It was the Fault of the Age, and not of Homer, if there wants that Delicacy in some of his Sentiments which now appears in the Works of Men of a much inferior Genius. Besides, if there are Blemishes in any particular Thoughts, there is an infinite Beauty in the greatest Part of them. In short, if there are many Poets who would not have fallen into the Merit of some of his Sentiments, there are none who could have risen up to the Greatness of others. Virgil has excelled all others in the Propriety of his Sentiments. Milton shines likewise very much in this Particular. Nor must we omit one Consideration which adds to his Honour and Reputation. Homer and Virgil introduced Persons whose Characters are commonly known among Men, and such as are to be met with either in History, or in ordinary Conversation. Milton's Characters, most of them, lie out of Nature, and were to be formed purely by his own Invention. It shews a greater Genius in Shakespeare to have drawn his Caliban, than his Hotspur or Julius Caesar. The one was to be supplied out of his own Imagination, whereas the other might have been formed upon Tradition, History and Observation. It was much easier therefore for Homer to find proper Sentiments for an Assembly of Grecian Generals, than for Milton to diversify his infernal Council with proper Characters, and inspire them with a Variety of Sentiments. The Lovers of Dido and Aeneas are only Copies of what has passed between other Persons. Adam and Eve, before the Fall, are a different Species from that of Mankind, who are descended from them and none but a Poet of the most unbounded Invention, and the most exquisite Judgment, could have filled their Conversation and Behaviour with [so many apt^y] Circumstances during their State of Innocence.

Nor is it sufficient for an Epic Poem to be filled with such Thoughts as are Natural, unless it abound also with such as are Sublime. Virgil in this Particular falls short of Homer. He has not indeed so many Thoughts that are Low and Vulgar, but at the same time has not so many Thoughts that are Sublime and Noble. The Truth of it is, Virgil seldom rises into very astonishing Sentiments, where he is not fired by the Iliad. He every where charms and pleases us by the Force of his own Genius, but seldom elevates and transports us where he does not fetch his Hints from Homer.

Thoughts. There are others of the Moderns who rival him in every other part of Poetry but in the Greatness of his Sentiments he triumphs over all the Poets both Modern and Ancient, Homer only excepted. It is impossible for the Imagination of Man to distend itself with greater Ideas, than those which he has laid together in his first, [second,] and sixth Book[s]. The seventh, which describes the Creation of the World, is likewise wonderfully Sublime, tho' not so apt to stir up Emotion in the Mind of the Reader, nor consequently so perfect in the Epic Way of Writing, because it is filled with less Action. Let the judicious Reader compare what Longinus has observed¹ on several Passages in Homer, and he will find Parallels for most of them in the Paradise Lost.

From what has been said we may infer, that as there are two kinds of Sentiments, the Natural and the Sublime, which are always to be pursued in an Heroic Poem, there are also two kinds of Thoughts which are carefully to be avoided. The first are such as are affected and unnatural, the second such as are mean and vulgar. As for the first kind of Thoughts, we meet with little or nothing that is like them in Virgil. He has none of those [trifling²] Points and Puerilities that are so often to be met with in Ovid, none of the Epigrammatic Turns of Lucan, none of those swelling Sentiments which are so frequent in Statius and Claudian, none of those mixed Embellishments of Passus. Every thing is just and natural. His Sentiments shew that he had a perfect Insight into human Nature, and that he knew every thing which was the most proper to affect it³.

Mr Dryden has in some Places, which I may hereafter take notice of, misrepresented Virgil's way of thinking as to this Particular, in the Translation he has given us of the Aeneid. I do not

While scarce the skies her horrid head can bound,

She stalks on earth (Iliad iv)
Of horses of the gods

Far as a shepherd from some spot on high O'er the wide main extends his boundless eye, Through such a space of air, with thund'ring sound,

At one long leap th' immortal coursers bound Iliad v

Longinus quotes also from the Iliad xix, the combat of the Gods, the description of Neptune, Iliad xi, and the Prayer of Ajax, Iliad xvii

² [trifle]

³ [affect it] I remember but one Line in him which has been objected against, by the Critics, as a point of Wit. It is in his ninth Book, where Juno, speaking of the Trojans, how they survived the Ruins of their City, expresses her self in the following Words

Num capti potuerunt capi, num incensa cremantur Pergara?

Were the Trojans taken even after they were Captives, or did Troy burn even when it was in Flames?

⁴ in better repute Kings and princes did not disdain the beast so much as mere tradesmen do in our times. 'Tis just the same with many other similes which in Homer's time were allowable. We should now pity a Poet that should be so silly and ridiculous as to compare a Hero to a piece of Fat. Yet Homer does it in a comparison he makes of Ulysses. The reason is that in these Primitive Times, wherein the Sacrifices were living creatures, the Blood and the Fat were the most noble, the most august, and the most holy things.

is composed of Persons, who have the Talent of Pleasing with Delicacy of Sentiments flowing from habitual Christianity of Thought, but mixed Company is frequently made up of Pretenders to Mirth, and is usually pestered with constrained, obscene, and painful Witicism. Now and then you meet with a Man so exactly formed for Pleasing, that it is no matter what he is doing or saying, that is to say, that there need no Manner of Importance in it, to make him gain upon every Body who hears or beholds him. This Felicity is not the Gift of Nature only, but must be attended with happy Circumstances, which add a Dignity to the familiar Behaviour which distinguishes him whom we call an agreeable Man. It is from this that every Body loves and esteems Polycarpus. He is in the Vigour of his Age and the Gayety of Life, but has passed through very conspicuous Scenes in it, though no Soldier, he has shared the Danger, and acted with great Gallantry and Generosity on a decisive Day of Battle. To have those Qualities which only make other Men conspicuous in the World as he is superannuated to him, is a Circumstance which gives Weight to his most indifferent Actions for as a known Credit is ready Cash to a Trader, so is acknowledged Merit immediate Distinction, and serves in the Place of Equipage to a Gentleman. This renders Polycarpus graceful in Mirth, important in Business, and regarded with Love in every ordinary Occurrence. But not to dwell upon Characters which have such particular Recommendations to our Hearts, let us turn our Thoughts rather to the Methods of Pleasing which must carry Men through the World who cannot pretend to such Advantages. Falling in with the particular Humour or Manner of one above you, abstracted from the general Rules of good Behaviour, is the Life of a Slave. A Parasite differs in nothing from the meanest Servant, but that the Footman hires himself for bodily Labour, subjected to go and come at the Will of his Master, but the other gives up his very Soul. He is prostituted to speak, and professes to think after the Mode of him whom he courts. This servitude to a Patron, in an honest Nature, would be more grievous than that of wearing his Livery therefore we will speak of those Methods only which are worthy and ingenious.

The happy Talent of Pleasing either those above you or below you, seems to be wholly owing to the Opinion they have of your Sincerity. This Quality is to attend the agreeable Man in all the Actions of his Life and I think there need no more be said in Honour of it, than that it is what forces the Approbation even of your Opponents. The guilty Man has an Honour for the Judge who with Justice pronounces against him the Sentence of Death itself. The Author of the Sentence at the Head of this Paper, was an excellent Judge of human Life, and pressed his own in Company the most agreeable that ever was in the World. Augustus lived amongst his Friends as if he had his Fortune to make in his own Court. Candour and Affability, accompanied with as much Power as ever Mortal was vested with, were what made him in the utmost Manner agreeable among a Set of admirable Men, who had Thoughts too high for Ambition, and Views too large to be gratified by what he could give them in the Disposal of an Empire, without the Pleasures of their mutual Conversation. A certain Uniformity of Taste and Judgment, which is natural to all of the same Order in the Species, was the Band of this Society, and the Emperor assumed no Figure in it but what he thought was his Due from his private Talents and Qualifications, as they contributed to advance the Pleasures and Sentiments of the Company.

Cunning People, Hypocrites, all who are but half virtuous, or half wise, are incapable of tasting the refined Pleasure of such an equal Company as could wholly exclude the Keck of Fortune in their Conversations. Horace, in the Discourse from whence I take the Hint of the present Speculation, lays down excellent Rules for Conduct in Conversation with Men of Power but he spends it with an Air of one who had no Need of such an Application for any thing which related to himself. It shews he understood what it was to be a skilful Courtier, by just Admonitions against Importunity, and shewing how forcible it was to seek Modestly of your own Warts. There is indeed something so shameless in taking all Opportunities to speak of your own Affairs, that he who is guilty of it towards him upon whom he depends, fares like the Beggar who exposes his Sores, which instead of moving Compassion makes the Man he begs of turn away from the Object.

I cannot tell what is become of him, but I remember about sixteen Years ago an honest Fellow, who so justly understood how disagreeable the Mention or Appearance of his Warts would make him, that I have often reflected upon him as a Counterpart of Irish, whom I have formerly mentioned. This Man, whom I have missed for some Years in my Walks, and have heard was someway employed about the Army, made it a Maxim, that good Wigs, delicate Lincin, and a cheerful Air, were to a poor Dependent the same that working Tools are to a poor Artificer. It was no small Entertunment to me, who knew his Circumstances, to see him, who had fasted two Days, attribute the Thinness they told him of to the Violence of some Gallantries he had lately been guilty of. The skilful Dissembler carried this on with the utmost Address and if any suspected his Affairs were narrow, it was attributed to indulging himself in some fashionable Vice rather than an irreproachable Poverty, which saved his Credit with those on whom he depended.

The main Art is to be as little troublesome as you can, and make all you hope for come rather as a Favour from your Patron than Claim from you. But I am here prating of what is the Method of Pleasing so as to succeed in the World, when there are Crowds who have, in City, Town, Court, and Country, arrived at considerable Acquisitions, and yet seem incapable of acting in any constant Tenour of Life, but have gone on from one successful Error to another. Therefore I think I may shorten this Enquiry after the Method of Pleasing and as the old Beau said to his Son, once for all, Pray, Jack, be a fine Gentleman, so may I, to my Reader abridge my Instructions, and finish the Art of Pleasing in a Word, Be rich. 1

HAVING already given an Account of the Dissection of a Bea's Heart, with the several Discoveries made on that Occasion, I shall here, according to my Promise, enter upon the Dissection of a Coquet's Heart, and communicate to the Public such Particularities as we observed in that curious Piece of Anatomy.

I should perhaps have waded this Undertaking, had not I been put in mind of my Promise by several of my unknown Correspondents, who are very importunate with me to write an Example of the Coquet, as I have already done of the Beau. It is therefore, in Compliance with the Requests of Friends, that I have looked over the Minutes of my former Dream, in order to give the Public in exact Relation to it, which I shall enter upon without further Preface.

Our Operator, before he engaged in this Visionary Dissection, told us, that there was nothing in his Art more difficult than to lay open the Heart of a Coquet, by reason of the many Labyrinths and Recesses which are to be found in it, and which do not appear in the Heart of any other Animal.

He desired us first of all to observe the Percardium, or outward Case of the Heart, which we did very attentively and by the help of our Glasses discern'd in it Millions of little Scars, which seem'd to have been occasioned by the Points of innumerable Darts and Arrows, that from time to time had glanced upon the outward Coat, though we could not discover the smallest Orifice, by which any of them had entered and pierced the inward Substance.

Every Smatterer in Anatomy knows that this Percardium, or Case of the Heart, contains in it a thin reddish Liquor, supposed to be bred from the Vapours which exhale out of the Heart, and, being stop'd here, are condensed into this watry Substance. Upon examining this Liquor, we found that it had in it all the Qualities of that Spirit which is made use of in the Thermometer, to shew the Change of Weather.

Nor must I here omit an Experiment one of the Company assured us he himself had made with this Liquor, which he found in great Quantity about the Heart of a Coquet whom he had formerly dissected. He affirm'd to us, that he had actually inclosed it in a small Tube made after the manner of a Weather Glass, but that instead of acquainting him with the Variations of the Atmosphere, it shew'd him the Qualities of those Persons who entered the Room where it stood. He affirm'd also, that it rose at the Approach of a Plume of Feathers, an embroidered Coat, or a Pair of fringed Gloves, and that it fell as soon as an ill shaped Perruwig, a clumsy Pair of Shoes, or an unfashionable Coat came into his House. Nay, he proceeded so far as to assure us, that upon his Laughing aloud when he stood by it, the Liquor mounted very sensibly, and immediately sunk again upon his looking serious. In short, he told us, that he knew very well by this Invention whenever he had a Man of Sense or a Coxcomb in his Room.

Having cleared away the Percardium, or the Case and Liquor above mentioned, we came to the Heart itself. The outward Surface of it was extremely slippery, and the Mucro, or Point, so very cold withal, that, upon endeavouring to take hold of it, it slid through the Fingers like a smooth Piece of Ice.

The Fibres were turned and twisted in a more intricate and perplex'd manner than they are usually found in other Hearts, insomuch that the whole Heart was wound up together in a Gordian Knot, and must have had very irregular and unequal Motions, whilst it was employ'd in its Vital Function.

One thing we thought very observable, namely, that, upon examining all the Vessels which came into it or issued out of it, we could not discover any Communication that it had with the Tongue.

We could not but take Notice likewise, that several of those little Nerves in the Heart which are affected by the Sentiments of Love, Hired, and other Passions, did not descend to this before us from the Brain, but from the Muscles which lie about the Eye.

Upon weighing the Heart in my Hand, I found it to be extremely light, and consequently very hollow, which I did not wonder at, when upon looking into the Inside of it, I saw Multitudes of Cells and Cisterns running one within another, as our Historians describe the Apartments of Rosamond's Bower. Several of these little Hollows were stuff'd with innumerable sorts of Insects, which I shal forbear giving any particular Account of, and shall therefore only take Notice of what lay first and uppermost, which, upon our untolding, it and applying our Microscopes to it, appeared to be a fine coloured Hood.

We were inform'd that the Lady of this Heart, when living, receiv'd the Addresses of several who made Love to her, and did not only give each of them Encouragement, but made every one she convers'd with believe that she regard'd him with an Eye of Kindness for which Reason we expected to have seen the Impression of Multitudes of Faces among the several Parts and Foldings of the Heart but to our great Surprise not a single Print of this nature discover'd it self till we came into the very Core and Center of it. We there observ'd a little Figure, which, upon applying our Glasses to it, appear'd dressed in a very fantastick manner. The more I look'd upon it, the more I thought I had seen the Face before, but could not possibly recollect either the Place or Time when, at length, one of the Company, who had examin'd this Figure more nicely than the rest, shew'd us plainly by the Make of its Face, and the several Turns of its Features, that the little Idol which was thus lodg'd in the very Middle of the Heart was the deceased Beau, whose Head I gave some Account of in my last Tuesday's Paper.

As soon as we had finish'd our Dissection, we resolv'd to make an Experiment of the Heart, not being able to determine among our selves the Nature of its Substance, which differ'd in so many Particulars from that of the Heart in other Females. Accordingly we laid it into a Pan of burning Coals, when we observed in it a certain Salamandrine Quality, that made it capable of living in the midst of Fire and Flame, without being consumed, or so much as singed.

As we were admiring this strange Phœnomenon, and standing round the Heart in a Circle, it gave a most prodigious Sigh or rather Crack, and dispersed all at once in Smoke and Vapour. This imaginary Noise, which methought was louder than the burst of a Cannon, produced such a violent Shake in my Brain, that it dissipated the Fumes of Sleep, and left me in an Instant broad awake.

It is a lamentable thing that every Man is full of Complaints, and constantly uttering Sentences against the Fickleness of Fortune, when People generally bring upon themselves all the Calamities they fall into, and are constantly heaping up Matter for their own Sorrow and Disappointment. That which produces the greatest Part of the [Delusions²] of Mankind, is a false Hope, which People indulge with so sanguine a Flattery to themselves, that their Hearts are bent upon fantastical Advantages which they had no Reason to believe should ever have arrived to them. By this unjust Measure of calculating their Happiness, they often mourn with real Affliction for imaginary Losses. When I am talking of this unhappy way of accounting for our selves, I cannot but reflect upon a particular Set of People, who, in their own Favour, resolve every thing that is possible into what is probable, and then reckon on that Probability as on what must certainly happen. WILL HONEYCOMB, upon my observing his looking on a Lady with some particular Attention, gave me an Account of the great Distresses which had laid waste that her very fine Face, and had given an Air of Melancholy to a very agreeable Person. That Lady, and a couple of Sisters of hers, were, said WILL, fourteen Years ago, the greatest Fortunes about Town but without having any Loss by bad Tenants, by bad Securities, or any Damage by Sea or Land, were reduced to very narrow Circumstances. They were at that time the most inaccessible haughty Beauties in Town and their Pretensions to take upon them at that unmerciful rate, was rais'd upon the following Scheme, according to which all their Lov'ers were answered.

'Our Father is a youngish Man, but then our 'Mother is somewhat older, and not likely to have 'any Children. His Estate, being 800^l per Annum, at 20 Years Purchase, is worth 16,000^l, 'Our Uncle who is above 50, has 400^l per Annum, In Prospect of this, and the Knowledge of her own personal Merit, every one was contemptible in their Eyes, and they refus'd those Offers which had been frequently made 'em. But mark the End. The Mother dies, the Father is married again, and has a Son, on him was entail'd the Father's, Uncle's, and Grand-mother's Estate. This cut off 43,000^l. The Maiden Aunt married a tall Irishman, and with her went the 6000^l. The Widow died, and left but enough to pay her Debts and bury her, so that there remained for these three Girls but their own 1000^l. They had [by] this time pass'd their Prime, and got on the wrong side of thirty and must pass the Remunder of their Days, upbraiding Mankind that they mind nothing but Money, and bewailing that Virtue, Sense and Modesty are had at present in no manner of Estimation.

I mention this Case of Ladies before any other, because it is the most irreparable. For tho' Youth is the Time less capable of Reflection, it is in that Sex the only Season in which they can advance their Fortunes. But if we turn our Thoughts to the Men, we see such Crowds of Unhappy from no other Reason, but an ill grounded Hope, that it is hard to say which they rather deserve, our Pity or Contempt. It is not unpleasant to see a Fellow after grown old in Attendance, and after having pass'd half a Life in Servitude, call himself the unhappiest of all Men, and pretend to be disappointed because a Courtier broke his Word. He that promises himself any thing but what may naturally arise from his own Property or Labour, and goes beyond the Desire of possessing above two Parts in three even of that, lays up for himself an increasing Heap of Afflictions and Disappointments. There are but two Means in the World of gaining by other Men, and these are by being either agreeable or considerable. The Generality of Mankind do all things for their own sakes, and when you hope any thing from Persons above you, if you cannot say, I can be thus agreeable or thus serviceable, it is ridiculous to pretend to the Dignity of being unfortunate when they leave you you were injudicious, in hoping for any other than to be neglected, for such as can come within these Descriptions of being capable to please or serve your Patron, when his Humour or Interests call for their Capacity either way.

quire my Attention, I give myself up wholly to them till they are set in Order

In short, we often see Men of dull and phlegmatick Tempers, arriving to great Estates, by making a regular and orderly Disposition of their Business, and that without it the greatest Parts and most lively Imaginations rather puzzle their Affairs, than bring them to an happy Issue

From what has been said, I think I may lay it down as a Maxim, that every Man of good common Sense may, if he pleases, in his particular Station of Life, most certainly be Rich The Reason why we sometimes see that Men of the greatest Capricities are not so, is either because they despise Wealth in Comparison of something else or at least are not content to be getting an Estate, unless they may do it their own way, and at the same time enjoy all the Pleasures and Gratifications of Life

But besides these ordinary Forms of growing Rich, it must be allowed that there is Room for Genius, as well in this as in all other Circumstances of Life

Tho' the Ways of getting Money were long since very numerous and tho' so many new ones have been found out of late Years, there is certainly still remaining so large a Field for Invention, that a Man of an indifferent Head might easily sit down and draw up such a Plan for the Conduct and support of his Life, as is never yet once thought of

We daily see Methods put in practice by hungry and ingenious Men, which demonstrate the Power of Invention in this Particular

It is reported of Scaramouch, the first famous Italian Comedien, that being at Paris and in great Want, he bethought himself of constantly plying near the Door of a noted Perfumer in that City, and when any one came out who had been buying Snuff, never failed to desire a Taste of them when he had by this Means got together a Quantity made up of several different Sorts, he sold it again at a lower Rate to the same Perfumer, who finding out the Trick, called it Talac de mille fleurs, or Snuff of a thousand Flowers The Story further tells us, that by this means he got a very comfortable Subsistence, till making too much haste to grow Rich, he one Day took such an unreasonable Pinch out of the Box of a Swiss Officer, is engaged him in a Quarrel, and obliged him to quit this Ingenious Way of Life

Nor can I in this Place omit doing Justice to a Youth of my own Country, who, tho' he is scarce yet twelve Years old, has with great Industry and Application returned to the Art of beating the Grinders March on his Chin I am credibly informed that by this means he does not only maintain himself and his Mother, but that he is laying up Money every Day, with a Design, if the War continues, to purchase a Drum at least, if not a Colours

I shall conclude these Instances with the Device of the famous Rabclaus, when he was at a great Distance from Paris, and without Money to bear his Expences thither This ingenious Author being thus sharp set, got together a convenient Quantity of Brick-Dust, and having disposed of it into several Papers, writ upon one Pojson for Monsieur, upon a second, Pojson for the Dauphin, and on a third, Pojson for the King. Having made this Provision for the Royal Family of France, he hid his Papers so that his Landlord, who was an Inquisitive Man, and a good Subject, might get a Sight of them

The Plot succeeded as he desired The Host gave immediate Intelligence to the Secretary of State

The Secretary presently sent down a Special Messenger, who brought up the Trutor to Court, and provided him at the King's Expence with proper Accommodations on the Road As soon as he appeared he was known to be the Celebrated Rabclaus, and his Powder upon Examination on being found very Innocent, the Jest was only laid at for which a less eminent Drole would have been sent to the Gallies

Trade and Commerce might doubtless be still varied a thousand Ways, out of which would arise such Branches as have not yet been touched The famous Do ly is still fresh in every one's Memory, who rused by a Fortune by finding out Materials for such Stuffs as might at once be cheap and genteel I have heard it rumored, that he did not he discovered this frugal Method of gratifying our Pride, we should hardly have been [able] to carry on the last War

I regard Trade not only as highly advantageous to the Commonwealth in general but as the most natural and likely Method of making a Man's Fortune, having observed, since my being a Spectator in the World, greater Estates got about Clairge, than at Witchall or St. James I believe I may also add, that the first Acquisitions are generally attended with more Satisfaction, and as good a Conscience

I must not however close this Essay, without observing that what has been said is only intended for Persons in the common ways of Thriving, and is not designed for those Men who from low beginnings push themselves up to the Top of States, and the most considerable Figures in Life My Maxim of Saving is not designed for such as these, since nothing is more usual than for Thrift to disappoint the Ends of Ambition, it being almost impossible that the Mind should be intent upon Trifles, while it is at the same time forming some great Design

I may therefore compare these Men to a great Poet, who, as Longinus says, while he is full of the most magnificent Ideas, is not always at leisure to mind the little Beauties and Niceties of his Art

I would however have all my Readers take great care how they miste themselves for un common Genius's, and Men above Rule, since it is very easy for them to be deceived in this Particular

* [able so well]
* [descend to and be]

'in order to put the Congregation into the Tune, she was all the while curtsying to Sir Anthony in so affected and indecent a manner, that the Indignation I conceived at it made me forget myself so far, as from the Tune of that Psalm to wander into Southwell's Tune, and from thence into Windsor's Tune, still unable to recover myself till I had with the utmost Confusion set a new one. Nay, I have often seen her rise up and smile and curtsy to one at the lower End of the Church in the midst of a Gloria Patri and when I have spoke the Assent to a Prayer with a long Amen uttered with decent Gravity, she has been rolling her Eyes around about in such a Manner, as plainly shewed, however she was moved, it was not towards an Heavenly Object. In fine, she extended her Conquests so far over the Males, and roused such Envy in the Females, that what between Love of those and the Jealousy of these, I was almost the only Person that looked in the Prayer Book all Church time. I had several Projects in my Head to put a Stop to this growing Mischief but as I have long lived in Kent, and there often heard how the Kentish Men evaded the Conqueror, by carrying green Boughs over their Herds, it put me in mind of practising this Device against Mrs. Simper. I find I have preserved many a young Man from her Eye shot by this Means therefore humbly pray the Boughs may be fixed, till she shall give Security for her peaceable Intentions.

Your Humble Servant,
Francis Sternhold

HAVING already treated of the Fable, the Characters, and Sentiments in the Paradise Lost, we are in the last Place to consider the Language, and as the Learned World is very much divided upon Milton as to this Point, I hope they will excuse me if I appear particular in any of my Opinions and incline to those who judge the most advantageously of the Author.

It is requisite that the Language of an Heroic Poem should be both Perspicuous and Sublime. In proportion as either of these two Qualities are wanting, the Language is imperfect. Perspicuity is the first and most necessary Qualification, inasmuch that a good natur'd Reader sometimes overlooks a little Slip even in the Grammar or Syntax, where it is impossible for him to mistake the Poet's Sense. Of this Kind is that Passage in Milton, wherein he speaks of Satan

—God and his Son except,
Created thing nought wold he nor shunn'd

And that in which he describes Adam and Eve Adam the goodliest Man of Men since born His Sons, the fairest of her Daughters I've

It is plain, that in the former of these Passages according to the natural Syntax, the Divine Persons mentioned in the first Line are represented as created Beings, and that, in the other, Adam and Eve are confounded with their Sons and Daughters. Such little Blemishes as these, when the I thought is great and natural, we should, with Horace, impute to a pardonable Inadvertency, or to the Weakness of human Nature, which cannot attend to each minute Particular, and give the last Finishing to every Circumstance in so long a Work. The Ancient Critics therefore, who were acted by a Spirit of Candour, rather than that of Caviling, invented certain Figures of Speech, on purpose to palliate little Errors of this nature in the Writings of those Authors who had so many greater Beauties to atone for them.

If Clearness and Perspicuity were only to be consulted, the Poet would have nothing else to do but to cloath his Thoughts in the most plain and natural Expressions. But since it often happens that the most obvious Phrases, and those which are used in ordinary Conversation, become too familiar to the Ear, and contract a kind of Meanness by passing through the Mouths of the Vulgar, a Poet should take particular Care to guard himself against Idiomatick Ways of Speaking. Ovid and Lucan have many Poornesses of Expression upon this Account, as taking up with the first Phrases that offered, without putting themselves to the Trouble of looking after such as would not only have been natural, but also elevated and sublime. Milton has but few Failings in this Kind, of which, however, you may meet with some Instances, as² in the following Passages.

Embrios and Idiots, Eremites and Fryars, White, Black, and Grey, with all their Trumpery, Here Pilgrims roam—

*A while discourse they hold,
No fear lest Dinner cool when this began Our Author—*

*Who of all Ages to succeed, but feeling
The Evil on him brought by me, will curse
My Head, all fare our Ancestor impure, For this we may thank Adam—*

The Great Masters in Composition, knew very well that many an elegant Phrase becomes improper for a Poet or an Orator, when it has been debased by common Use. For this Reason the Works of Ancient Authors, which are written in dead Languages, have a great Advantage over those which are written in Languages that are now

² [see an Instance or two]

'Diction consists in being perspicuous without 'being mean'

spoken. Were there any mean Phrases or Idioms in Virgil and Homer, they would not shock the Ear of the most delicate Modern Reader, so much as they would have done that of an old Greek or Roman, because we never hear them pronounced in our Streets or in our Conversation.

It is no therefore sufficient that the Language of an Epic Poem be Perspicuous, unless it be also Sublime. To this end it ought to deviate from the common Forms and ordinary Phrases of Speech. The Judgment of a Poet very much discovers itself in shunning the common Roads of Expression, without falling into such ways of Speech as may seem stiff and unnatural. He must not well into a false Sublime, by endeavouring to avoid the other Extremity. Among the Greeks Æschylus, and sometimes Sophocles were guilty of this Fault among the Latins Catullus and Statius, and among our own Countrymen, Snodgrass and Lee. In these Authors the Affectation of Greatness often hurts the Perspicuity of the Style, as in many others the Endeavour after Perspicuity prejudices its Greatness.

Aristotle has observed, that the Idiomatical Style may be avoided, and the Sublime formed, by the following Methods.¹ First by the Use of Metaphors. Such are those of Milton;

Impartruis'd to cut another's Arrows
And in his Hand a Reed Stood upright with Fire
The grassy Cleads now calv'd, [Spangled to his Eyes]

In these and innumerable other Instances the Metaphors are very bold but just. I must however observe that the Metaphors are not [so] thick sown in Milton, which always savours too much of Wit, that they never clash with one another, which, as Aristotle observes, turns a Sentence into a kind of an Enigma or Riddle,² and that he seldom has recourse to them where the proper and natural Words will do as well.

Another way of raising the Language, and giving it a Poetical Turn, is to make use of the Idioms of other Tongues. Virgil is full of the Greek Forms of Speech, which the Critics call Hellenisms, as Horace in his Odes abounds with them much more than Virgil.³ I need not mention the several Dialects which Horace has made use of for this end. Milton, in conformity with the Practice of the Ancient Poets, and with Aristotle's Rule, has infused a great many Latinisms, as well as Græcisms, and some few Hebraisms, into the Language of his Poem, as towards the Beginning of it

Nor did I late, not perceive the evil Plague?
In which they were, or the fierce Pains I feel Yet in their German's Voice they soon obey'd——Who shall lift a li'ning Fire?
The dark unknown of the Abyss,
And through the palpable Obscure find out His way, or spread his airy Flight?
Uphorn with his fatigable Wings Over the vast Abyss!

[—So both ascend
In the Visions of God—

Book 2.]

Under this Head may be reckon'd the placing the Adjective after the Substantive, the Transposition of Words, the turning the Adjective into a Substantive, with several other Foreign Modes of Speech which this Poet has naturalized to give his Verse the greater Sound, and throw it out of Pose.

The third Method mentioned by Aristotle is what agrees with the Genius of the Greek Language more than with that of any other Tongue, and is therefore more used by Homer than by any other Poet. I mean the lengthening of a Phrase by the Addition of Words, which may either be inserted or omitted, as also by the extending or contracting of particular Words by the Insertion or Omission of certain Syllables. Milton has put in practice this Method of raising his Language, as far as the Nature of our Tongue will permit, as in the Passage above-mentioned, Erewhile, [for] what is Hermis, in common Discourse. If you observe the Measure of his Verse, he has with great Judgment suppressed a Syllable in several Words, and shortened those of two Syllables into one, by which Method, besides the above-mentioned Advantage, he has given a greater Variety to his Numbers. But this Practice is more particularly remarkable in the Names of Persons and of Countries, as Belshazzar, Hesselar, and in many other Particulars, where he has either changed the Name, or made use of that which is not the most commonly known, that he might the better depart from the Language of the Vulgar.

The same Reason recommended to him several old Words, which also makes his Poem appear the more venerable, and gives it a greater Air of Antiquity.

I must likewise take notice, that there are in Milton's several Words of his own coining, as Cerberian, murder'd, Hell-doom's, Emerson, Atoms, and many others. If the Reader is offended at this Liberty in our English Poet, I would recommend him to a Discourse in Plutarch,⁴ which shews us how frequently Horace has made use of the same Liberty.

² [like those in Milton]

³ That language is elevated and remote from the vulgar idiom which employs unusual words or unusual, I mean foreign, metaphorical, extended—all, in short, that are not common words. Yet, should a poet compose his Dictionary entirely of such words the result would be either an enigma or a barbarous jargon an enigma if composed of metaphors, a barbarous jargon if composed of foreign words. For the essence of an enigma consists in putting together things apparently inconsistent and impossible, and at the same time saying nothing but what is true. Now this cannot be effected by the mere arrangement of words by the metaphorical use of them it may.

⁴ On Life and Poetry of Homer, wrongly ascribed to Plutarch, Bl. I § 26

which our Tongue would afford him, has carried our Language to a greater Height than any of the English Poets have ever done before or after him, and made the Sublimity of his Style equal to that of his Sentiments.

I have been the more particular in these Observations on Milton's Style, because it is that Part of him in which he appears the most singular. The Remarks I have here made upon the Practice of other Poets, with my Observations out of Aristotle, will perhaps alleviate the Prejudice which some have taken to his Poem upon this Account tho' after all, I must confess that I think his Style, tho' admirable in general, is in some places too much stiffened and obscured by the frequent Use of those Methods, which Aristotle has prescribed for the raising of it.

This Redundancy of those several Ways of Speech, which Aristotle calls foreign Language, and with which Milton has so very much enriched, and in some Places darkened the Language of his Poem, was the more proper for his use, because his Poem is written in Blank Verse Rhyme, without any other Assistance, throws the Language off from Prose, and very often makes an indifferent Phrase pass unregarded but where the Verse is not built upon Rhymes, there Pomp of Sound, and Energy of Expression, are indispensably necessary to support the Style, and keep it from falling into the Plainness of Prose.

Those who have not a Taste for this Elevation of Style, and are apt to ridicule a Poet when he departs from the common Forms of Expression, would do well to see how Aristotle has treated an Ancient Author called Eclid,¹ for his insipid Mirth upon this Occasion Mr Dryden used to call [these] sort of Men his Prose-Criticks.

¹ Poetics, II § 26. 'A judicious intermixture is requisite. It is without reason, therefore, that some critics have censured these modes of speech, and ridiculed the poet for the use of them as old Euclid did, objecting that versification would be an easy business, if it were permitted to lengthen words at pleasure, and then giving a burlesque example of that sort of diction. In the employment of all the species of unusual words, moderation is necessary for metaphors, foreign words, or any of the others improperly used, and with a design to be ridiculous, would produce the same effect. But how great a difference is made by a proper and temperate use of such words may be seen in heroic verse. Let any one put common words in the place of the metaphorical, the foreign, and others of the same kind, and he will be convinced of the truth of what I say.' He then gives two or three examples of the effect of changing poetical for common words. As, that (in plays now lost) 'the same Iambic verse occurs in Aeschylus and Euripides but by means of a single alteration—the substitution of a foreign for a common and usual word—one of these verses appears beautiful the other ordinary. For Aeschylus in his Philoctetes says, "The poisonous wound that eats my flesh." But Euripides for (σφοδρὴ) "eats" says (βουβαταί) "banquets on." ² [this]

I should, under this Head of the Language, consider Milton's Numbers, in which he has made use of several Elisions, which are not customary among other English Poets, as may be particularly observed in his cutting off the Letter V, when it precedes a Vowel.¹ This, and some other Innovations in the Measure of his Verse, has varied his Numbers in such a manner, as

¹ This is not particularly observed. On the very first page of P. L. we have a line with the final j twice sounded before a vowel,

Invoke thy aid to my adventurous song

Again a few lines later,

*That to the height of this great argument
I may assert Eternal Providence*

Ten lines farther we read of the Serpent

Stirr'd up with envy and revenge

We have only an apparent elision of y a few lines later in his aspiring

To set myself in glory above his peers, for the *l*ne would be ruined were the j to be omitted by a reader. The extreme shortness of the two unaccented syllables, j and a, gives them the quantity of one in the metre, and allows by the turn of voice a suggestion of exuberance heightening the force of the word glory. Three lines lower Milton has no elision of the y before a vowel in the line,

Against the throne and monarchy of God

Nor eight lines after that in the words 'day and night'. There is elision of y in the line,

That were an ignominy and shame beneath This down fall

But none a few lines lower down in Sole reigning holds the tyranny of heaven

When the j stands by itself, unaccented, immediately after an accented syllable, and precedes a vowel that is part of another unaccented syllable standing immediately before an accented one, Milton receives the consequence and does not attempt to give it the force of a distinct syllable. But Addison's vague notion that it was Milton's custom to cut off the final j when it precedes a vowel, and that for the sake of being uncommon, came of inaccurate observation. For the reasons just given, the y of the word glory runs into the succeeding syllable, and most assuredly is not cut off, when we read of the excess Of glory obscur'd as when the sun, new ris'n, Looks through the horizontal misty air, but the y in 'misty' stands as a full syllable because the word air is accented. So again in

*Death, as oft accus'd Of tardy execution, since denounc'd
The day of his offence*

The y of 'tardy' is a syllable because the vowel following it is accented, the y also of 'day' remains, because, although an unaccented vowel follows, it is itself part of an accented syllable.

makes them incapable of satiating the Ear, and cloying the Reader, which the same uniform Measure would certainly have done, and which the perpetual Returns of Rhyme never fail to do in long Narrative Poems. I shall close these Reflections upon the Language of Paradise Lost, with observing that Milton has copied after Homer rather than Virgil in the length of his Periods, the Copiousness of his Phrases, and the running of his Verses into one another.

MR SPECTATOR, York, Jan 18, 1712
I PRETEND not to inform a Gentleman of so just a Taste, whenever he pleases to use it, but it may not be amiss to inform your Readers, that there is a false Delicacy as well as a true one. True Delicacy, as I take it, consists in Exactness of Judgment and Dignity of Sentiment, or if you will Purity of Affection, as this is opposed to Corruption and Grossness. There are Pedants in Breeding as well as in Learning. The Eye that cannot bear the Light is not delicate but sore. A good Constitution appears in the Soundness and Vigour of the Parts, not in the Squeamishness of the Stomach. And a false Delicacy is Affectation, not Politeness. What then can be the Standard of Delicacy but Truth and Virtue? Virtue, which, as the Satyrist long since observed, is real Honour whereas the other Distinctions among Mankind are merely titular. Judging by that Rule, in my Opinion, and in that of many of your virtuous Female Readers, you are so far from deserving Mr Courtly's Accusation, that you seem too gentle, and to allow too many Excuses for an enormous Crime, which is the Reproach of the Age, and is in all its Branches and Degrees expressly forbidden by that Religion we pretend to profess, and whose Laws, in a Nation that calls it self Christian, one would think should take Place of those Rules which Men of corrupt Minds, and those of weak Understandings follow. I know not any thing more pernicious to good Manners, than the giving fair Names to foul Actions, for this confounds Vice and Virtue, and takes off that natural Horror we have to Evil. An innocent Creature, who would start at the Name of Strumpet, may think it pretty to be called a Mistress, especially if her Seducer has taken care to inform her, that a Union of Hearts is the principal Matter in the Sight of Heaven, and that the Business at Church is a meer idle Ceremony. Who knows not that the Difference between obscene and modest Words expressing the same Action, consists only in the accessory Idea, for there is nothing immodest in Letters and Syllables. Fornication and Adultery are modest Words because they express an Evil Action as criminal, and so as to excite Horror and Aversion. Whereas Words representing the Pleasure rather than the Sin, are for this Reason indecent and dishonest. Your Papers would be chargeable with something worse than Indelicacy, they would be Immoral, did you treat the detestable Sins of Uncleanness in the same manner as you rally in impudent Self-love and in artful Glance as those Laws would be very unjust, that should chastise Murder and Petty Larceny with the same Punishment. Even Delicacy requires that the Pity shewn to distressed indigent Wickedness first betrayed into, and then expelled the Harbour of the Brothel, should be changed to Detestation, when we consider primped Vice in the Habitations of the Wealthy. The most free Person of Quality, in Mr Courtly's Phrase, that is, to speak properly, a Woman of Figure who has forgot her Birth and Breeding, dishonoured her Relations and her self, abandoned her Virtue and Reputation, together with the natural Modesty of her Sex, and misquod her very Soul, is so far from deserving to be treated with no worse Character than that of a kind Woman, (which is doubtless Mr Courtly's Meaning, if he has any,) that one can scarce be too severe on her, in as much as she sins against greater Restraints, is less exposed, and liable to fewer Temptations, than Beauty in Poverty and Distress. It is hoped therefore, Sir, that you will not lay aside your generous Design of exposing that monstrous Wickedness of the Town, whereby a Multitude of Innocents are sacrificed in a more barbarous Manner than those who were offered to Moloch. The Unchaste are provoked to see their Vice exposed, and the Chaste cannot rise into such Filth without Danger of Defilement, but a meer Spectator may look into the Bottom, and come off without partaking in the Guilt. The doing so will convince us you pursue publick Good, and not merely your own Advantage. But if your Zeal slackens, how can one help thinking that Mr Courtly's Letter is but a Feint to get off from a Subject, in which either your own, or the private and base Ends of others to whom you are partial, or those [of] whom you are afraid, would not endure a Reformation?

I am, Sir, your humble Servant and Admirer, so long as you tread in the Paths of Truth, Virtue, and Honour

MR SPECTATOR,

Trin Coll Cantab Jan 12, 1711-12

'Tis my Fortune to have a Chamber-Fellow, with whom, tho' I agree very well in many Sentiments, yet there is one in which we are as contrary as Light and Darkness. We are both in Love. His Mistress is a lovely Fair, and mine a lovely Brown. Now is the Praise of our Mistresses. Beauty employs much of our Time, we have frequent Quarrels in entering upon that Subject, while each says all he can to defend his Choice. For my own part, I have racked my Fancy to the utmost, and sometimes, with the greatest Warmth of Imagination, have told him, That Night was made before Day, and many more fine Things, tho' without any effect. Nay, last Night I could not forbear saying with more Heat than Judgment, that the Devil ought to be painted white. Now my Desire is, Sir, that you would 'grow cool, and shun her whom they before seemed so much to admire, and proceed to act the same common place Villany towards another.' A Coxcomb flushed with many of these infamous Victories shrill say he is sorry for the poor Fools, protest and vow he never thought of Matrimony, and wonder talking civilly can be so strangely misinterpreted. Now, Mr SPECTATOR, you that are a professed Friend to Love, will, I hope, observe upon those who abuse that noble Passion, and raise it in innocent Minds by a deceitful Affection of it, after which they desert the Enamoured. Pray bestow a little of your Counsel to those fond believing Females who already have or are in Danger of broken Hearts in which you will oblige a great Part of this Town, but in a particular Manner,

SIR, Your (3. & Heart whole) Admirer, and devoted humble Servant, Melania.

Melania's Complaint is occasioned by so general a Folly, that it is wonderful one could so long overlook it. But this false Gallantry proceeds from an Impotence of Mind, which makes those who are guilty of it incapable of pursuing what they themselves approve. Many a Man wishes a Woman his Wife whom he dares not take for such. Tho' no one has Power over his Inclinations or Fortunes, he is a Slave to common Fame. For this Reason I think Melania gives them too soft a Name in that of Male Coquets. I now not why Irrresolution of Mind should not be more contemptible than Impotence of Body, and these frivolous Admirers would be but tenderly used, in being only included in the same Term with the Insufficient another Way. They whom my Correspondent calls Male Coquets, shall hereafter be called Fribblers. A Fribbler is one who professes Rapture and Admiration for the Woman to whom he addresses, and dreads nothing so much as her Consent. His Heart can flutter by the Force of Imagination, but cannot fix from the Force of Judgment. It is not uncommon for the Parents of young Women of moderate Fortune to wink at the Addresses of Fribblers, and expose their Children to the ambiguous Behaviour which Melania complains of, till by the Fondness to one they are to lose, they become incapable of Love towards others, and by Consequence in their future Marriage lead a joyless or a miserable Life. As therefore I shall in the Speculations which regard Love be as severe as I ought on Jilts and Libertine Women, so will I be as little merciful to insignificant and mischievous Men. In order to this, all Visitants who frequent Families wherein there are young Females, are forthwith required to declare themselves, or absent from Places where their Presence brings such as would pass their Time more to the Advantage of those whom they visit. It is a Matter of too great Moment to be dallied with and I shall expect from all my young People a satisfactory Account of Appearances. Strephon has from the Publication hereof seven Days to explain the Riddle he presented to Eudamia, and Chloris in Hour after this comes to her Hand, to declare whether she will have Philotas, whom a Woman of no less Merit than her self, and of superior Fortune, languishes to call her own

To the SPECTATOR

SIR,

'Since so many Dealers turn Authors, and write quaint Advertisements in praise of their Wares, one who from an Author turn'd Dealer may be allowed for the Advancement of Trade to turn Author again. I will not however set up like some of 'em, for selling cheaper than the most able honest Tradesman can, nor do I send this to be better known for Choice and Cheapness of China and Japan Wares, Tea, Fans, Muslins, Pictures, Arrack, and other Indian Goods. Placed as I am in Leadenhall-street, near the India-Company, and the Centre of that Trade, I thank to my fair Customers, my Warehouse is graced as well as the Benefit Days of my Plays and Operas, and the foreign Goods I sell seem no less acceptable than the foreign Books I translated, Rabelais and Don Quixote. This the Critics allow me, and while they like my Wares they may dispraise my Writing. But as 'tis not so well known yet that I frequently cross the Seas of late, and speaking Dutch and French, besides other Languages, I have the Convenience of buying and importing rich Brocades, Dutch Atlases, with Gold and Silver, or without, and other foreign Silks of the newest Modes and best Fabricks, fine Flanders Lace, Linnens, and Pictures, at the best Hand. This my new way of Trade I have fallen into I cannot better publish than by an Application to you. My Wares are fit only for such as your Readers and I would beg of you to print this Address in your Paper, that those whose Minds you adorn may take the Ornaments for their Persons and Houses from me. This, Sir, if I may presume to beg it, will be the greater Favour, as I have lately received rich Silks and fine Lace to a considerable Value, which will be sold cheap for a quick Return, and as I have also a large Stock of other Goods Indian Silks were formerly a great Branch of our Trade and since we must not sell 'em, we must seek Amends by dealing in others. This I hope will plead for one who would lessen the Number of Teazers of the Muses, and who, suiting his Spirit to his Circumstances, humbles the Poet to exalt the Citizen. Like a true Tradesman, I hardly ever look into any Books but those of Accounts. To say the Truth, I cannot, I think, give you a better Idea of my being a downright Man of Traffick, than by acknowledging I oftener read the Advertisements, than the Matter of even your Paper. I am under a great Temptation to Peter Anthony Motteux, the writer of this letter, was born in Normandy, and came as a refugee to England at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Here he wrote about 14 plays, translated Bayle's Dictionary, Montaigne's Essays, and Don Quixote, and established himself also as a trader in Leadenhall Street. He had a wife and a fine young family when (at the age of 56, and six years after the date of this letter) he was found dead in a house of ill fame near Temple Bar under circumstances that caused a reward of fifty pounds to be offered for the discovery of his murderer.

ation would be sufficient to extinguish the Bitterness of Hatred, the Thurst of Avarice, and the Cruelty of Ambition

I am very much pleased with the Passage of Antiphanes a very ancient Poet, who lived near an hundred Years before Socrates, which represents the Life of Man under this View, as I have here translated it Word for Word. Be not grieved, says he, above measure for thy deceased Friends! They¹ are not dead, but have only finished that Journey which it is necessary for every one of us to take. We ourselves must go to that great Place of Reception in which they are all of them assembled, and in this general Rendezvous of Mankind, live together in another State of Being

I think I have, in a former Paper, taken notice of those beautiful Metaphors in Scripture, where Life is termed a Pilgrimage, and those who pass through it are called Strangers and Sojourners upon Earth. I shall conclude this with a Story, which I have somewhere read in the Travels of Sir John Chardin,² that Gentleman after having told us, that the Inns which receive the Caravans in Persia, and the Eastern Countries, are called by the Name of Caravansaries, gives us a Relation to the following Purpose

A Dervise, travelling through Tartary, being arrived at the Town of Balk, went into the King's Palace by Mistake, as thinking it to be a publick Inn or Caravansary. Having looked about him for some time, he enter'd into a long Gallery, where he laid down his Wallet, and spread his Carpet, in order to repose himself upon it after the Manner of the Eastern Nations. He had not been long in this Posture before he was discovered by some of the Gurds, who asked him what was his Business in that Place? The Dervise told them he intended to take up his Night's Lodging in that Caravansary. The Guards let him know, in a very angry manner, that the House he was in was not a Caravansary, but the King's Palace. It happened that the King himself passed through the Gallery during this Debate, and smiling at the Mistake of the Dervise, asked him how he could possibly be so dull as not to distinguish a Palace from a Caravansary? Sir, says the Dervise, give me leave to ask your Majesty a Question or two. Who were the Persons that lodged in this House when it was first built? The King replied, His Ancestors. And who, says the Dervise, was the last Person that lodged here? The King replied, His Father. And who is it, says the Dervise, that lodges here at present? The King told him, that it was he himself. And who, says the Dervise, will be here after you? The King answered, The young Prince his Son. Ah Sir, said the Dervise, a House that changes its Inhabitants so often, and receives such a perpetual Succession of Guests, is not a Palace but a Caravansary. L

He travelled into Persia and the East Indies, and his account of his voyages was translated into English, German, and Flemish. He was living when this paper appeared, but died in the following year, at the age of 70.

THE Players, who know I am very much their Friend, take all Opportunities to express a Gratitude to me for being so. They could not have a better Occasion of Obliging me, than one which they lately took hold of. They desired my Friend WILL HONEYCOMB to bring me to the Reading of a new Tragedy it is called The distressed Mother.² I must confess, tho' some Days are passed since I enjoyed that Entertainment, the Passions of the several Characters dwell strongly upon my Imagination and I congratulate to the Age, that they are at last to see Truth and humane Life represented in the Incidents which concern Heroes and Heroines. The Style of the Play is such as becomes those of the first Education, and the Sentiments worthy those of the highest Figure. It was a most exquisite Pleasure to me, to observe real Fear drop from the Eyes of those who had long made it their Profession to dissemble Affliction and the Player, who read, frequently throw down the Book, till he had given vent to the Humanity which rose in him at some irresistible Touches of the imagined Sorrow. We have seldom had any Female Distress on the Stage, which did not, upon cool Examination, appear to flow from the Weakness rather than the Misfortune of the Person represented. But in this Tragedy you are not entertained with the ungoverned Passions of such as are enamoured of each other merely as they are Men and Women, but their Regards are founded upon high Conceptions of each other's Virtue and Merit and the Character which gives Name to the Play, is one who has behaved her self with heroic Virtue in the most important Circumstances of a Female Life, those of a Wife, a Widow, and a Mother. If there be those whose Minds have been too attentive upon the Affairs of Life, to have any Notion of the Passion of Love in such Extremes as are known only to particular Tempers, yet, in the above-mentioned Considerations, the Sorrow of the Heroine will move even the Generality of Mankind. Domestick Virtues concern all the World, and there is no one living who is not interested that Andromache should be an imitable Character. The generous Affection to the Memory of her deceased Husband, that tender Care for her Son, which is ever heightened with the Consideration of his Father, and these Regards preserved in spite of being tempted with the Possession of the highest Greatness, are what cannot but be venerable even to such an Audience as at present frequents the English Theatre. My Friend WILL HONEYCOMB commended several tender things that were said, and told me they were very genteel, but whisper'd me, that he feared the Piece was not busy enough for the present Taste To supply this, he recommended to the Players to be very careful in their Scenes, and above all Things that every Part should be perfectly new dressed I was very glad to find that they did not neglect my friend's Admonition, because there are a great many in his Class of Criticism who may be grined by it but indeed the Truth is, that as to the Work itself, it is every where Nature The Persons are of the highest Quality in Life, even that of Princes but their Quality is not represented by the Poet with Direction that Guards and Waiters should follow them in every Scene but their Grandeur appears in Greatness of Sentiment(s), flowing from Minds worthy their Condition To make a Character truly Great this Author understands that it should have its Foundation in superior Thoughts and Maxims of Conduct It is very certain, that many an honest Woman would make no Difficulty, tho' she had been the Wife of Hector, for the sake of a Kingdom to marry the Enemy of her Husband's Family and Country and indeed who can deny but she might be still an honest Woman, but no Heroine! That may be defensible, my ludeable in one Character, which would be in the highest Degree exceptionable in another When Cato Uticensis killed himself, Cotinus a Roman of ordinary Quality and Character did the same thing, upon which one said, smiling, 'Cotinus might have lived, tho' Cæsar has seized the 'Roman Liberty' Cotinus's Condition might have been the same, i.e. things at the upper End of the World pass as they would What is further very extraordinary in this Work, is, that the Persons are all of them ludeable, and their Misfortunes arise rather from unguarded Virtue than Propensity to Vice The Poet has an Opportunity of doing self Justice in supporting the Representation of Passion, Sorrow, Indignation, even Despair itself within the Rules of Decency, Honour and Good-breeding and since there is no one can flatter himself his ill will be always fortunate, they may here see Sorrow as they would wish to bear it whenever it arrives

MR SPECTATOR,

I HAVE now considered Milton's Paradise Lost I under those four great Heads of the Fable, the Characters, the Sentiments and the Language and have shewn that he excels, in general, under each of these Heads I hope that I have made several Discoveries which may appear new, even to those who are versed in Critical Learning Were I indeed to chuse my Readers, by whose Judgment I would stand or fall, they should not be such as are acquainted only with the French and Italian Critics, but also with the Ancient and Moderns who have written in either of the learned Languages. Above all, I would have them well versed in the Greek and Latin Poets, without which a Man very often fancies that he understands a Critick when in Reality he does not comprehend his Meaning

It is in Criticism, as in all other Sciences and Speculations, one who brags with him any implicit Notions and Observations which he has made in his reading of the Poets, will find his own Reflections methodized and explained, and perhaps several little Hints that had passed in his Mind, perfected and improved in the Works of a good Critick whereas one who has not these previous Lights is very often in utter Stranger to what he reads, and apt to put a wrong Interpretation upon it.

Nor is it sufficient, that a Man who sets up for a Judge in Criticism, should have perused the Authors above mentioned unless he has also a clear and Logical Head Without this Talent he is perpetually puzzled and perplexed amidst his own Illanders, mistakes the Sense of those he would confute, or if he chances to think right, does not know how to convey his Thoughts to another with Clearness and Perspicuity Aristotle, who was the best Critick, was also one of the best Logicians that ever appeared in the World

Mr Lock's Essay on Human Understanding would be thought a very odd Book for a Man to make himself Master of, who would get a Reputation by Critical Writings, though at the same time it is very certain, that an Author who has not learned the Art of distinguishing between Words and Things, and of ranging his Thoughts, and setting them in proper Lights, whatever Notions

he may have, will lose himself in Confusion and Obscurity. I might further observe, that there is not a Greek or Latin Critick who has not shown, even in the Style of his Criticisms, that he was a Master of all the Elegance and Delicacy of his Native Tongue.

The Truth of it is, there is nothing more absurd, than for a Man to set up for a Critick, without a good Insight into all the Parts of Learning, whereas many of those who have endeavoured to signalize themselves by Works of this Nature among our English Writers, are not only defective in the above mentioned Particulars, but plainly discover, by the Phrases which they make use of, and by their confused way of thinking, that they are not acquainted with the most common and ordinary Systems of Arts and Sciences. A few general Rules extracted out of the French Authors,² with a certain Cant of Words, has some times set up an Illiterate heavy Writer for a most judicious and formidable Critick.

One great Mark, by which you may discover a Critick who has neither Taste nor Learning, is this, that he seldom ventures to praise any Passage in an Author which has not been before received and applauded by the Publick, and that his Criticism turns wholly upon little Faults and Errors. This part of a Critick is so very easy to succeed in, that we find every ordinary Reader, upon the publishing of a new Poem, has Wit and Ill nature enough to turn several Passages of it into Ridicule, and very often in the right Place. This Mr. Dryden has very agreeably remarked in those two celebrated Lines,

*Errors, like Straws, upon the Surface float
He who would search for Pearls must dive below.*¹

A true Critick ought to dwell rather upon Excellencies than Imperfections, to discover the concealed Beauties of a Writer, and communicate to the World such things as are worth their Observation. The most exquisite Words and finest Strokes of an Author are those which very often appear the most doubtful and exceptionable to a Man who wants a Relish for polite Learning, and they are these, which a sower undistinguishing Critick generally attacks with the greatest Violence. Tully observes, that it is very easy to brand or fix a Mark upon what he calls Verbum ardens,² or, as it may be rendered into English, a glowing bold Expression, and to turn it into Ridicule by a cold ill-natured Criticism. A little Wit is equally capable of exposing a Beauty, and of aggravating a Fault, and though such a Treatment of an Author naturally produces Indignation in the Mind of an understanding Reader, it has however its Effect among the Generality of those whose Hands it falls into, the Rabble of Mankind being very apt to think that every thing which is laughed at with any Mixture of Wit, is ridiculous in itself.

Such a Mirth as this is always unseasonable in a Critick, as it rather prejudices the Reader than convinces him, and is capable of marring a Beauty, as well as a Blemish, the Subject of Derision. A Man, who cannot write with Wit on a proper Subject, is dull and stupid, but one who shows it in an improper Place, is as impertinent and absurd. Besides, a Man who has the Gift of Ridicule is who was at the same time making a scholar of his own daughter Ann. Dacier and the young Lady became warmly attached to one another, married, united in abjuring Protestantism, and were for forty years, in the happiest concord, man and wife, and fellow-scholars. Dacier and his wife, as well as Fontenelle, were alive when the Spectator was appearing. his wife dying, aged 69, in 1720, the husband, aged 71, in 1722. André Dacier translated and annotated the Poetics of Aristotle in 1692, and that critical work was regarded as his best performance.

² Dryden accounted among critics 'the greatest of his age' to be Boileau and Rapin. Boileau was the great master of French criticism. Rapin, born at Tours in 1621, taught Bulles Letters with extraordinary success, was in his own order of Jesuits, wrote famous critical works, was one of the best Latin poets of his time and died at Paris in 1687. His Whole Critical Works were translated by Dr Basil Kennett in two volumes, which appeared in 1705. The preface of their publisher said of Rapin that 'he has long dictated in this part of letters. He is acknowledged as the great arbitrator between the merits of the best writers and during the course of almost thirty years there have been few appeals from his sentence' (See also a note on p. 74.) Riccioli Bossu, the great French authority on Epic Poetry, born in 1631, was a regular canon of St Genevieve, and taught the Humanities in several religious houses of his order. He died, subprior of the Abbey of St Jean de Chartres, in 1680. He wrote, besides his Treatise upon Epic Poetry, a parallel between the philosophies of Aristotle and Descartes, which appeared a few months earlier (in 1674) with less success. Another authority was Father Bouhours, of whom see note on p. 102. Another was Bernard le Bovier de Fontenelle, called by Voltaire the most universal genius of his age. He was born at Rouen in 1657, looking so delicate that he was baptized in a hurry, and at 16 was unequal to the exertion of a game at billiards, being caused by any unusual exercise to spit blood, though he lived to the age of 1 hundred, less one month and two days. He was taught by the Jesuits, went to the bar to please his father, pleaded a cause, lost it, and gave up the profession to devote his time wholly to literature and philosophy. He went to Paris, wrote plays and the 'Dialogues of the Dead,' living then with his uncle, Thomas Corneille. A discourse on the Eloquence prefixed to his pastoral poems made him an authority in this manner of composition. It was translated by Motteux for addition to the English translation of Bossu on the Epic, which had also appended to it an Essay on Satire by another of these French critics, André Dacier. Dacier, born at Castres in 1651, was educated at Saumur under Taneguy le Févre, apt to find Fault with any thing, that it gives him an Opportunity of exerting his beloved Talent, and very often censures a Passage, not because there is any Fault in it, but because he can be merry upon it. Such kinds of Pleasantry are very unfur and disingenuous in Works of Criticism, in which the greatest Masters, both Ancient and Modern have always appeared with a serious and instructive Air.

As I intend in my next Paper to shew the Defects in Milton's Paradise Lost, I thought fit to premise these few Particulars, to the End that the Reader may know I enter upon it, as on a very ungrateful Work, and that I shall just point at the Imperfections, without endeavouring to enlame them with Ridicule. I must also observe with Longinus,¹ that the Productions of a great Genius, with many Lapses and Inadvertencies, are infinitely preferable to the Works of an inferior kind of Author, which are scrupulously exact and conformable to all the Rules of correct Writing.

I shall conclude my Paper with a Story out of bo calis,² which sufficiently shews the Opinion that judicious Author entertained of the sort of Critics I have been here mentioning. A famous Critick, says he, having gathered together all the Faults of an eminent Poet, made a Present of them to Apollo, who received them very graciously, and resolved to make the Author a suitable Return for the Trouble he had been in to collect and bring them in. In order to this, he set before him a Sack of Wheat as it had been just threshed out of the Sheaf. He then bid him pick out the Chaff from among the Corn and lay it aside by itself. The Critick applied himself to the Task with great Industry and Pleasure, and after having made the due Separation, was presented by Apollo with the Chaff for his Puns.³ L.

² Frajan Boccacini, born at Rome in 1554, was a satirical writer famous in Italy for his fine criticism and bold satire. Cardinals Borghese and Cayetan were his patrons. His 'Ragguagli di Parnasso' and 'la Secretaria di Parnasso', in which Apollo heard the complaints of the world, and dispensed justice in his court on Parnassus, were received with delight. Afterwards, in his 'Pictura di Piragone', he satirized the Court of Spain, and, fearing consequences, retired to Venice, where in 1613 he was attacked in his bed by four ruffians, who beat him to death with sand bags. Boccacini's Ragguagli di Parnasso has been translated into English, in 1622, as 'News from Parnassus'. Also, in 1656, as 'Adventures from Parnassus', by H. Carey, Earl of Monmouth. This translation was reprinted in 1669 and 1674, and again in 1706 by John Hughes, one of the contributors to the Spectator.

AS no one can be said to enjoy Health, who is only not sick, without he feel wit in himself a light-ome and invigorating Principle which will not suffer him to remain idle, but still spurs him on to Action. So in the Practice of every Virtue, there is some additional Grace required, to give a Clum of excelling in this or that particular Action. A Diamond may want polishing, though the Value be still intrinsically the same and the same Good may be done with different Degrees of Lustre. No man should be contented with himself that he barely does well, but he should perform every thing in the best and most becoming Manner that he is able.

Fullly tells us he wrote his Book of Officers, because there was no Time of Life in which some correspondent Duty might not be practised, nor is there a Duty without a certain Decency accompanying it, by which every Virtue 'tis join'd to will seem to be doubled. Another may do the same thing, and yet the Action want that Air and Beauty which distinguish it from others. Like that nimble Sun shine Titan is said to have diffused over his Landscapes which denotes them his, and has been always unequalled by any other Person.

There is no one Action in which this Quality I am speaking of will be more sensibly perceived, than in granting a Request or doing an Office of Kindness. Alumnus, by his Way of consenting to a Benefaction, shall make it lose its Name, while Carus doubles the kindness and the Obligation. I don't the first desired Request drops indeed at last, but from so doubtful a Brow, that the Oblighd is almost as much Reason to resent the Manner of bestowing it, as to be thankful for the favour itself. Carus invites with a pleasing Air, to give him an Opportunity of doing an Act of Humanity, meets the Petition half Way, and consents to a Request with a Countenance which proclaims the Satisfaction of his Mind in assisting the Distressed.

The Decency then that is to be observed in Liberality, seems to consist in it being performed with such Cheerfulness, as may express the God-like Pleasure is to be met with in obliging one's Fellow Creatures that may shew Good-nature and Benevolence overflowed and do not, as in some Men, run upon the Tilt and taste of the Sediments of a grutchling uncommunicative Disposition.

Since I have intimated that the greatest Decorum is to be preserved in the bestowing our good Offices, I will illustrate it a little by an Example drawn from private Life, which carries with it such a Profusion of Liberality, that it can be exceeded by nothing but the Humanity and Good-nature which accompanies it. It is a Letter of Pliny's,¹ which I shall here translate, because the

PLINY to QUINTILIAN

'Tho' I am fully acquainted with the Contentment and just Moderation of your Mind, and the Conformity the Education you have given your Daughter bears to your own Character, yet since she is suddenly to be married to a Person of Distinction, whose Figure in the World makes it necessary for her to be at a more than ordinary Expence in Cloaths and Equipage suitable to her Husband's Quality, by which, tho' her intrinsic Worth be not augmented, yet will it receive both Ornament and Lustre And knowing your Estate to be as moderate as the Riches of your Mind are abundant, I must challenge to my self some part of the Burthen, and as a Parent of your Child, I present her with Twelve hundred and fifty Crowns towards these Expenses, which Sum had been much larger, had I not feared the Smallness of it would be the greatest Inducement with you to accept of it Farewell

Thus should a Benefaction be done with a good Grace, and shine in the strongest Point of Light, it should not only answer all the Hopes and Expectancies of the Receiver, but even out run his Wishes 'Tis this happy manner of Behaviour which adds new Charms to it, and softens those Gifts of Art and Nature, which otherwise would be rather distasteful than agreeable Without it, Valour would degenerate into Brutality, Learning into Pedantry, and the genteel Demeanour into Affectation Even Religion its self, unless Decency be the Handmaid which waits upon her, is apt to make People appear guilty of Sourness and ill Humour But this shows Virtue in her first original Form, adds a Comeliness to Religion, and gives its Professors the justest Title to the Beauty of Holiness A Man fully instructed in this Art, may assume a thousand Shapes, and please in all He may do a thousand Actions shall become none other but himself not that the Things themselves are different, but the Manner of doing them

If you examine each Feature by its self, Aglaure and Calliclea are equally handsome, but take them in the Whole, and you cannot suffer the Comparison Tho one is full of numberless nameless Graces, the other of as many nameless Faults

The Comeliness of Person, and Decency of Behaviour, add infinite Weight to what is pronounced by any one 'Tis the want of this that often makes the Rebukes and Advice of old rigid Persons of no Effect, and leave a Displeasure in the Minds of those they are directed to But Youth and Beauty, if accompanied with a graceful and becoming Severity, is of mighty Force to raise, even in the most Profligate, a Sense of Shame In Milton, the Devil is never described ashamed but once, and that at the Rebuke of a brutish Angel

*So spake the Cherub, and his grave Rebuke, Severe in youthful Beauty, added Grace Invincible Abash'd the Devil stood,
And felt how awful Goodness is, and saw*

His Loss*

The Care of doing nothing unbecoming has accompanied the greatest Minds to their last Moments They avoided even an indecent Posture in the very Article of Death Thus Cæsar gathered his Robe about him, that he might not fall in a manner unbecoming of himself and the greatest Concern that appeared in the Behaviour of Lucretia, when she stabbed her self, was, that her Body should be in an Attitude worthy the Mind which had inhabited it

THE famous Gratian,³ in his little Book wherein he lays down Maxims for a Man's advancing himself at Court, advises his Reader to associate himself with the Fortunate, and to shun the Company of the Unfortunate which, notwithstanding the Baseness of the Precept to an honest Mind, may have something useful in it for those who push their Interest in the World It is certainly a great Part of what we call good or ill Fortune, rises out of right or wrong Measures, and Schemes of Life When I hear a Man complain of his being unfortunate in all his Undertakings, I shrewdly suspect him for a very weak Man in his Affairs In Conformity with this way of thinking, Cardinal Richelieu used to say, that Unfortunate and Imprudent were but two Words for the same Thing As the Cardinal himself had a great Share both of Prudence and Good For-

³ Balthasar Gracian, a Spanish Jesuit, who died in 1658, rector of the Jesuits' College of Tarragona, wrote many books in Spanish on Politics and Society, among others the one here referred to on the Courtier which was known to Addison, doubtless, through the French translation by Amelot de la Houssaye tune, his famous Antagonist, the Count d'Ostror-1772, was disgraced at the Court of St Louis, because it was alleged against him that he had never any Success in his Undertakings. Thus, even in Linnæus's Autobiogr., was it not accusing him of Imprudence.

Crius recommended Purkey to the Romans for their Generals upon three Accounts, as he was a Man of Courage, Credit, and Good-Fortune. It was perhaps for the Reason above mentioned, namely that a Series of Good Fortune supports prudent Management in the Person whom it befalls, that not only Sylla the Dictator, but several of the Roman Emperors, as it will be seen upon their Medals, among their other Titles, gave themselves that of Felix or Fortunate. The Heathens, indeed, seem to have valued a Man more for his Good-Fortune than for any other Quality, which I think is very natural for those who have not a strong Belief of another World. For how can I conceive a Man crowned with many Disgraces and Miserys, that has not some extraordinary Fund of Merit and Perfection in him which lies open to the Supreme Eye, tho' perhaps it is not discovered by my Observation? What is the Reason Hercules and Urgal's Heroes do not form a Resolution or strike a Blow without the Consent and Direction of some Deity? Doubtless because the Poets esteemed it the greatest Honour to be favoured by the Gods, and thought the best Way of proving a Man was to recount those Actions which naturally implied an extraordinary Merit in the Person on whom they descended.

Those who believe a future State of Rewards and Punishments yet very absurdly, if they form their Opinion of a Man's Merit from his Successes. But certainly, if I thought the whole Circle of our being was concluded between our Birth and Deaths, I should think a Man's Good Fortune the Measure and Standard of his real Merit, since Providence would have no Opportunity of rewarding his Virtue and Perfections, but in the present Life. A virtuous Unbeliever, who lies under the Pressure of Misfortunes, has reason to cry out, as they say Brutus did a little before his Death, O Virtue, I have misceifed thee as a Substantial Good, but I find thou art an empty Name.

But to return to our first Point. The Prudence does undoubtedly in a great measure produce our good or ill Fortune in this World, it is certain there are many unforeseen Accidents and Occurrences, which very often pervert all the finest Schemes that can be had by Human Wisdom. The Race is not always to the Swift, nor the Battle to the Strong. Nothing less than infinite Wisdom can have an absolute Command over Fortune the highest Degree of it which Asa can possess, is by no means equal to fortuitous Events, and to such Contingencies as may rise in the Prosecution of our Affairs. Nay, it very often happens, that Prudence, which has always in it a great Mixture of Caution, hinders a Man from being so fortunate as he might possibly have been without it. A Person who only runs it what is likely to succeed, and follows closely the Dictates of Human Prudence, never meets with those great and unforeseen Successes, which are often the effect of a sanguine Temper, or more happy Riches; and thus perhaps may be the Reason, that resorting to the common Observation, Fortune, like other Estates, delights rather in favouring the poor than the old

Upon the whole, since Man is so short created a Creature and the Accidents which may happen to him so various I cannot but be of the same Opinion in another Case, that were there any Doubt of a Providence yet it is so runny was very desirable there should be such a Being of infinite Wisdom and Goodness, as whose Direction we might rely in the Conduct of Human Life.

It is a great Presumption to ascribe our Decrees to our own Management, and not to enter in our selves upon any Pleading, rather is it the Pompt of Heaven that the Acquisition of our own Merit. I am very well pleased with a Medal which was struck by Queen Elizabeth, a little after the Defeat of the Invincible Armada, to perpetuate the Memory of that extraordinary Event. It is well known how the King of Spain, and others, who were the Enemies of that great Princess, to derogate from her Glory, represented the Ruins of their Fleet rather to the Violence of Storms and Tempests than to the Power of her Fleet. Queen Elizabeth, instead of looking upon that as a Diminution of her Honour, loved herself upon such a signal Favour of Providence and records it by (in) the Reverse of the Medal above mentioned, (has represented) a Fleet beaten by a Land power, and I think, sent upon one another, with that Legend, Interpretation, affertit Deus et est pariter He Flee with his Fleet, as if they were so.

It is remarked of a famous Grecian General, whose Name I cannot at present recollect, and who had been a particular Favourite of Fortune, that upon recounting his Victories among his Friends, he added at the End of several great Actions but in this Fortune had no Share. After which it is observed in History, that he never prospered in any thing he undertook.

As Arrogance, and a Conceitnedness of our own Abilities, are very shocking and offensive to Men of Sense and Virtue, we may be sure they are highly displeasing to that Being who delimits in an humble Mind, and by several of his Dispens-ations seems purposely to shew us, that our own Schemes or Providence have no Share in our Advancement[s].

Since on this Subject I have already admitted several Questions which have occurred to my Memory upon writing this Paper, I will conclude it with a little Poema. The Drop, says the Fable, lay a great while hardening in the Shell till by Degrees it was ripen'd into a Pearl, which falling into the Hands of a Diver, after a long Series of Adventures, is at present that famous Pearl which is fix'd on the Top of the Peruvian Diamond L

Difficile est plurimum virtutem revereri qui semper secunda fortuna sit usus—Tull ad Hærennum

INSOLENCE is the Crime of all others which every Man is most apt to rail at and yet is there one Respect in which almost all Men living are guilty of it, and that is, in the Case of having a greater Value upon the Gifts of Fortune than we ought. It is here in England come into our very Language, as a Propriety of Distinction to say, when we would speak of Persons to their Advantage, they are People of Condition. There is no doubt but the proper Use of Riches implies that a Man should exert all the good Qualities imaginable, and if we mean by a Man of Condition or Quality, one who, according to the Wealth he is Master of, shews himself just, beneficent, and charitable, that Term ought very deservedly to be had in the highest Veneration but when Wealth is used only as it is the Support of Pomp and Luxury, to be rich is very far from being a Recommendation to Honour and Respect. It is indeed the greatest Insolence imaginable, in a Creature who would feel the Extremes of Thirst and Hunger, if he did not prevent his Appetites before they call upon him, to be so forgetful of the common Necessity of Human Nature as never to cast an Eye upon the Poor and Needy. The Fellow who escaped from a Ship which struck upon a Rock in the West, and join'd with the Country People to destroy his Brother Sailors and make her a Wreck, was thought a most execrable Creature but does not every Man who enjoys the Possession of what he naturally wants, and is unmindful of the unsupplied Distress of other Men, betray the same Temper of Mind? When a Man looks about him, and with regard to Riches and Poverty beholds some drawn in Pomp and Equipage, and they and their very Servants with an Air of Scorn and Triumph overlooking the Multitude that pass by them, and, in the same Street, a Creature of the same Make crying out in the Name of all that is Good and Sacred to behold his Misery, and give him some Supply against Hunger and Nakedness, who would believe these two Beings were of the same Species? But so it is, that the Consideration of Fortune has taken up all our Minds, and, as I have often complained, Poverty and Riches stand in our Imaginations in the Places of Guilt and Innocence. But in all Seasons there will be some Instances of Persons who have Souls too large to be taken with popular Prejudices, and while the rest of Mankind are contending for Superiority in Power and Wealth, have their Thoughts bent upon the Necessities of those below them. The Charity Schools which have been erected of late Years, are the greatest Instances of publick Spirit the Age has produced. But indeed when we consider how long this Sort of Beneficence has been on Foot, it is rather from the good Management of those Institutions, than from the Number or Value of the Benefactions to them, that they make so great a Figure. One would think it impossible, that in the Space of fourteen Years there should not have been five thousand Pounds bestowed in Gifts this Way, nor sixteen hundred Children, including Males and Females, put out to Methods of Industry. It is not allowed me to speak of Luxury and Idly with the severe Spirit they deserve. I shall only therefore say, I shall very readily compound with any Lady in a Hoop-Petticoat, if she gives the Price of one half Yard of the Silk towards Cloathing, Feeding and Instructing an Innocent helpless Creature of her own Sex in one of these Schools. The Consciousness of such an Action will give her Features a nobler Life on this illustrious Day, than all the Jewels that can hang in her Hair, or can be clustered at her Bosom. It would be uncourtly to spend in harsher Words to the Fair, but to Men one may take a little more Freedom. It is monstrous how a Man can live with so little Reflection as to fancy he is not in a Condition very unjust and disproportioned to the rest of Mankind while he enjoys Wealth, and exerts no Beneficence or Pity to others. As for this particular Occasion of these Schools, there cannot any offer more worthy a generous Mind. Would you do an handsome thing without Return? do it for an Infant that is not sensible of the Obligation. Would you do it for publick Good? do it for one who will be an honest Artificer. Would you do it for the Sake of Heaven? give it to one who shall be instructed in the Worship of him for whose Sake you gave it. It is no thanks a most laudable Institution this if it were of no other Expectation than that of producing a Race of good and useful Servants, who will have more than a liberal, a religious Education. What would not a Man do, in common Prudence, to lay out in Purchase of one about him, who would add to all his Orders he gave the Weight of the Commandments to enforce an Obedience to them? for one who would consider his Master as his Father, his Friend, and Benefactor, upon the easy Terms, and in Expectation of no other Return but moderate Wages and gentle Usage? It is the common Vice of Children to run too much among the Servants, from such as are educated in these Places they would see nothing but Lowliness in the Servant, which would not be dissimulous in the Child. All the ill Offices and defamatory Whispers which take their Birth from Domesticks, would be prevented, if this Charity could be made universal and a good Man might have a Knowledge of the whole Life of the Persons he designs to take into his House for his own Service, or that of his Family or Children, long before they were admitted. This would create endearing Dependences and the Obligation would have a paternal Air in the Master, who would be relieved from much Care and Anxiety from the Gratitude and Diligence of an humble Friend attending him as his Servant. I fall into this Discourse from a Letter sent to me, to give me Notice that Fifty Boys would be Clothed, and take their Seats (at the Charge of some generous Benefactors) in St Bride's Church on Sunday next. I wish I could promise to my self any thing which my Correspondent seems to expect from a Publication of it in this Paper for there can be nothing added to what so many excellent and learned Men have said on this Occasion. But that there may be something here which would move a generous Mind, like that of him who writ to me, I shall transcribe an handsome Paragraph of Dr Snape's Sermon on these Charities, which my Correspondent enclosed with his Letter.

The wise Providence has amply compensated the Disadvantages of the Poor and Indigent, in wanting many of the Conveniences of this Life, by a more abundant Provision for their Happiness in the next. Had they been higher born, or more richly endowed, they would have wanted this Manner of Education, of which those only enjoy the Benefit, who are low enough to submit to it, where they have such Advantages without Money, and without Price, as the Rich cannot purchase with it. The Learning which is given, is generally more edifying to them, than that which is sold to others. Thus do they become more exalted in Goodness, by being depressed in Fortune, and their Poverty is, in Reality, their Preferment. T high Spirit but could not bring her to close with me, before I had entered into a Treaty with her longer than that of the Grand Alliance. Among other Articles, it was therein stipulated, that she should have 400l a Year for Pu money, which I obliged myself to pay Quarterly into the hands of one who had acted as her Plenipotentiary in that Affair. I have ever since religiously observed my part in this solemn Agreement. Now, Sir, so it is, that the Lady has had several Children since I married her to which, if I should credit our malicious Neighbours, her Pu money has not a little contributed. The Education of these my Children, who, contrary to my Expectation, are born to me every Year, straightens me so much, that I have begged their Mother to free me from the Obligation of the above mentioned Pu money, that it may go towards making a Provision for her Family. This Proposal makes her noble Blood swell in her Veins, in so much that finding me a little tardy in her last Quarter's Payment, she threatens me every Day to arrest me, and proceeds so far as to tell me, that if I do not do her Justice, I shall die in a Jail. To this she adds, when her Parliament will let her argue calmly, that she has several Play-Debts on her Hand, which must be discharged very suddenly, and that she cannot lose her Money as becomes a Woman of her Fashion, if she makes me any Abatement in this Article. I hope, Sir, you will take an Occasion from hence to give your Opinion upon a Subject which you have not yet touched, and inform us if there are any Precedents for this Usage among our Ancestors or whether you find any mention of Pu money in Grotius, Puffendorf, or any other of the Civilians.

I am ever

the humblest of your Admirers, Joseph Enbible, Esq

As there is no Man living who is a more professed Advocate for the Fair Sex than my self, so there is none that would be more unwilling to invade any of their ancient Rights and Privileges but as the Doctrine of Pu money is of a very late Date, unknown to our Great Grandmothers, and not yet received by many of our Modern Ladies I think it is for the Interest of both Sexes to keep it from spreading.

Mr Enbible may not, perhaps, be much mistaken where he intimates, that the supplying a Man's Wife with Pu money, is furnishing her with Arms against himself, and in a manner becoming necessary to his own Dishonour. We may indeed, generally observe, that in proportion as a Woman is more or less Beautiful, and her Husband advanced in Years, she stands in need of a greater or less number of Pus, and upon a Treaty of Marriage, rises or falls in her Demands accordingly. It must likewise be owned, that high Quality in a Mistress does very much inflame this Article in the Marriage Reckoning.

But where the Age and Circumstances of both Parties are pretty much upon a level, I cannot but think the insisting upon Pu money is very extraordinary, and yet we find several Matches broken off upon this very Head. What would a Foreigner, or one who is a Stranger to this Practice, think of a Lover that forsakes his Mistress, because he is not willing to keep her in Pins, but what would he think of the Mistress, should he be informed that she asks five or six hundred Pounds a Year for this use? Should a Man unacquainted with our Customs be told the Sums which are allowed in Great Britain, under the Title of Pin-money, what a prodigious Consumption of Pins would he think there was in this Island? A Pin a Day, says our frugal Proverb, is a Groat a Year, so that according to this Calculation, my Friend Fribble's Wife must every Year make use of Eight Millions six hundred and forty thousand new Pins.

I am not ignorant that our British Ladies all lege they comprehend under this general Term several other Conveniences of Life, I could therefore wish, for the Honour of my Countrywomen, that they had rather called it Needle-Money, which might have implied something of Good housewifery, and not have given the malicious World occasion to think, that Dress and Trifles have always the uppermost Place in a Woman's Thoughts.

I know several of my fair Reasoners urge, in defence of this Practice, that it is but a necessary Provision they make for themselves, in case their Husband proves a Churl or a Miser so that they consider this Allowance as a kind of Alimony, which they may lay their Claim to, without actually separating from their Husbands. But with Submission, I think a Woman who will give up her self to a Man in Marriage, where there is the least Room for such an Apprehension, and trust her Person to one whom she will not rely on for the common Necessaries of Life, may very properly be accused (in the Phrase of an homely Proverb) of being Penny wise and Pound foolish.

It is observed of over cautious Generals, that they never engage in a Battle without securing a Retreat, in case the Event should not answer their Expectations, on the other hand, the greatest Conquerors have burnt their Ships, or broke down the Bridges behind them, as being determined either to succeed or die in the Engagement. In the same manner I should very much suspect a Woman who takes such Precautions for her Retreat, and contrives Methods how she may live happily, without the Affliction of one to whom she joins herself for Life. Separate Purses between Man and Wife are, in my Opinion, as unnatural as separate Beds. A Marriage cannot be happy, where the Pleasures, Inclinations, and Interests of both Parties are not the same. There is no greater Incitement to Love in the Mind of Man, than the Sense of a Person's depending upon him for her Ease and Happiness. A Woman uses all her Endeavours to please the Person whom she looks upon as her Honour, her Comfort, and her Support.

For this Reason I am not very much surprized at the Behaviour of a rough Country Squire, who, being not a little shocked at the Proceeding of a young Widow that would not recede from her Demands of Pin money, was so enraged at her mercenary Temper, that he told her in great Wrath 'As much as she thought him her Slave, he would

'shew all the World he did not care a Pin for her Upon which he flew out of the Room, and never saw her more.

Socrates, in Plato's Alcibiades, says, he was informed by one, who had travelled through Persia, that as he passed over a great Tract of Lands, and enquired what the Name of the Place was, they told him it was the Queen's Girdle to which he adds, that another wide Field which lay by it, was called the Queen's Veil, and that in the same Manner there was a large Portion of Ground set aside for every part of Her Majesty's Dress. These Lands might not be improperly called the Queen of Persia's Pin-money.

I remember my Friend Sir ROGER, who I dare say never read this Passage in Plato, told me some time since, that upon his courting the Perverse Widow (of whom I have given an Account in former Papers) he had disposed of an hundred Acres in a Diamond-Ring, which he would have presented her with, had she thought fit to accept it, and that upon her Wedding-Day she should have carried on her Head fifty of the tallest Oaks upon his Estate. He further informed me that he would have given her a Cole pit to keep her in clean Linnen, that he would have allowed her the Profits of a Windmill for her Fans, and have presented her once in three Years with the Sheering of his Sheep (for her) Under-Petticoats. To which the Knight always adds, that though he did not care for fine Cloaths himself, there should not have been a Woman in the Country better dressed than my Lady Coverley. Sir ROGER perhaps, merrily in this, as well as in many other of his Devices, appear something odd and singular, but if the Humour of Pin money prevails, I think it would be very proper for every Gentleman of an Estate to mark out so many Acres of it under the Title of The Pins. DEAR SPEC
'HAVING lately conversed much with the Fair Sex on the Subject of your Speculations, (which since their Appearance in Publick, have been the chief Exercise of the Female 'loquacious Faculty) I found the fair Ones possess'd with a Dissatisfaction at your prefixing Greek Motto's to the Frontispiece of your late Papers and, as a Man of Gallantry, I thought 'it a Duty incumbent on me to impart it to you, in Hopes of a Reformation, which is only to be effected by a Restoration of the Latin to the usual Dignity in your Papers, which of late, the Greek, to the great Displeasure of your Female Readers, has usurp'd for tho' the Latin has the Recommendation of being 'unintelligible to them as the Greek, yet being written of the same Character with their Mother-Tongue, by the Assistance of a Spelling-Book, it's legible, which

And since the Introduction of Operas into this Nation, the Ladies are so charmed with Sounds abstracted from their Ideas, that they adore and honour the Sound of Lutes as it is old Poets. I am a Solicitor for the Fair Sex, and therefore think my self in this Character more likely to be prevalent in this Request, than if I should subscribe myself by my proper Name

I desire you may insert this in one of your Spectators, to show my Zeal for removing the Dissatisfaction of the Fair Sex, and restoring you to their Favour

SIR,

I was some time since in Company with a young Officer, who entered into with the Company he had made over a Female Neighbour of his when a Gentleman who stood by, as I suppose, envying the Captain's good Fortune asked him what Reason he had to believe the Lady admired him? Why, says he, my Lodgings are opposite to hers, and she is continually at her Window either at Work, Reading taking Snuff or putting her self in some toying Posture on purpose to draw my Eyes that Way. The Conversation of this vain Soldier made me reflect on some of my own Actions for so I must know, Sir, I am often at a Window which fronts the Apartments of several Gentlemen, who I doubt not have the same Opinion of me. I must own I love to look at them all, one for being well dressed a second for his fine Lye and one particular one, because he is the least Man I ever saw. But there is so nothing so easy and pleasant in the Manner of my little Man, that I observe he is a Favourite of all his Acquaintance. I could go on to tell you of many others that I believe think I have encouraged them from my Window. But pray let me have your Opinion of the Use of the Window in a beautiful Lady and how often she may look out at the same Man, without being supposed to have a Mind to jump out to him

Yours,

Aurelia Careless.

True

Mr SPECTATOR,

I have for some time made Love to a Lady who received it with all the kind Returns I ought to expect. But without any Provocation that I know of she has of late shunned me with the utmost Abhorrence, inasmuch that she went out of Church this Sunday in the midst of Divine Service upon my coming into the same Place. Pray, Sir, what must I do in this Distress?

We live in this Town a sort of People who pretend to Wit and write Lampoons. I have lately been the Subject of one of them. The Scribber had not Genius enough in Verse to turn my Age, as indeed I am an old Maid, into Rallery, nor affecting a youthful Turn than is consistent with my Time of Day, and therefore he makes the Title to his Madrigal The Character of Mrs. Juth Lethchase, born in the Year 1660. What I desire of you is, That you disallow that a Coxcomb who pretends to write Verse, should put the most malicious Thing he can say in Print. This I humbly conceive will double our Country Wits, who indeed take a great deal of Pains to say any thing in Rhymer, tho' they say it very ill

Mr SPECTATOR,

We are several of us Gentlemen and Ladies, who Board in the same House, and after Dinner one of our Company in agreeable Manner enough to himself stands up and reads your Paper to us. We are the civillest People in the World to one another, and therefore I am forced to this way of desiring our Reader when he is doing this Office, not to stand above the Fire. This will be a general Good to our Family this cold Weather. He will I hope, take it to be our common Request when he comes to these Words 'Pray, Sir, say it' which I desire you to insert and so I will particularly oblige

I am a great Lover of Dancing, but cannot perform so well as some others. However, by my Ours of the Wth is Caprice and some on, and Graces I don't fail to divert the Company, particularly the Ladies, who laugh immoderately at all the Time. Some who pretend to be my Friends, tell me they do it in Detraction and would advise me to leave it off, whilst that I make my self ridiculous. Egremont's report of the performance of Hor

AFTER what I have said in my last Saturday Paper, I shall enter on the Subject of this without further Preface, and remark the several Defects which appear in the Table, the Characters, the Sentiments, and the Language of Mist^{rs} Partridge's List not doubting but that Reader will pardon me, if I altogether at the same time whatever may be said for the mitigation of such Defects. The first Imperfection which I shall observe in the Fable is that the Event of it is unhappy.

The Fable of every Poem is, according to Aristotle's Division, either Simple or Implex.¹ It is called Simple when there is no change of Fortune in it; Implex, when the Fortune of the chief Actor changes from Bad to Good, or from Good to Bad. The Implex Fable is thought the most perfect. I suppose, because it is more proper to stir up the Passions of the Reader, and to surprise him with a greater Variety of Accidents.

The Implex Fable is therefore of two kinds. In the first the chief Actor makes his Way through a long Series of Dangers and Difficulties, till he arrives at Honour and Prosperity, as we see in the [Story of Ulysses]. In the second, the chief Actor in the Poem falls from some eminent Pitch of Honour and Prosperity, into Misery and Disgrace. Thus we see Adam and Eve sinking from a State of Innocence and Happiness, into the most abject Condition of Sin and Sorrow.

The most striking Tragedies among the Ancients were built on this last sort of Implex Fable, particularly the Tragedy of Odipus, which proceeds upon a Story, if we may believe Aristotle, the most proper for Tragedy that could be invented by the Wit of Man.² I have taken some Pains in a former Paper to shew, that this kind of Implex Fable, wherein the Event is unhappy, is more apt to affect an Audience than that of the first kind, notwithstanding many excellent Pieces among the Ancients, as well as most of those which have been written of late Years in our own Country, are raised upon contrary Plans. I must however own, that I think this kind of Fable, which is the most perfect in Tragedy, is not so proper for an Heroic Poem.

Milton seems to have been sensible of this Imperfection in his Fable, and has therefore endeavoured to cure it by several Expedients, particularly by the Mortification which the great Adversary of Mankind meets with upon his Return to the Assembly of Infernal Spirits, as it is described in [a] beautiful Passage of the Tenth Book, and likewise by the Vision wherein Adam at the close of the Poem sees his Offspring triumphing over his great Enemy, and himself restored to a happier Paradise than that from which he fell.

There is another Objection against Milton's Fable, which is indeed almost the same with the former, tho' placed in a different Light, namely, I hat the Hero in the Paradise Lost is unsuccessful, and by no means a Match for his Enemies. This gave Occasion to Mr Dryden's Reflection, that the Devil was in reality Milton's Hero.³ I think I have obviated this Objection in my first Paper. The Paradise Lost is an Epic [or a] Narrative Poem, [and] he that looks for an Hero in it, searches for that which Milton never intended [but] if he will needs fix the Name of an Hero upon any Person in it, 'tis certainly the Messiah who is the Hero, both in the Principal Action, and in the [chief Episodes]. Paganism could not furnish out a real Action for a Fable greater than that of the Iliad or Æneid, and therefore an Heathen could not form a higher Notion of a Poem than one of that kind, which they call an Heroic. Whether Milton's is not of a [sublimed] Nature I will not presume to determine. It is sufficient that I shew there is in the Paradise Lost all the Greatness of Plan, Regularity of Design, and masterly Beauties which we discover in Homer and Virgil.

I must in the next Place observe, that Milton has interwoven in the Texture of his Fable some Particulars which do not seem to have Probability enough for an Epic Poem, particularly in the Actions which he ascribes to Su and Death, and the Picture which he draws of the Ludo of Vanity, with other Passages in the second Book. Such Allegories rather savour of the Spirit of Spenser and Ariosto, than of Homer and Virgil.

In the Stric ure of his Poem he has likewise admitted of too many Digressions. It is finely observed by Aristotle, that the Author of an Heroic Poem should seldom speak himself, but throw as much of his Work as he can into the Mouths of those who are his Principal Actors.⁴ Aristotle has given no reason for this Precept, but I presume it is because the Mind of the Reader is more awed and elevated when he hears Æneas or Achilles speak, than when Virgil or Homer tell in their own Persons. Besides that assuming the Character of an eminent Man is apt to fire the Imagination and raise the Ideas of the Author. Illy tells us,⁵ mentioning his Dialogue of Old Age, in which Cato is the chief Speaker, that upon a Review of it he was agreeably imposed upon, and fancied that it was Cato, and not he himself, who uttered his Thoughts on that Subject.

he says, 'Spenser has a better plea for his "Fury Queen" had his action been finished, or been 'one and Milton if the Devil had not been his hero, 'instead of Adam, if the grant had not soiled the 'knight, and driven him out of his stronghold, to 'wander through the world with his lady errant 'and if there had not been more machining persons than human in his poem'

The last Fault which I shall take notice of in Milton's Style, is the frequent use of what the Learned call Technical Words, or Terms of Art. It is one of the great Beauties of Poetry, to make hard things intelligible, and to deliver what is abstruse [of¹] itself in such easy Language as may be understood by ordinary Readers. Besides, that the Knowledge of a Poet should rather seem born with him, or inspired, than drawn from Books and Systems. I have often wondered how Mr Dryden could translate a Passage out of Virgil after the following manner

*Tack to the Larboard, and stand off to Sea
Veer Star-board Sea and Land—*

Milton makes use of Larboard in the same manner. When he is upon Building he mentions Doric Pillars, Pilasters, Cornice, Freeze, Architrave. When he talks of Heavenly Bodies, you meet with Ecliptic and Eccentric, the trepidation, Stars dropping from the Zenith, Rays culminating from the Equator. To which might be added many Instances of the like kind in several other Arts and Sciences.

I shall in my next [Papers²] give an Account of the many particular Beauties in Milton, which would have been too long to insert under those general Heads I have already treated of, and with which I intend to conclude this Piece of Criticism. L

the several books of Paradise Lost), we may note here that Milton would have been quite ready to have his work tried by the same Addison has been applying. In his letter to Samuel Hartlib, sketching his ideal of a good Education, he assigns to advanced pupils logic and then 'rhetoric taught out of the rules of Plato, Aristotle, Phalereus, Cicero, Hermogenes, Longinus. To which poetry would be made subsequent, or, indeed, rather precedent, as being less subtle and fine, but more simple, sensuous, and passionate. I mean not here the prosody of a verse, which they could not but have hit on before among the rudiments of grammar; but that sublime art which in Aristotle's Poetics, in Horace and the Italian commentaries of Castelvetro, Tasso, Marzoni, and others, teaches what the latus ars of a true epic poem, what of a dramatic, what of a lyric, what decorum is which is the grand masterpiece to observe. This would make them soon perceive what despicable creatures our common rhymers and play-writers be and show them what religious, what glorious and magnificent use might be made of poetry, both in divine and human things.

Nusquam Tuta fides— Virg

MR SPECTATOR, London, Feb 9, 1711-12
I AM a Virgin, and in no Case despicable but yet such as I am I must remain, or else become, 'tis to be feared, less happy for I find not the least good Effect from the just Correction you some time since gave, that too free, that looser Part of our Sex which spoils the Men, the same Connivance at the Vices, the same ease of Admittance of Addresses, the same vitiated Relish of the Conversation of the greatest of Rakes (or in a more fashionable Way of expressing one's self, of such as have seen the World most) still abounds, increases, multiplies.

The humble Petition therefore of many of the most strictly virtuous, and of my self, is, That you'll once more exert your Authority, and that according to your late Promise, your full, your impartial Authority, on this siller Brunch of our Kind. For why should they be the uncontrollable Mistresses of our Fate? Why should they with Impunity indulge the Males in Licentiousness whilst single, and we have the dismal Hazard and Plague of reforming them when married? Strike home, Sir, then, and spare not, or all our maiden Hopes, our gilded Hopes of nuptial Felicity are frustrated, are vanished, and you your self, as well as Mr Courtly, will, by smoothing over immodest Practices with the Gloss of soft and harmless Names, for ever forfeit our Esteem. Nor think that I'm herein more severe than need be. If I have not reason more than enough, do you and the World judge from this ensuing Account, which, I think, will prove the Evil to be universal.

You must know then, that since your Reprehension of this Female Degeneracy came out, I've had a Tender of Respects from no less than five Persons, of tolerable Figure too as Times go. But the Misfortune is, that four of the five are professed Followers of the Mode. They would face me down, that all Women of good Sense ever were, and ever will be, Latitudinarians in Wedlock and always did, and will, give and take what they profanely term Conjugal Liberty of Conscience.

The two first of them, a Captain and a Merchant, to strengthen their Argument, pretend to repeat after a Couple, a Brace of Ladies of Quality and Wit, That Venus was always kind to Mars, and what Soul that has the least spark of Generosity, can deny a Man of Bravery any thing? And how pitiful a Trader that, whom no Woman but his own Wife will have Correspondence and Dealings with? Thus these whilst the third, the Country Squire, confessed, That indeed he was surprized into good Breeding, and entered into the Knowledge of the World unawares. That dining together Day at a Gentleman's House, the Person who entertained was obliged to leave him with his Wife and Nieces, where they spoke with so much Contempt of an

'absent Gentleman for being slow at a Hunt, that he had resolved never to be drowsy, unmanly, or stupid for the future at a Friends' House, and on a hunting Morning, not to pursue the Game either with the Husband abroad, or with the Wife at home.

'The next that came was a Tradesman, [no] less full of the Age than the former for he had the Gallantry to tell me, that at a late Junket which he was invited to, the Motion being made, and the Question being put, 'twas by Maid, Wife and Widow resolved nemine eor trahente, That a young sprightly Journeyman is absolutely necessary in their Way of Business. In which they had the Assent and Concurrence of the Husbands present. I dropped him a Courtesy, and gave him to understand that it was his Licence of Leave.

'I am reckoned pretty, and have had very many Advices besides these but have been veryaverse to hear any of them, from my Observation on these above mentioned, 'till I hoped some Good from the Character of my present Admirer, a Clergyman. But I find even amongst them there are indirect Practices in relation to Love, and our Treaty is at present a little in Suspence, till some Circumstances are cleared. There is a Charge against him among the Women, and the Case is this. It is alleged, That a certain endowed Female would have appropriated her self to and consolidated her self with a Church, which my Divine now enjoys, (or, which is the same thing, did prostitute her self to her Friend doing this for her) That my ecclesiastical, to obtain the one, did engage himself to take off the other that lay on Hand but that on his Success in the Spiritual, he again renounced the Carnal.

'I put this closely to him, and taxed him with Disingenuity. He to clear himself made the subsequent Defence and that in the most solemn Manner possible. That he was applied to and insinuated to accept of a Benefice. That a conditional Offer thereof was indeed made him at first, but with Disdain by him rejected. That when nothing (as they easily perceived) of this Nature could bring him to their Purpose, Assurance of his being entirely unengaged before hand, and safe from all their After-Expectations (the only Stratagem left to draw him in) was given him. That pursuant to this the Donation itself was without Delay, before several reputable Witnesses, tendered to him gratis with the open Profession of not the least Reserve, or most minute Condition, but that yet immediately after Induction, his insidious Introducer (or her crafty Procurer, which you will) industriously spread the Report, which had reached my Ears not only in the Neighbourhood of that said Church, but in London, in the University, in mine and his own County, and where-ever else it might probably obviate his Application to any other Woman, and so confine him to this alone. And, in a Word, That as he never did make any previous Offer of his Service, or the least Step to her Affection, so on his Discovery of these

2 [not]

'Designs thus had to trick him he could not but afterwards, in Justice to himself, vindicate both his Innocence and Freedom by keeping his proper Distance.

'This is his Apology, and I think I shall be satisfied with it. But I cannot conclude my tedious Epistle, without recommending to you not only to resume your former Christement, but to add to your Criminals the Simoniacal Ladies, who seduce the sacred Order into the Difficulty of either breaking a mercenary Troth made to them whom they ought not to deceive, or by breaking or keeping it offending against him whom they cannot deceive. Your Assistance and Labours of this sort would be of great Benefit, and your speedy Thoughts on this Subject would be very seasonable to

'It is observed, that a Man improves more by reading the Story of a Person eminent for Prudence and Virtue, than by the finest Rules and Precepts of Morality. In the same manner a Representation of those Calamities and Misfortunes which a weak Man suffers from wrong Measures and ill-concerted Schemes of Life, is apt to make a deeper Impression upon our Minds, than the wisest Maxims and Instructions that it can be given us, for avoiding the like Follies and Inconduits in our own private Conduct. It is for this Reason that I lay before my Reader the following Letter, and leave it with him to make his own use of it, without adding my Reflections of my own upon the Subject Matter.

MR SPECTATOR,

'Having carefully perused a Letter sent you by Joshua a Riddle, I sq, with your subsequent Discourse upon Poor Money, I do presume to trouble you with an Account of my own Case, which I look upon to be no less deplorable than that of Squire Fribble. I am a Person of no Extraction, having begun the World with a small parcel of Rusty Iron, and was for some Years commonly known by the Name of Jock Iniz! I have naturally a very happy Genius for getting Money, insomuch that by the Age of Five and twenty I had scraped together Four thousand two hundred Pounds Five Shillings, and a few odd Pence. I then launched out into considerable Business, and became a bold Trader both by Sea and Land, which in a few Years raised me a

'very [great¹] Fortune For these my Good Services I was Knighted in the thirty fifth Year of my Age, and lived with great Dignity among my City-Neighbours by the Name of Sir John Anvil Being in my Temper very Ambitious, I was now bent upon making a Family, and accordingly resolved that my Descendants should have a Dash of Good Blood in their Veins In order to this, I made Love to the Lady Mary Oddly, an Indigent young Woman of Quality To cut short the Marriage I reaty, I threw her a Charte Blanche, as our News Papers call it, desiring her to write upon it her own Terms She was very concise in her Demands, insisting only that the Disposal of my Fortune, and the Regulation of my Family, should be entirely in her Hands Her Father and Brothers appeared exceedingly averse to this Match, and would not see me for some time but at present we are so well reconciled, that they Dine with me almost every Day, and have borrowed considerable Sums of me, which my Lady Mary very often twits me with, when she would shew me how kind her Relations are to me She had no Portion, as I told you before, but what she wanted in Fortune, she makes up in Spirit She at present changed my Name to Sir John Anvil, and at present writes her self Mary Enville I have had some Children by her, whom she has Christened with the Surnames of her Family, in order, as she tells me, to wean out the Homeliness of their Prentage by the Father's Side Our eldest Son is the Honourable Oddly Enville, Esq., and our eldest Daughter Harriot Enville Upon her first coming into my Family, she turned off a parcel of very careful Servants, who had been long with me, and introduced in their stead a couple of Blackamoors, and three or four very genteel Fellows in Laced Liveries, besides her French woman, who is perpetually making a Noise in the House in a Language which no body understands, except my Lady Mary She next set her self to reform every Room of my House, having glazed all my Chimney pieces with Looking-glass, and planted every Corner with such heaps of China, that I am obliged to move about my own House with the greatest Caution and Circumspection, for fear of hurting some of our Brittle Furniture She makes an Illumination once a Week with Wax-Candles in one of the largest Rooms, in order, as she phrases it, to see Company At which time she always desires me to be Abroad, or to confine my self to the Cock-loft, that I may not disgrace her among her Visitants of Quality Her Footmen, as I told you before, are such Betus that I do not much care for asking them Questions when I do, they answer me with a sassy Frown, and say that every thing, which I find Fault with, was done by my Lady Mary's Order She tells me that she intends they shall wear Swords with their next Liveries, having lately observed the Footmen of two or three Persons of Quality hanging behind the Coach with Swords by their Sides As soon as the first Honey Moon was over, I represented to her the

'Unreasonableness of those daily Innovations which she made in my Family, but she told me I was no longer to consider my self as Sir John Anvil, but as her Husband, and added, with a Frown, that I did not seem to know who she was I was surprized to be treated thus, after such Familiarities as had passed between us But she has since given me to know that whatever Freedoms she may sometimes indulge me in, she expects in general to be treated with the Respect that is due to her Birth and Quality Our Children have been trained up from their Infancy with so many Accounts of their Mother's Family, that they know the Stories of all the great Men and Women it has produced Their Mother tells them, that such an one commanded in such a Sea Engagement, that their Great Grandfather had a Horse shot under him at Edge-hill, that their Uncle was at the Siege of Buda, and that her Mother danced in a Ball at Court with the Duke of Monmouth, with abundance of Fiddle-faddle of the same Nature. I was, the other Day, a little out of Countenance at a Question of my little Daughter Harriot, who asked me, with a great deal of Innocence, why I never told them of the Generals and Admirals that had been in my Family As for my Eldest Son Oddly, he has been so spirited up by his Mother, that if he does not mend his Manners I shall go near to disinvent him He drew his Sword upon me before he was nine years old, and told me, that he expected to be used like a Gentleman upon my offering to correct him for his Insolence, my Lady Mary stepped in between us, and told me, that I ought to consider there was some Difference between his Mother and mine She is perpetually finding out the Faults of her own Relations in every one of my Children, tho', by the way, I have a little Chubb-faced Boy as like me as he can stare, if I durst say so but what most angers me, when she sees me playing with any of them upon my Knee, she has begged me more than once to converse with the Children as little as possible, that they may not learn any of my awkward Tricks. You must farther know, since I am opening my Heart to you, that she thinks her self my Superior in Sense, as much as she is in Quality, and therefore treats me like a plain well meaning Man, who does not know the World She dictates to me in my own Business, sets me right in Point of Trade, and if I disagree with her about any of my Ships at Sea, wonders that I will dispute with her, when I know very well that her Great Grandfather was a Flag Officer To complicit my Sufferings she has teased me for this Quarter of [?] Year last past, to remove into one of the Squares at the other End of the Town, promising for my Encouragement, that I shall have as good a Cock-loft as any Gentleman in the Square to which the Honourable Oddly Enville, Esq., always adds, like a Jack-a-napes as he is, that he hopes 'twill be as near the Court as possible

In short, Mr SPECTATOR, I am so much out of my natural Element, that to recover my old

MR SPECTATOR,

WHEN you talk of the Subject of Love, and the Relations arising from it, methinks you should take Care to leave no Fault unobserved which concerns the State of Marriage.
The great Vexation that I have observed in it, is, that the wedded Couple seem to want Opportunities of being often enough alone together, and are forced to quarrel and be fond before Company. Mr Hetspur and his Lady, in a Room full of their Friends, are ever saying something so smart to each other, and that but just within Rules, that the whole Company stand in the utmost Anxiety and Suspence for fear of their falling into Extremities which they could not be present at. On the other Side, Tom Fad-dle and his pretty Spouse where-ever they com-are billing at such a Rate as they think must do our Hearts good who behold 'em. Cannot you possibly propose a Morn between being Wasps and Doves in Publick? I should think if you advised to hate or love sincerely it would be better.
For if they would be so discreet as to hate from the very Bottom of their Hearts, their Avers on would be too strong for little Gibes every Moment and if they loved with strict calm and noble Value which dwells in the Heart, with a Warmth like that of Life Blood, they would not be so impatient of their Passion as to fall into observable Fondness. This Method, in each Case, would save Appearances, but as those who offend on the fond Side are by much the fewer, I would have you begin with them, and go on to take Notice of a most impertinent Licence married Women take, not only to be very loving, to their Spouses in Publick, but also make numerous Allusions to private Familiarities, and the like. Lucina is a Lady of the greatest Discretion, you must know, in the World and withal very much a Physician. Upon the Strength of these two Qualities there is nothing she will not speak of before us Virgins, and she every Day talks with a very grave Air in such a Manner, as is very improper so much as to be hinted at but to obtrude the greatest Extramity. Those whom they call good Bodies, notable People, hearty Neighbours, and the purest goodest Company in the World, are the great Offenders in this Kind.
Here I think I have laid before you an open Field for Pleasantry and hope you will shew these People that at least they are not witty.
In which you will save from many a Blush a daily Sufferer, who is very much

Your most humble Servant,
Susanna Loveworth.

MR SPECTATOR,

'In yours of Wednesday the 30th past, you and your Correspondent are very severe on a sort of Men, whom you call Male Coquets but without any other Reason, in my Apprehension, than that of paying a shallow Compliment to the fair Sex, by accusing some Men of imaginary Faults, that the Women may not seem to be the more faulty Sex, though at the same time you suppose there are some so weak as to be imposed upon by fine Things and false Addresses. I can't persuade myself that your Design is to debar the Sexes the Benefit of each other's Conversation within the Rules of Honour, nor will you, I dare say, recommend to 'em, or encourage the common Tea Table Talk, much less that of Politicks and Matters of State. And if these are forbidden Subjects of Discourse, then as long as there are any Women in the World who take a Pleasure in hearing themselves praised, and can bear the Sight of a Man prostrate at their Feet, so long I shall make no Wonder that there are those of the other Sex who will pay them those impertinent Humiliations. We should have few People such as to practise Flattery, if all were so wise as to despise it. I don't deny but you would do a meritorious Act, if you could prevent all In-positions on the Simplicity of young Women, but I must confess I don't apprehend you have had the Fault on the proper Person, and if I trouble you with my Thoughts upon it I promise my self your Pardon. Such of the Sex as are raw and innocent and most exposed to these Attacks, have, or their Parents are much to blame if they have not, one to advise and guard 'em, and are obliged themselves to take Care of 'em, but if these, who ought to hinder Men from all Opportunities of this sort of Conversation, instead of that encourage and promote it, the Suspicion is very just that there are some private Reasons for it, and I'll leave it to you to determine on which Side a Part is then acted. Some Women there are who are arrived at Years of Discretion, I mean are got out of the Hands of their Parents and Governours, and are set up for themselves, who yet are liable to these Attempts, but if these are prevailed upon, you must excuse me if I lay the Fault upon them, that their Wisdom is not grown with their Years. My Client, Mr Strin-gham, whom you summoned to declare himself, gives you Thanks however for your Warning, and begs the Favour only to enlarge his Time for a Week, or to the last Day of the Term, and then he'll appear gratis, and pray no Day over

Yours,
Philanthropos

WE are generally so much pleased with any little Accomplishments, either of Body or Mind, which have once made us remarkable in the World, that we endeavour to persuade our selves it is not in the Power of Time to rob us of them We are eternally pursuing the same Methods which first procured us the Applauses of Mankind It is from this Notion that an Author writes on, tho' he is come to Dotage without ever considering that his Memory is impaired, and that he has lost that Life, and those Spirits, which formerly raised his Fancy, and fired his Imagination The same Folly hinders a Man from submitting his Behaviour to his Age, and makes Clodius, who was a celebrated Dancer at five and twenty, still love to hobble in a Minuet, tho' he is past Threescore It is this, in a Word, which fills the Town with elderly Fops, and superannuated Coquets

Canidia, a Lady of this latter Species, passed by me Yesterday in her Coach Canidia was an haughty Beauty of the last Age, and was followed by Crowds of Adorers, whose Passions only pleased her, as they gave her Opportunities of plying the Tyrant She then contracted that awful Cast of the Eye and forbidding Frown, which she has not yet laid aside, and has still all the Insolence of Beauty without its Charms If she now attracts the Eyes of any Beholders, it is only by being remarkably ridiculous even her own Sex laugh at her Affectation and the Men, who always enjoy an ill-natured Pleasure in seeing an imperious Beauty humbled and neglected, regard her with the same Satisfaction that a free Nation sees a Tyrant in Disgrace.

WILL HONEYCOMB, who is a great Admirer of the Gallantries in King Charles the Second's Reign, lately communicated to me a Letter written by a Wit of that Age to his Mistress, who it seems was a Lady of Canidia's Humour and

MADAM,

'Since my waking Thoughts have never been 'able to influence you in my Favour, I am re'solved to try whether my Dreams can make any 'Impression on you To this end I shall give you 'an Account of a very odd one which my Fancy
'presented to me last Night, within a few Hours
'after I left you

'Methought I was unaccountably conveyed 'into the most delicious Place mine Eyes ever 'beheld, it was a large Valley divided by a River
'of the purest Water I had ever seen The 'Ground on each Side of it rose by an easie
'Ascent, and was covered with Flowers of an in'finite Variety, which as they were reflected in the 'Water doubled the Beauties of the Place, or rather 'formed an Imaginary Scene more beautiful than 'the real. On each Side of the River was a 'Range of lofty Trees, whose Boughs were laden 'with almost as many Birds as Leaves Every 'Tree was full of Harmony

'I had not gone far in this pleasant Valley, when
'I perceived that it was terminated by a most mag'nificent Temple The Structure was ancient,
'and regular On the Top of it was figured the 'God Saturn, in the same Shape and Dress that 'the Poets usually represent Time

'As I was advancing to satisfy my Curiosity by 'a nearer View, I was stopped by an Object far 'more beautiful than any I had before discovered 'in the whole Place I fancy, Madam, you will 'easily guess that this could hardly be any thing
'but your self in reality it was so, you lay ex'tended on the Flowers by the side of the River,
'so that your Hands which were thrown in a negli'gent Posture, almost touched the Water Your 'Eyes were closed, but if your Sleep deprived
'me of the Satisfaction of seeing them, it left me 'at leisure to contemplate several other Charms,
'which disappear when your Eyes are open I 'could not but admire the Tranquillity you slept 'in, especially when I considered the Uneasiness
'you produce in so many others

'While I was wholly taken up in these Reflec'tions, the Doors of the Temple flew open, with a 'very great Noise and lifting up my Eyes, I saw 'two Figures, in human Shape, coming into the 'Valley Upon a nearer Survey, I found them 'to be Youth and Love. The first was encircled 'with a kind of Purple Light, that spread a Glory
'over all the Place the other held a flaming

² By William Alexander, Earl of Stirling (who died in 1640), one of his four 'Monarchical Tragedies.' He received a grant of Nova Scotia to colonize, and was secretary of state for Scotland

'Torch in his Hand I could observe, that all the way as they came towards us, the Colours of the Flowers appeared more lively, the Trees shone out in Blossoms, the Birds threw themselves into Pairs, and descended thence as they passed. The whole Face of Nature glowed with new Beauties. They were no sooner arrived at the Place where you lay, when they seated themselves on each Side of you. On their Approach methought I saw a new Bloom arise in your Face, and new Charms diffuse themselves over your whole Person. You appeared more than Mortal but, to my great Surprise, continued fast asleep, tho' the two Deities made several gentle Efforts to awaken you.

After a short Time, SATURN (displaying a Pair of Wings which I had not before taken notice of) flew off. LOVE still remained, and holding the Torch which he had in his Hand before your Face, you still appeared as beautiful as ever. The glancing of the Light in your Eyes at length awakened you, when, to my great Surprise, instead of acknowledging the Favour of the Deity, you frowned upon him, and struck the Torch out of his Hand into the River. The God after having regarded you with a Look that spoke at [once] his Pity and Displeasure, flew away. Immediately a Kind of Gloom over-spread the whole Place. At the same time I saw an hideous Spectre enter at one end of the Valley. His Eyes were sunk into his Head, his Face was pale and withered, and his Skin puckered up in Wrinkles. As he walked on the sides of the Bank the River froze, the Flowers faded the Trees shed their Blossoms the Birds wrung from off the Boughs and fell dead at his Feet. By these Marks I knew him to be OLD AGE. You were seized with the utmost Horror and Amazement at his Approach. You endeavoured to have fled but the Phantome caught you in his Arms. You may easily guess at the Change you suffered in this Embrace. For my own Part though I am still too full of the [frightful] Idea, I will not shock you with a Description of it. I was so startled at the Sight that my Sleep immediately left me, and I found myself awake, I am sure to consider of a Dream which seems too extraordinary to be without a Meaning. I am, Madam, with the greatest Respect,

31. SPECTATOR,

'If this Paper has the good Fortune to be honoured with a Place in your Writings, I shall be the more pleased, because the Character of I mitia is not in its origin but a real one. I have industriously observed the whole by the Addition of one or two Circumstances of no Consequence, that the Person it is drawn from might still be concealed and that the Writer of it might not be in the least suspected, and for [other] Reasons, I chuse not to give it the Form of a Letter. But if, besides the Faults of the Composition, there be any thing in it more proper for a Correspondent than the SPECTATOR himself to write, I submit it to your better Judgment, to receive any other Model you think fit.

I am, SIR,

Your very humble Servant

There is nothing which gives one so pleasing a Prospect of human Nature as the Contemplation of Wisdom and Beauty. The latter is the peculiar Portion of that Sex which is therefore called Vir but the happy Concurrence of both these Excellencies in the same Person, is a Character too celestial to be frequently met with. Beauty is an over-weening, self-sufficient thing, careless of providing it self any more substantial Ornaments, and so little does it consult its own Interests, that it too often defeats it self by betraying that Innocence which renders it lovely and desirable. As therefore Virtue makes a beautiful Woman appear more beautiful, so Beauty makes a virtuous Woman really more virtuous. Whilst I am considering these two Perfections gloriously united in one Person, I cannot help representing to my Mind the Image of I mitia.

Who ever beheld the charming Emilia, without feeling in his Breast that once the Glow of Love and the Tenderness of virtuous Friendship? The unstudied Graces of her Behaviour, and the pleasing Accents of her Tongue, incessantly draw you on to wish for a nearer Enjoyment of them: but even her Smiles carry in them a silent Reproof to the Impulses of licentious Love. Thus, tho' the Attributes of her Beauty play almost irresistibly upon you and create Desire, you immediately stand corrected not by the Severity but the Decency of her Virtue. That Sweetness and Good humour which is so visible in her Face, naturally diffuses it self into every Word and Action. A Man must be a Savage, who at the Sight of I mitia, is not more inclined to do her Good than gratify himself. Her Person, as it is thus studiously embellished by Nature thus adorned with unpremeditated Graces, is a fit Lodging for a Mind so fair and lovely there dwell rational Pity, modest Hope, and cheerful Resignation.

Many of the prevailing Passions of Mankind do undecor'dedly pass under the Name of Religion which is thus made to express itself in Action, according to the Nature of the Constitution in which it resides. So that were we to make a Judgment from Appearances, one would imagine Religion in some is little better than Sullenness and Reserve, in many Fear, in others the Dependings of a melancholly Complexion, in others the Formality of insignificant unaffecting Observances, in others Severity, in others Ostentation. In Emilia it is a Principle founded in Reason and enlivened with Hope: it does not break forth into irregular Fits and Spells of Devotion, but is in uniform and consistent Tenour of Action. It is strict without Severity, compassionate without Weakness: it is the Perfection of that good Humour which proceeds from the Understanding, not the Effect of an easy Constitution.

By a generous Sympathy in Nature, we feel our selves disposed to mourn when any of our Fellow Creatures are afflicted, but injured Innocence and Beauty in Distress, is an Object that carries in it something inexpressibly moving. It softens the most manly Heart with the tenderest Sensations of Love and Compassion, till at length it confesses its Humanity, and flows out into Tears.

Were I to relate that part of Emilia's Life which has given her an Opportunity of exerting the Heroism of Christianity, it would make too sad, too tender a Story. But when I consider her alone in the midst of her Distresses, looking beyond this gloomy Vale of Affliction and Sorrow into the Joys of Heaven and Immortality, and when I see her in Conversation thoughtless and easy as if she were the most happy Creature in the World, I am transported with Admiration. Surely never did such a Philosophic Soul inhabit such a beautiful Form! For Beauty is often made a Privilege against Thought and Reflection: it laughs at Wisdom, and will not abide the Gravity of its Instructions.

Were I able to represent Emilia's Virtues in their proper Colours and their due Proportions, Love or Flattery might perhaps be thought to have drawn the Picture larger than Life: but as this is but an imperfect Draught of so excellent a Character, and as I cannot, will not hope to have any Interest in her Person, all that I can say of her is but impartial Praise extorted from me by the prevailing Brightness of her Virtues. So rare a Pattern of Female Excellence ought not to be concealed: but should be set out to the View and Imitation of the World: for how amiable does Virtue appear thus as it were made visible to us in so fair an Example!

Horatia's Disposition is of a very different Turn. Her Thoughts are wholly bent upon Conquest and arbitrary Power. That she has some Wit and Beauty no Body denies, and therefore has the Esteem of all her Acquaintance: as a Woman of an agreeable Person and Conversation, but a hateful her Husband may think of it that is not sufficient for Horatia. She values that little to Respect as a mean Acquisition, and demands Veneration in the Right of an Idol, for this Reason her natural Desire of Life is conually checked with an inconsistent Fear of Wrinkles and old Age.

Emilia cannot be supposed ignorant of her personal Charms, tho' she seems to be so, but she will not hold her Happiness upon so precarious a Tenure, whilst her Mind is adorned with Beauties of a more exalted and lasting Nature. When in the full Bloom of Youth and Beauty we saw her surrounded with a Crowd of Adorers, she took no Pleasure in Slaughter and Destruction, gave no false deluding Hopes which might encrease the Torments of her disappointed Lovers: but having for some Time given to the Decency of a Virgin Coyness, and examined the Merit of their several Pretensions, she at length gratified her own, by resigning herself to the ardent Pastor of Bromius. Bromius was then Master of many good Qualities and a moderate Fortune, which was soon after unexpectedly increased to a plentiful Estate. This for a good while proved his Misfortune, as it furnished his unexperienced Age with the Opportunities of Evil Company and a sensual Life. He might have longer wandered in the Labyrinths of Vice and Folly, had not Emilia's prudent Conduct won him over to the Government of his Reason. Her Ingenuity has been constantly employed in humanizing his Passions and refining his Pleasures. She shewed him by her own Example, that Virtue is consistent with decent Freedoms and good Humour, or rather, that it cannot subsist without 'em. Her good Sense readily instructed her, that a silent Example and an easy unrepining Behaviour, will always be more persuasive than the Severity of Lectures and Admonitions: and that there is so much Pride interwoven into the Mark of human Nature, that an obstinate Man must only take the Hint from another, and then be left to advise and correct himself. Thus by an artful Train of Management and unseen Persuasions, having at first brought him not to dislike, and at length to be pleased with that which otherwise he would not have bore to hear of, she then knew how to press and secure this Advantage, by approving it as his Thoughts, and seconding it as his Proposal. By this Means she has grounded an Interest in some of his leading Passions, and made them accessory to his Reformation.

There is another Particular of Emilia's Conduct which I can't forbear mentioning. To some perhaps it may at first Sight appear but a trifling inconsiderable Circumstance, but for my Part, I think it highly worthy of Observation, and to be recommended to the Consideration of the fair Sex. I have often thought wrapping Gowns and dirty Linnen, with all that huddled Oeconomy of Dress which passes under the general Name of a Mob, the Bane of conjugal Love, and one of the readiest Means imaginable to alienate the Affection of an Husband, especially a fond one. I have heard some Ladies, who have been surprized by Company in such a Deshabille, apologize for it after this Manner. Truly I am ashamed to be caught in this Pickle, but my Husband and I were sitting all alone by our selves, and I did not expect to see such good Company. This by the way is a fine Compliment to the good Man, which 'tis ten to one but he returns in dogged Answers

But there is no single Passage in the whole Poem worked up to a greater Sublimity, than that wherein his Person is described in those celebrated Lines

—He, above the rest
In shape and gesture proudly eminent Stood like a Tower, &c

His Sentiments are every way answerable to his Character, and suitable to a created Being of the most exalted and most depraved Nature Such is that in which he takes Possession of his Place of Torments

—Hail Horrors! hail Infernal World! and thou profoundest Hell Receive thy new Possessor, one who brings A mind not to be changed by place or time And Afterwards,

—Here at least
We shall be free, th' Almighty hath not built Here for his envy, will not drive us hence Here we may reign secure, and in my choice To reign is worth Ambition, tho' in Hell Better to reign in Hell, than serve in Heaven

Amidst those Impieties which this Enraged Spirit utters in other places of the Poem, the Author has taken care to introduce none that is not big with absurdity, and incapable of shocking a Religious Reader, his Words, as the Poet himself describes them, bearing only a Semblance of Worth, not Substance He is likewise with great Art described as owning his Adversary to be Almighty Whatever perverse Interpretation he puts on the Justice, Mercy, and other Attributes of the Supreme Being, he frequently confesses his Omnipotence, that being the Perfection he was forced to allow him, and the only Consideration which could support his Pride under the Shroud of his Defeat

Nor must I here omit that beautiful Circumstance of his bursting out in Tears, upon his Survey of those innumerable Spirits whom he had involved in the same Guilt and Ruin with himself

—H. now prepared
To speak, whereat their doubled ranks they bend
From wing to wing, and half enclose him round With all his Peers Attention held them mute Thrice he assayed, and thrice in spite of Scorn Fell as such as Angels weep, burst forth—

The Catalogue of Evil Spirits has abundance of Learning in it, and a very agreeable turn of Poetry, which rises in a great measure from [its'] describing the Places where they were worshipped, by those beautiful Marls of Rivers so frequent among the Ancient Poets The Author had doubtless in this place Homers Catalogue of Ships, and Virgils List of Warriors, in his View The Characters of Moloch and Bebal prepare the Reader's Mind for their respective Speeches and Behaviour in the second and sixth Book The Account of Thammuz is finely Romantic, and suitable to what we read among the Ancients of the Worship which was paid to that Idol

² [his]

[—Thammuz came next behind, Whose annual Wound in Lebanon allur'd
The Syrian Damsels to lament his fate,
In am'rous Ditties all a Summer's day, While smooth Adonis from his native Rock Ran purple to the Sea, suppos'd with blood

His Eye survey'd the dast' Idolatries Of alienated Judah—

The Reader will pardon me if I insert as a Note on this beautiful Passage, the Account given us by the late ingenious Mr Maundrell² of this Ancient Piece of Worship, and probably the first Occasion of such a Superstition 'We came to a fair large River—doubtless the Ancient River Adonis, so famous for the Idolatrous Rites performed here in Lamentation of Adonis We had the Fortune to see what may be supposed to be the Occasion of that Opinion which Lucian relates, concerning this River, viz that this Stream, at certain Seasons of the Year, especially about the Feast of Adonis, is of a bloody Colour which the Heathens looked upon as proceeding from a kind of Symptom in the River for the Death of Adonis, who was killed by a wild Boar in the Mountains, out of which this Stream rises Something like this we saw actually come to pass, for the Water was stain'd to a surprising Redness and, as we observed in travelling, had discoloured the Sea a great way into a reddish Hue, occasion'd doubtless by a sort of Minium, or red Earth, washed into the River by the Violence of the Rain, and not by any Stain from Adonis's Blood]

The Passage in the Catalogue, explaining the manner how Spirits transform themselves by Contractions or Enlargement of their Dimensions, is introduced with great Judgment, to make way for several surprising Accidents in the Sequel of the Poem There follows one, at the very End of the first Book, which is what the French Critics call Marvellous, but at the same time probable by reason of the Passage last mentioned As soon as the Infernal Palace is finished, we are told the Multitude and Rabble of Spirits immediately shrunk themselves into a small Compress, that there might be Room for such a numberless Assembly in this capacious Hall. But it is the Poet's Refinement upon this Thought which I most admire, and which is indeed very noble in its self. For he tells us, that notwithstanding the vulgar among the fallen Spirits, contracted their Forms, those of the first Rank and Dignity still preserved their natural Dimensions.

² A Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem at Easter, A.D. 1697 By Henry Maundrell, M.A. It was published at Oxford in 1703, and was in a new edition in 1707 It reached a seventh edition in 1749 Maundrell was a Fellow of Exeter College, which he left to take the appointment of chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo The brief account of his journey is in the form of a diary, and the passage quoted is under the date, March 15, when they were two days' journey from Tripoli The stream he identifies with the Adonis was called, he says, by the Turks Ibruhim Pashah It is near Gibyle, called by the Greeks Byblus, a place once famous for the birth and temple of Adonis The extract from Paradise Lost and the passage from Maundrell were interpolated in the first reprint of the Spectator

*Thus in confus'd Spirits the allied Forms Reduc'd their Statues immense, and all in Thought unite it, as if in the Hall
Of that Infernal Court but far below,
And in their own Dimensions like their selves,
The great Serpent of Chaos and Clime,
In close recess and secret conceals A thousand Devils Gods on Golden Seats, Frequent and full.*

The Character of Magnon, and the Description of the Pandemonium, are full of Beauties.

There are several other Strokes in the first Book wonderfully poetical, and Instances of that Sublime Genius so peculiar to the Author. Such is the Description of Azazel's Statue, and of the Infernal Standard, which he unfurls. It is also of that ghastly Light, by which the Fiends appear to one another in their Place of Torments.

The Seat of Disolation and of Light, Saw what the glimmering of those loud Flames Casts pale and dreadful.

The Shout of the whole Host of fallen Angels when drawn up in Battel Array.

The universal Host sent A Shout that tore Hell's Concanes, and beyond Frighted the region of Chaos and old Night.

The Review, which the Leader makes of his Infernal Army.

*He thro' the eternal files Darts his experienced eye, and soon traverse
The whole Battalion views, their Order due, Their Visages and Stature as of Gods Their Number last he sums, and so his Heart Dursts with Pride, and hard'ning in his streights

The Flash of Light which appear'd upon the drawing of their Swords.

He spake and to confirm his words outflow Millions of flaming Swords, drawn from the thighs

Of mighty Cherubim the sudden Blaze Far round illumined Hell.

The sudden Production of the Pandemonium.

Anon out of the Earth a Fabrick huge Rose like an Exhalation, with the Sound Of dulcet Symphonies and Voices sweet.

The Artificial Illuminations made in it.

From the arched Roof Pendent by subtle Magick, many a Row Of Starry Lamps and blazing Crescents, fed With Naphtha and Asphaltus, yielded Light As from a Sky.

There are also several noble Similes and Allusions in the First Book of Paradise Lost. And here I must observe that when Milton alludes either to Things or Persons, he never quits his Simile till it rises to some very great Idea, which is often forced on the Occasion that gave Birth to it. The Resemblance does not, perhaps, last above a Line or two, but the Poet runs on with the Hint till he has raised out of it some glorious Image or Sentiment, proper to influence the Mind of the Reader, and to give it that sublime kind of Interrainment which is suitable to the Nature of an Heroick Poem. Those who are acquainted with Homer's and Virgil's way of Writing, can not but be pleased with this kind of Structure in Milton's Similitudes. I am the more particular on this Head, because ignorant Readers, who have formed their Taste upon the quaint Similes, and little Turns of Wit which are so much in Vogue among Modern Poets, cannot relish these Beauties which are of a much higher Nature, and are therefore apt to censure Milton's Comparisons in which they do not see any surprising Points of Likeness. Monsieur Perrault was a Man of this vicious Relish, and for that very Reason has endeavoured to turn into Ridicule several of Homer's Similitudes, which he calls Comparaisons a l'oreille queue, Long tail'd Comparisons. I shall conclude this Paper on the First Book of Milton with the Answer which Monsieur Boileau makes to Perrault on this Occasion. 'Comparisons says he, in Odes, and Epic Poems, are not introduced only to illustrate and embellish the Discourse, but to amuse and relax the Mind of the Reader, by frequently disengaging him from too painful Attention to the Principal Subject, and by leading him into other agreeable Images. Homer, says he, excelled in this Particular, whose Comparisons abound with such Images of Nature as are proper to relieve and diversify his Subjects. He continually instructs the Reader, and makes him take notice, even in Objects which are every Day before our Eyes, of such Circumstances as we should not otherwise have observed. To

* See note to No 279. Charles Perrault made himself a lasting name by his Fairy Tales a charming embodiment of French nursery traditions. The four volumes of his Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes, published in 1696, included the good general idea of human progress, but worked it out badly, dealing irreverently with Plato as well as Homer and Pindar, and exalting among the moderns not only Molière and Corneille, but also Chapelain, Scuderi and Quinault, whom he called 'the greatest lyrical and dramatic poet that France ever had'. The battle had begun with a debate in the Academy. Racine having ironically complimented Perrault on the ingenuity with which he had elevated little men above the ancients in his poem (published 1687), le Siècle de Louis le Grand. Pontenelle touched the matter lightly, as Perrault's ally, in his Digression sur les Anciens et les Modernes, but afterwards drew back, saying, 'I do not belong to the party which claims me for its chief'. The leaders on the respective sides, unequally matched, were Perrault and Boileau.

thus he adds, as a Maxim universally acknowledged, 'That it is not necessary in Poetry for the Points of the Comparison to correspond with one another exactly, but that a general Resemblance is sufficient, and that too much Nicety in this Particular favours of the Rhetoric and Lips of a Grammarian.'

In short, if we look into the Conduct of Homer, Virgil and Milton, as the great Fable is the Soul of each Poem, so to give their Works an agreeable Variety, their Episodes are so many short Fables, and their Similes so many short Episodes, to which you may add, if you please, that their Metaphors are so many short Similes. If the Reader considers the Comparisons in the first Book of Milton of the Sun in an Eclipse, of the Sleeping Lemathan, of the Bees swarming about their Hive, of the Fury Dance, in the view whereof I have here placed them, he will easily discover the great Beauties that are in each of those Passages.

Vulnus alit - ens et caeco carpitur igni — Virg

THE Circumstances of my Correspondent, whose Letter I now insert, are so frequent, that I cannot want Compression so much as to forbear saying it before the Town. There is some thing so mean and inhuman in a direct Smithfield Bargain for Children, that if this Lover carries his Point, and observes the Rules he pretends to follow, I do not only wish him Success, but also that it may imitate others to follow his Example. I know not one Motive relating to this Use which would produce so many honourable and worthy Actions, as the Hopes of obtaining a Woman of Merit. There would ten thousand Ways of Industry and honest Ambition be pursued by young Men, who believed that the Persons admired had Value enough for their Passion to attend the Event of their good Fortune in all their Applications, in order to make their Circumstances fall in with the Duties they owe to themselves, their Families, and their Country. All these Relations a Man should think of who intends to go into the State of Marriage and expects to make it a State of Pleasure and Satisfaction.

MR SPECTATOR,

I have for some Years indulged a Passion for a young Lady of Age and Quality suitable to my own, but very much superior in Fortune. It is the Fashion with Parents (how justly I leave you to judge) to make all Regards give way to the Article of Wealth. From this one Consideration it is that I have concealed the ardent Love I have for her, but I am beholden to the Force of my Love for many Advantages which I reap from it towards the better Conduct of my Life. A certain Complacency to all the World, a strong Desire to oblige where ever it lay in my Power, and a circumspect Behaviour in all my Words and Actions, have rendered me more particularly acceptable to all my Friends and Acquaintance. I have thus had the same good I seek upon my Fortune, and I have increased in Riches in proportion to my Advancement in those Arts which make a man agreeable and amiable. There is a certain Sympathy which will tell my Mistress from these Circumstances, that it is I who write this for her Reading, if you will please to insert it. There is not a downright Innuity, but a great Coldness between our Parents, so that if either of us declared any kind Sentiment for each other, her Friends would be very likely to tell us an Obligation upon our Family, and mine to receive it from hers. Under these delicate Circumstances it is no easy Matter to act with Safety. I have no Reason to fancy my Mistress has any Reward for me, but from a very distant and valued Value which I have for her. If from any Hint in my future Paper of yours she gives me the least Discouragement, I doubt not but I shall surmount all other Difficulties and inspired by so noble a Motive for the Care of my Fortune as the Belief she is to be concerned in it, I will not despair of receiving her one Day from her Father's own Hand.

I am, SIR,

Your most obedient humble Servant,
Clytander

To his Worship the SPECTATOR,

The humble Petition of Auntory Title-Page, Stationer, in the Centre of Lincoln Inn-Fields,

Sheweth,

That your Petitioner and his Forefathers have been Sellers of Books for Time immemorial. That your Petitioner's Ancestor, Crouchback Title-Page, was the first of that Vocation in Britain, who keeping his Station in fair Weather, at the Corner of Lottery, was by way of Immunity called the Stationer, and ran a Shop from him all succeeding Book-sellers have affected to bear. That the Station of your Petitioner and his Father has been in the Price of his present Settlement ever since that Square has been built. That your Petitioner has formerly had the Honour of your Worship's Custom and hopes you never had Reason to complain of your Penny worth, that particularly he sold you your first Lilly's Grammar, and at the same Time a Wife's Connexion almost as good as new. Moreover, that your first rudimental Essays in Spectatorship were made in your Petitioner's Shop, where you often practised for Hours together sometimes on his books upon the Rules, sometimes on the little Hieroglyphicks either gilt, silvered, or plain, which the Stationer Woman on the other Side of the Shop had wrought in Ginger bread and sometimes on the English Youth, who in sundry Places there were exercising themselves in the traditional Sports of the Field.

From these Considerations it is, that your Petitioner is encouraged to apply himself to you, and to proceed humbly to acquaint your Worship, That he has certain Intelligence that you receive great Numbers of defamatory Letters designed by their Authors to be published, which you throw aside and totally neglect. Your Petitioner therefore prays that you will please to bestow on him those Refuse Letters, and he hopes by printing them to get a more plentiful Provision for his Family or at the worst he may be allowed to sell them by the Pound Weight to his good Customers the Pistre Cooks of London and Westminster.

And your Petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

In the Spectator,

The humble Petition of J. H. Esq. of St. Vincent in the House of Commons, in behalf of himself and Neighbourhood,

Sheweth,

That your Petitioners have with great Industry and Application arrived at the most exact Art of Invitation or Intreaty. That by a speech up and persuasive Address, they have for many Years last past pesterably cried in every tenth Passenger, whether they intended or not to call at the Ship, to come in and buy, and from that softness of Behaviour, have received great Profit and at the gentle Appellation of the Law.

That there have of late set up amongst us certain Persons of St. Vincent and J. H. Esq. who by the Strength of their Arms, and the Address of their Throats, draw on the Regard of all Passengers from your said Petitioners from which Violence they are distinguished by the Name of the Warriors.

That while your Petitioners stand ready to receive Passengers with a submissive Bow, and respect it with a gentle Voice, Let us not do you as it has been here, the Warriors reach out their Hands at Pistol shot, and seize the Customers at Arms Length.

That while the Fawners strain and redden the Muscles of their Faces in making Distinction between a Spinner in a coloured Scarf and an Handmaid in a Straw Hat, the Warriors use the same Roughness to both and prevail upon the easiness of the Passengers, to the Impoverishment of your Petitioners.

Your Petitioners therefore most humbly pray, that the Warriors may not be permitted to inhabit the politest Parts of the Town, and that the Court may remain a Repository for buyers of a more soft Education.

And your Petitioners, &c.

The Petition of the New Exchange, concerning the Arts of buying and Selling, as particular writing Goods by the Confession of the Seller, will be considered on another Occasion.

Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis Tempus eget. Virg.

OUR late News-Papers being full of the Project now on foot in the Court of France, for establishing a Political Academy, and I myself having received Letters from several Virtuoso's among my Foreign Correspondents, which give some Light into that Affair, I intend to make it the Subject of this Day's Speculation. A general Account of this Project may be met with in the Dans Courant of last Friday in the following Words, translated from the Gazette of Amsterdam.

Paris, Jeudy 12. "It is confirmed that the King has resolved to establish a new Academy, for Politicks, of which the Monsieur de Tencin, Minister of the Secretary of State is to be Protector. Six Academicians are to be chosen endowed with proper Talents, for beginning to form this Academy, in which no Person is to be admitted under twenty five Years of Age. They must likewise each have an Estate of two thousand Livres a Year, either in Possession, or to come to us by Inheritance. The King will allow to each a Pension of a Thousand Livres. They are likewise to have able Masters to teach them the necessary Sciences, and to instruct them in all the Treaties of Peace, Alliance, and others, which have been made in several Ages past. These members are to meet twice a Week at the Academie. From this Seminary are to be chosen Secretaries to Ambassadors who by degrees may advance to higher Employments.

And the Politicks trade France the Terror of Paris. The Statesman who have prospered in the Nation of late Years, have on the contrary rendered it either the Prey or Contempt of its Neighbours. The Cardinal excited that famous Academy which I have called all the Parts of Politic Learning to the greatest Height. His chief Design in that Institution was to divert the Men of Genius from meddling with Politics, a Province in which he did not care to have any one else interfere with him. On the contrary, the Monsieur de Tencin seems resolved to make the young Men in France as Wise as himself, and is therefore taken up at present in establishing a Nursery of Statesmen.

Some private Letters add that there will also be erected a Seminary of Politician Politicians, who are to be brought up at the Feet of Madam de Maintenon, and to be dispatched into foreign Courts upon any Emergencies of State. But as the News of this last Project has not been yet confirmed, I shall take no further Notice of it.

Several of my Readers may doubtless remember that upon the Conclusion of the last War, which had been carried on so successfully by the Enemy, their Generals were many of them transformed into Ambassadors, but the Conduct of those who have commanded in the present War, has, it seems, brought so little Honour and Advancement to their great Monarch that he is resolved to trust his Affairs no longer in the Hands of those Military Gentlemen.

The Regulations of this new Academy very much deserve our Attention. The Students are to have in Possession, or Reversion, an Estate of two thousand French Livres per Annum, which, as the present Exchange runs, will amount to it less than hundred and twenty six Pounds English. This, with the Royal Allowance of a Thousand Livres, will enable them to find themselves in

Coffee and Snuff not to mention News Papers, Pen and Ink, Wax and Wafers, with the like Necessaries for Politicians

A Man must be at least Five and Twenty before he can be initiated into the Mysteries of this Academy, tho' there is no Question but many grave Persons of a much more advanced Age, who have been constant Readers of the Paris Gazette, will be glad to begin the World anew, and enter themselves upon this List of Politicians

The Society of these hopeful young Gentlemen is to be under the Direction of six Professors, who, it seems, are to be Speculative Statesmen, and drawn out of the Body of the Royal Academy. These six wise Masters, according to my private Letters, are to have the following Parts allotted them

The first is to instruct the Students in State Legerdemain, is how to take off the Impression of a Seal, to split a Wafer, to open a Letter, to fold it up again, with other the like ingenious Feats of Dexterity and Art. When the Students have accomplished themselves in this Part of their Profession, they are to be delivered into the Hands of their second Instructor, who is a kind of Pasture Master

This Artist is to teach them how to nod judiciously, to shrug up their Shoulders in a dubious Case, to connive with either Eye, and in a Word, the whole Practice of Political Grimace

The Third is a sort of Language-Master, who is to instruct them in the Style proper for a Foreign Minister in his ordinary Discourse. And to the End that this College of Statesmen may be thoroughly practised in the Political Style, they are to make use of it in their common Conversations, before they are employed either in Foreign or Domestic Affairs. If one of them asks in other, what o'clock it is, the other is to answer him indirectly, and, if possible, to turn off the Question. If he is desired to change a Louis d'or, he must beg Time to consider of it. If it be enquired of him, whether the King is at Versailles or Marly, he must answer in a Whisper. If he be asked the News of the late Gazette, or the Subject of a Proclamation, he is to reply, that he has not yet read it. Or if he does not care for explaining himself so far, he needs only draw his Brow up in Wrinkles, or elevate the Left Shoulder

The Fourth Professor is to teach the whole Art of Political Characters and Hieroglyphics, and to the End that they may be perfect also in this Practice, they are not to send a Note to one another (tho' it be but to borrow a Lactius or a Machiavil), which is not written in Cypher

Their Fifth Professor, it is thought, will be chosen out of the Society of Jesuits, and is to be well read in the Controversies of probable Doctrines, mental Reservation, and the Rights of Princes. This Learned Man is to instruct them in the Grammar, Syntax, and construing Part of Treaty Latin, how to distinguish between the Spirit and the Letter, and likewise demonstrate how the same Form of Words may lay an Obligation upon any Prince in Europe, different from that which it lays upon his Most Christian Majesty. He is likewise to teach them the Art of finding Flaws, Loop holes, and Evasions, in the most solemn Compacts, and particularly a great Rabbinical Secret, revised of late Years by the Fraternity of Jesuits, namely, that contradictory Interpretations of the same Article may both of them be true and valid

When our Statesmen are sufficiently improved by these several Instructors, they are to receive their last Polishing from one who is to act among them as Master of the Ceremonies. This Gentleman is to give them Lectures upon those important Points of the Elbow Chair, and the Star Head, to instruct them in the different Situations of the Right-Hand, and to furnish them with Bows and Inclinations of all Sizes, Measures and Proportions. In short, this Professor is to give the Society their Stiffening, and infuse into their Manners that beautiful Political Starch, which may qualify them for Levees, Conferences, Visits, and make them shine in what vulgar Minds are apt to look upon as Trifles

I have not yet heard any further Particulars, which are to be observed in this Society of unsledged Statesmen, but I must confess, had I a Son of five and twenty, I should take it into his Head at that Age to set up for a Politician, I think I should go near to disinherit him for a Block head. Besides, I should be apprehensive lest the same Arts which are to enable him to negotiate between Potentates might a little infect his ordinary behaviour between Man and Man. There is no Question but these young Machavils will, in a little time, turn their College upside down with Plots and Stratagems, and lay as many Schemes to Circumvent one another in a Reg or a Sillid, as they may hereafter put in Practice to over-reach a Neighbouring Prince or State

We are told, that the Spartans, tho' they punished Theft in their young Men when it was discovered, looked upon it as Honourable if it succeeded. Provided the Consequence was clean and unsuspected, a Youth might afterwards boast of it. This, say the Historians, was to keep them sharp, and to hinder them from being imposed upon, either in their publick or private Negotiations. Whether any such Relaxations of Morality, such little jeux d'esprit, ought not to be allowed in this intended Seminary of Politicians, I shall leave to the Wisdom of their Founder

In the mean time we have fair Warning given us by this doughty Body of Statesmen and as Sylla saw many *Marius*s in Cesar, so I think we may discover many *Torcy*s in this College of Academicians. Whatever we think of our selves, I am afraid neither our Smyrna or St James will be a Match for it. Our Coffee houses are, indeed, very good Institutions, but whether or no these our British Schools of Politicks may furnish out as able Envoy's and Secretaries as an Academy that is set apart for that Purpose, will deserve our serious Consideration, especially if we remember that our Country is more famous for producing Men of Integrity than Statesmen and that on the contrary, French Truth and British Policy make a conspicuous Figure in Nothing, as the Earl of Rochester has very well observed in his admirable Poem upon that barren Subject L

I WRITE this to communicate to you a Misfortune which frequently happens, and therefore deserves a consolatory Discourse on the Subject I was within this Half-Year in the Possession of as much Beauty and as many Lovers as any young Lady in England But my Admirers have left me, and I cannot complain of their Behaviour I have within that Time had the Small Pox and this Face, which (according to many amorous Epistles which I have by me) was the Seat of all that is beautiful in Woman, is now disfigured with Scars It goes to the very Soul of me to speak what I really think of my Face and tho' I think I did not over-rate my Beauty while I had it, it has extremely advanced in its value with me now it is lost There is one Circumstance which makes my Case very particular the ugliest Fellow that ever pretended to me, was and is most in my Favour, and he treats me at present the most unreasonably If you could make him return an Obligation which he owes me, in liking a Person that is not amiable — But there is, I fear, no Possibility of making Passion move by the Rules of Reason and Gratitude But say what you can to one who has survived her self, and knows not how to act in a new Being My Lovers are at the Feet of my Rivals, my Rivals are every Day bewailing me, and I cannot enjoy what I am, by reason of the distracting Reflection upon what I was Consider the Woman I was did not die of old Age, but I was taken off in the Prime of my Youth, and according to the Course of Nature may have Forty Years After-Life to come I have nothing of my self left which I like, but that

*I am, SIR,
Your most humble Servant,
Parthenissa*

When Lewis of France had lost the Battle of Ramelies, the Addresses to him at that time were full of his Fortitude, and they turned his Misfortune to his Glory in that, during his Prosperity, he could never have manifested his heroic Constancy under Distresses, and so the World had lost the most eminent Part of his Character Parthenissa's Condition gives her the same Opportunity and to resign Conquests is a Task as difficult in a Beauty as an Hero In the very Entrance upon this Work she must burn all her Love-Letters or since she is so candid as not to call her Lovers who follow her no longer Unfaith-

¹ Mr John Duncombe subscribed this letter to his relative, John Hughes, and said that by Parthenissa was meant a Miss Rotherham, afterwards married to the Rev Mr Wyatt, master of Felsted School, in Essex The name of Parthenissa is from the Heroine of a romance by Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery

ful, it would be a very good beginning of a new Life from that of a Beauty, to send them back to those who wrote them, with this honest Inscription, Articles of a Marriage Treaty broken off by the Small-Pox I have known but one Instance, where a Matter of this Kind went on after a like Misfortune, where the Lady, who was a Woman of Spirit, writ this Billet to her Lover

SIR,

'If you flattered me before I had this terrible Malady, pry come and see me now But if you sincerely liked me, stay away, for I am not the same

Corinna

The Lover thought there was something so sprightly in her Behaviour, that he answered,

Madam,

'I am not obliged, since you are not the same Woman, to let you know whether I flattered you or not but I assure you, I do not, when I tell you I now like you above all your Sex, and hope you will bear what may befall me when we are both one, as well as you do what happens to your self now you are single, therefore I am ready to take such a Spirit for my Companion as soon as you please

Amilear

If Parthenissa can now possess her own Mind, and think as little of her Beauty as she ought to have done when she had it, there will be no great Diminution of her Charms and if she was formerly afflicted too much with them, an easier Behaviour will more than make up for the Loss of them Take the whole Sex together, and you find those who have the strongest Possession of Men's Hearts are not eminent for their Beauty You see it often happen that those who engage Men to the greatest Violence, are such as those who are Strangers to them would take to be remarkably defective for that End The fondest Lover I know, said to me one Day in a Crowd of Women at an Entertainment of Musick, You have often heard me talk of my Beloved That Woman there, continued he, smiling when he had fixed my Eye, is her very Picture The Lady he shewed me was by much the least remarkable for Beauty of any in the whole Assembly, but having my Curiosity extremely raised, I could not keep my Eyes off of her Her Eyes at last met mine, and with a sudden Surprise she looked round her to see who near her was remarkably handsome that I was gazing at This little Act explain'd the Secret She did not understand herself for the Object of Love, and therefore she was so The Lover is a very honest plain Man and what charmed him was a Person that goes along with him in the Cares and Joys of Life, not taken up with her self, but sincerely attentive with a ready and cheerful Mind, to accompany him in either

I can tell Parthenissa for her Comfort, That the Beauties, generally speaking, are the most impertinent and disagreeable of Women An apparent Desire of Admiration, a Reflection upon their own Merit, and a precious Behaviour in their general Conduct, are almost inseparable

Accidents in Beauties All you obtain of them is granted to Importunity and Solicitation for what did not deserve so much of your Time, and you recover from the Possession of it, as out of a Dream

You are ashamed of the Vagaries of Fancy which so strangely mis led you, and your Admiration of a Beauty, merely as such, is inconsistent with a tolerable Reflection upon your self The cheerful good humoured Creatures, into whose Heads it never entered that they could make any Man unhappy are the Persons formed for making Men happy There's Miss Liddy can dance a Jigg, raise Price, write a good Hand, keep an Account, give a reasonable Answer, and so as she is bid while her elder Sister Madam Martha is out of Humour, has the Spleen, learns by Reports of People of higher Quality new Ways of being uneasy and displeased And this happens for no Reason in the World, but that poor Liddy knows she has no such thing as a certain Negligence that is so becoming, that there is not I know not what in her Air And that if she tall s like a Fool, there is no one will say, Well! I know not what it is, but every Thing pleases when she speaks it

Ask any of the Husbands of your great Beauties, and they'll tell you that they hate their Wives Nine Hours of every Day they pass together There is such a Particularity for ever affected by them, that they are incumbered with their Charms in all they say or do They pry at publick Devotions as they are Beauties They converse on ordinary Occasions as they are Beauties Ask Belinda what it is a Clock, and she is at a stand whether so great a Beauty should answer you In a Word, I think, instead of offering to administer Consolation to Parthunissa, I should congratulate her Metamorphosis and however she thinks she was not in the least insolent in the Prosperity of her Charms, she was enough so to find she may make her self a much more agreeable Creature in her present Adversity The Endeavour to please is highly promoted by a Consciousness that the Approbation of the Person you would be agreeable to, is a Favour you do not deserve for in this Case Assurance of Success is the most certain way to Disappointment Good-Nature will always supply the Absence of Beauty, but Beauty cannot long supply the Absence of Good-Nature

Madam, February 18

'I have yours of this Day, wherein you twice bid me not to disoblige you, but you must explain yourself further before I know what to do

Your most obedient Servant,

T The SPECTATOR.

I AM so well pleased with the following Letter, that I am in hopes it will not be a disagreeable Present to the Publick

SIR,

'Though I believe none of your Readers more admire your agreeable manner of working up Trifles than my self, yet as your Speculations are now swelling into Volumes, and will in all Probability pass down to future Ages, methinks I would have no single Subject in them, wherein the general Good of Mankind is concern'd, left unfinished

'I have a long time expected with great Impatience that you would enlarge upon the ordinary Mistakes which are committed in the Education of our Children I the more easily flattered myself that you would one time or other resume this Consideration, because you tell us that your 168th Paper was only composed of a few broken Hints, but finding myself hitherto disappointed, I have ventured to send you my own Thoughts on this Subject

'I remember Pericles in his famous Oration at the Funeral of those Athenian young Men who perished in the Samian Expedition, has a Thought very much celebrated by several Ancient Critics, namely, That the Loss which the Commonwealth suffered by the Destruction of its Youth, was like the Loss which the Year would suffer by the Destruction of the Spring The Prejudice which the Publick sustains from a wrong Education of Children, is an Evil of the same Nature, as it in a manner starves Posterity, and defrauds our Country of those Persons who, with due Care, might make an eminent Figure in their respective Posts of Life

'I have seen a Book written by Juan Huartes,¹ a Spanish Physician, entitled Examen de Ingenios, wherein he lays it down as one of his first Positions, that Nothing but Nature can qualify a Man for Learning and that without a proper Temperament for the particular Art or Science which he studies, his utmost Pains and Application, assisted by the ablest Masters, will be to no purpose

'He illustrates this by the Example of Tully's Son Marcus

'Cicero, in order to accomplish his Son in that sort of Learning which he designed him for, sent him to Athens, the most celebrated Academy at that time in the World, and where a vast Course, out of the most Polite Nations, could not but furnish a young Gentleman with a Multitude of great Examples, and Accidents that might in

'sensibly have instructed him in his designed Studies. He placed him under the Care of Crispus, who was one of the greatest Philosophers of the Age, and as if all the Books which were at that time written had not been sufficient for his Use, he composed others on purpose for him. Notwithstanding all this, History informs us, that Marcus proved a meer Blockhead, and that Nature (who it seems was even with it) for her Prodigality to the latter rendered him incapable of improving by all the Rules of Eloquence, the Precepts of Philosophy, his own Endeavours, and the most refined Communication in Italy. This Author therefore proposes, that there should be certain Teachers or Examiners appointed by the State to inspect the Genius of every particular Boy, and to allot him the Part that is most suitable to his natural Ideas.

Plato in one of his Dialogues tells us, that Socrates, who was the Son of a Midwife, used to say, that as his Mother, tho' she was very skilful in her Profession, could not deliver a Woman, unless she was first with Child, so neither could he himself raise Knowledge out of a Mind, where Nature had not planted it.

Accordingly the Method this Philosopher took of instructing his Scholars by several Interrogatories or Questions, was only helpful to the Birth, and bringing their own Thoughts to Light.

The Spanish Doctor above mentioned, as his Speculations grow more refined, asserts that every kind of Wit has a particular Science corresponding to it, and in which alone it can be truly excellent. As to those Geniuses, which may seem to have in equal Aptitude for several Things, he regards them as many unfinished Pieces of Nature wrought off in haste.

There are, indeed, but very few to whom Nature has been so unkind, that they are not capable of shining in some Science or other. There is a certain Bias towards Knowledge in every Mind, which may be strengthened and improved by proper Applications.

The Story of Christopher Clavius is very well known. He was entered in a College of Jesuits, and after having been tried at several Parts of Learning upon the Point of being dismissed as an hopeless Blockhead, till one of the Fathers took it into his Head to make an Essay of his Parts in Geometry, which it seems hit his Genius so luckily that he afterwards became one of the greatest Mathematicians of the Age. It is commonly thought that the Strictness of these Fathers, in discovering the Talent of a young Student, has not a little contributed to the Figure which their Order has made in the World.

How different from this manner of Education is that which prevails in our own Country? Where nothing is more a usual than to see forty or fifty Boys of several Ages, Tempers and Inclinations ranged together in the same Class, employed upon the same Authors, and enjoined the same Tasks? Whate'er their natural Genius may be, they are all to be made Poets, Historians, and Orators alike. They are all obliged to have the same Capacity, to bring in the same Tale of Verse, and to furnish out the same Portion of Prose. Every Boy is bound to have a good Memory as the Capital of the Form. To be brief, instead of adapting Studies to the particular Genius of a Youth we expect from the young Man that he should adapt his Genius to his Studies. This, I must confess, is not so much to be imputed to the Instructor, as to the Parent, who will never be brought to believe, that his Son is not capable of performing as much as his Neighbours; and that he may not make him whatever he has a Mind to.

If the present Age is more tradable than those which have gone before it in any single Particular, it is in that generous Care which several well-disposed Persons have taken in the Education of poor Children, and as in these Charity-Schools there is no Price left for the over-weening Indulgence of a Parent, the Directors of them would make them beneficial to the Publick, if they considered the Precept which I have been thus long meditating. They might easily, by well examining the Parts of those under their Inspection, make a just Distribution of them into proper Classes and Divisions, and allot to them this or that particular Study, as their Genius qualifies them for Professions, Trades, Handicrafts, or Service by Sea or Land.

How is this kind of Regulation wanting in the three great Professions?

Dr Swift complaining of Persons who took upon them Holy Orders, tho' altogether unqualified for the Sacred Function, says somewhere, that many a Man runs his Head against a Pillar, who might have done his Country excellent Service at a Plough tail.

In like manner many a Lawyer, who makes but an indistinct Figure at the Bar, might have made a very elegant Waterman, and have shined at the Ten-ple Square, tho' he can get no Business in the House.

I have known a Corn-cutter, who with a right Education would have been an excellent Physician.

To descend lower, are not our Streets filled with sagacious Drymen, and Politicians in France? We have several Taylors of six Foot high, and meet with many a broad pair of Shoulders that are thrown away upon a Barber, when perhaps at the same time we see a pigmy Porter reeling under a Burthen, who might have managed his Needle with much Dexterity, or have snarped his Fingers with great Ease to himself, and Advantage to the Publick.

The Spaniards, tho' they acted with the Spirit which I am here speaking of, carried it much fur-

¹ Christopher Clavius, a native of Bamberg died in 1612, aged 75, at Rome, whither he had been sent by the Jesuits and where he was regarded as the Euclid of his age. It was Clavius whom Pope Gregory XIII employed in 1581 to effect the reform in the Roman Calendar promulgated in 1582, when the 5th of October became throughout Catholic countries the 15th of the New Style, an improvement that was not admitted into Protestant England until 1752. Clavius wrote an Arithmetic and Commentaries on Euclid, and justified his reform of the Calendar against the criticism of Scaliger.

'ther than what I propose. Among them it was not lawful for the Father himself to bring up his Children after his own Fancy. As soon as they were seven Years old they were all listed in several Companies and disciplined by the Publick. The old Men were Spectators of their Performances, who often run out Quarrels among them, and set them at Strife with one another, that by those early Discoveries they might see how their several Talents lay, and with it my regard to their Quality, dispose of them accordingly for the Service of the Commonwealth. By this Means Sparta soon became the Mistress of Greece, and famous through the whole World for her Civil and Military Discipline.

'If you think this Letter deserves a place among your Speculations, I may perhaps trouble you with some other Thoughts on the same Subject. I am, &c.

MR SPECTATOR,
'I GIVE you this Trouble in order to propose my self to you as an Assaillant in the war of Cares which you have thought fit to undertake for the publick Good. I am a very great Lover of Women, that is to say honestly, and as it is natural to study what one likes, I have industriously applied my self to understand them. The present Circumstance relating to them, is that I think there wants under you, as SPECTATOR, a Person to be distinguished and vested in the Power and Quality of a Censor on Marriages. I lodge at the Temple, and know, by seeing Women come I rather, and afterwards observing them conducted by their Council to Judges Chambers, that there is a Custom in Case of making Conveyance of a Wife's Estate, that she is carried to a Judge's Apartment and left alone with him, to be examined in private whether she has not been frightened or sweetened by her Spouse into the Act she is going to do, or whether it is of her own free Will. Now if it is her Method founded upon Reason and Equity, why should there not be also a proper Officer for examining such as are entering into the State of Matrimony, whether they are forced by Parents on one Side, or moved by Interest only on the other, to come together, and bring forth such awkward Heirs as are the Product of half Love and constrained Compliances? There is no Body, though I say it my self, would be fitter for this Office than I am. For I am an ugly Fellow of great Wit and Significancy. My Father was an Irish Country-Squire, my Mother a witty Peasantry of no Fortune. The Match was made by Consent of my Mother's Parents against her own. And I am the Child of a Rape on the Wedding Night, so that I am as healthy and as homely as my Father, but as sprightly and agreeable as my Mother. It would be of great Advantage to you if you would use me under you, that my Match might be better regulated for the future, and we might have no more Children of Squab-

'bles. I shall not reveal all my Pretensions till I receive your Answer and am,

SIR,
Your most Humble Servant,
Miles Palfrey.

MR SPECTATOR,

'I am one of those unfortunate Men within the City Walls, who am married to a Woman of Quality, but her Temper is something different from that of Lady an d. My Lady's whole Time and Thoughts are spent in keeping up to the Mode both in Apparel and Furniture. All the Goods in my House have been changed three times in seven Years. I have had seven Children by her, and by our Marriage Artillery was to have her Apartment new furnished as often as she lay in. Nothing in our House is useful but that which is fashionable. My Pewter holds out generally half a Year, my Lute a full Twelve-month. Chairs are not fit to sit in that were made two Years since, nor I look fit for my thing, but to sleep in that have stood up above that time. My Dear is of Opinion that in old-fashioned Grate consumes Coals, but gives no Heat. If he drinks out of Glass of half a Year, sleep in old-fashioned Wine from Sir all I fear. Oh dear Sir you may guess all the rest.

Yours

'P S I could bear even all this, if I were not obliged also to eat fast richly. I have a pain in my Stomach and have a constant Loathing of what ever comes to my own Table for which reason I dine at the Grave-House three Days a Week. Where the good Company wonders they never see you of late. I am sure by your unprejudiced Discourses you love Broth better than Soup.

MR SPECTATOR,

It is, I think,

'You may believe you are a Person as much trilled of as any Man in Town. I am one of your best Friends in this House, and have laid a wager you are so candid a Man and so honest a Fellow, that you will print this Letter, tho' it is in Recommendation of a new Paper called The Historian. I have read it carefully, and find it written with Skill, good Sense, Modesty, and Fire. You must allow the Town is kinder to you than you deserve, and I doubt not but you have so much Sense of the World, Change of Humour, and instability of all humane Things, as to understand, that the only Way to preserve Honour, is to communicate it to others with Good Nature and Judgment. You are so generally read, that what you speak of will be read. This with Men of Sense and Liberty is all that is wanting, to recommend The Historian.

I am, SIR,
Your daily Advocate, Reader Gentle

'Steele's papers had many imitations, as the Historian, here named, the Rapod, Obsequator, Moderator, Grover, Censor, Hermist, Surprize, Silent Monitor, Inquisitor, Pilgrim, Restorer, Instructor, or Grumacher, &c. There was also in 1712 a Kambur anticipating the name of Dr. Johnson's Analyst of 1750-2.

*T ruing our tortures into horrid arms Against the Torturer, when to meet the Noise
Of his almighty Engine he shall hear Infernal Thunder, and for Lightning see Black fire and horror shot with equal rage Among his Angels, and his throne it self Melt with Tartarean Sulphur, and strange Fire,
His own invented Torments—*

His preferring Annihilation to Shame or Misery, is also highly suitable to his Character, as the Comfort he draws from their disturbing the Peace of Heaven, that if it be not Victory it is Revenge, is a Sentiment truly Diabolical, and becoming the Bitterness of this implacable Spirit.

Belial is described in the first Book, as the Idol of the Lewd and Luxurious. He is in the Second Book, pursuant to that Description, characterized as tumorous and slothful and if we look in the Sixth Book, we find him celebrated in the Battel of Angels for nothing but that scoffing Speech which he makes to Satan, on his supposed Advantage over the Enemy. As his Appearance is uniform, and of a Piece, in these three several Views, we find his Sentiments in the Infernal Assembly every way conformable to his Character. Such are his Apprehensions of a second Battel, his Horrors of Annihilation, his preferring to be miserable rather than not to be. I need not observe, that the Contrast of Thought in this Speech, and that which precedes it, gives an agreeable Variety to the Debate.

Mammon's Character is so fully drawn in the First Book, that the Poet adds nothing to it in the Second. We were before told, that he was the first who taught Mankind to ransack the Earth for Gold and Silver, and that he was the Architect of Pandæmonium, or the Infernal Place, where the Evil Spirits were to meet in Council. His Speech in this Book is every way suitable to so depraved a Character. How proper is that Reflection, of their being unable to taste the Happiness of Heaven were they actually there, in the Mouth of one, who while he was in Heaven, is said to have had his Mind dazzled with the outward Poms and Glories of the Place, and to have been more intent on the Riches of the Pavement, than on the Beatific Vision. I shall also leave the Reader to judge how agreeable the following Sentiments are to the same Character.

*'Tis deep World
Of Darkness do we dread? How oft amidst Incl cloud and dark doth Heav'n all ruling Sire
Chuse to reside, his Glory unobscured,
And with the Majesty of Darkness round Covers his Throne, from whence deep Thunders roar Mustering their Rage, and Heav'n resembles Hell?
As le our Darkness, cannot we his Light Invitate when we please? This desert Soil Wants not her hidden Lustre, Gems and Gold, Nor want we Skill or Art, from whence to raise Magnificence, and what can Heav'n shew

Beelzebub, who is reckoned the second in Dignity that fell, and is, in the First Book, the second that awakens out of the Trance, and confers with Satan upon the Situation of their Affairs, maintains his Rank in the Book now before us. There is a wonderful Majesty described in his rising up to speak. He acts as a kind of Moderator between the two opposite Parties, and proposes a third Undertaking, which the whole Assembly gives into. The Motion he makes of detaching one of their Body in search of a new World is grounded upon a Project devised by Satan, and cursorily proposed by him in the following Lines of the first Book.

Space may produce new Worlds, whereof so rise There went a Fame in Heav'n, that I enrol'd Intended to create, and therein plant A Generation, whom his choice Regard Should favour equal to the Sons of Heav'n Further, if but to pry, shall be perhaps Our first Eruption, thither or elsewhere For this Infernal Pit shall never hold Celestial Spirits in Bondage, nor the Abyss Long under Darkness cover. But these Thoughts Full Counsel must mature ———

It is on this Project that Beelzebub grounds his Proposal.

*———What if we find Some easier Enterprize? There is a Place
(If a wient and prophetic Fame in Heav'n Err not) another World, the happy Seat Of some new Race call'd MAN, about this Time To be created like to us, though less In Power and Excellence, but favour'd more Of him who rules above, so was his Will Pronounc'd among the Gods, and by an Oath, That shook Heav'n's whole Circumference, confirm'd.*

The Reader may observe how just it was not to omit in the First Book the Project upon which the whole Poem turns. As also that the Prince of the fallen Angels was the only proper Person to give it Birth, and that the next to him in Dignity was the fittest to second and support it.

There is besides, I think, something wonderfully Beautiful, and very apt to affect the Reader's Imagination in this ancient Prophecy or Report in Heaven, concerning the Creation of Man. Nothing could shew more the Dignity of the Species, than this Tradition which ran of them before their Existence. They are represented to have been the Talk of Heaven, before they were created. Virgil, in compliment to the Roman Commonwealth, makes the Heroes of it appear in their State of Pre-existence, but Milton does a far greater Honour to Mankind in general, as he gives us a Glimpse of them even before they are in Being.

The rising of this great Assembly is described in a very Sublime and Poetical Manner.

Their rising all at once was as the Sound Of Thunder heard remote———

The Diversions of the fallen Angels, with the particular Account of their Place of Habitation, are described with great Pregnancy of Thought, and Copiousness of Invention. The Diversions are every way suitable to Beings who had nothing left them but Strength and Knowledge misapplied, Such are their Contentions at the Race, and in Fights of Arms, with their Entertainment in the following Lines

*Others with vast Typhazean rage more fell Rend up both Rocks as d Hills, and ride the Air In Whirlwind, Hell scarce holds the wild Up-
roar*

Their Musck is employed in celebrating their own criminal Exploits, and their Discourse in sounding the unfathomable Depths of Fate, Free-will and Fore-knowledge

The several Circumstances in the Description of Hell are finely imagined as the four Rivers which disgorge themselves into the Sea of Fire, the Ex-teams of Cold and Heat, and the River of Oblivion The monstrous Animals produced in that Infernal World are represented by a single Line, which gives us a more horrid Idea of them, than a much longer Description would have done

Nature breeds, Perverse, all monstrous, all prodigious Things, Immovable, unutterable, and worse Than Fables yet have feign'd or Fear conceiv'd, Gorgon's, as d H, dra's, and Chimeræ's dire

This Episode of the fallen Spirits, and their Place of Habitation, comes in very happily to un-bend the Mind of the Reader from its Attention to the Debate An ordinary Poet would indeed have spun out so many Circumstances to a great Length, and by that means have weakened, instead of illustrated, the principal Fable.

The Flight of Satan to the Gates of Hell is finely imaged

I have already declared my Opinion of the Allegory concerning Sin and Death, which is however a very finished Piece in its kind, when it is not considered as a Part of an Epic Poem The Genealogy of the several Persons is contrived with great Delicacy Sin is the Daughter of Satan, and Death the Offspring of Sin The incestuous Mixture between Sin and Death produces those Monsters and Hell hounds which from time to time enter into their Mother, and tear the Bowels of her who gave them Birth These are the Errors of an evil Conscience, and the proper Fruits of Sin, which naturally rise from the Apprehensions of Death This last beautiful Moral is, I think, clearly intimated in the Speech of Sin, where complaining of this her dreadful Issue, she adds,

*Before mine Eyes in Opposition sits Grim Death my Son and Foe, who sets them on,
And ne his Part t would full soon devour For 'twas t of other Prey, but that he knows His End w th mine e wvols d*

I need not mention to the Reader the beautiful Circumstance in the last Part of this Quotation He will likewise observe how naturally the three Persons concerned in this Allegory are tempted by one common Interest to enter into a Confederacy together, and how properly Sin is made the Portress of Hell, and the only Being that can open the Gates to that World of Tortures

The descriptive Part of this Allegory is likewise very strong, and full of Sublime Ideas The Figure of Death, [the Regal Crown upon his Head,] his Menace of Satan, his advancing to the Combat, the Outcry at his Birth, are Circumstances too noble to be past over in Silence, and extremely suitable to this King of Terrors I need not mention the Justness of Thought which is observed in the Generation of these several Symbolical Persons, that Sin was produced upon the first Revolt of Satan, that Death appear'd soon after he was cast into Hell, and that the Errors of Conscience were conceived at the Gate of this Place of Torments The Description of the Gates is very poetical, as the opening of them is full of Milton's Spirit

*On a sudden open fly
With impetuous Recoil and jarring Sound
The infernal Doors, and on their Hinges grate Hars! Th under, that the lowest Bottom shook Of Erebus She open'd, b it to shi t Excell'd her Power, the Gates wide open stood,
That with extended Wings a banner'd Host Under spread Ensigns marching might pass through.*

With Horse as d Chariots rank'd in loose Array, So wide they stood, and like a Furnace Mouth Cast forth redounding Smoke and ruddy Flame

In Satan's Voyage through the Chaos there are several Imaginary Persons described, as residing in that immense Waste of Matter This may perhaps be conformable to the Taste of those Critics who are pleased with nothing in a Poet which has not Life and Manners ascribed to it, but for my own Part, I am pleased most with those Passages in this Description which carry in them a greater Measure of Probability, and are such as might possibly have happened Of this kind is his first mounting in the Smoke that rises from the Infernal Pit, his falling into a Cloud of Nitre, and the like combustible Materials, that by their Explosion still hurried him forward in his Voyage his springing upward like a Pyramid of Fire, with his laborious Passage through that Confusion of Elements which the Poet calls

The Womb of Nature, and perhaps her Grave

The Glimmering Light which shot into the Chaos from the utmost Verge of the Creation, with the distant discovery of the Earth that hung close by the Moon, are wonderfully Beautiful and Poetical

Dear SPEC,

Feb 19, 1712

I have lov'd a Lady entirely for this Year and Half, tho' for a great Part of the Time (which has contributed not a little to my Pain) I have been debarred the Liberty of conversing with her. The Grounds of our Difference was this, that when we had enquired into each other's Circumstances, we found that at our first setting out into the World, we should owe five hundred Pounds more than her Fortune would pay off. My Estate is seven hundred Pounds a Year, besides the benefit of Im Mines. Now, dear SPEC, upon this State of the Case, and the Lady's positive Declaration that there is still no other Objection, I beg you'll not fail to insert this, with your Opinion as soon as possible, whether this ought to be esteemed a just Cause or Impediment why we should not be join'd, and you will for ever oblige

Yours sincerely,
Dick Lovesick

P S Sir, if I marry this Lady by the Assistance of your Opinion, you may expect a Favour for it

MR SPECTATOR,

I have the misfortune to be one of those unhappy Men who are distinguished by the Name of discarded Lovers but I am the less mortified at my Disgrace, because the young Lady is one of those Creatures who set up for Negligence of Men, are forsooth the most rigidly Virtuous in the World, and yet their Nicety will permit them, at the Command of Parents, to go to Bed to the most utter Stranger that can be proposed to them. As to me myself, I was introduced by the Father of my Mistress but find I owe my being at first received to a Comparison of my Estate with that of a former Lover, and that I am now in like manner turned off, to give Way to his humble Servant still richer than I am. What makes this Treatment the more extravagant is, that the young Lady is in the Management of this way of Fraud, and obeys her Father's Orders on these Occasions without any Manner of Reluctance, and does it with the same Air that one of your Men of the World would signify the Necessity of Affairs for turning another out of Office. When I came home last Night I found this Letter from my Mistress

SIR,

If it had proceeded, I should have behaved myself with all suitable Regard to you, but as it is, I beg we may be Strangers for the Future. Adieu

LYDIA

This great Indifference on this Subject, and the mercenary Motives for making Alliances, is what I think lies naturally before you, and I beg of you to give me your Thoughts upon it. My Answer to Lydia was as follows, which I hope you will approve, for you are to know the Wo-

It is not to be doubted but if this Frailty were set in a proper Light, he would quickly perceive the Indecency and evil Consequences of it. Now, Sir, this being an Infirmary which I hope may be corrected, and knowing that he pays much Deference to you, I beg that when you are at Leisure to give us a Speculation on Gossiping, you would think of my Neighbour. You will hereby oblige several who will be glad to find a Reformation in their gray-haired Friend. And how becoming will it be for him, instead of pouring forth Words at all Adventures to set a Watch before the Door of his Mouth, to refrain his Tongue, to check its Impetuosity, and guard against the Salies of that little, pert, forward, busy Person, which, under a sober Conduct, might prove a useful Member of a Society. Mr SPECTATOR,

I AM amazed that among all the Variety of Characters, with which you have enriched your Speculations, you have never given us a Picture of those audacious young Fellows among us, who commonly go by the Name of Fortune-Stealers. You must know, Sir, I am one who live in a continual Apprehension of this sort of People that lye in wait, Day and Night, for our Children, and may be considered as a kind of Kidnappers within the Law. I am the Father of a young Heiress, whom I begin to look upon as marriageable, and who has looked upon her self as such for above these Six Years. She is now in the Eighteenth Year of her Age. The Fortune-hunters have already cast their Eyes upon her, and take care to plant themselves in her View whenever she appears in any Publick Assembly. I have my self caught a young Jackanapes with a pair of Silver Fringed Gloves, in the very Fact. You must know, Sir, I have kept her as a Prisoner of State ever since she was in her Teens. Her Chamber Windows are cross barred, she is not permitted to go out of the House but with her Keeper, who is a stryd Relation of my own. I have likewise forbid her the use of Pen and Ink for this Twelve-Month last past, and do not suffer a Ban-box to be carried into her Room before it has been searched. Notwithstanding these Precautions, I am at my Wits End for fear of any sudden Surprise. There were, two or three Nights ago, some Fiddles heard in the Street, which I am afraid portend me no Good, not to mention a trill Irish-Man, that has been seen walking before my House more than once this Winter. My Knowledge likewise informs me, that the Girl has talked to her twice or thrice of a Gentleman in a Fair Wig, and that she loves to go to Church more than ever she did in her Life. She gave me the slip about a Week ago, upon which my whole House was in Alarm. I immediately dispatched a Hue and Cry after her to the Change, to her Mantuan-maker, and to the young Ladies that Visit her; but after above an Hour's search she returned of herself, having been taking a Walk, as she told me, by Rosamond's Pond. I have hereupon turned off her Woman, doubled her Guards, and given new Instructions to my Relation, who, to give her her due, keeps a watchful Eye over all her Motions. This, Sir, keeps me in a perpetual Anxiety, and makes me very often watch when my Daughter sleeps, as I am afraid she is even with me in her turn. Now, Sir, what I would desire of you is, to represent to this fluttering Tribe of young Fellows, who are for making their Fortunes by these indirect Means, that stealing a Man's Daughter for the sake of her Portion, is but a kind of Tolerated Robbery; and that they make but a poor Amends to the Father, whom they plunder after this Manner, by going to bed with his Child. Dear Sir, be speedy in your Thoughts on this Subject, that, if possible, they may appear before the Disbanding of the Army.

I am, SIR,

Your most humble Servant,
Tim Watchwell

Themistocles, the great Athenian General, being asked whether he would chuse to marry his Daughter to an indigent Man of Merit, or to a worthless Man of an Estate, replied, That he should prefer a Man without an Estate, to an Estate without a Man. The worst of it is, our Modern Fortune-Hunters are those who turn their Herds that way, because they are good for nothing else. If a young Fellow finds he can make nothing of Cook and Littleton, he provides himself with a Ladder of Ropes, and by that means very often enters upon the Premises.

The same Art of Scaling has likewise been practised with good Success by many military Engineers. Stratagems of this nature make Parts and Industry superfluous, and cut short the way to Riches.

Nor is Vanity a less Motive than Idleness to this kind of Mercenary Pursuit. A Fop who admires his Person in a Glass, soon enters into a Resolution of making his Fortune by it, not questioning but every Woman that falls in his way will do him as much Justice as he does himself. When an Heiress sees a Man throwing particular Graces into his Ogle, or talking loud within her Hearing, she ought to look to her self, but if withal she observes a pur of Red-Heels, a Patch, or any other Particularity in his Dress, she cannot take too much care of her Person. These are Bruts not to be trifled with, Charms that have done a world of Execution, and made their way into Hearts which have been thought impregnable. The Force of a Man with these Qualifications is so well known, that I am credibly informed there are several Female Undertakers about the Change, who upon the Arrival of a likely Man out of a neighbouring Kingdom, will furnish him with proper Dress from Head to Foot, to be paid for at a double Price on the Day of Marriage.

We must however distinguish between Fortune-Hunters and Fortune-Stealers. The first are those assiduous Gentlemen who employ their whole Lives in the Chace, without ever coming at the Quarry. Suffenus has combed and powdered it the Ladies for thirty Years together, and taken his Stand in a Side Box, 'till he has grown wrinkled under their Eyes. He is now plying the same Snare for the present Generation of Beauties, which he practised on their Mothers. Co'thus, after having made his Applications to more than you meet with in Mr Cowley's Ballad of Mistresses, was at last smitten with a City Lady of 20,000 Sterling but died of old Age before he could bring Matters to bear. Nor must I here omit my worthy Friend Mr HONEYCOMB, who has often told us in the Club, that for twenty years successively, upon the death of a Childless rich Man, he immediately drew on his Boots, called for his Horse, and made up to the Widow. When he is rallied upon his ill Success, WILL with his usual Gaiety tells us, that he always found [her'] Pre engaged.

Widows are indeed the great Game of your Fortune-Hunters. There is scarce a young Fellow in the Town of six Foot high, that has not pressed in Review before one or other of these wealthy Relicts. Hi dibrass's Cupid, who —took his Stand Upon a Widow's future Land,² is daily employed in throwing Darts, and kindling Flame. But as for Widows, they are such a Subtle Generation of People, that they may be left to their own Conduct, or if they make a false Step in it, they are answerable for it to no Body but themselves. The young innocent Creatures who have no Knowledge and Experience of the World, are those whose Safety I would principally consult in this Speculation. The stealing of such an one should, in my Opinion, be as punishable as a Rape. Where there is no Judgment there is no Choice: and why the inveigling a Woman before she is come to Years of Discretion, should not be as Criminal as the seducing of her before she is ten Years old, I am at a Loss to comprehend. Quod hunc Officium, quæ laus, quod Decus erit tanti, quod adipisci cum colore Corporis velut, qui dolorem summum in alium sibi persuaserit? Quam porro quis ignominiam quam turpitudinem non pertulerit, ut effugiat dolorem, si id summum natum esse decrevit?—Tull de Dolore tolerando

IT is a very melancholy Reflection, that Men are usually so weak, that it is absolutely necessary for them to know Sorrow and Pain to be in their right Sensus. Prosperous People (for Happy there are none) are hurried away with a fond Sense of their present Condition, and thoughtless of the Mutability of Fortune. Fortune is a Term which we must use in such Discourses as these, for what is wrought by the unseen Hand of the Disposer of all Things. But methinks the Disposition of a Mind which is truly great, is that which makes Misfortunes and Sorrows little when they befall our selves, great and lamentable when they befall other Men. The most unpardonable Malefactor in the World going to his Death and bearing it with Composure, would win the Pity of those who should behold him: and this not because his Calamity is deplorable, but because he seems himself not to deplore it. We suffer for him who is less sensible of his own Misery, and are inclined to despise him who sinks under the Weight of his Distresses. On the other hand, without any Touch of Envy, a temperate and well govern'd Mind looks down on such as are exalted with Success, with a certain Shame for the Imbecility of human Nature, that can so far forget how liable it is to Calamity, as to grow giddy with only the Suspence of Sorrow, which is the Portion of all Men. He therefore who turns his Face from the unhappy Man, who will not look again when his Eye is cast upon modest Sorrow, who shuns Affliction like a Contagion, does but pamper himself up for a Sacrifice, and contract in himself a greater Aptitude to Misery by attempting to escape it. A Gentleman where I happened to be last Night, fell into a Discourse which I thought shewed a good Discerning in him. He took Notice that whenever Men have looked into their Heart for the Idea of true Excellency in human Nature, they have found it to consist in Suffering after a right Manner and with a good Grace. Heroes are always drawn bearing Sorrows, struggling with Adversities, undergoing all kinds of Hardships, and having in the Service of Mankind a kind of Appetite to Difficulties and Dangers. The Gentleman went on to observe, that it is from this secret Sense of the high Merit which there is in Patience under Calamities, that the Writers of Romances, when they attempt to furnish out Characters of the highest Excellence, ransack Nature for things terrible, they raise a new Creation of Monsters, Dragons, and Giants. Where the Danger ends, the Hero ceases, when he won an Empire, or gained his Mistress, the rest of his Story is not worth relating. My Friend carried his Discourse so far as to say, that it was for higher Beings than Men to join Happiness and Greatness in the same Idea, but that in our Condition we have no Conception of superlative Excellence, or Heroism, but as it is surrounded with a Shade of Distress.

It is certainly the proper Education we should give our selves, to be prepared for the ill Events and Accidents we are to meet with in a Life sentenced to be a Scene of Sorrow. But instead of this Expectation, we soften our selves with Prospects of constant Delight, and destroy in our Minds the Seeds of Fortitude and Virtue, which should support us in Hours of Anguish. The constant Pursuit of Pleasure has in it something insolent and improper for our Being. There is a pretty sober Liveliness in the Ode of Horace to Delius, where he tells him, loud Mirth, or immoderate Sorrow, Inequality of Behaviour either in Prosperity or Adversity, are alike ungraceful in Man that is born to die. Moderation in both Circumstances is peculiar to generous Minds. Men of that Sort ever taste the Gratifications of Health, and all other Advantages of Life, as if they were liable to part with them, and when bereft of them resign them with a Greatness of Mind which shews they know their Value and Duration. The Contempt of Pleasure is a certain Preparatory for the Contempt of Pain. Without this, the Mind is as it were taken suddenly by an unforeseen Event, but he that has always, during Health and Prosperity, been abstinent in his Satisfaction, enjoys, in the worst of Difficulties, the Reflection, that his Anguish is not aggravated with the Comprison of past Pleasures which upbraid his present Condition. Polly tells us a Story after Pompey, which gives us a good Taste of the pleasant Manner the Men of Wit and Philosophy had in old Times of alleviating the Distresses of Life by the Force of Reason and Philosophy. Pompey when he came to Rhodes, had a Curiosity to visit the famous Philosopher Possidonius, but finding him in his sick Bed, he bewailed the Misfortune that he should not hear a Discourse from him. But you may, answered Possidonius, and immediately entered into the Point of Stoical Philosophy, which says Pain is not an Evil. During the Discourse, upon every Puncture he felt from his Distemper, he smiled and cried out, Pain, Pain, he is impertinent and troublesome as you please, I shall never own that thou art an Evil.

MR SPECTATOR,

Having seen in several of your Papers, a Concern for the Honour of the Clergy, and their doing every thing as becomes their Character, and particularly performing the publick Service with a due Zeal and Devotion. I am the more encouraged to lay before them, by your Means, several Expressions used by some of them in their Prayers before Sermon, which I am not well satisfied in. As their giving some Titles and Epithets to great Men, which are indeed due to them in their several Ranks and Stations, but not properly used, I think, in our Prayers. Is it not Contradiction to say, Illustrious Right Reverend, and Right Honourable poor Sinner? These Distinctions are suited only to our State here, and have no place in Heaven. We see they are omitted in the Liturgy which I think the Clergy should take for their Pattern in their own Forms of Devotion. There is another Ex-

^a Devotion. Another Expression which I take to be improper, is this, the whole Race of Mankind, when they pray for all Men for Race signifies, Lineage or Descent. and if the Race of Mankind may be used for the present generation, (though I think not very fitly) the whole Race taken in all from the Beginning to the End of the World. I don't remember to have met with that Expression in their sense anywhere but in the old Version of Psal 14, which those Men, I suppose, have but little Esteem for. And some, when they have prayed for all Schools and Nurseries of good Learning and True Religion, especially the two Universities add these Words, Grant that from them and all other Places dedicated to thy Worship and Service, may come forth such Persons. But what do they mean by all other Places? It pression which I would not mention, but that I have heard it several times before. I learned Congregation, to bring in the last Petition of the Prayer in these Words, O let us of the Lord be at 1, and I will speak but this once, as if there was no Difference between Abraham's interceding for Sodom, for which he had no War rant as we can find, and our asking those Things which we are required to pray for. They would therefore have much more Reason to fear his Anger if they did not make such Petitions to him. There is another pretty Fancy. When a young Man has a Mind to let us know who gave him his Scarf, he speaks a Parenthesis to the Almighty, Bless, as I am in Duty bound to pray, the right honourable the Countess, is not that as much as to say, Bless her, for thou knowest I am her Chaplain?

Your humble Servant,

Exigite ut mores teneros seu pollice ducat, Ut si quis certum vultum facit—Juv

I SHALL give the following Letter no other Recommendation, than by telling my Readers that it comes from the same Hand with that of last Thursday

SIR,

I send you, according to my Promise, some farther Thoughts on the Education of Youth in which I intend to discuss that famous Question, Whether the Education at a publick School, or under a private Tutor, is to be preferred?

As some of the greatest Men in most Ages have been of very different Opinions in this Matter, I shall give a short Account of what I think may be best urged on both sides, and afterwards leave every Person to determine for himself.

It is certain from Suetonius, that the Romans thought the Education of their Children a business properly belonging to the Parents themselves. and Plutarch, in the Life of Marcus Cato, tells us, that as soon as his Son was capable of Learning, Cato would suffer no Body to Teach him but himself, tho he had a Servant named Chilo, who was an excellent Grammarian, and who taught a great many other Youths.

On the contrary, the Greeks seemed more inclined to Publick Schools and Seminaries.

A private Education promises in the first place Virtue and Good-Breeding in a publick School Manly Assurance, and in early Knowledge in the Ways of the World.

Mr Locke in his celebrated Treatise of Education, confesses that there are Inconveniences seems to me that this is either a Tautology, as being the same with all Schools and Nurseries before expressed, or else it runs too far, for there are general Places dedicated to the Divine Service which cannot properly be intended here.

^a Some Thoughts concerning Education, § 70.

'to be feared on both sides. If, says he, I keep my Son at Home, he is in danger of becoming my young Master. If I send him Abroad, it is scarce possible to keep him from the reigning Contagion of Rudeness and Vice. He will perhaps be more innocent at Home, but more ignorant of the World, and more sheepish when he comes Abroad. However, as this learned Author asserts, That Virtue is much more difficult to be attained than Knowledge of the World, and that Vice is a more stubborn, as well as a more dangerous Fault than Sheepishness, he is altogether for a private Education, and the more so, because he does not see why a Youth, with right Management, might not attain the same Assurance in his Father's House, as at a publick School. To this end he advises Parents to accustom their Sons to whatever strange Faces come to the House to take them with them when they Visit their Neighbours, and to engage them in Conversation with Men of Parts and Breeding.

'It may be objected to this Method, that Conversation is not the only thing necessary, but that unless it be a Conversation with such as are in some measure their Equals in Parts and Years, there can be no room for Emulation, Contention, and several of the most lively Passions of the Mind, which, without being sometimes moved by these means, may possibly contract a Dulness and Insensibility.

'One of the greatest Writers our Nation ever produced observes, That a Boy who forms Parties, and makes himself Popular in a School or a College, would act the same Part with equal ease in a Senate or a Privy Council. And Mr. Osborn speaking like a Man versed in the Ways of the World, affirms, that the well laying and carrying on of a design to rob an Orchard, trains up a Youth insensibly to Caution, Secrecy and Circumspection, and fits him for Matters of greater Importance.

'In short, a private Education seems the most natural Method for the forming of a virtuous Man. A Publick Education for making a Man of Business. The first would furnish out a good Subject for Plato's Republick, the latter a Member for a Community over-run with Artifice and Corruption.

'It must however be confessed, that a Person at the head of a publick School has sometimes so many Boys under his Direction, that it is impossible he should extend a due proportion of his Care to each of them. This is, however, in reality, the Fault of the Age, in which we often see twenty Parents, who tho' each expects his Son should be made a Scholar, are not contented altogether to make it worth while for any Man of a liberal Education to take upon him the Care of their Instruction.

'In our great Schools indeed this Fault has been of late Years rectified, so that we have at present not only Ingenious Men for the chief Masters, but such as have proper Ushers and Assistants under them. I must nevertheless own, that for want of the same Encouragement in the Country, we have many a promising Genius spoiled and abused in those Seminaries.

'I am the more inclined to this Opinion, having myself experienced the Usage of two Rural Masters, each of them very unfit for the Trust they took upon them to discharge. The first imposed much more upon me than my Parts, tho' none of the weakest, could endure, and used me barbarously for not performing impossibilities. The latter was of quite another Temper, and a Boy, who would run upon his Errands, wash his Coffee pot, or ring the Bell, might have as little Conversation with any of the Classics as he thought fit. I have known a Lad at this Place excused his Exercise for assisting the Cook-maid, and remember a Neighbouring Gentleman's Son was among us five Years, most of which time he employed in uring and watering our Master's grey Pad. I scorned to Compound for my Faults, by doing any of these Elegant Offices, and was accordingly the best Scholar, and the worst used of any Boy in the School.

'I shall conclude this Discourse with an Advantage mentioned by Quintilian, as accompanying a Publick way of Education, which I have not yet taken notice of, namely, that we very often contract such Friendships at School, as are a Service to us all the following Part of our Lives.

'I shall give you, under this Head, a Story very well known to several Persons, and which you may depend upon as a real Truth.

'Every one, who is acquainted with Westminster-School, knows that there is a Curtain which used to be drawn across the Room, to separate the upper School from the lower. A Youth happened, by some Mischance, to tear the above-mentioned Curtain. The Severity of the Master was too well known for the Criminal to expect any Pardon for such a Fault, so that the Boy, who was of a meek Temper, was terrified to Death at the Thoughts of his Appearance, when his Friend, who sat next to him, bad him be of good Cheer, for that he would take the Fault on himself. He kept his word accordingly. As soon as they were grown up to be Men the Civil War broke out, in which our two Friends took the opposite Sides, one of them followed the Parliament, the other the Royal Party.

'As their Tempers were different, the Youth who had torn the Curtain, endeavoured to raise himself on the Civil List, and the other, who had born the Blame of it, on the Military. The first succeeded so well, that he was in a short time made a Judge under the Protector. The other was engaged in the unhappy Enterprize of Penraddock and Groves in the West. I suppose, Sir, I need not acquaint you with the Event of that Undertaking. Every one knows that the Royal Party was routed, and all the Heads of them, among whom was the Curtain Champion, imprisoned at Exeter. It happened to be his Friend's Lot at that time to go the Western Circuit. The Trial of the Rebels, as they were then called, was very short, and nothing now re-maintained but to pass Sentence on them when the Judge hearing the Name of his old Friend, and observing his Face, more attentively, which he had not seen for many Years asked him, if he was not formerly a Westminster Scholar, by the Answer, he was soon convinced that it was his former generous Friend and, without saying any thing more at that time, made the best of his Way to London, where employing all his Power and Interest with the Protector, he saved his Friend from the Fate of his unhappy Associates.

The Gentleman, whose Life was thus preserved by the Gratitude of his School-Fellow, was afterwards the Father of a Son, whom he lived to see promoted in the Church, and who still deservedly fills one of the highest Stations in it.

Mr SPECTATOR,

I AM a young Man about eighteen Years of Age, and have been in Love with a young Woman of the same Age about this half Year. I go to see her six Days in the Week, but never could have the Happiness of being with her alone. If any of her Friends are at home, she will see me in their Company but if they be not in the Way, she flies to her Chamber. I can discover no Signs of her Aversion but either a Fear of falling into the Lash of Matrimony, or a childish Lunacy, deprives us of an Interview apart, and drives us upon the Difficulty of Lying out our Lives in fruitless Expectation. Now, Mr SPECTATOR, if you think us ripe for Oeconomy, perwade the dear Creature, that to pine away into Barranca and Deformity under a Mother's Shade, is not so honourable, nor does it appear so unamiable, as she would in full Bloom. [There is a great deal left out before he concludes]

Mr SPECTATOR,
Your humble Servant,
Bob Harmless

If this Gentleman be really no more than Eighteen, I must do him the Justice to say he is the most knowing Infant I have yet met with. He does not, I fear, yet understand, that all he thinks of is another Woman; therefore, till he has given a further Account of himself, the young Lady is hereby directed to keep close to her Mother.

THE SPECTATOR

I cannot comply with the Request in Mr Frott's Letter but let it go just as it came to my Hands, for being so familiar with the old Gentleman, as

The allusion is to Colonel Wake, father of Dr William Wake, who was Bishop of Lincoln when this paper was written, and became in 1716 Archbishop of Canterbury. The trials of Penruddock and his friends were in 1655 rough as he is to him. Since Mr Frott has an Ambition to make him his Father-in-Law, he ought to treat him with more Respect besides, his Style to me might have been more distant than he has thought fit to afford me. Moreover, his Mistress shall continue in her Confinement, till he has found out which Word in his Letter is not rightly spelt.

Mr SPECTATOR,

I shall ever own my self your obliged humble Servant for the Advice you gave me concerning my Dancing which unluckily came too late. For, as I said, I would not leave off Capering till I had your Opinion of the Matter, was at our famous Assembly the Day before I received your Papers, and there was observed by an old Gentleman, who was informed I had a Respect for his Daughter told me I was an insignificant little Fellow, and said that for the future he would take Care of his Child so that he did not doubt but to cross my numerous Inclinations. The Lady is confined to her Chamber, and for my Part, am ready to bring my self with the Thoughts that I have danced my self out of your with her Father. I hope you will pardon the Trouble I give but shall take it for a mighty favour, if you will give me a little more of your Advice to put me in a write Way to cheat the old Dragon and obtain my Mistress. I am once more,

SIR,

York, Feb 23, Your obliged humble Servant 1711-12 John Frott

Let me desire you to make what Alterations you please, and insert this as soon as possible. Pardon Mistake by Haste

I never do pardon Mistakes by Haste

SIR,

Pray be so kind as to let me know what you esteem to be the chief Qualification of a good Poet, especially of one who writes Plays, and you will very much oblige,

SIR, Your very humble Servant,

To be a very well bred Man

THE SPECTATOR

Mr SPECTATOR,

You are to know that I am naturally Brave, and love Fighting as well as any Man in England. This gallant Temper of mine makes me extremely delighted with Battles on the Stage. I give you this Trouble to complain to you, that Nicodem refused to gratify me in that Part of the Opera for which I have most Taste. I observe it's become a Custom, that whenever any Gentlemen are particularly pleased with a Song, or their crying out Encore or Altro Volto, the Performer is so obliging as to sing it over again. I was at the Opera the last time Hydaspes was performed. At that Part of it where the Heroe engages with the Lion, the graceful Manner with which he put that terrible Monster to Death gave me so great a Pleasure, and at the same time so just a Sense of that Gentleman's Intre'pidity and Conduct, that I could not formerly desiring a Repetition of it, by crying out Allro Vello in a very audible Voice and my Friends flatter me, that I pronounced those Words with a tolerable good Accent, considering that was but the third Opera I had ever seen in my Life Yet, notwithstanding all this, there was so little Regard had to me, that the Lion was carried off, and went to Bed, without being killed any more that Night Now, Sir, pray consider that I did not understand a Word of what Mr Nicolas said to this cruel Creature, besides, I have no Ear for Musick, so that during the long Dispute between em the whole Entertainment I had was from my Eye Why then have not I as much Right to have a graceful Action repeated as another has a pleasing Sound since I only hear, as I only see, and we neither of us know that there is any reasonable thing I doing? Pray, Sir, settle the Business of this Claim in the Audience, and let us know when we may cry Alto Vello, As glisce, again, again, for the future I am in English again, and expect some Reason or other to be given me, and perhaps an ordinary one may serve but I expect your Answer

Your most humble Servant

'You must give me Leave, amongst the rest of your Female Correspondents, to address you about an Affair which has already given you many a Speculation and which, I know, I need not tell you have had a very happy Influence over the adult Part of our Sex But as many of us are either too old to learn, or too obstinate in the Pursuit of the Vanities which have been bred up with us from our Infancy, and all of us quitting the Stage whilst you are prompting us to act our Part well you ought methinks, rather to turn so in Instructions for the Benefit of that Part of our Sex, who are yet in their native Innocence, and ignorant of the Vices and that Variety of Unhappinesses that reign amongst us

I must tell you, MR SPECTATOR, that it is as much a Part of your Office to oversee the Education of the female Part of the Nation, as well as of the Male, and to convince the World you are not partial, pray proceed to detect the Male Administration of Governem^{ts} is successfully as you have exposed that of Pedagogues and rescue our Sex from the Prejudice and Tyranny of Education as well as that of our own, who with out your reasonable Interposition are like to improve upon the Vices that are now in vogue

I who I now the Dignity of your Post, as SPECTATOR, and the Authority a civil Eye ought to bear in the female World could not forbear consulting you, and beg your Advice in so crucial a Point, as is that of the Education of young Gentlewomen Having already provided myself with a very convenient House in a good Air, I am not without Hope but that you will promote this generous Design I must farther tell you, Sir, that all who shall be committed to my Conduct, beside the usual Accomplishments of the Needle, Dancing, and the French Tongue, shall not fail

Nec deus interit, nisi deus in die cedat
In eodem ———— Hoc

HORACE advises a Poet to consider thoroughly the Nature and Force of his Genius. Mus seems to have known perfectly well, wherein his Strength lay, and has therefore chosen a Subject entirely conformable to those Talents, of which he was Master As his Genius was wonderfully turned to the Sublime, his Subject is the noblest that could have entered into the Thoughts of Man Every thing that is truly great and astonishing, has a place in it the whole System of the intellectual World, the Cosmos, and the Creation Heaven Earth and Hell, enter into the Constitution of his Poem

Having in the First and Second Books represented the Infernal World with all its Horrors, the Thread of his Fable naturally leads him into the opposite Regions of Bliss and Glory

If Mus Majesty forsakes him any where, it is in those Parts of his Poem, where the Divine Persons are introduced as Speakers One may, I think, observe that the Author proceeds with a kind of Fear and Trembling, whilst he describes the Sentiments of the Almighty. He dares not give his Imagination its full Play, but chuses to confine himself to such Thoughts as are drawn from the Books of the most Orthodox Divines, and to such Expressions as may be met with in Scripture. The Sentiments therefore, which we are to look for in these Speeches, are not of a Poetical Nature, nor so proper to fill the Mind with Sentiments of Grandeur as with Thoughts of Devotion. The Passions, which they are designed to rouse, are a Divine Love and Religious Fear. The Particular Beauty of the Speeches in the Third Book, consists in that Shortness and Perspicuity of Style, in which the Poet has couched the greatest Myriades of Christianity, and drawn together, in a regular Scheme, the whole Dispensation of Providence, with respect to Man. He has represented all celestial Doctrines of Predestination, of Free Will and Grace, as also the great Points of Incarnation and Redemption, which naturally grow up in a Poem that treats of the Fall of Man, with great Energy of Expression, and in a clearer and stronger Light than I ever met with in any other Writer. As these Points are dry in themselves to the generality of Readers, the coarse and clear manner in which he has treated them, is very much to be admired, as is likewise that particular Art which he has made use of in the interspersing of all those Graces of Poetry, which the Subject was capable of receiving.

The Survey of the whole Creation, and of every thing that is transacted in it, is a Prospect worthy of Omniscience, and as much above that, in which Jupiter has drawn his Jupiter, as the Christian Idea of the Supreme Being is more Rational and Sublime than that of the Heathens. The particular Objects on which he is described to have cast his Eye, are represented in the most beautiful and lively Manner.

Not had the Almighty Fell'er seen a doer,
From the pure Enpyrean aether's seat
He had seen above all the gods bent o'er his Eye, His own Works and their Works at once to see About him all the Sanctities of Heaven Stood thick as Stars, and from his Sight received Beatitude past all praise. On his right
He vaulted Imare of his Glory sat, His only Son. On earth he first benold Or the first Parents, yet the only Son Of Manu'd, in the happy garden fled, Keeping immortal fruits of Joy and Love, Uninterrupted Joy, untroubled Love
In blissful Solitude. He then rose up Hell as the Gulf between, and Satan there Coast'g the Wall of Heaven on this side Night,
In the sun air sublime, and ready now
To strike with warred wings, and willing feet
On the bare side of this world, that seed From land unborn'd out of firmament, On certain wheel, in Ocean or in Air Him God beheld, & from his prospect high, Wherein past, present, future he beholds, Takes to his only Son foretelling spoke Satan's Approach to the Confines of the Creation, is finely imaged in the beginning of the Speech, which immediately follows. The Effects of this Speech in the blessed Spirits, and in the Divine Person to whom it was addressed, cannot but fill the Mind of the Reader with a secret Pleasure and Complacency.

Th' while God spoke, on bays all fingers cress'd All Heaven, and in the blessed Spirit, elect Saw of his Joy ineffable diffus'd Joy, I can fore-tell the Son of God - 'till Most glorious is, in him, all his Father's Substantially express'd and in his face Divine Compassion is fully appear'd, Love, 'till it end, and without measure Grace

I need not point out the Beauty of that Circumstance, wherein the whole Host of Angels are represented as standing Mute, nor when how proper the Occasion was to produce such a Silence in Heaven. The Close of this Divine Colloquy, with the Hymn of Angels that follows upon it, are so wonderfully Beautiful and Poetical, that I should not forbear meeting the whole Passage, if the Bounds of my Paper would give me leave.

*No sooner led the Almighty's eyes, but all The multitudes of Angels with a shout (Loud as when first burst forth the sun, or set As first the voices) utter'd Joy, Heaven rung With Jubilee, and led Hosannas fill'd
The eternal regions, &c. &c.*

Satan's Walk upon the Outside of the Universe, which, at a Distance, appeared to him of a globular Form, but, upon his nearer Approach, look'd like an unbounded Plain, is natural and noble. As his Roaring upon the Frontiers of the Creation between that Mass of Matter which was wrought into a World, and the shapeless unformed Heap of Materials, which still lay in Chaos and Confusion, strikes the Imagination with some lively and lively great and wild. I have before spoke of the Isis of Vanity, which the Poet places upon this outermost Surface of the Universe, and shall here explain myself more at large on that, and other Parts of the Poem, which are of the same Shadowy Nature.

Aristotle observes, that the Fable of an Epic Poem should abound in Circumstances that are both credible and astonishing, or as the French Critics chuse to phrase it, the Fable should be filled with the Probable and the Marvellous. This Rule is as fine and just as any in Aristotle's whole Art of Poetry.

If the Fable is only Probable, it differs nothing from a true History; if it is only Marvellous it is no better than a Romance. The great Secret therefore of Heroic Poetry is to relate such Circumstances, as may produce in the Reader at the same time both Belief and Astonishment. This is brought to pass in a well-chosen Fable, by the Account of such things as have really happened, or at least of such things as have happened according to the received Opinions of Mankind. As ton's Fable is a Masterpiece of this Nature is the War in Heaven, the Condition of the fallen Angels, the State of Innocence, and Temptation of the Serpent, and the Fall of Man, though they are very astonishing in themselves, are not only credible, but actual Points of Truth.

The next Method of reconciling Miracles with Credibility, is by a happy Invention of the Poet, as in particular, when he introduces Agents of a superior Nature, who are capable of effecting what is wonderful, and what is not to be met with in the ordinary course of things. Ulysses's Ship being turned into a Rock, and Aeneas's Fleet into a Shoal of Water Nymphs though they are very surprising Accidents, are nevertheless probable, when we are told that they were the Gods who thus transformed them. It is this kind of Machinery which fills the Poems both of Homer and Virgil with such Circumstances as are wonderful, but not impossible, and so frequently produce in the Reader the most pleasing Passion that can rise in the Mind of Man, which is Admiration. If there be any Instance in the Aeneid liable to Exception upon this Account, it is in the Beginning of the third Book, where Aeneas is represented as tearing up the Myrtle that dropped Blood. To qualify this wonderful Circumstance, Polydorus tells a Story from the Root of the Myrtle, that the barbarous Inhabitants of the Country having pierced him with Spears and Arrows, the Wood which was left in his Body took Root in his Wounds, and gave Birth to that bleeding Tree. This Circumstance seems to have the Marvellous without the Probable, because it is represented as proceeding from Natural Causes, without the Interposition of any God, or other Supernatural Power capable of producing it. The Spears and Arrows grow of themselves, without so much as the Modern Help of an Enchantment. If we look into the Fiction of Milton's Fable, though we find it full of surprising Incidents, they are generally suited to our Notions of the Things and Persons described, and tempered with a due Measure of Probability. I must only make an Exception to the Lunbo of Vanity, with his Episode of Sin and Death, and some of the imaginary Persons in his Chaos. These Passages are astonishing, but not credible. The Reader cannot so far impose upon himself as to see a Possibility in them, they are the Description of Dreams and Shadows, not of Things or Persons. I know that many Critics look upon the Stories of Circe, Polypheme, the Sirens, nay the whole Odyssey and Iliad, to be Allegories; but allowing this to be true, they are Fables, but considering the Opinions of Mankind that prevailed in the Age of the Poet, might possibly have been according to the Letter. The Persons are such as might have acted what is ascribed to them, as the Circumstances in which they are represented, might possibly have been Truths and Realities. This Appearance of Probability is so absolutely requisite in the greater kinds of Poetry, that Aristotle observes the Ancient Tragick Writers made use of the Names of such great Men as had actually lived in the World, tho' the Tragedy proceeded upon Adventures they were never engaged in, on purpose to make the Subject more Credible. In a Word, besides the hidden Meaning of an Epic Allegory, the plain literal Sense ought to appear Probable. The Story should be such as an ordinary Reader may acquiesce in, whatever Natural, Moral, or Political Truth may be discovered in it by Men of greater Penetration.

Satan, after having long wandered upon the Surface, or outmost Wall of the Universe, discovers at last a wide Gap in it, which led into the Creation, and is described as the Opening through which the Angels pass to and fro into the lower World, upon their Errands to Mankind. His Sitting upon the Brink of this Passage, and taking a Survey of the whole Face of Nature that appeared to him new and fresh in all its Beauties, with the Simile illustrating this Circumstance, fills the Mind of the Reader with a surprizing and glorious Idea as any that rises in the whole Poem. He looks down into that vast Hollow of the Universe with the Eye, or (as Milton calls it in his first Book) with the Kenn of an Angel. He surveys all the Wonders in this immense Amphitheatre that lye between both the Poles of Heaven, and takes in at one View the whole Round of the Creation.

His Flight between the several Worlds that shined on every side of him, with the particular Description of the Sun, are set forth in all the Warmth of a luxuriant Imagination. His Shape, Speech and Behaviour upon his transforming himself into an Angel of Light, are touched with exquisite Beauty. The Poet's Thought of directing Satan to the Sun, which in the vulgar Opinion of Mankind is the most conspicuous Part of the Creation, and the placing in it an Angel, is a Circumstance very finely contrived, and the more adjusted to a Poetical Probability, as it was a received Doctrine among the most famous Philosophers, that every Orb had its Intelligence, and as an Apostle in Sacred Writ is said to have seen such an Angel in the Sun. In the Answer which this Angel returns to the disguised evil Spirit, there is such a becoming Majesty as is altogether suitable to a Superior Being. The Part of it in which he represents himself as present at the Creation, is very noble in it self, and not only proper where it is introduced, but requisite to prepare the Reader for what follows in the Seventh Book.

*I saw when at his Word the formless Mass,
This World's material Mould, came to a Heap Confusion heard his Voice, and wild Upheav Stood rul'd, stood vast Infinitude confin'd, Till at his second Bidding Darkness fled, Light shon, &c*

In the following Part of the Speech he points out the Earth with such Circumstances, that the Reader can scarce forbear fancying himself employed on the same distant View of it.

Look downward on the Globe whose hither Side With Light from hence, tho' but reflected, shines, That place is Earth, the Seat of Man, that Light His Day, &c

I must not conclude my Reflections upon this Third Book of Paradise Lost, without taking Notice of that celebrated Complaint of Milton with which it opens, and which certainly deserves all the Praises that have been given it, tho' as I have before hinted, it may rather be looked upon as an Excrescence, than as an essential Part of the Poem. The same Observation might be applied to that beautiful Digression upon Hypocrisis, in the same Book. L

Liber'as, quæ serâ tan en respexit Inertem Virg Ecl 1

MR SPECTATOR,

I F you ever read a Letter which is sent with the more Pleasure for the Reality of its Complaints, this may have Reason to hope for a favourable Acceptance and if Time be the most irretrievable Loss, the Regrets which follow will be thought, I hope, the most justifiable. The regaining of my Liberty from a long State of Indolence and Inactivity, and the Desire of resisting the further Encroachments of Idleness, make me apply to you and the Uneasiness with which I recollect the past Year, and the Apprehensions with which I expect the Future, soon determined me to it.

Idleness is so general a Distemper that I cannot but imagine a Speculation on this Subject will be of universal Use. There is hardly any one Person without some Alloy of it and thousands besides my self spend more Time in idle Uncertainty which to begin first of two Affairs, that would have been sufficient to have ended them both. The Occasion of this seems to be the Want of some necessary Employment, to put the Spirits in Motion, and awaken them out of their Lethargy. If I had less Leisure, I should have more for I should then find my Time distinguished into Portions, some for Business, and others for the indulging of Pleasures. But now one Race of Indolence overspreads the whole, and I have no Land-mark to direct myself by. Were one's Time a little struttred by Business, like Water inclosed in its Banks it would have some determined Course but unless it be put into some Channel it has no Current, but becomes a Deluge without either Use or Motion.

When Scanderbeg Prince of Epirus was dead, the Tur's, who had but too often felt the Force of his Arm in the Battels he had won from them, imagined that by wearing a piece of his Bones near their Heart, they should be animated with a Vigour and Force like to that which inspired him when living. As I am like to be but of little use whilst I live, I am resolved to do what Good I can after my Decease and have accordingly ordered my Bones to be disposed of in this Manner for the Good of my Countrymen, who are troubled with too exorbitant a Degree of Fire. All Fox hunters upon wearing me, would in a short Time be brought to endure their Beds in a Morning, and perhaps even quit them with Regret at Ten. Instead of hurrying away to tease a poor Animal, and run away from their own Thoughts a Chair or a Chariot would be thought the most desirable Means of performing a Remove from one Place to another. I should be a Cure for the unnatural Desire of John Frott for Draining, and a Specifick to lessen the Inclination Mrs Fidget has to Motion, and cause her always to give her Approbation to the present Place she is in. In fine, no Egyptian Mummy was ever half so useful in Physick, as I should be to these feverish Constitutions, to repress the violent Sallies of Youth, and give each Action its proper Weight and Repose.

I can stifle any violent Inclination, and oppose a Torrent of Anger, or the Solicitations of Revenge, with Success. But Indolence is a Stream which flows slowly on, but yet undermines the Foundation of every Virtue. A Vice of a more lively Nature were a more desirable Injurious than this Rust of the Mind, which gives a Tincture of its Nature to every Action of ones Life. It were as little Hazard to be lost in a Storm, as to lie thus perpetually becalmed. And it is to no Purpose to have within one the Seeds of a thousand good Qualities, if we want the Vigour and Resolution necessary for the exerting them. Death brings all Persons back to an Equality, and this Image of it, this Slumber of the Mind, leaves no Difference between the greatest Genius and the meanest Understanding. A Faculty of doing things remarkably praise-worthy thus concealed, is of no more use to the Owner, than a Heap of Gold to the Man who dares not use it.

To-Morrow is still the fatal Time when all is to be rectified. To-Morrow comes, it goes, and still I please myself with the Shadow, whilst I lose the Reality unmindful that the present Time alone is ours, the future is yet unborn, and the past is dead, and can only live (as Parents in their Children) in the Actions it has produced.

The Time we live ought not to be computed by the Numbers of Years, but by the Use has been made of it, thus 'tis not the Extent of Ground, but the yearly Rent which gives the Value to the Estate. Wretched and thoughtless Creatures, in the only Price where Covetousness were a Virtue we turn Prodigals. Nothing lies upon our Hands with such Uneasiness, nor has there been so many Devices for any one Thing, as to make it slide away imperceptibly and to no purpose. A Shilling shall be hoarded up with Care, whilst that which is above the Price of an Estate, is flung away with Disregard and Contempt. There is nothing now a-days so much avoided as a solicitous Improvement of every part of Time. 'tis a Report must be shunned as one tenders the Name of a Wit and a fine Genius, and as one fears the Dreadful Character of a laborious Plodder. But notwithstanding this, the greatest Wits any Age has produced thought far otherwise, for who can think either Socrates or Demosthenes lost any Reputation, by their continual Pains both in overcoming the Defects and improving the Gifts of Nature. All are acquainted with the Labour and Assiduity with which Tully acquired his Eloquence. Seneca in his Letters to Lucilius assures him, there was not a Day in which he did not either write something,

'or read and epitomize some good Author and I remember Pliny in one of his Letters, where he gives an Account of the various Methods he used to fill up every Vacancy of Time, after several Employments which he enumerates, sometimes, 'says he, I hunt but even then I carry with me a Pocket-Book, that whilst my Servants are busied in disposing of the Nets and other Matters I may be employed in something that may be useful to me in my Studies, and that if I miss of my Game, I may at the least bring home some of my own Thoughts with me, and not have the Mortification of having caught nothing all Day.'

'Thus, Sir, you see how many Examples I recall to Mind, and what Arguments I use with myself, to regain my Liberty. But as I am afraid 'tis no Ordinary Perswasion that will be of Service, I shall expect your Thoughts on this Subject, with the greatest Impatience, especially since the Good will not be confined to me alone, but will be of Universal Use. For there is no Hopes of Amendment where Men are pleased with their Ruin, and whilst they think Laziness is a desirable Character. Whether it be that they like the State it self, or that they think it gives them a new Lustre when they do exert themselves, seemingly to be able to do that without Labour and Application, which others attain to but with the greatest Diligence.

I am, SIR,

Your most obliged humble Servant,

AUGUSTUS, a few Moments before his Death, asked his Friends who stood about him, if they thought he had acted his Part well and upon receiving such an Answer as was due to his extraordinary Merit, Let me then, says he, go off the Stage with your Applause, using the Expression with which the Roman Actors made their Exit at the Conclusion of a Dramatick Piece. I could wish that Men, while they are in Health, would consider well the Nature of the Part they are engaged in, and what Figure it will make in the Minds of those they leave behind them. Whether it was worth coming into the World for whether it be suitable to a reasonable Being, in short, whether it appears Graceful in this Life, or will turn to an Advantage in the next. Let the Symplicant, or Buffoon, the Satyrst, or the Good Companion, consider with himself, when his Body shall be laid in the Grave, and his Soul pass into another State of Existence, how much it will rebound to his Praise to have it said of him, that no Man in England eat better, that he had an admirable Talent at turning his Friends into Ridicule, that no Body out did him at an Ill-natured Jest, or that he never went to Bed before he had dispatched his third Bottle. These are, however, very common Funeral Orations, and Elogiums on deceased Persons who have acted among Mankind with some Figure and Reputation.

But if we look into the Bulk of our Species, they are such as are not likely to be remembered a Moment after their Disappearance. They leave behind them no Traces of their Existence, but are forgotten as tho' they had never been. They are neither wanted by the Poor, regretted by the Rich, [nor] celebrated by the Learned. They are neither missed in the Commonwealth, nor lamented by private Persons. Their Actions are of no Significance to Mankind, and might have been performed by Creatures of much less Dignity, than those who are distinguished by the Faculty of Reason. An eminent French Author speaks somewhere to the following Purpose. I have often seen from my Chamber window two noble Creatures, both of them of an erect Countenance and endowed with Reason. These two intellectual Beings are employed from Morning to Night, in rubbing two smooth Stones one upon another, that is, as the Vulgar phrase it, in polishing Marble.

My Friend, Sir ANDREW FREEPORT, as we were sitting in the Club last Night, gave us an Account of a sober Citizen, who died a few Days since. This honest Man being of greater Consequence in his own Thoughts, than in the Eye of the World, had for some Years past kept a Journal of his Life. Sir ANDREW shewed us one Week of it. [Since] the Occurrences set down in it mark out such a Road of Action as that I have been speaking of, I shall present my Reader with a faithful Copy of it, after having first inform'd him, that the Deceased Person had in his Youth been bred to Trade, but finding himself not so well turned for Business, he had for several Years last past lived altogether upon a moderate Annuity.

I question not but the Reader will be surprized to find the above-mentioned Journalist taking so much care of a Life that was filled with such inconsiderable Actions, and received so very small Improvements, and yet, if we look into the Behaviour of many whom we daily converse with, we shall find that most of their Hours are taken up in those three important Articles of Eating, Drinking and Sleeping I do not suppose that a Man loses his Time, who is not engaged in publick Affairs, or in an illustrious Course of Action On the Contrary, I believe our Hours may very often be more profitably laid out in such Transactions as make no Figure in the World than in such as are apt to draw upon them the Attention of Mankind One may become wiser and better by several Methods of Employing one's Self in Secrecy and Silence, and do what is laudable without Noise, or Ostentation I would, however, recommend to every one of my Readers, the keeping a Journal of their Lives for one Week, and setting down punctually their whole Series of Employments during that Space of Time This Kind of Self-Examination would give them a true State of themselves, and incline them to consider seriously what they are about One Day would rectify the Omissions of another, and make a Man weigh all those indifferent Actions, which, though they are easily forgotten, must certainly be accounted for

MR SPECTATOR,

A CERTAIN Vice which you have lately at-you as growing so deep in the Heart of Man, that the Affection outlives the Practice of it.

You must have observed that Men who have been bred in Arms preserve to the most extreme

Time in Gallantry and Adventure, keep up, as well as they can, the Appearance of it, and carry

I HAVE endeavour'd, in the Course of my Papers, to do Justice to the Age, and have taken care as much as possible to keep my self a Neuter between both Sexes I have neither spared the Ladies out of Complaisance, nor the Men out of Purity but notwithstanding the great Integrity with which I have acted in this Particular, I find my self tri'd with an Inclination to favour my own half of the Species Whether it be that the Women afford a more fruitful Field for Speculation or whether they run more in my Head than the Men, I cannot tell, but I shall set down the Charge as it is laid against me in the following Letter

Mr SPECTATOR,

I always make one among a Company of young Females, who peruse your Speculations every Morning I am at present Commissioned by your whole Assembly, to let you know, that we fear you are a little inclined to be partial towards your own Sex We must however acknowledge, with all due Gratitude, that in some Cases you have given us our Revenge on the Men, and done us Justice We could not easily have forgiven you several Strokes in the Dissection of the Coquet's Heart, if you had not, much about the same time, made a Sacrifice to us of a Beau's Scull

You may, however, Sir, please to remember, that long since you attacked our Hoods and Commodies in such manner, as to use your own Expression made very many of us ashamed to show our Heads We must, therefore, beg leave to represent to you that we are in Hopes, if you would please to make a due Enquiry, the Men in all Ages would be found to have been little less whimsical in adorning that Part, than our selves The different Forms of their Wiggs, together with the various Cocks of their Hats, all flatter us in this Opinion

I had a humble Servant last Summer, who the first time he declared himself, was in a full-bottom'd Wigg but the Day after to my no small Surprise, he accosted me in a thin Natural one I received him, at this our second Interview, as a perfect Stranger, but was extremely confounded, when his Speech discovered who he was I resolved therefore, to fix his Face in my Memory for the future but as I was walking in the Park the same Evening he appeared to me in one of those Wiggs that I think you call a Night-cap, which had altered him more effectually than before He afterwards played a Couple of Black Riding Wiggs upon me with the same Success, and, in short, assumed a new Face almost every Day in the first Month of his Courtship

'I observed afterwards, that the Variety of Cocks into which he moulded his Hat, had not a little contributed to his Impositions upon me

'Yet, as if all these Wigs were not sufficient to distinguish their Heads, you must, doubtless, Sir, have observed, that great Numbers of young Fellows have, for several Months last past, taken upon the name of wear Feathers

'We hope, therefore, that these may, with as much Justice, be called Indian Princes, as you have styled a Woman in a coloured Hood an Indian Queen and that you will, in due time, take these very Gentlemen into Consideration

'We the more earnestly beg that you would put a Stop to this Practice, since it has already lost us one of the most agreeable Members of our Society, who after having refused several good Estates, and two Titles, was lured from us last Week by a mixed Feather

'I am ordered to present you the Respects of our whole Company, and am,

SIR, Your very humble Servant,
DORINDA

Note, The Person wearing the Feather, tho' our Friend took him for an Officer in the Guards, has proved to be [an arrant Linnen Draper]

I am not now at leisure to give my Opinion upon the Hat and Feather however to wipe off the present Imputation, and gratify my Female Correspondent, I shall here print a Letter which I lately received from a Man of Mode, who seems to have a very extraordinary Genius in his Wry

SIR,

I presume I need not inform you, that among Men of Dress it is a common Phrase to say Mr Such an one has struck a bold Stroke, by which we understand, that he is the first Man who has had Courage enough to lead up a Fashion Accordingly, when our Trylors take Measure of us, they always demand whether we will have a plain Suit, or strike a bold Stroke I think I may without Vanity say, that I have struck some of the boldest and most successful Strokes of any Man in Great Britain I was the first that struck the Long Pocket about two Years since I was likewise the Author of the Frosted Button, which when I saw the Town came readily into, being resolved to strike while the Iron was hot,
I produced much about the same time the Scallop I up, the knotted Cravat, and made a fair Push for the Silver cloed Stocking

A few Months after I brought up the modish Tail, or the Coat with close Sleeves I struck this at first in a plain Dash, but that failing, I struck it a second time in blue Camlet and reported the Stroke in several kinds of Cloth, till at last it took effect There are two or three young Fellows at the other End of the Town, who have always their Eye upon me and answer me Stroke for Stroke I was once so unwary as to mention my Fancy in relation to the new fashioned Surtout before one of these Gentlemen, who was disingenuous enough to steal my pers with some Domestick of the Batchelor (who is to be hunted into the Loits they have had for him) what are his Manners, his Familiarities, his good Qualities or Vices, not as the Good in him is a Recommendation, or the Ill a Diminution, but as they affect or contribute to the main Inquiry, What Estate he is in? When this Point is well reported to the Board, they can take in a wild roving Fox-hunter, as easily as a soft, gentle young Fop of the Town. The Way is to make all Places uneasy to him, but the Scenes in which they have allotted him to act. His Brother Huntsmen, Bottle Companions, his Fraternity of Fops, shall be brought into the Conspiracy against him. Then this Matter is not hid in so bare-faced a Manner before him as to have it intimated Mrs. Such & one would make him a very proper Wife but by the Force of their Correspondence they shall make it (as Mr. Waller said of the Marriage of the Dwarfs) is impracticable to have any Woman besides her they design him, as it would have been in Adam to have refused Eve. The Man named by the Commission for Mrs. Such & one, shall neither be in Fashion, nor dare ever to appear in Company, should he attempt to evade their Determination.

The Female Sex wholly govern domestick Life, and by this Means, when they think fit, they can sow Dissentions between the dearest Friends, may make Father and Son irreconcilable Enemies, in spite of all the Ties of Gratitude on one Part, and the Duty of Protection to be paid on the other. The Ladies of the Inquisition understand this perfectly well, and where Love is not a Motive to a Man's chusing one whom they allot, they can, with very much Art, insinuate Stories to the Disadvantage of his Honesty or Courage, till the Creature is too much dispirited to bear up against a general ill Reception, which he every where meets with, and in due time falls into their appointed Wedlock for Shelter. I have a long Letter bearing Date the fourth Instant, which gives me a large Account of the Policies of this Court, and find there is now before them a very refractory Person who has escaped all their Machinations for two Years last past. But they have prevented two successive Matches which were of his own Inclination, the one, by a Report that his Mistress was to be married, and the very Day appointed, Wedding-Clothes bought, and all things ready for her being given to another, the second time, by insinuating to all his Mistress's Friends and Acquaintance, that he had been false to several other Women, and the like. The poor Man is now reduced to profess he designs to lead a single Life, but the Inquisition gives out to all his Acquaintance, that nothing is intended but the Gentleman's own Welfare and Happiness. When this is urged, he talks still more humbly, and protests he aims only at a Life without Pain or Reproach. Pleasure, Honour or Riches, are things for which he has no taste. But notwithstanding all this and what else he may defend himself with, as that the Lady is too old or too young, of a suitable Humour, or the quite contrary, and that it is impossible they can ever do other than wrangle from June to January, Every Body tells him all this is Spleen and he must have a Wife, while all the Members of the Inquisition are unanimous in a certain Woman for him, and they think they all together are better able to judge, than he or any other private Person whatsoever.

Temple, March 3, 1711

Your Speculation this Day on the Subject of Idleness, has employed me, ever since I read it, in sorrowful Reflections on my having loitered away the Term (or rather the Vacation) of ten Years in this Place, and unhappily suffered a good Chamber and Study to be idle as long. My Books (except those I have taken to sleep upon) have been totally neglected, and my Lord Cole and other venerable Authors were never so slighted in their Lives. I spent most of the Day at a Neighbouring Coffee-House, where we have what I may call a lazy Club. We generally come in Night Gowns, with our Stockings about our Heels, and sometimes but one on. Our Salutation at Entrance is a Yawn and a Stretch, and then without more Ceremony we take our Place at the Loiling Table, where our Discourse is, what I fear you would not read out, therefore shall not insert. But I assure you, Sir, I heartily lament this Loss of Time, and am now resolved (if possible, with double Diligence) to retrieve it, being effectually awakened by the Arguments of Mr. Shack out of the Senseless Stupidity that has so long possessed me. And to demonstrate that Penitence accompanies my Confession, and Constancy my Resolutions, I have locked my Door for a Year and desire you would let my Companions know I am not within. I am with great Respect,

SIR, Your most obedient Servant,

Nec satis est pulchra esse poemata, dulcis sinitur

THOSE, who know how many Volumes have been written on the Poems of Homer and Virgil, will easily pardon the Length of my Discourse upon Milton. The Paradise Lost is looked upon, by the best Judges, as the greatest Production, or at least the noblest Work of Genius in our Language, and therefore deserves to be set before an English Reader in its full Beauty. For this Reason, tho' I have endeavoured to give a general Idea of its Graces and Imperfections in my Six First Papers, I thought myself obliged to bestow one upon every Book in particular. The Three first Books I have already dispatched, and am now entering upon the Fourth. I need not

¹ From this date to the end of the series the Saturday papers upon Milton exceed the usual length of a Spectator essay. That they may not occupy more than the single leaf of the original issue, they are printed in smaller type the columns also, when necessary, encroach on the bottom margin of the paper, and there are few advertisements inserted.

The Speeches of these two first Lovers flow equally from Passion and Sincerity. The Professions they make to one another are full of Warmth but at the same time founded on Truth. In a Word, they are the Gallantries of Paradise.

—When Adam first of Men—

*Sole partner and sole part of all these joys, Dearer th, self than all,
But let us ever praise him, and extol
His bounty, following o'r delightful Task, To prune these growing plants, and tend these flow'rs,
Which were it toilsome, yet with thee were sweet To whom thus Eve reply'd. O thou for whom,
And from whom I was form'd, flesh of thy flesh,
And without whom am to no end, my Guide
And Head, what thou hast said is just and right For we to him united all praises owe,
And daily thanks, I chiefly, who enjoy
So far the happier Lot, enjoying thee Pre eminent by so much odds, while thou Live consort to thy self canst no where find, &c.*

The remaining part of Eve's Speech, in which she gives an Account of her self upon her first Creation, and the manner in which she was brought to Adam, is I think as beautiful a Passage as any in Milton, or perhaps in any other Poet whatsoever. These Passages are all worded off with so much Art, that they are capable of pleasing the most delicate Reader, without offending the most severe.

That Day I oft remember, when from Sleep, &c

A Poet of less Judgment and Invention than this great Author, would have found it very difficult to have filled [these] tender Parts of the Poem with Sentiments proper for a State of Innocence, to have described the Warmth of Love, and the Professions of it, without Artifice or Hyperbole, to have made the Man speak the most endearing things, without descending from his natural Dignity, and the Woman receiving them without departing from the Modesty of her Character in a Word, to adjust the Privileges of Wisdom and Beauty, and make each appear to the other in its proper Force and Loveliness. This mutual Subordination of the two Sexes is wonderfully kept up in the whole Poem, as particularly in the Speech of Eve I have before mentioned, and upon the Conclusion of it in the following Lines.

*So spake our general Mother, and with eyes Of Conjugal attraction unreprieved,
And meek surrender, half embracing lean'd
On our first father, half her swelling breast Naked in et his under the flowing Gold
Of her loose tresses hid. he in delight
Both of her beauty and submissive charms Smil'd with superior Love —*

The Poet adds, that the Devil turned away with Envy at the sight of so much Happiness.

We have another View of our first Parents in their Evening Discourses, which is full of pleasing Images and Sentiments suitable to their Condition and Characters. The Speech of Eve, in particular, is dressed up in such a soft and natural Turn of Words and Sentiments, as cannot be sufficiently admired.

I shall close my Reflections upon this Book, with observing the Masterly Transition which the Poet makes to their Evening Worship in the following Lines.

*Thus at their shady Lodge arriv'd, both stood, Both turn'd, and under open Sky, ador'd The God that made both [Sky,] Air, Earth and Heaven,
Which they beheld, the Moon's resplendent Globe,
And Starry Pole. Thou also mad'st the Night, Maker Omnipotent, and thou the Day, &c.*

Most of the Modern Heroick Poets have imitated the Ancients, in beginning a Speech without premising, that the Person said thus or thus but as it is easier to imitate the Ancients in the Omission of two or three Words, it requires Judgment to do it in such a manner as they shall not be missed, and that the Speech may begin naturally without them. There is a fine Instance of this Kind out of Homer, in the Twenty Third Chapter of Longinus.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

THOMAS EARL OF WHARTON¹

My Lord,
THE Author of the Spectator having prefixed before each of his Volumes the Name of some great Person to whom he has particular Obligations, lays his Claim to your Lordship's Patronage upon the same Account. I must confess, my Lord, had not I already receiv'd great Instances of your Favour, I should have been afraid of submitting a Work of this Nature to your Perusal. You are so thoroughly acquainted with the Characters of Men, and all the Parts of human Life, that it is impossible for the least Misrepresentation of them to escape your Notice. It is Your Lordship's particular Distinction that you are Master of the whole Compass of Business, and have signalized Your Self in all the different Scenes of it. We admire some for the Dignity, others for the Popularity of their Behaviour; some for their Clearness of Judgment, others for their Happiness of Expression; some for the laying of Schemes, and others for the putting of them in Execution. It is Your Lordship only who enjoys these several Talents united, and that too in as great Perfection as others possess them singly. Your Enemies acknowledge this great Extent in your Lordship's Character, at the same time that they use their utmost Industry and Invention to derogate from it. But it is for Your Honour that those who are now Your Enemies were always so. You have acted in so much Consistency with Your Self, and promoted the Interests of your Country in so uniform a Manner, that even those who would misrepresent your Generous Design for the Publick Good, cannot but approve the Steadiness and Intrepidity with which you pursue them. It is a most sensible Pleasure to me that I have this Opportunity of professing my self one of your great Admirers, and in a very particular Manner,

My LORD,
Your Lordship's Most Obedient,
And most Obedient,
Humble Servant

¹ This is the Thomas, Earl of Wharton, who in 1708 became Lord lieutenant of Ireland, and took Addison for his Chief Secretary. He was the son of Philip, Baron Wharton, a firm Presbyterian, sometimes called the good Lord Wharton, to distinguish him from his son and grandson. Philip Wharton had been in opposition of Stuart encroachments, a friend of Algernon Sidney, and one of the first men to welcome William III to England. He died, very old in 1694. His son Thomas did not inherit the religious temper of his father, and even a dedication could hardly have ventured to compliment him on his private morals. But he was an active politician, was with his father in the secret of the landing of the Prince of Orange, and was made by William Comptroller of the Household. Thwarted in his desire to become a Secretary of State, he made himself formidable as a bold, sarcastic speaker and by the strength of his parliamentary interest. He is said to have returned at one time thirty members, and to have spent eighty thousand pounds upon the maintenance of his political position. He was apt, by his manners, to make friends of the young good one if it be true. But as for the following Relation, I should be glad were I sure it were false. It is told with such Simplicity, and there are so many artless touches of Distress in it, that I fear it comes too much from the Heart.

men of influence. He spent money freely also on the turf, and upon his seat of Winchenden, in Wilts. Queen Anne, on her accession, struck his name with her own hand from the list of Privy Counsellors, but he won his way not only to restoration of that rank, but also in December, 1706, at the age of 67, to his title of Viscount Winchenden and Earl of Wharton. In November, 1708 he became Lord lieutenant of Ireland, with Addison for secretary. He took over with him also Clayton the musician, and kept a gay court, easily accessible, except to Roman Catholics, whom he would not admit to his presence, and against whom he enforced the utmost rigour of the penal code. He had himself conformed to the Church of England. Swift accused him, as Lord lieutenant, of shameless depravity of manners, of injustice, greed, and gross venality. This Lord Wharton died in 1715, and was succeeded by his son Philip, whom George I, in 1718, made Duke of Wharton for his father's vigorous support of the Hanoverian succession. His character was much worse than that of his father, the energetic politician and the man of cultivated taste and ready wit to whom Steele and Addison here dedicated the Fifth Volume of the Spectator.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'Some Years ago it happened that I lived in the same House with a young Gentleman of Merit with whose good Qualities I was so much taken, as to make it my Endeavour to show as many as I was able in my self. I amiliar Converse improved general Civilities into an unfeigned Passion on both Sides. He watched an Opportunity to declare himself to me and I, who could not expect a Man of so great an Estate as his, received his Addresses in such Terms, as gave him no reason to believe I was displeased by them, tho I did nothing to make him think me more easy than was decent. His Father was a very hard worldly Man, and proud so that there was no reason to believe he would easily be brought to think there was any thing in my Woman's Person or Character that could balance the Disadvantage of an unequal Fortune. In the mean time the Son continued his Application to me, and omitted no Occasion of demonstrating the most disinterested Passion imaginable to me and in plain direct Terms offered to marry me privately, and keep it so till he should be so happy as to gain his Father's Approbation, or become possessed of his Estate. I passionately loved him, and you will believe I did not deny such a one what was my Interest also to grant. However I was not so young, as not to take the Precaution of carrying with me a faithful Servant, who had been also my Mother's Maid, to be present at the Ceremony. When that was over I demanded a Certificate, signed by the Minister, my Husband, and the Servant. I just now spoke of. After our Nuptials, we conversed together very familiarly in the same House but the Restraints we were generally under, and the Interviews we had, being stolen and interrupted, made our Behaviour to each other live rather the impatient Fondness which is visible in Lovers, than the regular and gratified Affection which is to be observed in Man and Wife. This Observation made the Father very anxious for his Son and press him to a Match he had in his Eye for him. To relieve my Husband from this Importunity, and conceal the Secret of our Marriage, which I had reason to know would not be long in my power to Town, it was resolved that I should retire into a remote Place in the Country and converse under feigned Names by Letter. We long continued this Way of Commerce and I with my Needle a few Looks and reading over and over my Husband's Letters passed my Time in a resigned Expectation of better Days. He pleased to take notice, that within four Months after I left my Husband I was delivered of a Daughter, who died within few Hours after her Birth. This Accident and the retired Manner of Life I led, gave criminal Hopes to a neighbouring brute of a Country Gentleman whose Folly was the Source of all my Affliction. This Rustick is one of those rich Clowns, who supply the Want of all manner of Preeding by the Neglect of it, and with noisy Mirth half Understanding and ample Fortune force themselves upon Persons and Things, witho it any Sense of Time and Place. The poor ignorant People where I lay conceal'd, and now passed for a Widow, wondered I could be so shy and strange, as they called it, to the Squire and were bribed by him to admit him whenever he thought fit. I happened to be sitting in a little Parlour which belonged to my own Part of the House, and musing over one of the fondest of my Husband's Letters, in which I always kept the Certificate of my Marriage, when this rude Fellow came in, and with the nauseous Familiarity of such unbred Brutes, snatched the Papers out of my Hand. I was immediately under so great a Concern, that I threw my self at his Feet, and begged of him to return them. He with the same odious Pretence to Freedom and Gravity, swore he would read them. I grew more importunate he more curious till at last, with an Indignation arising from a Passion I then first discovered in him, he threw the Papers into the Fire, swearing that since he was not to read them, the Man who writ them should never be so happy as to have me read them over again. It is insignificant to tell you my Tears and Reproaches made the boisterous Calf leave the Room ashamed and out of Countenance, when I had leisure to ruminate on this Accident with more than ordinary Sorrow. However, such was then my Confidence in my Husband, that I writ to him the Misfortune, and desired another Paper of the same kind. He deferred writing two or three Posts, and at last answered me in general, That he could not then send me what I asked for, but when he could find a proper Conveyance, I should be sure to have it. From this time his Letters were more cold every Day than the other, and as he grew indifferent I grew jealous. This has at last brought me to Town, where I find both the Witnesses of my Marriage dead, and that my Husband, after three Months Conhabitation, has married a young Lady whom he married in Obedience to his Father. In a word, he shuns and disowns me. Should I come to the House and confront him, the Father would join in supporting him against me, though he believed my Story should I talk it to the World, what Reparation can I expect for an Injury I cannot make out? I believe he means to bring me, through Necessity, to resign my Pretensions to him for some Provision for my Life but I will die first. Pray bid him remember what he said, and how he was charmed when he lughed at the heedless Discovery I often made of my self. Let him remember how awkward I was in my dissembled Indifference towards him before Company. ask him how I, who could never conceal my Love for him, at his own Request, can part with him for ever? Oh, Mr SPECTATOR, sensible Spirits know no Indifference in Marriage. What then do you think is my piercing Affliction? — I leave you to represent my Distress your own way, in which I desire you to be speedy, if you have Compassion for Innocence exposed to Infamy.

MR SPECTATOR,
THE Materials you have collected together towards a general History of Clubs, make so bright a Part of your Speculations, that I think it is but a Justice we all owe the learned World to furnish you with such Assistances as may promote that useful Work For this Reason I could not forbear communicating to you some imperfect Informations of a Set of Men, if you will allow them a place in that Species of Being who have lately erected themselves into a Nocturnal Fraternity, under the title of the Mohock Club, a Name borrowed it seems from a sort of Canibals in India, who subsist by plundering and devouring all the Nations about them The President is styled Emperor of the Mohocks, and his Arms are a Turkish Crescent, which his Imperial Majesty bears it present in a very extraordinary manner engraven upon his Forehead Agreeable to their Name, the avowed design of their Institution is mischief, and upon this Foundation all their Rules and Orders are framed An outrageous Ambition of doing all possible hurt to their Fellow Creatures, is the great Cement of their Assembly, and the only Qualification required in the Members In order to exert this Principle in its full Strength and Perfection, they take care to drink themselves to a pitch, that is, beyond the Possibility of attending to any Motions of Reason and Humanity then make a general Sally, and attack all that are so unfortunate as to walk the Streets through which they patrol Some are knock'd down, others stab'd, others cut and carbonado'd To put the Watch to a total Rout, and mortify some of those inoffensive Militia, is reckon'd a Corps d'eclat The particular Talents by which was still in hopes that he would some time or other make his Advances. As he was one day talking with her in Company of her two Sisters, the Conversation happening to turn upon Love, each of the young Ladies was by way of Rallery, recommending a Wife to him when, to the no small Surprise of her who languished for him in secret, he told them with a more than ordinary Seriousness, that his Heart had been long engaged to one whose Name he thought himself obliged in Honour to conceal but that he could shew her Picture in the Lid of his Snuff-box. The young Lady, who found herself the most sensibly touched by this Confession, took the first Opportunity that offered of snatching his Box out of his Hand. He seemed desirous of recovering it, but finding her resolved to look into the Lid, begged her, that if she should happen to know the Person, she would not reveal her Name. Upon carrying it to the Window, she was very agreeably surprized to find there was nothing within the Lid but a little Looking Glass, in which, after she had view'd her own Face with more Pleasure than she had ever done before, she returned the Box with a Smile, telling him, she could not but admire at his Choice.

WILL fancying that his Story took, immediately fell into a Dissertation on the Usefulness of Looking-Glasses, and applying himself to me, asked, if there were any Looking Glasses in the Times of the Greeks and Romans, for that he had often observed in the Translations of Poems out of those Languages, that a People generally talked of seeing themselves in Wells, Fountains, Lakes, and Rivers. Nay, says he, I remember Mr Dryden in his Ovid tells us of a swingeing Fellow, called Polypheme, that made use of the Sea for his Looking Glass, and could never dress himself to Advantage but in a Calm.

My Friend WILL to shew us the whole Compass of his Learning upon this Subject, further informed us, that there were still several Nations in the World so very barbarous as not to have any Looking Glasses among them and that he had lately read a Voyage to the South-Sea, in which it is said, that the Ladies of Chili always dress their Heads over a Basin of Water.

I am the more particular in my Account of WILL's last Night's Lecture on these natural Mirrors, as it seems to bear some Relation to the following Letter, which I received the Day before

SIR,

I have read your last Saturday's Observations on the Fourth Book of Milton with great Satisfaction, and am particularly pleased with the hidden Moral, which you have taken notice of in several Parts of the Poem. The Design of this Letter is to desire your Thoughts, whether there may not also be some Moral couched under that Place in the same Book where the Poet lets us know that the first Woman immediately after her Creation ran to a Looking Glass, and became so enamoured of her own Face, that she had never removed to view any of the other Works of Nature, had not she been led off to a Man. If you think fit to set down the whole Passage from

'Milton, your Readers will be able to judge for themselves, and the Quotation will not a little contribute to the filling up of your Paper

Your humble Servant,
R T

The last Consideration urged by my Quenist is so strong, that I cannot forbear closing with it. The Passage he alludes to, is part of Eve's Speech to Adam, and one of the most beautiful Passages in the whole Poem

*That Day I oft remember, when from sleep
I first awak'd, and found my self repos'd Under a shade of flowers, much wond'ring where And what I was, whence thither brought, and how*

*Not distant far from thence a murm'ring Sound Of Waters issu'd from a Cave, and spread Into a liquid Plain, then stood unmov'd Pure as the Expanse of Heav'n I thither went With unexperie'd I thought, and laid me down On the green Bank, to look into the clear Smooth Lake, that to me seem'd another Sky
As I bent down to look, just opposite,
A Shape within the wat'ry Gleam appear'd Bending to look on me, I started back,
It started back, but pleas'd I soon retir'd, Pleas'd it return'd as soon with answering Looks Of Sympathy and Love, there I had fix'd Mine Eyes till now, and pined with vain Desire, Had not a Voice thus warn'd me, What thou seest,*

*What thee thou seest, fair Creature, is thy self,
With thee it came and goes but follow me,
And I will bring thee where no Shadow stays I hy coming, and thy soft Embraces, he Whose Image thou art, him thou shalt enjoy Inseparably thine, to him shalt bear Multitudes like thy self, and thence be call'd Mother of Human Race What could I do, But follow straight, irresistibly thus led?
Till I esp'd thee, fair indeed and tall,
Under a Platan, yet methought less fair, Less winning soft, less amiably mild,
Than that smooth wat'ry Image back I turn'd, Thou follow'ing cry'dst aloud, Return fair Love, Whom fly'st thou? whom thou fly'st, of him thou art,*

His Flesh, his Bone, to give thee Being, I lent Out of my Side to thee, nearest my Heart, Substantial Life, to have thee by my side Henceforth an individual Solace dear Part of my Soul I seek thee, and thee claim My other half! With that thy gentle hand Sist'd mine, I yielded, and from that time see How Beauty is excell'd by manly Grace, And Wisdom, which alone is truly fair

So spake our general Mother, X.

My SPECTATOR,
YOUR Correspondent's Letter relating to Fortune Hunters, and your subsequent Discourse upon it, have given me Encouragement to send you a State of my Case, by which you will see, that the Matter complained of is a common Grievance both to City and Country.
I am a Country Gentleman of between five and six thousand a Year. It is my Misfortune to have a very fine Park and an only Daughter upon which account I have been so plagu'd with Deer-stealers and Fops, that for these four Years past I have scarce enjoy'd a Moment's Rest. I look upon my self to be in a State of War, and am forc'd to keep as constant watch in my Seat, as a Governour would do that commanded a Town on the Frontier of an Enemy's Country. I have indeed pretty well secur'd my Park, having for this purpose provided my self of four keepers, who are Left handed, and handle a Quarter-Staff beyond any other Fellow in the Country. And for the Guard of my House, besides a Band of Pensioner-Matrons and an old Mudden Relation, whom I keep on constant Duty, I have Blunderbusses always charg'd, and Fox-Guns planted in private Places about my Garden, of which I have given frequent Notice in the Neighbourhood yet so it is, that in spite of all my Care, I shall every now and then have a saucy Rascal ride by reconnaissance (as I think you call it) under my Windows, as sprucely drest as if he were going to a Ball. I am aware of this way of attacking a Mistress on Horseback, having heard that it is a common Practice in Spain, and have therefore taken care to remove my Daughter from the Road side of the House, and to lodge her next the Garden. But to cut short my Story what can a Man do after all? I durst not stand for Member of Parliament last Election, for fear of some ill Consequence from my being off of my Post. What I would therefore desire of you, is, to promote a Project I have set on foot and upon which I have writ to some of my Friends and that is, that care may be taken to secure our Daughters by Law, as well as our Deer and that some honest Gentleman of a publick Spirit, would move for Leave to bring in a Bill For the better preserving of the Female Game.

I am,

SIR

Your humble Servant

Mr SPECTATOR,

Mile-End-Green, March 6, 1712-12

Here is a young Man walks by our Door every Day about the Dusk of the Evening. He looks up at my Window, as if to see me and if I steal towards it to peep at him, he turns another way, and looks frightened at finding what he was looking for. The Air is very cold and pray let him know that if he knocks at the Door, he will be carry'd to the Parlour Fire, and I will come down soon after, and give him an Opportunity to break his Mind.

I am, SIR,

Your humble Servant,

Mary Comitt

'If I observe he cannot speak, I'll give him time to recover himself, and ask him how he does

Dear SIR,

I beg you to print this without Delay, and by the first Opportunity give us the natural Causes of Longing in Women or put me out of Fear that my Wife will one time or other be deliver'd of something as monstrous as any thing that has yet appeared to the World, for they say the Child is to bear a Resemblance of what was desir'd by the Mother. I have been marry'd upwards of six Years, have had four Children, and my Wife is now big with the fifth. The Expences she has put me to in procuring what she has longed for during her Pregnancy with them, would not only have handsomely defray'd the Charges of the Month, but of their Education too. Her Fancy being so exorbitant for the first Year or two, as not to confine it self to the usual Objects of Estates and Drinkables, but running out after Equipage and Furniture, and the like Extravagancies. To trouble you only with a few of them. When she was with Child of Tom, my eldest Son, she came home one day just hunting, and told me she had been visiting a Relation, whose Husband had made her a Present of a Charriot and a stately pair of Horses and that she was positive she could not breathe a Week longer, unless she took the Air in the Fellow to it of her own within that time. Thus, rather than lose an Heir, I readily comply'd with. Then the Furniture of her best Room must be instantly changed, or she should mark the Child with some of the frightful Figures in the old-fashion'd Tapestry. Well, the Upholsterer was called, and her Longing sav'd that bout. When she went with Molly, she had fix'd her Mind upon a new Set of Plite, and as much China as would have furnished an India Shop. These also I cheerfully granted, for fear of being Father to an Indian Pagod. Hitherto I found her Demands rose upon every Concession and had she gone on, I had been ruined. But by good Fortune, with her third, which was Peggy, the Height of her Imagination came down to the Corner of a Venison Pasty, and brought her once even upon her Knees to gnaw off the Ears of a Pig from the Spit. The Gratifications of her Palate were easily preferred to those of her Vanity, and sometimes a Partridge or a Quail, a Wheat Ear or the Pestle of a Lark, were cheerfully purchased nay, I could be contented tho' I were to feed her with green Pease in April, or Cherries in May. But with the Babe she now goes, she is turned Girl again, and fallen to eating of Chalk, pretending 'twill make the Child's Skin white and nothing will serve her but I must bear her Company, to prevent its having a Shade of my Brown. In this however I have

'ventur'd to deny her. No longer ago than yesterday, as we were coming to Town, she saw a parcel of Crows so heartily at Break fast upon a piece of Horse-flesh, that she had an invincible Desire to partake with them, and (to my infinite Surprize) begged the Coachmen to cut her off a Slice as if 'twere for himself, which the Fellow did and as soon as she came home she fell to it with such an Appetite, that she seem'd rather to devour than eat it. What her next Sally will be, I cannot guess but in the mean time my Request to you is, that if there be any way to come at these wild unaccountable Rovings of Imagination by Reason and Argument, you'd speedily afford us your Assistance This exceeds the Grievance of Pin-Money, and I think in every Settlement there ought to be a Clause inserted, that the Father should be answerable for the Longings of his Daughter But I shall impatiently expect your Thoughts in this Matter and am

Your most Obliged, and most Faithful Humble Servant,

'Let me know whether you think the next Child will love Horses as much as Molly does China-Ware

—Major rerum mihi nascitur ordo—Virg

WE were told in the foregoing Book how the evil Spirit practis'd upon Eve as she lay asleep, in order to inspire her with Thoughts of Vanity, Pride, and Ambition. The Author, who shews a wonderful Art throughout his whole Poem, in preparing the Reader for the several Occurrences that arise in it, founds upon the above-mention'd Circumstance, the first Part of the fifth Book. Adam upon his awaking finds Eve still asleep, with an unusual Discomposure in her Looks. The Posture in which he regards her, is describ'd with a tenderness not to be express'd, as the Whisper with which he awakens her, is the softest that ever was convey'd to a Lover's Ear

His wonder was, to find unawaken'd Eve
With Tresses discompos'd, and glowing Cheek, As through unquiet Rest he on his side Leaning half-raised, with Looks of cordial Love Hung over her enamour'd, and beheld Beauty, which whether waking or asleep, Shot forth peculiar Graces then, with Voice Mild, as when Zephyrus on Flora breathes, Her Hand soft touching, whisper'd thus Awake
My fairest, my Espous'd, my latest found, Heaven's last best Gift, my ever-new Delight!
Awake the Morning shines, and the fresh Field Calls us, we lose the Prime, to mark how sprang Our tended Plants, how blows the Citron Grove, What drops the Myrrh, and what the balmy Reed,

How Nature paints her Colours how the Bee

Sits on the Bloom, extracting liquid Sweets Such whispering wak'd her, but with startled Eye

On Adam, whom embracing, thus she spake O Sole, in whom my Thoughts find all Repose, My Glory, my Perfection I glad I see Thy Face, and Merit return'd—

I cannot but take notice that Milton, in the Conferences between Adam and Eve, had his Eye very frequently upon the Book of Canticles, in which there is a noble Spirit of Eastern Poetry and very often not unlike what we meet with in Homer, who is generally plac'd near the Age of Solomon. I think there is no question but the Poet in the preceding Speech remember'd those two Passages which are spoil'd on the like occasion, and fill'd with the same pleasing Images of Nature.

My beloved spake, and said unto me, Rise up, my Love, my Fair one, and come away, for lo the Winter is past, the Rain is over and gone, the Flowers appear on the Earth, the Time of the singing of Birds is come, and the Voice of the Turtle is heard in our Land. The Fig-tree putteth forth her green Figs, and the Vines with the tender Grape grow a good Soil. Arise my Love, my Fair-one and come away

Come, my Beloved, let us go forth into the Field, let us get up early to the Vineyards, let us see if the Vine flourish, until the tender Grape appear, and the Pomegranates be set forth

His preferring the Garden of Eden, to that

Where the Sapient King Held Dalliance with his fair Egyptian Spouse, shews that the Poet had this delightful Scene in his mind

Eve's Dream is full of those high Concepts engendering Pride, which we are told, the Devil endeavour'd to instill into her. Of this kind is that Part of it where she fancies herself as taken'd by Adam in the following beautiful Lines.

Wh, sleep'st thou Eve? now is the pleasant Time,
The cool, the silent, save where Silence yields To the night-warbling Bird, that now awake Tunes sweetest his love-labour'd Song, now reigns Full or'd the Moon, and with more [pleasing²]
Light

Shadowy sets off the Face of things In vain,
If none regard Heaven wakes with all his Eyes, Whom to behold but thee, Nature's Desire,
In whose sight all things joy, with Ravishment, Attracted by thy Beauty, still to gaze!

An injudicious Poet would have made Adam talk thro' the whole Work in such Sentiments as these. But Flattery and Falshood are not the Courtship of Milton's Adam, and could not be heard by Eve in her State of Innocence, except only in a Dream produc'd on purpose to tempt her Imagination. Other vain Sentiments of the same kind in this Relation of her Dream, will be obvious to every Reader. Tho' the Catastrophe of the Poem is finely presag'd on this Occasion, the Particulars of it are so artfully shadow'd, that they do not anticipate the Story which follows in the ninth Book. I shall only add that the Vision it self is founded upon Truth the Circumstances of it are full of that Wildness and Inconsistency which are natural to a Dream. Adam, conformable to his superior Character for Wisdom, instructs and comforts Eve upon this occasion

² [pleasing]

*So cheer'd he his fair Spouse, and she was cheer'd, But silently a gentle Fear let fall
From either Eye, and wip'd then with their hair, Two other Frowns is Drags that ready steel Each in the rechristal Shew, he ere they fell Kiss'd, as the Graces is Sister of sweet Remorse
And pious Awe, that fear'd to have effect*

The Morning Hymn is written in Imitation of one of those Psalms, where, in the overflowings of Gratitude and Praise, the Psalmist calls not only upon the Angels, but upon the most conspicuous Parts of the animate Creation, to join with him in extolling their common Maker. Invocations of this nature fill the Mind with glorious Ideas of God's Works, and awaken that Divine Enthusiasm which is so natural to Devotion. But if this calling upon the dead Parts of Nature, is at all times a proper kind of Worship, it was in a particular manner suitable to our first Parents, who had the Creation fresh upon their Minds, and had not seen the various Dispensations of Providence, nor consequently could be acquainted with those many Topicks of Praise which might afford Matter to the Devotions of their Posterity. I need not remark the beautiful Spirit of Poetry, which runs through this whole Hymn, nor the Holiness of that Resolution with which it concludes.

Having already mentioned those Speeches which are assigned to the Persons in this Poem, I proceed to the Description which the Poet [gives] of Raphael. His Departure from before the Throne, and the Flight thro' the Choirs of Angels, is finely imaged. As Milton every where fills his Poem with Circumstances that are marvellous and astonishing, he describes the Gate of Heaven as framed after such a manner, that it open'd of it self upon the Approach of the Angel who was to pass through it.

Of Heaven arriv'd, the Gate self open'd wide,
On golden Hinges turn'd, as by Word Divine, the Sovereign Archangel led fram'd*

The Poet here seems to have regarded two or three Passages in the 18th Iliad, as that in particular, where speaking of Vulcan, Homer says, that he had made twenty Tripodes running on Golden Wheels, which, upon occasion, might go of themselves to the Assembly of the Gods, and, when there was no more Use for them, return again after the same manner. Scaliger has rallied Homer very severely upon this Point, as M. Dacier has endeavoured to defend it. I will not pretend to determine, whether in this particular of Homer the Marvellous does not lose sight of the Probable. As the marvellous Workmanship of Milton's Gates is not so extraordinary as this of the Tripodes, so I am persuaded he would not have mentioned it, had not he been supported in it by a Passage in the Scripture, which speaks of Wheels in Heaven that had Life in them, and moved of themselves, or stood still, in conformity with the Cherubims, whom they accompanied.

There is no question but Milton had this Circumstance in his Thoughts, because in the following Book he describes the Chariot of the Messiah with living Wheels, according to the Plan in Ezekiel's Vision.

*—Forth rush'd with Whirlwind sound
The Chariot of paternal Deity Flash'd thick flames, Wheel with a wheel undrawn, Its self instruct with Spirit—*

I question not but Bossu, and the two Daciers, who are for imitating every thing that is censured in Homer, by something parallel in Holy Writ, would have been very well pleas'd had they thought of confronting Vulcan's Tripods with Ezekiel's Wheels.

Raphael's Descent to the Earth, with the Figure of his Person, is represented in very lively Colours. Several of the French, Italian and English Poets have given a Loose to their Imaginations in the Description of Angels. But I do not remember to have met with any so finely drawn, and so conformable to the Notions which are given of them in Scripture, as this in Milton. After having set him forth in all his Heavenly Plumage, and represented him as lighting upon the Earth, the Poet concludes his Description with a Circumstance, which is altogether new, and imagin'd with the greatest Strength of Fancy.

*—Like Man's Son he stood,
As if shool his Plumes, that Heavenly Fragrance fill'd
The Current wide—*

Raphael's Reception by the Guardian Angels, his passing through the Wilderness of Sweets, his distant Appearance to Adam, have all the Graces that Poetry is capable of bestowing. The Author afterwards gives us a particular Description of Eve in her Domestick Employments.

*So saying, with disparted sul Looks in haste
She turns, on hospitable Thro' ights intent, What Place to chuse for Delicacy best,
If hat order, so contriv'd, as not to mix Tastes, no' well join'd, unequal, but bring Taste after Taste, upbeld with kindest Change, Besters her then, &c.*

Though in this, and other Parts of the same Book, the Subject is only the Housewifery of our first Parent, it is set off with so many pleasing Images and strong Expressions, as make it none of the least agreeable Parts in this Divine Work.

The natural Majesty of Adam, and at the same time his submissive Behaviour to the Superior Being, who had vouchsafed to be his Guest, the solemn Hail which the Angel bestows upon the Mother of Mankind, with the Figure of Eve ministering at the Table, rare Circumstances which deserve to be admired

Raphael's Behaviour is every way suitable to the Dignity of his Nature, and to that Character of a sociable Spirit, with which the Author has so judiciously introduced him. He had received Instructions to converse with Adam, as one Friend converses with another, and to warn him of the Enemy, who was contriving his Destruction. Accordingly he is represented as sitting down at Table with Adam, and eating of the Fruits of Paradise. The Occasion naturally leads him to his Discourse on the Food of Angels. After having thus entered into Conversation with Man upon more indifferent Subjects, he warns him of his Obedience, and makes natural Transition to the History of that fallen Angel, who was employ'd in the Circumvention of our first Parents.

Had I followed Monsieur Bosart's Method in my first Paper of Milton, I should have dated the Action of Paradise Lost from the Beginning of Raphael's Speech in this Book, as he supposes the Action of the Epic to begin in the second Book of that Poem. I could allege many Reasons for my drawing the Action of the Epic rather from its immediate Beginning in the first Book, than from its remote Beginning in the second; and shew why I have considered the sacking of Troy as an Episode according to the common Acceptation of that Word. But as this would be a dry, unentertaining Piece of Criticism, and perhaps unnecessary to those who have read my first Paper, I shall not enlarge upon it. Whichever of the Notions be true, the Unity of Milton's Action is preserved according to either of them; whether we consider the Fall of Man in its immediate Beginning, as proceeding from the Resolutions taken in the infernal Council, or in its more remote Beginning, as proceeding from the first Revolt of the Angels in Heaven. The Occasion which Milton assigns for this Revolt, as it is founded on Hints in Holy Writ, and on the Opinion of some great Writers, so it was the most proper that the Poet could have made use of.

The Revolt in Heaven is described with great Force of Imagination and a fine Variety of Circumstances. The learned Reader cannot but be pleased with the Poet's Imitation of Homer in the last of the following Lines.

At length into the Limits of the North They came, and Satan took his Royal Seat High on a Hill, far blazing, as a Mount Rais'd on a Mount with Pyramids and Towers From Diamond Quarries torn, and Rocks of Gold,

The Palace of great Lucifer, (so call That Structure in the Dialect of Men Interpreted)

Homer mentions Persons and Things, which he tells us in the Language of the Gods are call'd by different Names from those they go by in the Language of Men. Milton has imitated him with his usual Judgment in this particular Place, wherein he has likewise the Authority of Scripture to justify him. The Part of Aldiel, who was the only Spirit that in this infinite Host of Angels preserved his Allegiance to his Maker, exhibits to us a noble Moral of religious Singularity. The Zeal of the Seraphim breaks forth in a becoming Warmth of Sentiments and Expressions, as the Character which is given us of him denotes the generous Scorn and Intrepidity which attends Heroic Virtue. The Author doubtless designed it as a Pattern to those who live among Mankind in their present State of Degeneracy and Corruption.

*So spake the Seraph Abdiel faithful few'd Among the faithless, faithful only he,
Among the num'erable false, unmov'd, Unshaken, unsecur'd, untir'd;
His Loyalty he left, his Love, his Zeal Nor Number, nor Example with him wrought To swerve from Truth, or change his constant Mind,*

*Flough single From amidst them forth he pass'd,
Long way, through [hostile] Scorn, 'till he was taunt'd*

*Superior, nor of Violence fear'd ought,
And, with retorted Scorn, his Back he turn'd On those proud Towers to rust Destruction doom'd.*

THAT useful Part of Learning which consists in Emendations, Knowledge of different Readings, and the like, is what in all Ages Persons extremely wise and learned have had in great Veneration. For this reason I cannot but rejoice at the following Epistle, which lets us into the true Author of the Letter to Mrs. Margaret Clark, part of which I did myself the Honour to publish in a former Paper. I must confess I do not naturally affect critical Learning; but finding myself not so much regarded as I am apt to flatter myself I may deserve from some professed Patrons of Learning, I could not but do myself the Justice to shew I am not a Stranger to such Erudition as they smile upon, if I were duly encouraged. However this only to let the World see what I could do, and shall not give my Reader any more of this kind, if he will forgive the Ostentation I shew at present.

SIR,
March 13, 1712
Upon reading your Paper of yesterday,² I took the Pains to look out a Copy I had formerly taken, and remembered to be very like your last ¹ This paper is No 328 in the original issue, but Steele omitted it from the reprint and gave in its place the paper by Addison which here stands next to it marked with the same number, 328. The paper of Addison's had formed no part of the original issue. Of the original No 328 Steele inserted a censure at the end of No 330.

'Letter Comparing them, I found they were the very same, and have, underwritten, sent you that Part of it which you say was torn off. I hope you will insert it, that Posterity may know 'twas Gabriel Bullock that made Love in that natural Stile of which you seem to be fond. But, to let you see I have other Manuscripts in the same Way, I have sent you Enclosed three Copies, faithfully taken by my own Hand from the Originals, which were writ by a Yorkshire gentle man of a good estate to Madam Mary, and an Uncle of hers, a Knight very well known by the most ancient Gentry in that and several other Counties of Great Britain. I have exactly followed the Form and Spelling. I have been credibly informed that Mr. William Bullock, the famous Comedian, is the descendant of this Gabriel, who begot Mr. William Bullock's great grandfather on the Body of the above-mentioned Mrs. Margaret Clark. But neither Speed, nor Baker, nor Selden, taking notice of it, I will not pretend to be positive. But desire that the letter may be reprinted, and what is here recovered may be in Italic.

Your daily Reader

To her I very much respect, Mrs. Margaret Clark

'Lovely, and oh that I could write loving Mrs. Margaret Clark. I pray you let Affection excuse Presumption. Having been so happy as to enjoy the Sight of your sweet Countenance and comely Body, sometimes when I had occasion to buy Trevel or I quorish Power at the apothecary's shop, I am so enamoured with you, that I can no more keep close my flaming Desire to become your Servant. And I am the more bold now to write to your sweet self, because I am now my own Man, and may mitche were I please, for my Father is taken away and now I am come to my living which is ten yard Land, and a House and there is never a yard Land in our Field but is as well worth ten Pound a Year, as a Thief's worth a Halter. And all my Brothers and Sisters are provided for besides I have good Household Stuff, though I say it, both Priss and Pewter, Linnens and Woollens, and though my House be thatched, yet if you and I mitche, it shall go hard but I will have one half of it slated. If you shall think well of this Motion, I will writ upon you as soon as my new Cloaths is made, and Hay Harvest is in. I could, though I say it, have good Matches in our Town, but my Mother (God's Peace be with her) charged me upon her Death Bed to marry a Gentlewoman, or a who had been well trained up in Serving and Cookery. I do not think but that if you and I can agree to marry, and lay our Means togther, I shall be made grand Jury-man ere two or three Years come about, and that will be a great Credit to us. If I could have got a Messenger for Sixpence I would have sent one on Purpose, and some Trifle or other for a Token of my Love.

² In some counties 20, in some 24, and in others 30 acres of Land

'but I hope there is nothing lost for that neither. So hope you will take this Letter in good Part, and insert it with what Care and Speed you can, I rest and remain,

'Sir
William, I hope that you are well. I write to let you know that I am in trouble about a Lady you see, and I do desire that you will be my friend for when I did come to see her at your hall, I was mightily abused. I would fain see you to topelish and shry would not let me go to you. But I desire that you will be our friend, for it is no dishonor neither for you nor she, for God did make us all. I wish that I might see you, for shry say that you are a good man and many doth wonder at it, but madam norton is abused and ceated two I believe. I might a had many a Lady, but I can have none but her with a good consons, for there is a God that know our hearts. If you and madam norton will come to York, there I shall meet you if God be willing and if you pleased so be not angier till you know the trutes of things.

I give my to me Lady, and to Mr. George Nelson Aysenby, and to madam norton, March, the 19th 1706

This is for madam Mary norton disforth Lady she went to York

'Madam Mary. Deare loving sweet Lady, I hope you are well. Do not go to London, for they will put you in the nunnery, and heed not Mrs. Lucy what she saith to you, for she will ly and ceat you go from to another Place, and we will gate wed so with speed. mind what I write to you, for if they gate you to London they will keep you there and so let us gate wed, and we will both go so if you go to London, you rueing your self so heed not what none of them saith to you let us gate wed, and we shall lie to gader any time. I will do any thing for you to my poore. I hope the devil will fult them all, for a hellish Company there be from there cursed trick and mischief ways good lord bless ana deliver both you and me.

I think to be at York the 24 day

This is for madam Mary norton to go to London for a Lady that belongs to disforth

'Madam Mary, I hope you are well. I am sorry that you went away from York deare loving sweet Lady, I writ to let you know that I do remain faithful and if can let me know where I can meet you, I will wed you, and I will do any thing to my poor for you are a good woman, and will be a loving Mistress. I am in trouble for you, so if you will come to York I will wed you so with speed come, and I will have none but you so, sweet love, heed not what to

'sray to me, and with speed come heed not what
'none of them say to you, your Maid makes you

Mr SPECTATOR,

'AS I believe this is the first Complaint that 'ever was made to you of this nature, so
'you are the first Person I ever could prevail upon 'my self to try it before When I tell you I have 'a healthy vigorous Constitution, a plentiful State,
'no inordinate Desires, and am married to a 'virtuous lovely Woman, who neither wants Wit
'nor Good Nature, and by whom I have a numer'ous Offspring to perpetuate my Family, you will 'naturally conclude me a happy Man. But, not'withstanding these promising Appearances, I am 'so far from it, that the prospect of being ruin'd
'and undone, by a sort of Extravagance which of 'late Years is in a less degree crept into every 'fashionable Family, deprives me of all the Com'forts of my life, and renders me the most anxious 'miserable Man on Earth My Wife, who was 'the only Child and darling Care of an indulgent
'Mother, employ'd her early Years in learning all 'those Accomplishments we generally understand
'by good Breeding and polite Education She 'sings, dances, plays on the Lute and Harpsicord,
'paints prettily, is a perfect Mistress of the 'French Tongue, and has made a considerable 'Progress in Italian She is besides excellently
'skill'd in all domestick Sciences, as Preserving,
'Pickling, Pastry, making Wines of Fruits of our 'own Growth, Embroidering, and Needleworks
'of every Kind Hitherto you will be apt to think 'there is very little Cause of Complaint but sus'pend your Opinion till I have further explain'd
'my self, and then I make no question you will 'come over to mine You are not to imagine I 'find fault that she either possesses or takes de'light in the Exercise of those Qualifications I 'just now mention'd 'tis the immoderate Fonde-
'ness she has to them that I lament, and that 'what is only design'd for the innocent Amuse'ment and Recreation of Life, is become the 'whole Business and Study of her's The six 'Months we are in Town (for the Year is equally 'divided between that and the Country) from al'most Break of Day till Noon, the whole Morn'ing is laid out in practising with her several Mas'ters and to make up the Losses occasion'd by

'her Absence in Summer, every Day in the Week
'their Attendance is requir'd and as they all are 'People eminent in their Professions, their Skill 'and Time must be recompens'd accordingly So 'how far these Articles extend, I leave you to 'judge Lining, one would think, is no ex'pensive Diversion, but as she manages the Ma'ter, 'tis a very considerable Addition to her Dis'bursements Which you will easily believe, when 'you know she prints Lines for all her I amle Ac'quaintance, and draws all her Relations Pictures
'in Miniature the first must be mounted by no 'body but Colmar, and the other set by no body
'but Charles Blather What follows, is still 'much worse than the former for, as I told you,
'she is a great Artist at her Needle, 'tis incredible
'what Sums she expends in Embroidery For be'sides what is appropriated to her personal Use,
'as Mantua's, Petticoats, Stomachers, Handker'chiefs, Purse, Pin cushions, and Working 'Aprons, she keeps four French Protections con'tinually employ'd in making divers Pieces of 'superfluous Furniture, as Quilts, Toilets, Hang'ings for Closets, Beds, Window Curtains, ea y
'Chairs, and Tabourets Nor have I any hopes 'of ever reclaiming her from this Extravagance,
'while she obstinately persists in thinking it a
'not able piece of good Housewifery, because they 'are made at home, and she has had some share 'in the Performance There would be no end of 'relating to you the Particulars of the annual 'Charge, in furnishing her Store-Room with a 'Profusion of Pickles and Preserves for she is 'not contented with having every thing, unless it
'be done every way, in which she consults an 'Hereditary Book of Receipts for her female 'Ancestors have been always fund for good
'Housewifery, one of whom is made immortal, by 'giving her Name to an Eye-Water and two sorts 'of Puddings I cannot undertake to recite all 'her medicinal Preparations, as Sykes Cere-
'cloths, Powders, Confects, Cordials, Ratafia, 'Persico, Orange flower, and Cherry Brandy, to'gether with innumerable sorts of Simple Waters
'But there is nothing I try so much to Heart, as
'that detestable Catalogue of counterfeit Wines,
'which derive their Names from the Plants, Herbs,
'or Trees of whose Juices they are chiefly com'pounded They are lousesome to the Taste, and 'pernicious to the Health and as they seldom
'survive the Year, and then are thrown away,
'under a false Pretence of Frugality, I may as-
'firm they stand me in more than if I entertain'd
'all our Visitors with the best Burgundy and 'Champaign Coffee, Chocolate, Green, Im'perial, Pecco, and Bohe Tea seem to be Trifles
'but when the proper Appurtenances of the Ter-
'rable are added, they swell the Account higher 'than one would imagine I cannot conclude 'without doing her Justice in one Article where 'her Frugality is so remarkable, I must not deny 'her the Merit of it, and that is in relation to her 'Children, who are all confin'd, both Boys and 'Girls, to one large Room in the remotest Part of 'the House, with Bolts on the Doors and Bars to 'the Windows, under the Care and Tuition of an 'old Woman, who had been dry Nurse to her 'Grandmother This is their Residence all the 'Year round, and as they are never allow'd to appear, she prudently thinks it needless to be at any Expence in Apparel or Learning. Her eldest Daughter to this day would have neither read nor writ, if it had not been for the Butler, who being the Son of a Country Attorney, has taught her such a Hand as is generally used for engraving Bills in Chancery. By this time I have sufficiently tired your Patience with my domestic Grievances, which I hope you will agree could not well be contain'd in a narrower Compass, when you consider what a Paradox I undertook to maintain in the Beginning of my Epistle, and which manifestly appears to be but too melancholy a Truth. And now I heartily wish the Relation I have given of my Misfortunes may be of Use and Benefit to the Publick. By the Example I have set before them, the truly virtuous Wives may learn to avoid those Errors, which have so unhappily misled mine, and which are visibly these three. First, in mistaking the proper Objects of her Esteem, and fixing her Affections upon such things as are only the Trappings and Decorations of her Sex. Secondly, in not distinguishing what becomes the different Stages of Life. And, Lastly, The Abuse and Corruption of some excellent Qualities, which, if circumscib'd within just Bounds, would have been the Blessing and Prosperity of her Family, but by a vicious Extreme are like to be the Ruine and Destruction of it.

Ire tamen resta', Numa quo devent et Aeneas
Hor

MY Friend Sir ROGER DE COVERLEY told me the other Night, that he had been reading my Paper upon Wastefulness, in which, says he, there are a great many ingenious Inquiries. He told me at the same time, that he observed I had promised another Paper upon the Tombs, and that he should be glad to go and see them with me, not having visited them since he had read History. I could not at first imagine how this came into the Knight's Head, till I recollected that he had been very busy all last Summer upon Baker's Chronicle, which he has quoted several times in his Disputes with Sir ABRAHAM FREEMANTLE since his last coming to Town. Accordingly I promised to call upon him the next Morning, that we might go together to the Abby.

I found the Knight under his Butler's Hands, who always serves him. He was no sooner Dressed, than he called for a Glass of the Widow Trueby's Water, which he told me he always drank before he went abroad. He recommended me to a Dram of it at the same time, with so much Heartiness, that I could not forbear drinking it. As soon as I had got it down, I found it very unpalatable upon which the Knight observing that I [had] made several very Faces, told me that he knew I should not like it at first, but that it was the best thing in the World against the Stone or Gravel.

I could have wished indeed that he had acquainted me with the Virtues of it sooner, but it was too late to complain, and I knew what he had done was out of Good will. Sir ROGER told me further, that he looked upon it to be very good for a Man whilst he staid in Town, to keep off Infection, and that he got together a Quantity of it upon the first News of the Sickness being at Dantzick. When of a sudden turning short to one of his Servants, who stood behind him, he bid him call [?] Hickney Cough, and take care it was an elderly Man that drove it.

He then resumed his Discourse upon Mrs Truuby's Water, telling me that the Widow Truuby was one who did more good than all the Doctors and Apothecaries in the County. That she distilled every Poppy that grew within five Miles of her, that she distributed her Water gratis among all Sorts of People, to which the Knight added, that she had a very great Jointure, and that the whole Country would soon have it a Match between him and her, and truly, says Sir ROGER, if I had not been engaged, perhaps I could not have done better.

His Discourse was broken off by his Man's telling him he had called a Coach. Upon our going to it, after having cast his Eye upon the Wheels, he asked the Coachman if his Axeltree was good, upon the Fellow's telling him he would warrant it, the Knight turned to me, told me he looked like an honest Man, and went in without further Ceremony.

We had not gone far, when Sir ROGER popping out his Head, called the Coach man down from his Box, and upon his presenting himself at the Window, asked him if he smoked. As I was considering what this would end in, he bid him stop by the way at my good Tobaccoists, and take in a Roll of their best Virginia. Nothing material happen'd in the remaining part of our Journey, till we were set down at the West end of the Abby.

As we went up the Body of the Church, the Knight pointed at the Trophies upon one of the new Monuments, and cry'd out, A brave Man, I warrant him! Passing afterwards by Sir Cloudsly Shovel's Tomb, he flung his Hand that way and cry'd Sir Cloudsly Shovel! a very gallant Man! As we stood before Busby's Tomb, the Knight utter'd himself again after the same Manner, Dr Busby, a great Man! he whipp'd my Grandfather a very great Man! I should have gone to him myself, if I had not been a Blockhead. I a very great Man!

We were immediately conducted into the little Chappel on the right hand. Sir ROGER planting himself at our Historian's Elbow, was very attentive to every thing he said, particularly to the Account he gave us of the Lord who had cut off the King of Morocco's Head. Among several other Figures, he was very well pleas'd to see the Statesman Cecil upon his Knees, and, concluding them all to be great Men, was conducted to the Figure which represents that Martyr to good Housewifery, who died by the prick of a Needle. Upon our Interpreter's telling us, that she was a Maid of Honour to Queen Elizabeth, the Knight was very inquisitive into her Name and Family, and after having regarded her Finger for some time, I wonder, says he, that Sir Richard Baker has said nothing of her in his Chronicle

We were then convey'd to the two Coronation-Chairs, where my old Friend, after having heard that the Stone underneath the most ancient of them, which was brought from Scotland, was called Jacob's Pillar, sat himself down in the Chair and looking like the Figure of an old Gothick King, asked our Interpreter, What Authority they had to say, that Jacob had ever been in Scotland? The Fellow, instead of returning him an Answer, told him, that he hoped his Honour would pay his Forfeit. I could observe Sir ROGER a little ruffled upon being thus reprimanded but our Guide not insisting upon his Demand, the Knight soon recovered his good Humour, and whispered in my Ear, that if WILL WIMBLE were with us, and saw those two Chairs, it would go hard but he would get a Tobacco Stopper out of one or t other of them

Sir ROGER, in the next Place, laid his Hand upon Edward the Third's Sword, and leaning upon the Pommel of it, gave us the whole History of the Black Prince concluding, that in Sir Richard Baker's Opinion, Edward the Third was one of the greatest Princes that ever sate upon the English Throne

We were then shewn Edward the Confessor's Tomb, upon which Sir ROGER acquainted us, that he was the first who touched for the Evil, and afterwards Henry the Fourth's, upon which he shook his Head, and told us there was fine Reading in the Casualties in that Reign

Our Conductor then pointed to that Monument where there is the Figure of one of our English Kings without an Head and upon giving us to know, that the Head, which was of beaten Silver, had been stolen away several Years since. Some Whig, I'll warrant you, says Sir ROGER, you ought to lock up your Kings better they will carry off the Body too, if you don't take care

THE glorious Names of Henry the Fifth and Queen Elizabeth gave the Knight great Opportunities of shining, and of doing Justice to Sir Richard Baker, who, as our Knight observed with some Surprise, had a great many Kings in him, whose Monuments he had not seen in the Abby

For my own part, I could not but be pleased to see the Knight shew such an honest Passion for the Glory of his Country, and such a respectful Gratitude to the Memory of its Princes

I must not omit, that the Benevolence of my good old Friend, which flows out towards every one he converses with, made him very kind to our Interpreter, whom he looked upon as an extraordinary Man for which reason he shook him by the Hand in parting, telling him, that he should be very glad to see him at his Lodgings in Norfolk-buildings, and talk over these Matters with him more at leisure

THE following Letters, written by two very considerate Correspondents, both under twenty Years of Age, are very good Arguments of the Necessity of taking into Consideration the many Incidents which affect the Education of Youth

SIR,

'I have long expected, that in the Course of your Observations upon the several Parts of human Life, you would one time or other fall upon a Subject, which, since you have not, I take the liberty to recommend to you. What I mean, is the Patronage of young modest Men to such as are able to countenance and introduce them into the World. For want of such Assistances, a Youth of Merit languishes in Obscurity or Poverty, when his Circumstances are low, and runs into Riot and Excess when his Fortunes are plentiful. I cannot make my self better understood, than by sending you an History of my self, which I shall desire you to insert in your Paper, it being the only Way I have of expressing my Gratitude for the highest Obligations imaginable

I am the Son of a Merchant of the City of London, who, by many Losses, was reduced from a very luxuriant Trade and Credit to very narrow Circumstances, in Comparison to that of his former Abundance. This took away the Vigour of his Mind, and all manner of Attention to a Fortune, which he now thought desperate, insomuch that he died without a Will, having before buried my Mother in the midst of his other Misfortunes. I was sixteen Years of Age when I lost my Father, and an Estate of £200 a Year came into my Possession, without Friend or Guardian to instruct me in the Management or Enjoyment of it. The natural Consequence of this was, (though I wanted no Director, and soon had Fellows who found me out for a smart young Gentleman, and led me into all the Debaucheries of which I was capable) that my Companions and I could not well be supplied without my running in Debt, which I did very frankly, till I was arrested, and conveyed with a Guard strong enough for the most desperate Assassine, to a Bayliff's House, where I lay four Days, surrounded with very merry, but not very agreeable Company. As soon as I had extricated my self from this shameful Confinement, I reflected upon it with so much Horror, that I deserted all my old Acquaintance, and took Chambers in an Inn of Court, with a Resolution to study the Law with all possible Application. But I trifled away a whole Year in looking over a thousand Intricacies, without I riend to apply to in any Case of Doubt so that I only lived there among Men, as little Children are sent to School before they are capable of Improvement, only to be out of harm's way. In the midst of this State of Suspence, not knowing how to dispose of my self, I was sought for by a Relation of mine, who, upon observing a good Inclination in me, used me with great Familiarity, and carried me to his Seat in the Country. When I came there, he introduced me to all the good Company in the County, and the great Obligations I have to him for this kind Notice and Resolute with him ever since, has made so strong an Impression upon me, that he has an Authority of a Father over me, founded upon the Love of a Brother. I have a good Study of books, a good Stable of Horses always at my command, and tho' I am not now quite eighteen Years of Age, I am familiar Converse on his Part, and a strong Inclination to exert my self on mine. I have had an effect upon me that makes me acceptable wherever I go. Thus, Mr SPECTATOR, by this Gentleman's Favour and Patronage, it is my own fault if I am not wiser and richer every day I live. I speak this as well by subscribing the initial Letters of my Name to thank him, as to incite others to an Imitation of his Virtue. It would be a worthy Work to shew what great Charities are to be done with it Experience and how many noble Actions are lost out of Indifference in Persons capable of performing them if they were put in mind of it. If a Gentleman of Figure in a County would make his Family a Pattern of Sobriety, good Sense and Integrity, and would kindly endeavour to influence the Education and growing Prospects of the younger Gentry about him, I am apt to believe it would save him a great deal of male Heer on a publick Occasion, and render him the Leader of his Country from their Gratitude to him, instead of being a Slave to their Riots and Tumults in order to be made their Representative. The same thing might be recommended to all who have made any Progress in any Part of Education, or arrived at any Degree in a Profession, others may gain Preferment and Fortunes from their Patrons, but I have, I hope, received from me good Habits and Virtues. I repeat to you Sir, my Request to print this, in return for all the Evil an helpless Orphan shall ever escape, and all the Good he shall receive in this Life, which are wholly owing to this Gentleman's Favour to me.

SIR,
Your most obed^t & aff^d M^t Servant, S P

MR SPECTATOR,
I am a Lad of about fourteen. I finished my Pleasure in Learning. I have been at the Latin School four Years. I don't know I ever played truant. I neglected any Task my Master set me in my Life. I think on what I read in School as I go home at noon and night and exult in it, that I have often gone half a mile out of my way, not minding, whither I went. Our Maid told me she often hears me talk Latin in my sleep. And I dream two or three Nights in the Week I am reciting Juvenal and Horace. My Father seems as well pleased with my Performances as any Boy is in the same Class. I tell you, if I had my own Mind, I would choose rather to be a Scholar, than a Prince with Learning. I have a very good affectionate Father, but tho' very rich, yet so mighty near that he thinks much of the Charges of my Education. He often tells me, he believes my Schooling will run him that I cost him God knows what in Books. I tremble to tell him I want more. I am forced to keep my Pocket Money, and lay it out for a Book now and then, that he don't know of. He has ordered my Master to buy no more Books for me, but says he will buy them himself. I asked him for Heron's eighth Day, and he told me in a Trice, he did not believe I was fit for it, but only my Master had a Mind to make him think I had got a great way in my Learning. I am sometimes a Month behind other Boys in getting the Books my Master gives Orders for. All the Boys in the School but I, have the Greek Authors in Latin Perseus, gilt and lettered on the back. My Father is often reckoning up how long I have been in School, and tells me he fears I do little good. My Father's Carriage so discourages me, that he makes me grow dull and melancholy. My Master wonders what is the matter with me, I am afraid to tell him for he is a Man that loves to encourage Learning, and would be apt to chide my Father, and not knowing my Father's Temper, may make him worse. But, if you have any Love for Learning, I beg you would give me some Instructions in this case, and I persuade Parents to encourage their Children when they find their diligent and desirous of Learning. I have heard some Parents say, they would do any thing for their Children, if they would but mend their Learning. I would be glad to be in the place. Dear Sir, pardon my boldness. If you will but consider and pay my case, I will pray for your Prosperity as long as I live.

I am a Slave

MR SPECTATOR,
The attention you showed yesterday would have been paid me had you provided better for the two Liveries of my Paper, and placed in one the letter R, in the other A, and meantime I gave it, as you wish, A Word to the wise.
I am your most humble Servant,

WHEN I was last with my friend Sir ROBERT, in the 12th of 1712, I observed that he stood longer than ordinary before the List of venerable old Man I was at a loss to guess the Reason of it, when after some time he pointed to the Figure, and asked me if I did not think that our Forefathers look'd much wiser in their Beards than we do without them? For my part, says he, when I am walking in my Gallery in the Country, and see my Ancestors, who many of them died before they were of my Age, I cannot forbear regarding them as so many old Patriarchs, and at the same time looking upon myself as an idle Smock-fac'd young Fellow I love to see your Abrahams, your Isaacs, and your Jacobs, as we have them in old Pieces of Tapestry, with Beards below their Girdles, that cover half the Hangings The Knight added, if I would recommend Beards in one of my Papers, and endeavour to restore human Faces to their Ancient Dignity, that upon a Month's warning he would undertake to lead up the Fashion himself in a pair of Whiskers

I smiled at my Friend's Fancy, but after we parted, could not forbear reflecting on the Metamorphoses our Faces have undergone in this Particular

The Beard, conformable to the Notion of my Friend Sir ROGER, was for many Ages look'd upon as the Type of Wisdom. Lucian more than once rallies the Philosophers of his time, who endeavour'd to rival one another in Beard, and represents a learned Man who stood for a Professorship in Philosophy, as unqualify'd for it by the Shortness of his Beard

Aelian, in his Account of Zoilus, the pretended Critick, who wrote against Homer and Plato, and thought himself wiser than all who had gone before him, tells us that this Zoilus had a very long Beard that hung down upon his Breast, but no Hair upon his Head, which he always kept close shaved, regarding, it seems, the Hairs of his Head as so many Suckers, which if they had been suffer'd to grow, might have drawn away the Nourishment from his Chin, and by that means have starved his Beard

I have read somewhere that one of the Popes refus'd to accept an Edition of a Saint's Works, which were presented to him, because the Saint in his Effigies before the Book, was drawn without a Beard

We see by these Instances what Homage the World has formerly paid to Beards, and that a Barber was not then allow'd to make those Depredations on the Faces of the Learned, which have been permitted him of later Years

Accordingly several wise Nations have been so extremely jealous of the least Ruffle offer'd to their Beard, that they seem to have fixed the Point of Honour principally in that Part The Spaniards were wonderfully tender in this Particular Don Quevedo, in his third Vision on the Last Judgment, has carry'd the Humour very far, when he tells us that one of his vain glorious Countrymen, after having receiv'd Sentence, was taken into custody by a couple of evil Spirits, but that his Guides happening to disorder his Mustaches, they were forced to recompose them with a Pair of Curling-Irons before they could get him to file off

If we look into the History of our own Nation, we shall find that the Beard flourish'd in the Saxon

Heptarchy, but was very much discourag'd under the Norman Line It shot out, however, from time to time, in several Reigns under different Shapes The last Effort it made seems to have been in Queen Mary's Days, as the curious Reader may find, if he pleases to peruse the Figures of Cardinal Poole, and Bishop Gardiner, tho' at the same time, I think it may be question'd, if Zeal against Popery has not induced our Protestant Painters to extend the Beards of these two Persecutors beyond their natural Dimensions, in order to make them appear the more terrible

I find but few Beards worth taking notice of in the Reign of King James the First

During the Civil Wars there appeared one, which makes too great a Figure in Story to be passed over in Silence, I mean that of the redoubt'd Hudibras, an Account of which Butler has transmitted to Posterity in the following Lines

*His lawny Beard was th' equal Grace Both of his Wisdom, and his Face, In Cut and Dye so like a Tyle,
A sudden View it would beguile
The upper Part thereof was Wiry, The nether Orange mixt with Grey*

The Whisker continu'd for some time among us after the Expiration of Beards, but this is a Subject which I shall not here enter upon, having discussed it at large in a distinct Treatise, which I keep by me in Manuscript, upon the Mustachoe

If my Friend Sir ROGER's Project, of introducing Beards, should take effect, I fear the Luxury of the present Age would make it a very expensive Fashion There is no question but the Baux would soon provide themselves with false ones of the lightest Colours, and the most immoderate Lengths A fair Beard, of the Tapestry-Size Sir ROGER seems to approve, could not come under twenty Guineas The famous Golden Beard of Aesculapins would hardly be more valuable than one made in the Extravagance of the Fashion

Besides, we are not certain that the Ladies would not come into the Mode, when they take the Air on Horse-back They already appear in Hats and Feathers, Coats and Periwigs, and I see no reason why we not suppose that they would have their Riding-Beards on the same Occasion

I may give the Moral of this Discourse in another Paper X

Munus aptus acutus Narbibus horum hominum — Hor

Dear Short-Face,

I N your Speculation of Wednesday last, you have given us some Account of that worthy Society of Brutes the Mollocks, wherein you have particularly specify'd the ingenious Performance of the Lion Tipplers, the Dancing-Masters, and the Tumblers But as you acknowledge you had not then a perfect History of the whole Club, you might very easily omit one of 'the most notable Species of it, the Swatters, which may be reckoned a sort of Dancing-Masters too. It is to see us the Customs for half a do, or more of these well-disposed Swatters, as soon as they have melted the Person upon whom they design the Favour of a Sweat, to whip out the Swords, and holding them parallel to the Honour, they describe a sort of Magic Circle round about him with the Point. As soon as this Piece of Conjurat[i]on is perform'd and the Patient without doubt already beginning to wax warm, to forward the Operation, that Member of the Circle towards whom he is to turn his Back, first, runs his Sword directly in that Part of the Patient wherein School boys are punish'd, and, as it is very natural to imagine this will soon make him sick about to vomit, every Gentleman does himself the same Justice as often as he receives the Assault. After this he has gone two or three times to it, and the Patient is thought to have sweat sufficiently, he is very handsomely rubb'd down by some Attendants, who carry with them Instruments for that purpose, and so is discharged. This Relation I had from a Friend of mine, who has lately been under this Discipline. He tells me he had the Honour to discharge the Labour himself, not without the Applause and Acclamations both of his Imperial Majesty, and the whole Army, tho' I dare say, neither I or any of his Acquaintance ever dream he would have merited his Reputation by his Activity.

'I can assure you Sir, since I was very near being oblig'd to have given you a faithful and particular Account of this Discipline, I may so call it my self, for going the other night about, Fleet Street, and having one of our way, just enter'd into Drury Lane with a winding, Female who was travelling the same Way, a couple of Fellows directed towards us, drew the Swords, and I cre'd on to each other, A Sweat! A Sweat! Whereas, I suspect they were some of the Leaders of the Lagna. I also drew my Sword, and demand'd a Park. But his answer would be great for me, and perceive others behind him then flung off with great diligence to take me in flank. I began to vent for fear of being forc'd to it, but very suddenly betay myself to a Pint of Heel, who had had good Reason to be sure would do me Justice. I instantly for possession of a very fine Corner in a neighbouring Alley that lay in my Rear, which Post I made I should have half a hour with great Firmness and Resolution, tho' not letting this Success so far overcome me as to make me unmindful of the Circumstances on that it is necessary to be observed upon, advancing again towards the Street by which Pride ceas'd a good Management I made a handsome and orderly Retreat, having suffer'd no other Damage in this Action than the Loss of my Plume, and the Dislocation of one of my Shoulders, which last I am just now inform'd is in a fair way of Recovery. These Swatters, by what I can learn from my Friend, and by as near a View as I was able to take of them my self, seem to me to have at present put a rule kind of Discipline amongst them. It is probable, if you would take a little Pains with them they might be brought into better order. But I'll leave that to your own Discretion, and will only add, that if you think it worth while to exert this by way of Caution to those who have a mind to preserve their Suits whole from the sort of Copping, and tell them at the same time the Hazard of dealing with Dick Walthers, you will perhaps oblige others, as well as

Jack Lightfoot.*

'P. S. My Friend will have me acquaint you, that though he would not willingly detract from the Merit of that extraordinary Strolch Man Mr. Spratly, yet it is his real Opinion, that some of those Fellows who are employ'd as Rubbers to this new fashioned Ragnio, have struck as bold Strokes as ever he did in his life.

'I had sent the for it twenty Hours sooner, if I had not had the Misfortune of being in a great debt about it. The Orthography of the word Ragnio I consulted several Dictionaries, but found no relief, at last having recourse both to the Ragnio in Stregate Street, and to that in Clarkey Street, and finding, the original Manuscripts upon the Sign posts of each to agree literally with my own spelling, I returned home, full of Satisfaction, in order to dispatch this Epistle.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'As you have taken most of the Circumstances of human Life into your Consideration, we, the undersigned, thought it not improper for us also to represent to you our Condition. We are three Ladies who live in the Country, and the greatest Improvements we make is by reading. We have taken a small Journal of our Lives, and find it extremely opposite to your last Thursday's Speculation. We rise by seven, and pass the beginning of each Day in Devotion, and looking into those Affairs that fall within the Occurrences of a retired Life. In the Afternoon we sometimes enjoy the Company of some Friend or Neighbour, or else we work or rest. At Night we retire to our Chambers, and take Leave of each other for the whole Night till ten of Clock. We take particular Care never to be out of a Sunday. Mr SPECTATOR, We are all very good Maids, I it is immodest of Character, which we think more laudable, than of being very good Wives. If any of your Correspondents enquire for a spouse for an honest Country Gentleman whose Estate is not dipp'd, and wants a Wife that can save half his Revenue, and yet make a better Use than any of his Neighbours of the same Estate with finer bred Women, you shall have further notice from

No 333] Saturday, March 22, 1712 [Addison

—local in Certamina Divos—Virg

WE are now entering upon the Sixth Book of Paradise Lost, in which the Poet describes the Battle of Angels, having roused his Reader's Expectation, and prepared him for it by several Passages in the preceding Books. I omitted quoting these Passages in my Observations on the former Books, having purposely reserved them for the opening of this, the Subject of which gave occasion to them. The Author's Imagination was so inflam'd with this great Scene of Action, that wherever he speaks of it, he rises, if possible, above himself. Thus where he mentions Satan in the Beginning of his Poem

—*Him the Almighty Power
Hurld headlong flaming from the Ethereal Sky, With hideous ruin and combustion, do on To bottomless Perdition, there to dwell In Adamantine Chains and penal Fire, Who durst defy th' Omnipotent to Arms*

We have likewise several noble Hints of it in the Infernal Conference

*O Prince! O Chief of many throned Powers, That led th' unbattled Seraphim to War,
Too well I see and rue the dire Event,
That with sad Overthrow and foul Defeat Hath lost us Heav'n, and all this mighty Host In horrible Destruction laid thus low But see! the angry Victor has recall'd His Ministers of Vengeance and Pursuit, Back to the Gates of Heav'n. The sulphurous Hail*

*Shot after us in Storm, o'er to us, hath laid The fiery Surge, that from the Precipice Of Heaven receiv'd us falling, and the Thunder, Wing'd with red Lightning and impetuous Rage, Perhaps hath spent his Shafts, and ceases no
To bellow through the vast and boundless Deep*

There are several other very sublime Images on the same Subject in the First Book, as also in the Second

*What when we fled again pursu'd and strook With Heav'n's afflicting Thunder, and besought
The Deep to shelter us, this Hell then seem'd A Refuge from those Wounds—*

In short, the Poet never mentions anything of this Battle but in such Images of Greatness and Terror as are suitable to the Subject. Among several others I cannot forbear quoting that Passage, where the Power, who is described as presiding over the Chaos, speaks in the Third Book

*Thus Satan, and him thus the Anarch old With faulting Speech, and Visage uncompos'd, Answer'd, I know thee, Stranger, who thou art,
That mighty leading Angel, who of late* and Green (meaning at the words 'render them accomplished') to which a conspicuous place was given, with original as 'not by Steele, in No 314

Made Head against Heaven's King, tho' overthrown

I saw and heard, for such a numerous Host Fled: not in silence through the frighted Deep With Ruin upon Ruin, Rout on Rout, Confusion worse confounded, and Heav'n's Gates Pour'd out by Millions her victorious Bands Pursuing—

It requir'd great Pregnancy of Invention, and Strength of Imagination, to fill this Battle with such Circumstances as should raise and astonish the Mind of the Reader, and at the same time in Exactness of Judgment, to avoid every thing that might appear light or trivial. Those who look into Homer, are surpris'd to find his Battles still rising one above another, and improving in Horror, to the Conclusion of the Iliad. Milton's Fight of Angels is wrought up with the same Beauty. It is usher'd in with such Signs of Wrath as are suitable to Omnipotence incensed. The first Engagement is carry'd on under a Cope of Fire, occasion'd by the Flights of innumerable burning Darts and Arrows, which are discharged from either Host. The second Onset is still more terrible, as it is filled with those artificial Thunders, which seem to make the Victory doubtful, and produce a kind of Consternation even in the good Angels. This is follow'd by the tearing up of Mountains and Promontories till, in the last place, the Messiah comes forth in the Fullness of Majesty and Terror. The Pomp of his Appearance amidst the Roarings of his Thunders, the Flashes of his Lightnings, and the Noise of his Chariot-Wheels, is described with the utmost Heights of Human Imagination.

There is nothing in the first and last Dry's Engagement which does not appear natural, and agreeable enough to the Ideas most Readers would conceive of a Fight between two Armies of Angels.

The second Dry's Engagement is apt to startle in Imagination, which has not been roused and qualify'd for such a Description, by the reading of the ancient Poets, and of Homer in particular. It was certainly a very bold Thought in our Author, to ascribe the first Use of Artillery to the Rebel Angels. But as such a pernicious Invention may be well suppos'd to have proceeded from such Authors, so it entered very properly into the Thoughts of that Being, who is all along describ'd as aspiring to the Majesty of his Maker. Such Engines were the only Instruments he could have made use of to imitate those Thunders, that in all Poetry, both sacred and profane, are represented as the Arms of the Almighty. The tearing up the Hills, was not altogether so daring a Thought as the former. We are, in some measure, prepar'd for such an Incident by the Description of the Grin's War, which we meet with among the Ancient Poets. What still made this Circumstance the more proper for the Poet's Use, is the Opinion of many learned Men, that the Table of the Grin's War, which makes so great a noise in Antiquity, [and gave birth to the sublimest Description in Hesiod's Works] is an Allegory founded upon this very Tradition of a Fight between the good and bad Angels.

It may, perhaps, be worth while to consider with what Judgment Milton, in this Narration, has avoided every thing that is mean and trivial in the Descriptions of the Latin and Greek Poets and at the same time improved every great Hint which he met with in their Works upon this Subject. Homer in that Passage, which Longinus has celebrated for its Sublimeness, and which Virgil and Ovid have copy'd after him, tells us, that the Giants threw Ossa upon Olympus, and Pelion upon Ossa. Heads in Epithet to Pelion (εἰσοσιφύλλον) which very much swells the Idea, by bringing up to the Reader's Imagination all the Woods that grew upon it. There is further a great Beauty in his singling out by Name these three remarkable Mountains, so well known to the Greeks. This last is such a Beauty as the Scene of Milton's War could not possibly furnish him with. Claudian, in his Fragment upon the Giants' War, has given full scope to that Wildness of Imagination which was natural to him. He tells us, that the Giants tore up whole Islands by the Roots, and threw them at the Gods. He describes one of them in particular taking up Lemnos in his Arms and whirling it to the Skies, with all Vulcan's Shop in the midst of it. Another tears up Mount Ida, with the River Euphrates, which ran down the Sides of it but the Poet, not content to describe him with this Mountain upon his Shoulders, tells us that the River flow'd down his Back, as he held it up in that Posture. It is visible to every judicious Reader, that such Ideas savour more of Burlesque, than of the Sublime. They proceed from a Wantonness of Imagination, and rather divert the Mind than astonish it. Milton has taken every thing that is sublime in these several Passages, and composes out of them the following great Image

From their Foundations loos'ning to and fro, They pluck'd the seated Hills, with all their Load, Rocks, Waters, Woods, and by the shaggy Tops Up-lifting bore them in their Hands

We have the full Majesty of Homer in this short Description, improv'd by the Imagination of Claudian, without its Puerilities.

I need not point out the Description of the fallen Angels seeing the Promontories hanging over their Heads in such a dreadful manner, with the other numberless Beauties in this Book, which are so conspicuous, that they cannot escape the Notice of the most ordinary Reader.

There are indeed so many wonderful Strokes of Poetry in this Book, and such a variety of Sublime Ideas, that it would have been impossible to have given them a place within the bounds of this Paper. Besides that, I find it in a great measure done to my hand at the End of my Lord Rochester's Essay on Untranslated Poetry. I shall refer my Reader thither for some of the Master Strokes in the Sixth Book of Paradise Lost, tho' at the same time there are many others which that noble Author has not taken notice of.

Milton, notwithstanding the sublime Genius he was Master of, has in this Book drawn to his Assistance all the Helps he could meet with among the Ancient Poets. The Sword of Michael, which makes so great a havoc among the bad Angels, was given him, we are told, out of the Armory of God.

—But the Sword
Of Michael from the Armory of God Was giv'n him temper'd so, that neither keen Nor solid might resist that Edge. It met
The Sword of Satan, with steep Force to smite Descending, and in half cut sheer —

This Passage is a Copy of that in Irgal, wherein the Poet tells us, that the Sword of Aeneas, which was given him by a Deity, broke into Pieces the Sword of Turnus, which came from a mortal Forge. As the Moral in this Place is divine, so by the way we may observe, that the bestowing on a Man who is favoured by Heaven such an allegorical Weapon, is very conformable to the old Eastern way of thinking. Not only Homer has made use of it, but we find the Jerish Hero in the Book of Maccabees, who had fought the Battels of the chosen People with so much Glory and Success, receiving in his Dream a Sword from the Hand of the Prophet Jeremiah. The following Passage, wherein Satan is described as wounded by the Sword of Michael, is an imitation of Homer.

*The grating Sword with discontinuous Wound Pass'd thro' him but th' Ethereal Substance clos'd
Not long drussible, and from the Gash
A Stream of Nectarous Humour issuing flow'd Sanguine, (such as celestial Spirits may bleed)
And all his Armour staid —*

Homer tells us in the same manner, that upon Dionides's wounding the Gods, there flow'd from the Wound an Ichor, or pure Kind of Blood, which was not bred from mortal Viands, and that tho' the Pain was exquisitely great, the Wound soon closed up and healed in those Beings who are vested with Immortality.

I question not but Milton in his Description of his furious Moloch flying from the Battel, and bellowing with the Wound he had received, had his Eye on Mars in the Iliad, who, upon his being wounded, is represented as retiring out of the Fight, and making an Outcry louder than that of a whole Army when it begins the Charge. Homer adds, that the Greeks and Trojans, who were engaged in a general Battel, were terrify'd on each side with the bellowing of this wounded Deity. The Reader will easily observe how Milton has kept all the Horror of this Image, without running into the Ridicule of it.

—Where the Might of Gabriel fought,
And with fierce Ensigns pierc'd the deep Array Of Moloch, furious King! who him defy'd,
And at his Chariot-wheels to drag him bound Threaten'd nor from the Holy One of Heaven Refrain'd his Tongue blasphemous but anon Down cloven to the Waste, with shatter'd Arms And uncouth Pain fed bellowing —

Milton has likewise raised his Description in this Book with many Images taken out of the poetical Parts of Scripture The Messiah's Chariot, as I have before taken notice, is formed upon a Vision of Ezekiel, who, as Grotius observes, has very much in him of Homer's Spirit in the Poetical Parts of his Prophecy

The following Lines in that glorious Commission which is given the Messiah to extirpate the Host of Rebel Angels, is drawn from a Sublime Passage in the Psalms

*Go then thou Mightiest in thy Father's Might !
Ascend my Chariot, guide the rapid Wheels That shake Heav'n's Basis, bring forth all my War,*

My Bow, my Thunder, my Almighty Arms, Gird on thy Sword on thy puissant Thigh

The Reader will easily discover many other Strokes of the same nature.

There is no question but Milton had heated his Imagination with the Fight of the Gods in Homer, before he enter'd upon this Engagement of the Angels Homer there gives us a Scene of Men, Heroes, and Gods, mix'd together in Battel Mars animates the contending Armies, and lifts up his Voice in such a manner, that it is heard distinctly as if all the Shouts and Confusion of the Fight Jupiter at the same time Thunders over their Heads, while Neptune raises such a Tempest, that the whole Field of Battel and all the Tops of the Mountains shake about them The Poet tells us, that Pluto himself, whose Habitation was in the very Center of the Earth, was so affrighted at the Shock, that he leapt from his Throne Homer afterwards describes Vulcan as pouring down a Storm of Fire upon the River Aanthus, and Minerva as throwing a Rock at Mars, who, he tells us, cover'd seven Acres in his Fall

As Homer has introduced into his Battel of the Gods every thing that is great and terrible in Nature, Milton has filled his Fight of good and bad Angels with all the like Circumstances of Horrour The Shout of Armies, the Rattling of Brazen Chariots, the Hurling of Rocks and Mountains, the Earthquake, the Fire, the Thunder, are all of them employ'd to lift up the Reader's Imagination, and give him a suitable Idea of so great an Action With what Art has the Poet represented the whole Body of the Earth trembling, even before it was created

*All Heaven resounded, and had Earth been then,
All Earth had to its Center shook —*

In how sublime and just a manner does he afterwards describe the whole Heaven shaking under the Wheels of the Messiah's Chariot, with that Exception to the Throne of God ?

*— Under his burning Wheels
The steadfast Empyrean shook throughout,
All but the Throne it self of God —*

Notwithstanding the Messiah appears clothed with so much Terror and Mystery, the Poet has still found means to make his Readers conceive an Idea of him, beyond what he himself was able to describe

Yet half his Strength he put not forth, but checkt

His Thunder in mud Volley, for he meant Not to destroy, but root them out of Heaven

In a Word, Milton's Genius, which was so great in it self, and so strengthened by all the helps of Learning, appears in this Book every way equal to his Subject, which was the most Sublime that could enter into the Thoughts of a Poet As he knew all the Arts of affecting the Mind, (he knew it was necessary to give¹) it certain Resting-places and Opportunities of recovering it self from time to time He has [therefore] with great Address interspersed several Speeches, Reflections, Similitudes, and the like Reliefs to diversify his Narration, and ease the Attention of [the²] Reader, that he might come fresh to his great Action, and by such a Contrast of Ideas, have a more lively taste of the nobler Parts of his Description

Voluisti, in suo Genere, unumquemque nostrum quasi quendam esse Roscum, dixisti-que non iam ea quæ recta essent probari, quam quæ prava sunt fastidi adhærere

Cicero de Gestu

IT is very natural to take for our whole Lives a light Impression of a thing which at first fell into Contempt with us for want of Consideration The real Use of a certain Qualification (which the wiser Part of Mankind look upon as at best an indifferent thing, and generally a frivolous Circumstance) shews the ill Consequence of such Prepossessions What I mean, is the Art, Skill, Accomplishment, or whatever you will call it, of Dancing I knew a Gentleman of great Abilities, who bewail'd the Want of this Part of his Education to the End of a very honourable Life He observ'd that there was not occasion for the common Use of great Talents that they are but seldom in Demand and that these very great Talents were often render'd useless to a Man for want of small Attainments. A good Mein (a becoming Motion, Gesture and Aspect) is natural to some Men, but even these would be highly more graceful in their Carriage, if what they do from the Force of Nature were confirm'd and heightened from the Force of Reason To one who has not at all considered it, to mention the Force of Reason on such a Subject, will appear fantastical, but when you have a little attended to it, an Assembly of Men will have quite another View and they will tell you, it is evident from plain and infallible Rules, why this Man with those beautiful Features, and well fashion'd Person, is not so agreeable as he who sits by him without any of those Advantages When we read, we do it without any exerted Act of Memory that presents the Shape of the Letters, but Habit makes us do it mechanically, without staying, like Children, to recollect and join those Letters. A Man who has not had the Regard of his Gesture in any part of his Education, will find himself unable to act with Freedom before new Company, as a Child that is but now learning would be to read without Hesitation. It is for the Advancement of the Pleasure we receive in being agreeable to each other in ordinary Life, that one would wish Dancing were generally understood as conducive as it really is to a proper Deportment in Matters that appear the most remote from it. A Man of Learning and Sense is distinguished from others as he is such that he never runs upon Points too difficult for the rest of the World, in like Manner the reaching out of the Arm and the most ordinary Motion discovers whether a Man ever learnt to know what is the true Harmony and Composure of his Limbs and Countenance. Whoever has seen Beeth in the Character of Pyrrhus, march to his Throne to receive Oristes, is convinced that majestick and great Conceptions are expressed in the very Step but perhaps, tho' no other Man could perform that Incident as well as he does, he himself would do it with a yet greater Elevation were he a Dancer. This is so dangerous a Subject to treat with Gravity, that I shall not to present enter into it any further but the Author of the following Letter has treated it in the Lacis he speaks of in such a Manner, that I am bound to him for a Resolution, that I will never hereafter think meanly of any thing, till I have heard what they who have another Opinion of it have to say in its Defence.

² [his]

Mr SPECTATOR,

'Since there are scarce any of the Arts or Sciences that have not been recommended to the World by the Pens of some of the Professors, Masters, or Lovers of them whereby the Usefulness, Excellence, and Benefit arising from them, both as to the speculative and practical Part, have been made publick, to the great Advantage and Improvement of such Arts and Sciences who should Dancing, an Art celebrated by the Ancients in so extraordinary a Manner, be totally neglected by the Moderns, and left destitute of any Pen to recommend its various Excellencies and substantial Merit to Mankind?

'The low Ebb to which Dancing is now fallen, is altogether owing to this Silence. The Art is esteem'd only as an amusing Trifle it lies altogether uncultivated, and is unhappily fallen under the Imputation of Illiterate and Mechanick. And as Terrace in one of his Prologues complains of the Rope dancers drawing all the Spectators from his Play so may we well say, that Capering and Tumbling is now preferred to, and supplies the Place of just and regular Dancing on our Theatres. It is therefore, in my opinion, a high time that some one should come in to its Assistance, and relieve it from the many gross and growing Errors that have crept into it, and over-cast its real Beauties and to set Dancing in its true light, would shew the Usefulness and Elegancy of it, with the Pleasure and Instruction produc'd from it and also lay down some fundamental Rules, that might so tend to the Improvement of its Professors, and Information of the Spectators, that the first might be the better enabled to perform and the latter render'd more capable of judging, what is (if there be any thing) valuable in this Art.

'To encourage therefore some ingenious Pen capable of so generous an Undertaking, and in some measure to relieve Dancing from the Disadvantages it at present lies under, I, who thereto dince, have attempted a small Treatise as an Essay towards an History of Dancing, in which I have enquired into its Antiquity, Original, and Use and shewn what Esteem the Ancients had for it. I have likewise considered the Nature and Perfection of all its several Parts, and how beneficial and delightful it is, both as a Qualification and an Exercise and endeavoured to answer all Objections that have been maliciously rais'd against it. I have proceeded to give an Account of the particular Dances of the Greeks and Romans, whether religious, warlike or civil and taken particular notice of that Part of Dancing relating to the ancient Stage, and in which the Pantomimes had so great a Share. Nor have I been wanting in giving an historical Account of some particular Masters excellent in this surprising Art. After which, I have advanced some Observations on the modern Dancing both as to the Stage, and that Part of it so absolutely necessary for the Qualification of Gentlemen and Ladies and have concluded with some short Remarks on the Origin and Progress of the Character by which Dances are writ down, as I communicated to one Master from another. If so ne great Genius after this would arise, and advance this Art to that Perfection it seems capable of receiving, what might not be expected from it? For if we consider the Origin of Arts and Sciences, we shall find that some of them took rise from Beginnings so mean and unpolishing, that it is very wonderful to think that ever such surprising Structures should have been rais'd upon such ordinary Foundations. But what cannot a great Genius effect? Who would have thought that the clamorous Noise of a Smith's Hammers should have given the first rise to Music? Yet Ancient in his second Book relates, that Pythagoras in passing by a Smith's Shop found that the Sounds proceeding from the Hammers were either more grave or acute, according to the different Weights of the Hammers. The Philosopher, to improve this Hint, suspends different Weights by Strings of the same Bigness, and found in like manner that the Sounds answer'd to the Weights. This being discover'd, he finds out those Numbers which produce Sounds that were Consonants. As, that two Strings of the same Substance and Tension the one being double the Length of the other, give that Interval which is called Diapason, or an Eighth the same was also effected from two Strings of the same Length and Size the one having four times the Tension of the other. By these Steps, from so mean a Beginning, did this great Man reduce, what was only before Noise, to one of the most delightful Sciences, by marry-

'ing it to the Mathematicks and by that means 'caused it to be one of the most abstract and 'demonstrative of Sciences Who knows there'fore but Motion, whether Decorous or Repre'sentative, may not (as it seems highly probable it 'may) be taken into consideration by some Person
'capable of reducing it into a regular Science,
'tho' not so demonstrative as that proceeding
'from Sounds, yet sufficient to entitle it to a Place
'among the magnify'd Arts

'Now, Mr SPECTATOR, as you have declared
'your self Visitor of Dancing Schools, and this 'being an Undertaking which more immediately
'respects them, I think my self indispensably 'obliged, before I proceed to the Publication of 'this my Essay, to ask your Advice, and hold it
'absolutely necessary to have your Approbation,
'and in order to recommend my Treatise to the 'Perusal of the Parents of such as learn to dance,
'as well as to the young Ladies, to whom, as 'Visitor, you ought to be Guardian

Respuere exemplar vitæ morumque iubebo Doctum imitatore, et veras hinc docere voces
Hor

MY Friend Sir ROGER DE COVERLEY, when we last met together at the Club, told me, that he had a great mind to see the new Tragedy, with me, insuring me at the same time, that he had not been at a Play these twenty Years The last I saw, said Sir ROGER, was the Committee, which I should not have gone to neither, had not I been told before hand that it was a good Church-of-England Comedy ¹ He then proceeded to enquire

of Addison's friend Ambrose Philips The art of packing a house to secure applause was also practised on the first night of the acting of this version of Andromaque

² The Committee, or the Faithful Irishman, was written by Sir Robert Howard soon after the Restoration, with for its heroes two Cavalier colonels, whose estates are sequestered, and their man Leg (Teague), an honest blundering Irishman The Cavaliers defy the Roundhead Committee, and 'the day may come,' says one of them,
'when those that suffer for their consciences and 'honour may be rewarded' Nobody who heard this from the stage in the days of Charles II could feel that the day had come Its comic Irishman kept the Committee on the stage, and in Queen Anne's time the thorough Tory still relished the stage caricature of the maintainers of the Commonwealth in Mr Dry with his greed, his poeisy, and private incontinence, his wife, who had been cook-maid to a gentleman, but takes all the State matters on herself, and their empty son Abel, who knows Parliament men and Sequestra-tors, and whose 'profound contemplations are 'caused by the conservation of his spirits for the nation's good'

of me who this Distrest Mother was and upon hearing that she was Hector's Widow, he told me that her Husband was a brave Man, and that when he was a School boy he had read his Life at the end of the Dictionary My Friend asked me, in the next place, if there would not be some danger in coming home late, in case the Mohocks should be Abroad I assure you, says he, I thought I had fallen into their Hands last Night for I observed two or three lusty black Men that follow'd me half way up Fleet-street, and mended their pace behind me, in proportion as I put on to get away from them You must know, continu'd the Knight with a Smile, I fancied they had a mind to hunt me, for I remember an honest Gentleman in my Neighbourhood, who was served such a trick in King Charles the Second's time for which reason he has not ventured himself in Town ever since I might have shown them very good Sport, had this been their Design for as I am an old Fox hunter, I should have turned and dodg'd, and have play'd them a thousand tricks they had never seen in their Lives before Sir ROGER added, that if these Gentlemen had any such Intention, they did not succeed very well in it for I threw them out, says he, at the End of Norfolk street, where I doubled the Corner, and got shelter in my Lodgings before they could imagine what was become of me However, says the Knight, if Captain SENTRY will make one with us to-morrow night, and if you will both of you call upon me about four o-Clock, that we may be at the House before it is full, I will have my own Coach in readiness to attend you, for John tells me he has got the Fore-Wheels mended

The Captain, who did not fail to meet me there at the appointed Hour, bid Sir ROGER fear no thing, for that he had put on the same Sword which he made use of at the Battel of Steinkirk Sir ROGER's Servants, and among the rest my old Friend the Butler, had, I found, provided themselves with good Oaken Plants, to attend their Master upon this occasion When he had plac'd him in his Coach, with my self at his Left-Hand, the Captain before him, and his Butler at the Head of his Footmen in the Rear, we convey'd him in safety to the Play-house, where, after having march'd up the Entry in good order, the Captain and I went in with him, and seated him betwixt us in the Pit As soon as the House was full, and the Candles lighted, my old Friend stood up and look'd about him with that Pleasure, which a Mind seasoned with Humanity naturally feels in its self, at the sight of a Multitude of People who seem pleas'd with one another, and partake of the same common Entertainment I could not but fancy to myself, as the old Man stood up in the middle of the Pit, that he made a very proper Center to a Tragick Audience Upon the entering of Pyrrhus, the Knight told me, that he did not believe the King of France himself had a better Strut I was indeed very attentive to my old Friend's Remarks, because I look'd upon them as a Piece of natural Criticism, and was well pleas'd to hear him at the Conclusion of almost every Scene, telling me that he could not imagine how the Play would end One while he appear'd much concerned for Andromache, and a little while after as much for Hermione and was extremely puzzled to think what would become of Pyrhus.

When Sir ROGER saw Andromache's obstinate Refusal to her Lover's Importunities, he whisper'd me in the Ear, that he was sure she would never love him to which he added, with a more than ordinary Vehemence, you can't imagine, Sir, what 'tis to have to do with a Widow. Upon Pyrhus his threatening afterwards to leave her, the Knight shook his Head, and muttered to himself, Al, do if you can. This Part dwelt so much upon my Friends Imagination that at the close of the Third Act, as I was thinking of something else, he whispered in my Ear, These Widows Sir, are the most perverse Creatures in the World. But pray, says he, you that are a Critick, is this Play according to your Dramatick Rules, as you call them? Should your People in Tragedy always talk to be understood? Why, there is not a single Sentence in this Play that I do not know the Meaning of.

The fourth Act very luckily begun before I had time to give the old Gentleman an Answer. Well, says the Knight, sitting down with great Satisfaction, I suppose we are now to see Hector's Ghost. He then renewed his Attention, and from time to time, fell a praising the Widow. He made, indeed, a little Mistake as to one of her Piques, whom at his first entering, he took for Attyanax, but he quickly set himself right in that Particular, though, at the same time, he owned he should have been very glad to have seen the little Boy, who, says he, must needs be a very fine Child by the Account that is given of him. Upon Hermione's going off with a Menace to Pyrhus, the Audience gave a loud Clap to which Sir ROGER added, On my Word, a notable young Raggick!

As there was a very remarkable Silence and Stillness in the Audience during the whole Action, it was natural for them to take the Opportunity of these Intervals between the Acts, to express their Opinion of the Players, and of their respective Parts. Sir ROGER hearing a Cluster of them praise Orestes, struck in with them, and told them, that he thought his Friend Pyllades was a very sensible Man as they were afterwards applauding Pyrhus, Sir ROGER put in a second time. And let me tell you, says he, though he speaks but little, I like the old Fellow in Whiskers as well as any of them. Captain SEVTRY seeing two or three Wags who sat near us, lean with an attentive Ear towards Sir ROGER, and fearing lest they should smother the Knight, pluck'd him by the Elbow, and whisper'd something in his Ear that lasted till the Opening of the Fifth Act. The Knight was wonderfully attentive to the Account which Orestes gives of Pyrhus his Death, and at the Conclusion of it, told me it was such a bloody Piece of Work, that he was glad it was not done upon the Stage. Seeing afterwards Orestes in his raving fit, he grew more than ordinary serious, and took occasion to moralize (in his way) upon an Evil Conscience, adding, that Orestes, in his Madness, look'd as if he saw something.

As we were the first that came into the House, so we were the last that went out of it, being resolved to have a clear Passage for our old Friend, whom we did not care to venture among the jostling of the Crowd. Sir ROGER went out fully satisfied with his Entertainment, and we guarded him to his Lodgings in the same manner that we brought him to the Play house being highly pleased, for my own part, not only with the Performance of the excellent Piece which had been presented but with the Satisfaction which it had given to the good old Man.

MR SPECTATOR,
AS you are the daily Endeavourer to promote Learning and good Sense, I think myself obliged to suggest to your Consideration what ever may promote or prejudice them. There is an Evil which has prevailed from Generation to Generation, which grey Hairs and tyrannical Custom continue to support. I hope your Spectatorial Authority will give a reasonable Check to the Spread of the Infection. I mean old Mens overbearing the strongest Sense of their Juniors by the mere Force of Seniority so that for a young Man in the Bloom of Life and Vigour of Age to give a reasonable Contradiction to his Elders, is esteemed an unpardonable Insolence, and regarded as a reversing the Decrees of Nature. I am a young Man, I confess, yet I honour the grey Head as much as any one however, when in Company with old Men, I hear them speak obscurely, or reason preposterously into which Absurdities, Prejudice, Pride, or Interest, will sometimes throw the wisest. I count it no Crime to rectify their Reasoning, unless Conscience must truckle to Ceremony, and Truth fall a Sacrifice to Complaisance. The strongest Arguments are enervated, and the brightest Evidence disappears before those tremendous Reasonings and dazzling Discoveries of venerable old Men. You are young giddy headed Fellows, you have not yet had Experience of the World. Thus we young folks find our Ambition cramped, and our Laziness indulged, since, while young, we have little room to display our selves, and, when old, the Weakness of Nature must pass for Strength of Sense, and we hope that hoary Heads will raise us above the Attacks of Contradiction. Now, Sir, as you would enliven our Activity in the pursuit of Learning, take our Case into Consideration, and, with a Gloss on brave Filius's Sentiments, assert the Rights of Youth, and prevent the pernicious Inroachments of Age. The generous Reasonings of that gallant Youth would adorn your Paper and I beg you would insert them, not doubting but that they will give good 'Entertainment to the most intelligent of your Readers.

'So these three Men ceased to answer Job, because he was righteous in his own Eyes. Then was kindled the Wrath of Elihu the Son of Barachel the Buzite, of the Kindred of Ram. Against Job was his Wrath kindled, because he justified himself rather than God. Also against his three Friends was his Wrath kindled, because they had found no Answer, and yet had condemned Job. Now Elihu had waited till Job had spoken, because they were elder than he. When Elihu saw there was no Answer in the Mouth of these three Men, then his Wrath was kindled. And Elihu the Son of Barachel the Buzite answered and said, I am young, and ye are very old, wherefore I was afraid, and durst not shew you mine Opinion. I said, Days should speak, and Multitude of Years should teach Wisdom. But there is a Spirit in Man, and the Inspiration of the Almighty giveth them Understanding. Great Men are not always wise. Neither do the aged understand Judgment. Therefore I said, hearken to me. I also will shew mine Opinion. Behold, I waited for your Words, I gave ear to your Reasons, whilst you searched out what to say. Yea, I attended unto you. And behold there was none of you that convinced Job, or that answered his Words lest ye should say, we have found out Wisdom. God thrusteth him down, not Man. Now he hath not directed his Words against me. Neither will I answer him with your Speeches. They were amazed, they answered no more. They left off speaking. When I had waited for they spake not, but stood still and answered no more. I said, I will answer also my Part, I also will shew mine Opinion. For I am full of Matter, the Spirit within me constraineth me. Behold, my Belly is as Wine, which hath no vent, it is ready to burst like new Bottles. I will speak that I may be refreshed. I will open my Lips, and answer. Let me not, I pray you, accept any Man's Person, neither let me give flattering Titles unto Man. For I know not to give flattering Titles, nor so doing my Maker would soon take me away.'

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I have formerly read with great Satisfaction your Papers about Idols, and the Behaviour of Gentlemen in those Coffee-houses where Women officiate, and impatiently waited to see you take India and China Shops into Consideration. But since you have pass'd us over in silence, either that you have not as yet thought us worth your Notice, or that the Grievances we lie under have escaped your discerning Eye, I must make my Complaints to you, and am encouraged to do it because you seem a little at leisure at this present Writing. I am, dear Sir, one of the top China-Women about Town, and though I say it, keep as good Things, and receive as fine Company as any of this End of the Town, let the other be who she will. In short, I am in a fair Way to be easy, were it not for a Club of Female Rakes, ² Job, ch xxxii.

'who under pretence of taking their innocent Rambles, forsooth, and diverting the Spleen, seldom fail to plague me twice or thrice a-day to cheapen Tea, or buy a Skreen. What else should they mean? as they often repeat it. These Rakes are your idle Ladies of Fashion, who having nothing to do, employ themselves in tumbling over my Ware. One of these No-Customers (for by the way they seldom or never buy any thing) calls for a Set of Tea-Dishes, another for a Bason, a third for my best Green-Tea, and even to the Punch-Bowl, there's scarce a piece in my Shop but must be displaced, and the whole agreeable Architecture disordered, so that I can compare 'em to nothing but to the Night-Goblins that take a Pleasure to overturn the Disposition of Plates and Dishes in the Kitchens of your housewifely Maids. Well, after all this Racket and Clutter, this is too dear, that is their Aver-sion, another thing is charming but not wanted. The Ladies are cured of the Spleen, but I am not a Shilling the better for it. Lord! what signifies one poor Pot of Tea, considering the Trouble they put me to? Vapours, Mr SPECTATOR, are terrible Things for though I am not possess'd by them my self, I suffer more from 'em than if I were. Now I must beg you to admonish all such Day-Goblins to make fewer Visits or to be less troublesome when they come to one's Shop and to convince 'em, that we honest Shopkeepers have something better to do, than to cure Fools of the Vapours gratis. A young Son of mine, a School-Boy, is my Secretary, so I hope you'll make Allowances

Fungit equum tenerum docilem servit Magister, Ire quam quare monstrat eques—— Hor

I HAVE lately received a third Letter from the Gentleman, who has already given the Publick two Essays upon Education. As his Thoughts seem to be very just and new upon this Subject, I shall communicate them to the Reader

SIR,

'If I had not been hindered by some extraordinary Business, I should have sent you sooner my further Thoughts upon Education. You may please to remember, that in my last Letter I endeavour'd to give the best Reasons that could be urg'd in favour of a private or publick Education. Upon the whole it may perhaps be thought that I seem'd rather inclin'd to the latter, tho' at the same time I confess'd that Virtue, which ought to be our first and principal Care, was more usually acquired in the former.

I intend therefore, in this Letter, to offer at Methods, by which I conceive Poys might be made to improve in Virtue, as they advance in Letters.

I know that in most of our public Schools Vice is punished and discouraged whenever it is 'found out, but this is far from being sufficient, unless our Youth are at the same time taught to form a right Judgment of Things, and to know what is properly Virtue

'To this end, whenever they read the Lives and Actions of such Men as have been famous in their Generation, it should not be thought enough to make them barely understand so many Greek or Lat Sentences, but they should be asked their Opinion of such an Action or Saying, and obliged to give their Reasons why they take it to be good or bad. By this means they would insensibly arrive at proper Notions of Courage, Temperance, Honour and Justice

'There must be great Care taken how the Example of any particular Person is recommended to them in gross, instead of which, they ought to be taught wherein such a Man, tho' great in some respects, was weak and faulty in others. For want of this Caution, a Boy is often so dazzled with the Lustre of a great Character, that he confounds its Beauties with its Blemishes, and looks even upon the faulty Parts of it with an Eye of Admiration

'I have often wondered how Alexander, who was naturally of a generous and merciful Disposition, came to be guilty of so barbarous an Action as that of dragging the Governour of a Town after his Chariot. I know this is generally ascribed to his Passion for Homer, but I lately met with a Passage in Plutarch, which, if I am not very much mistaken, still gives us a clearer Light into the Motives of this Action. Plutarch tells us, that Alexander in his Youth had a Master named Lysimachus, who, tho' he was a Man destitute of all Politeness, ingratiated himself both with Philip and his Pupil, and became the second Man at Court, by calling the King Peleus, the Prince Achilles, and himself Phanix. It is no wonder if Alexander having been thus used not only to admire, but to personate Achilles, should think it glorious to imitate him in this piece of Cruelty and Extravagance.

'To carry this Thought yet further, I shall submit it to your Consideration, whether instead of a Theme or Copy of Verses, which are the usual Exercises, as they are called in the School-phrase, it would not be more proper that a Boy should be tasked once or twice a Week to write down his Opinion of such Persons and Things as occur to him in his Reading, that he should descend upon the Actions of Turnus and Aeneas, shew wherein they excelled or were defective, censure or approve any particular Action, observe how it might have been carried to a greater Degree of Perfection, and how it exceeded or fell short of another. He might at the same time mark what was moral in any Speech, and how far it agreed with the Character of the Person speaking. This Exercise would soon strengthen his Judgment in what is blamable or praiseworthy, and give him an early Seasoning of Morality

'Next to those Examples which may be met with in Books, I very much approve Horace's Way of setting before Youth the infamous or honourable Characters of their Contemporaries. That Poet tells us, this was the Method his Father made use of to incline him to any particular Virtue, or gave him an Aversion to any particular Vice. If, says Horace, my Father advised me to live within Bounds, and be contented with the Fortune he should leave me, Do not you see (says he) the miserable Condition of Burrus, and the Son of Albus? Let the Misfortunes of those two Wretches teach you to avoid Luxury and Extravagance. If he would inspire me with an Abhorrence to Debauchery, do not (says he) make your self like Sectanius, when you may be happy in the Enjoyment of lawful Pleasures. How scandalous (says he) is the Character of Trebonius, who was lately caught in Bed with another Man's Wife? To illustrate the Force of this Method, the Poet adds, That is a headstrong Patient, who will not at first follow his Physician's Prescriptions, grows orderly when he hears that his Neighbours die all about him: so Youth is often frightened from Vice, by hearing the ill Report it brings upon others.

'Xenophon's Schools of Equity, in his Life of Cyrus the Great, are sufficiently famous. He tells us, that the Persian Children went to School, and employ'd their Time as diligently in learning the Principles of Justice and Sobriety, as the Youth in other Countries did to acquire the most difficult Arts and Sciences: their Governors spent most part of the Day in hearing their mutual Accusations one against the other, whether for Violence, Cherting, Slander, or Ingratitude, and taught them how to give Judgment against those who were found to be any ways guilty of these Crimes. I omit the Story of the long and short Coat, for which Cyrus himself was punished, as a Case equally known with any in Littleton.

'The Method, which Apuleius tells us the Indian Gymnosophists took to educate their Disciples, is still more curious and remarkable. His Words are as follow. When their Dinner is ready, before it is served up, the Masters enquire of every particular Scholar how he has employ'd his Time since Sun rising, some of them answer, that having been chosen as Arbiters between two Persons they have composed their Differences, and made them Friends, some, that they have been executing the Orders of their Parents, and others, that they have either found out something new by their own Application, or learnt it from the Instruction of their Fellows. But if there happens to be any one among them, who cannot make it appear that he has employed the Morning to advantage, he is immediately excluded from the Company, and obliged to work, while the rest are at Dinner.

'It is not impossible, that from these several Ways of producing Virtue in the Minds of Boys, some general Method might be invented. What I would endeavour to inculcate, is, that our Youth cannot be too soon taught the Principles of Virtue, seeing the first Impressions which are made on the Mind are always the strongest.

'The Archbishop of Cambray makes Telemachus say, that tho' he was young in Years, he was old in the Art of knowing how to keep both his own and his Friend's Secrets. When my Father, says the Prince, went to the Siege of 'Troy, he took me on his Knees, and after having embraced and blessed me, as he was surrounded by the Nobles of Ithaca, O my Friends, says he, into your Hands I commit the Education of my Son, if ever you lov'd his Father, shew it in your Care towards him, but above all, do not omit to form him just, sincere, and faithful in keeping a Secret. These Words of my Father, says Telemachus, were continually repeated to me by his Friends in his Absence, who made no scruple of communicating to me in their Unersiveness to see my Mother surrounded with Lovers, and the Measures they designed to take on that Occasion. He adds, that he was so ravished at being thus treated like a Man, and at the Confidence reposed in him, that he never once abused it nor could all the Insinuations of his Father's Rivals ever get him to betray what was committed to him under the Seal of Secrecy.

'There is hardly any Virtue which a Lad might not thus learn by Practice and Example.

'I have heard of a good Man, who used at certain times to give his Scholars Six Pence apiece, that they might tell him the next day how they had employ'd it. The third part was always to be laid out in Charity, and every Boy was blamed or commended as he could make it appear that he had chosen a fit Object.

'In short, nothing is more wanting to our publick Schools, than that the Masters of them should use the same care in fashioning the Manners of their Scholars, as in forming their Tongues to the learned Languages. Where ever the former is omitted, I cannot help agreeing with Mr Locke, that a Man must have a very strange Value for Words, when preferring the Languages of the Greeks and Romans to that which made them such brave Men, he can think it worth while to hazard the Innocence and Virtue of his Son for a little Greek and Latin.

'As the Subject of this Essay is of the highest Importance, and what I do not remember to have yet seen treated by any Author, I have sent you what occur'd to me on it from my own Observation or Reading, and which you may either suppress or publish as you think fit.

I FIND the Tragedy of the Distrest Mother is publish'd to day. The Author of the Prologue, I suppose, pleads an old Excuse I have read somewhere, of being dull with Design, and the Gentleman who writ the Epilogue, 'thrs, to my

I should be more unwilling to pardon him than any body, & Practice which cannot have any ill Consequence, but from the Abilities of the Person who is guilty of it.

MR SPECTATOR,
'I had the Happiness the other Night of sitting very near you, and your worthy Friend Sir ROGER, at the acting of the new Tragedy, which you have in a late Paper or two so justly recommended. I was highly pleas'd with the advantageous Situation fortune had given me in placing me so near two Gentlemen, from one of which I was sure to hear such Reflections on the several Incidents of the Play, as pure Nature suggested, and from the other such as flow'd from the exactest Art and Judgment. Tho' I must confess that my Curiosity led me so much to observe the Knight's Reflections, that I was not so well at leisure to improve my self by yours. Nature, I found, play'd her Part in the Knight pretty well, till at the last concluding Lines she entirely forsook him. You must know, Sir, that it is always my Custom, when I have been well entertained at a new Tragedy, to make my Retreat before the facetious Epilogue enters: not but that those Pieces are often very well writ, but having put down my Half Crown, and made a fair Purchase of as much of the pleasing Melancholy as the Poet's Art can afford me, or my own Nature admit of, I am willing to carry some of it home with me, and can't endure to be at once trick'd out of all, tho' by the wittiest Dexterity in the World. However, I kept my Seat to other Night, in hopes of finding my own Sentiments of this Matter favour'd by your Friend's when, to my great Surprise, I found the Knight entering with equal Pleasure into both Parts, and as much satisfied with Mrs Oldfield's Guety, as he had been before with Andromache's Greatness. Whether this were no other than an Effect of the Knight's peculiar Humanity, pleas'd to find at last, that after all the tragical Doings every thing was safe and well, I don't know. But for my own part, I must confess, I was so dissatisfied, that I was sorry the Poet had saved Andromache, and

'Mr Tonson's family and told to Garrick, that Addison was himself the author of it, and that when it had been at first printed with his name, he came early in the morning, before the copies were distributed, and order'd it to be given to Budgett, that it might add weight to the solicitation which he was then making for a place. Johnson calls it 'the most successful Epilogue that was ever yet spoken on the English theatre. The three first nights it was recited twice,' and whenever afterwards the play was acted the Epilogue was still expected and was spoken. This is a fifth paper for the benefit of Ambrose Philips, inserted, perhaps, to make occasion for a sixth (No 342) in the form of a reply to Physibulus.

could heartily have wished that he had left her stone-dead upon the Stage For you cannot imagine, Mr SPECTATOR, the Mischief she was reserv'd to do me I found my Soul, during the Action, gradually work'd up to the highest Pitch, and felt the exalted Passion which all generous Minds conceive at the Sight of Virtue in Distress. The Impression, believe me, Sir, was so strong upon me, that I am persuaded, if I had been let alone in it, I could at an Extremity have ventured to defend your self and Sir ROGER against half a Score of the fiercest Mohocks But the ludicrous Epilogue in the Close extinguish'd all my Ardour, and made me look upon all such noble Achievements, as downright silly and romantick. What the rest of the Audience felt, I can't so well tell For my self, I must declare, that at the end of the Play I found my Soul uniform, and all of a Piece, but at the End of the Epilogue it was so jumbled together, and divided between Jest and Earnest, that if you will forgive me an extravagant Fancy, I will here set it down I could not but fancy, if my Soul had at that Moment quitted my Body, and descended to the poetical Shades in the Posture it was then in, what a strange Figure it would have made among them They would not have known what to have made of my motley Spectre, half Comick and half Tragick, all over resembling a ridiculous Face, that at the same time laughs on one side and cries o't'other The only Defence, I think, I have ever heard made for this, as it seems to me, most unnatural Tack of the Comick Tail to the Tragick Head, is this, that the Minds of the Audience must be refreshed, and Gentlemen and Ladies not sent away to their own Homes with too dismal and melancholy Thoughts about them For who knows the Consequence of this? We are much oblig'd indeed to the Poets for the great Tenderness they express for the Safety of our Persons, and heartily thank them for it But if that be all pray, good Sir, assure them, that we are none of us like to come to any great Harm, and that let them do their best, we shall in all probability live out the Length of our Days, and frequent the Theatres more than ever What makes me more desirous to have some Reformation of this matter, is because of an ill Consequence or two attending it For a great many of our Church-Musicians being related to the Theatre, they have in Imitation of these Epilogues, introduced in their farewell Voluntaries a sort of Musick quite foreign to the design of Church-Services, to the great Prejudice of well disposed People Those fingering Gentlemen should be inform'd, that they ought to suit their Arts to the Place and Business and that the Musician is oblig'd to keep to the Text as much as the Preacher For want of this I have found by Experience a great deal of Mischief For when the Preacher has often, with great Piety and Art enough, handled his Subject, and the judicious Clerk has with utmost Diligence culled out two Staves proper to the Discourse, and I have found in my self and in the rest of the Pew good Thoughts and Dispositions, they have been all in a moment dissipated by a merry jig from the Organ-Loft One knows not what further ill Effects the Epilogues I have been speaking of may in time produce But this I am credibly inform'd of, that *Paul Lorrain*¹ has resolv'd upon a very sudden Reformation in his tragical Dramas and that at the next monthly Performance he designs, instead of a Penitential Psalm, to dismiss his Audience with an excellent new Ballad of his own composing Pray, Sir, do what you can to put a stop to those growing Evils, and you will very much oblige

Your Humble Servant,

LONGINUS has observ'd,³ that there may be a Loftiness in Sentiments, where there is no Passion, and brings Instances out of ancient Authors to support this his Opinion The Pothetic, as that great Critick observes, may animate and infuse the Sublime, but is not essential to it. Accordingly, as he further remarks, we very often find that those who excel most in stirring up the Passions, very often want the Talent of writing in the great and sublime manner, and so on the contrary Milton has shewn himself a Master in both these ways of Writing The Seventh Book, which we are now entering upon, is an Instance of that Sublime which is not mix'd and worked up with Passion The Author appears in a kind of composed and sedate Majesty, and tho' the Sentiments do not give so great an Emotion as those in the former Book, they abound with as magnificent Ideas The Sixth Book, like a troubled Ocean, represents Greatness in Confusion the seventh Affects the Imagination like the Ocean in a Calm, and fills the Mind of the Reader, without producing in it any thing like tumult or Agitation

The Critick above mentioned, among the Rules which he lays down for succeeding in the sublime way of writing, proposes to his Reader, that he should imitate the most celebrated Authors who have gone before him, and been engag'd in Works of the same nature⁴ as in particular, that if he writes on a poetical Subject, he should consider how Homer would have spoken on such an Occasion By this means one great Genius often catches the Flame from another, and writes in his Spirit, without copying servilely after him There are a thousand shining Passages in Virgil, which have been lighted up by Homer

Milton, tho' his own natural Strength of Genius was capable of furnishing out a perfect Work, has doubtless very much raised and ennobled his Conceptions, by such an Imitation as that which Longin is has recommended

In this Book, which gives us an Account of the six Days Works, the Poet received but very few Assistances from Heathen Writers, who were Strangers to the Wonders of Creation. But as there are many glorious strokes of Poetry upon this Subject in Holy Writ, the Author has numberless Allusions to them through the whole course of this Book. The great Critick I have before mentioned, though an Heathen, has taken notice of the sublime Manner in which the Law-giver of the Jesus has describ'd the Creation in the first Chapter of Genesis,¹ and there are many other Passages in Scripture, which rise up to the same Majesty, where this Subject is touched upon. Milton has shewn his Judgment very remarkably, in making use of such of these as were proper for his Poem, and in duly qualifying those high Strains of Eastern Poetry, which were suited to Readers whose Imaginations were set to an higher pitch than those of colder Climates.

Adam's Speech to the Angel, wherein he desires an Account of what had passed within the Regions of Nature before the Creation, is very great and solemn. The following Lines, in which he tells him, that the Day is not too far spent for him to enter upon such a subject, are exquisite in their kind.

*And the great Light of Day yet wants to run Much of his Race, though steep, suspense in Heaven
Held by thy Voice, thy potent Voice he hears,
And longer will delay, to hear thee tell His Generation, &c*

The Angel's encouraging our first Parent[s] in a modest pursuit after Knowledge, with the Causes which he assigns for the Creation of the World, are very just and beautiful. The Messengers, by whom, as we are told in Scripture, the Worlds were made, comes forth in the Power of his Father, surrounded with an Host of Angels, and clothed with such a Majesty as becomes his entering upon a Work, which, according to our Conceptions, [appears to] the utmost Exertion of Omnipotence. What a beautiful Description has our Author rused upon that Hint in one of the Prophets. *And behold there came four Chariots out from between two Mountains, and the Mountains were Mountains of Brass*³

*About his Chariot numberless were pour'd Cherub and Seraph, Potentates and Thrones, And Virtues, winged Spirits, and Chariots wing'd,
From the Armoury of Gold, where stand of old Myriads between two brazen Mountains lodg'd*

¹ Longinus, §9 — "So likewise the Jewish legislator, no ordinary person, having conceived a just idea of the power of God, has nobly expressed it in the beginning of his law. 'And God said, What? Let there be Light, and there was Light. Let the Earth be, and the Earth was'" [looks like] —

³ Zechariah vi 1

*Against a solemn Day, harness'd at hand, Celestial Equipage! and now came forth Spontaneous, for within them Spirit lodg'd, Attendant on their Lord. Heaven open'd wide Her ever-during Gates, Harmonious Sound!
On golden Hinges moving——*

I have before taken notice of these Chariots of God, and of these Gates of Heaven and shall here only add, that Homer gives us the same Idea of the latter, as opening of themselves, tho' he afterwards takes off from it, by telling us, that the Hours first of all removed those prodigious Heaps of Clouds which lay as a Barrier before them.

I do not know any thing in the whole Poem more sublime than the Description which follows, where the Messiah is represented at the head of his Angels, as looking down into the Chaos, calming its Confusion, riding into the midst of it, and drawing the first Out-Line of the Creation

On Heavenly Ground they stood, and from the Shore

*They view'd the vast immeasurable Abyss, Outrageous as a Sea, dark, wasteful, wild,
Up from the bottom turn'd by furious Winds And surging Waves, as Mountains to assault Heaven's height, and with the Center mix the Pole*

Silence, ye troubled Waves, and thou Deep, Peace!

*Said then the Omnisic Word, your Discord end Nor staid, but, on the Wings of Cherubim Up-lifted, in Paternal Glory rode Far into Chaos and the World unborn, For Chaos heard his Voice. In all His Train Follow'd in bright Procession, to behold Creation, and the Wonders of his Might Then staid the fervid Wheels, and in his Hand
He took the Golden Compasses, prepar'd In God's eternal Store, to circumscribe
This Unverse, and all created Things
One Foot he center'd, and the other turn'd Round, through the vast Profundity obscure,
And said, I this far extend, thus far thy bounds, This be thy just Circumference, O World!*

The Thought of the Golden Compasses is conceived altogether in Homer's Spirit, and is a very noble Incident in this wonderful Description. Homer, when he speaks of the Gods, ascribes to them several Arms and Instruments with the same greatness of Imagination. I let the Reader only peruse the Description of Minerva's Egis, or Buckler, in the Fifth Book, with her Spear, which would overturn whole Squadrons, and her Helmet, that was sufficient to cover an Army drawn out of an hundred Cities. The Golden Compasses in the above mentioned Passage appear a very natural Instrument in the Hand of him, whom Plato somewhere calls the Divine Geometrician. As Poetry delights in clothing abstracted Ideas in Allegories and sensible Images, we find a magnificent Description of the Creation form'd after the same manner in one of the Prophets, wherein he describes the Almighty Architect measuring the Waters in the Hollow of his Hand, meting out the Heavens with his Span, comprehending the Dust of the Earth in a Measure, weighing the Mountains in Scales, and the Hills in a Balance Another of them describing the Supreme Being in this great Work of Creation, represents him as laying the Foundations of the Earth, and stretching a Line upon it And in another place as furnishing the Heavens, stretching out the North over the empty Place, and hanging the Earth upon nothing This his noble Thought Milto. has express'd in the following Verse

And Earth self ball'rd in her Center hung

The Beauties of Description in this Book he so very thick, that it is impossible to enumerate them in this Paper The Poet has employ'd on them the whole Energy of our Tongue The several great Scenes of the Creation rise up to view one after another, in such a manner, that the Reader seems present at this wonderful Work, and to assist among the Chorus of Angels, who are the Spectators of it How glorious is the Conclusion of the first Day.

*—Thus was the first Day Ev'n and Morn Nor fast nor celebrat'd nor unsung
By the Celestial Qu'rs, when Orient's Light Exhild the first from Darkness they beheld, Her day of Heaven and Earth's joy and Sorrow*

The heav'nly numbers it Orb they fill'd

We have the same elevation of Thought in the third Day, when the Mountains were brought forth, and the Deep was made.

*Immediately 'He Me intan's huge appear Emergent, and their broad bare Backs up-rea'd Into the Clouds, their Tops asc'd the Sky
So high as Icar'd the tun'd Hills, so low Down sunk a hollow Bottom, broad and deep, Capacious bed of Waters—*

We have also the rising of the whole vegetable World described in this Day's Work which is filled with all the Graces that other Poets have lavish'd on their Descriptions of the Spring, and leads the Reader's Imagination into a Theatre equally surprising and beautiful

The several Glories of the Heav'ns make their Appearance on the Fourth Day

*First in his Fast the glorious Lamp was seen, Regent of Day and all the Horizon round Invested with bright Rays, join'd to round His Longitude through Heav'n's high Road
The gray
Down and the Pleiades before him darced, Shedding sweet Influence Less bright the Moon,*

*But opposite in level'd West was set,
His Mirror, with full face borrowing her Light From him, for other Lights she needed none In that aspect, and still that distance keeps Till Night, then in the East her turn she shines,*

Revol'd on Heav'n's great Axis, and her Reign With thousand lesser Lights descend'd I told, With thousand thousand Stars! that then appear'd Spangling the Hemisphere—

One would wonder how the Poet could be so concise in his Description of the six Days Works, as to comprehend them within the bounds of an Episode, and at the same time so particular, as to give us a lively Idea of them This is still more remarkable in his Account of the Fifth and Sixth Days, in which he has drawn out to our View the whole Animal Creation, from the Reptil to the Behemoth As the Lion and the Leviathan are two of the noblest Productions in the World of living Creatures, the Reader will find a most exquisite Spirit of Poetry in the Account which our Author gives us of them The Sixth Day concludes with the Formation of Man, upon which the Angel takes occasion, as he did after the Fall in Heaven, to remind Adam of his Obedience, which was the principal Design of this his VIth

The Poet afterwards represents the Messiah returning into Heaven, and taking a Survey of his great Work There is something inexpressibly Sublime in this part of the Poem, where the Author describes that great Period of Time, filled with so many Glorious Circumstances, when the Heavens and Earth were finished, when the Messiah ascended up in triumph thro' the everlasting Gates when he looked down with pleasure upon his new Creation, when every Part of Nature seem'd to rejoice in its Existence when the Morning Stars sang together, and all the Sons of God shouted for joy

*So Ev'n and Morn accomplish'd the sixth Day Yet not till the Creator from his Work Desisting, 'To in vernal, in summer,
Up to the Heav'n of Heav'n's, his high Abode, Hence to behold this new created World,
For Addition of his Empire, how vast and good In prospect from his Throne, how good, how fair,*

*Answering his great Ides Up he rode, Follow'd with Acclamation, and the Sound Symphonious of his myriad Harps, that tuned Angelical Harmonies, the Earth, the Air Resounding (tho' remember'd for th' unheardst)
The Heav'ns and all the Celestial ones rung,
The Planets in their Station listening stood,
While the bright Pomp ascend'd jubilate Open, ye everlasting Gates, ye suns, Open, ye Heav'ns, ye worlds, ye Days, let in The great Creator from his high throne Majesty cent, his six Days Work, a World!*

I cannot conclude this Poem upon the Creation, without mentioning a Poem which has lately appeared under that Title² The Work was undertaken with so good an Intent, and is executed with so great a Mastery, that it deserves to be looked upon as one of the most useful and noble Productions in our English Verse. The Reader cannot but be pleased to find the Depths of Philosophy enlivened with all the Charms of Poetry, and to see so great a Strength of Reason, amidst so beautiful a Redundancy of the Imagination. The Author has shewn us that Design in all the Works of Nature, which necessarily leads us to the Knowledge of its first Cause. In short, he has illustrated, by numberless and incontestable Instances, that Divine Wisdom, which the Son of Sirach has so justly ascribed to the Supreme Being in his Formation of the World, when he tells us, that He created her, and saved her, and numbered her, and found her out in all her Works

I TAKE it to be the highest Instance of a noble Mind to bear great Qualities without discovering in a Man's Behaviour any Consciousness that he is superior to the rest of the World. Or, to say it otherwise, it is the Duty of a great Person so to demean himself, as that whatever Endowments he may have, he may appear to value himself upon no Qualities but such as any Man may

It argues in blank verse, in the first two of its seven books, the existence of a Deity from evidences of design in the structure and qualities of earth and sea, in the celestial bodies and the air in the next three books it argues against objections raised by Atheists, Atomists, and Fatalists in the sixth book proceeds with evidences of design, taking the structure of man's body for its theme and in the next, which is the last book, treats in the same way of the Instincts of Animals and of the Faculties and Operations of the Soul. This is the manner of the Poem

Why were the Moist in Disorder so coud'ers,

It is hardly a 'mark of perfect skill' that there are five or six thousand of such dry Lines in Blackmore's poem, and not even one that should lead a critic to speak in the same breath of Blackmore and Milton.

arrive at He ought to think no Man valuable but for his publick Spirit, Justice and Integrity and all other Endowments to be esteem'd only as they contribute to the exerting those Virtues. Such a Man, if he is Wise or Valiant, knows it is of no Consideration to other Men that he is so, but as he employs those high Talents for their Use and Service. He who affects the Applauses and Addresses of a Multitude, or assumes to himself a Pre-eminence upon any other Consideration, must soon turn Admiration into Contempt. It is certain, that there can be no Merit in any Man who is not conscious of it but the Sense that it is valuable only according to the Application of it, makes that Superiority unvaluable, which would otherwise be invaluable. In this Light it is considered as a Thing in which every Man bears a Share. It annexes the Ideas of Dignity, Power, and Fame, in an agreeable and familiar manner, to him who is Possessor of it. and all Men who are Strangers to him are naturally incited to indulge a Curiosity in beholding the Person, Behaviour, Feature, and Shape of him in whose Character, perhaps, each Man had formed something in common with himself. Whether such, or any other, are the Causes, all Men have [a yearning¹] Curiosity to behold a Man of heroic Worth and I have had many Letters from all Parts of this Kingdom, that request I would give them an exact Account of the Stature, the Mien, the Aspect of the Prince² who lately visited England, and has done such Wonders for the Liberty of Europe. It would puzzle the most Curious to form to himself the sort of Man my several Correspondents expect to hear of, by the Action mentioned when they desire a Description of him. There is always something that concerns themselves, and growing out of their own Circumstances, in all their Enquiries. A Friend of mine in Holland beseeches me to be very exact in my Account of that wonderful Man, who had marched

² Prince Eugene of Savoy, grand-son of a duke of Savoy, and son of Eugene Maurice, general of the Swiss, and Olympe Mancini, a niece of Mazarin, was born at Paris in 1665, and in ended for the church, but had so strong a bent towards a military life that when refused a regiment in the French army he served the Emperor as volunteer against the Turks. He opposed the march of the French into Italy when Louis XIV declared war with Austria, and refused afterwards from Louis a Marshal's staff, a pension, and the government of Champagne. Afterwards in Italy, by the surprise of Cremona he made Marshal Villeroi his prisoner, and he was Marlborough's companion in wars at Blenheim and other victories. It was he who saved London, and expelled the French from Italy. He was 49 years old in 1712, and had come in that year to England to induce the court to continue the war, but found Marlborough in disgrace and the war very unpopular. He had been feasted by the city and received from Queen Anne a reward worth £500, which he wore at his birthday reception. He had also stood as godfather to Steele's third son, who was named after him.

an Army and all its Baggage over the Alps, and, if possible, to learn whether the Persian who shew'd him the Way and is drawn in the Map, be yet living. A Gentleman from the University, who is deeply intent on the Study of Humanity, desires me to be as particular if I had Opportunity in observing the whole Interview between his Highness and our late General. Thus do Mens Fancies work according to their several Educations and Circumstances, but all pay a Respect mixed with Admiration, to this illustrious Character. I have waited for his Arrival in Holland, before I would let my Correspondents know, that I have not been so uncurious a Spectator, as not to have seen Prince Lucene. It would be very difficult, as I said just now, to answer every Expectation of those who have wait to me on that Head, nor is it possible for me to find Words to let one know what an awful Glance there is in his Countenance who surpris'd Crimona, how daring he appears who forced the Trenches of Lurin. But in general I can say, that he who beholds him will easily expect from him any thing that is to be imagined or executed by the Wit or Force of Man. The Prince is of that Stature which makes a Man not easily become all Parts of Exercise, has Height to be graceful on Occasions of State and Ceremony, and no less adapted for Agility and Dispatch. His Aspect is erect and composed, his Eye lively and thoughtful, yet rather vigilant than sparkling his Action and Address the most easy and manageable, and his Behaviour in an Assembly peculiarly graceful in a certain Art of mixing, insensibly with the rest and becoming one of the Company, instead of receiving the Courtship of it. The Shape of his Person, and Composure of his Limbs, are remarkably exact and beautiful. There is in his Look something sublime, which does not seem to arise from his Quality or Character, but the innate Disposition of his Mind. It is apparent that he suffers the Presence of much Company, instead of taking Delight in it, and he appears in Publick while with us, rather to return Good will, or satisfy Lurin us, than to gratify any Taste he himself had of being popular. As his Thoughts are never tumultuous in Disorder, they are as little discomposed on Occasions of Pomp and Magnificence. A great Soul is affected in either Case no further than in considering the properest Methods to extricate it self from them. If this Hero has the strong Inclinations to uncommon Enterprizes that were remarkable in Alexander, he prosecutes and enjoys the Fame of them with the Justice, Propriety, and good Sense of Cesar. It is easy to observe in him a Mind capable of being entertained with Contemplation as Enterprize. A Mind ready for great Exploits, but not impatient for Occasions to exert it self. The Prince has Wisdom and Valour in as high Perfection as Men can enjoy, it which noble Faculties in conjunction, banish all Van Glory, Ostentation, Ambition, and all other Vices which might intrude upon his Mind to make it unequal. These Habits and Qualities of Soul and Body render this Personage so extraordinary, that he appears to have nothing in him but what every Man should have in him, the Exertion of his very self, abstracted from the Circumstances in which Fortune has placed him. Thus were you to see Prince Lucene, and were told he was a private Gentleman, you would say he is a Man of Modesty and Merit. Should you be told that he was Prince Lucene, he would be diminished no otherwise than that part of your distant Admiration would turn into familiar Good will. Thus I thought fit to entertain my Reader with, concerning an Hero who never was equalled but by one Man, over whom also he has this Advantage, that he has had an Opportunity to manifest in I esteem for him in his Adversity. HAVING, to oblige my Correspondent Phylis, printed his Letter last Friday, in relation to the new Epilogue, he cannot take it amiss, if I now publish another, which I have just received from a Gentleman who does not agree with him in his Sentiments upon that Matter.

SIR,

I am amazed to find an Epilogue attacked in your last Friday's Paper, which has been so generally applauded by the Town, and received such Honours as were never before given to any in an English Theatre.

The Audience would not permit Mrs. Oldfield to go off the Stage the first Night, till she had repeated it twice the second Night the Noise of Bravo's was as loud as before, and she was oblig'd to speak it twice the third Night it was still called for a second time and, in short, contrary to all other Epilogues, which are dropt after the third Representation of the Play, this has already been repeated nine times.

I must own I am the more surpris'd to find this Censure in Opposition to the whole Town, in a Paper which has hitherto been famous for its Candour of its Criticisms.

I can by no means allow your melancholy Correspondent, that the new Epilogue is unnatural because it is new. If I had a mind to be learned, I could tell him that the Prologue and Epilogues are real Parts of the ancient Tragedy, but every one knows that on the British Stage they are distinct Performances by themselves, Pieces entirely detached from the Play, and no way essential to it.

The moment the Play ends, Mrs. Oldfield is no more Andromache, but Mrs. Oldfield, and tho' the Poet had left Andromache stone-dead upon the Stage, as your ingenious Correspondent phrases it, Mrs. Oldfield might still have spoke a merry Epilogue. We have an Instance of this

1 Marlborough

2 Budge here defends with bad temper the Epilogue which Addison ascribed to him. Probably it was of his writing, but transformed by Addison's corrections.

'in a Tragedy' where there is not only a Death but a Martyrdom. St Catherine was there personated by Nell Green, she lies stone dead upon the Stage, but upon those Gentlemen's offering to remove her Body, whose Business it is to carry off the Slain in our English Tragedies, she breaks out into that abrupt Beginning of what was a very ludicrous, but at the same time thought a very good Epilogue

Hold, are you mad? you damn'd confounded Dog, I am to rise and speak it. Epilogue

'This diverting Manner was always practised by Mr Dryden, who if he was not the best Writer of Tragedies in his time, was allowed by every one to have the happiest Turn for a Prologue or an Epilogue. The Epilogues to Cleomenes, Don Sebastian, The Duke of Guise, Aurengzebe, and Love Triumphant, are all Precedents of this Nature

'I might further justify this Practice by that excellent Epilogue which was spoken a few Years since, after the Tragedy of Phædra and Hippolytus, with a great many others, in which the Authors have endeavour'd to make the Audience merry. If they have not all succeeded so well as the Writer of this, they have however shewn that it was not for want of Good-will

'I must further observe, that the Guilty of it may be still the more proper, as it is at the end of a French Play, since every one knows that Nation, who are generally esteem'd to have as polite a Taste as any in Europe, always close their Tragick Entertainments with what they call a Petite Piece, which is purposely design'd to raise Mirth, and send away the Audience well pleased. The same Person who has supported the chief Character in the Tragedy, very often plays the principal Part in the Petite Piece, so that I have myself seen at Paris, Orster and Lulin acted the same Night by the same Man

'Tragick Comedy, indeed, you have your self in a former Speculation found fault with very justly, because it breaks the Tide of the Passions while they are yet flowing, but this is nothing at all to the present Case, where they have already had their full Course

'As the new Epilogue is written conformable to the Practice of our best Poets, so it is not such in one which, as the Duke of Bridgewater says in his Rehearsal, might serve for any other Play, but whoolly rises out of the Occurrences of the Piece it was composed for

'The only Reason your mournful Correspondent gives against this Facetious Epilogue, as he calls it, is, that he has mind to go home in melancholy. I wish the Gentleman may not be more Grave than Wise. For my own part, I must confess I think it very sufficient to have the Anguish of a fictitious Piece remain upon me, while it is representing, but I love to be sent home to bed in a good humour. If Physibilus is however resolv'd to be inconsolable, and not to have his Tears dried up, he need only continue his old Custom, and when he has had his half Crown's worth of Sorrow, sink out before the Epilogue begins

'It is pleasant enough to hear this Tragical Genius complaining of the great Mischief Adrian had done him. What was that? Why, 'she made him laugh. The poor Gentleman's sufferings put me in mind of Harlequin's Case, who was tickled to Death. He tells us soon after, thro' a small Mistake of Sorrow for Rage, that during the whole Action he was so very sorry, that he thinks he could have strick'd half a score of the fiercest Moles in the Excess of his Grief. I cannot but look upon it as an happy Accident, that a Man who is so bloody minded in his Affliction, was diverted from this sort of outrageous Melancholy. The Valour of this Gentleman in his Distress, brings to one's memory the Knight of the sorrowful Countenance, who lyes about him at such an unmerciful rate in an old Romance. I shall readily grant him that his Soul, as he himself says, 'could have made a very ridickous Figure, had it quitt'd the Body, and descended to the Poetical Shades, in such an Encounter

'As to his Conceit of tickling a Fragile Head with a Comic Tail, in order to refresh the Audience, it is such a piece of Jargon, that I don't know what to make of it

'The elegant Writer makes a very sudden Transition from the Play house to the Church, and from thence, to the Gallows

'As for what relates to the Church, he is of Opinion, that these Epilogues have given occasion to those merry Jiggs from the Organ Loft, which have dissipated those good Thoughts, and Dispositions he has found in himself, and the rest of the Crew, upon the singing of two Stanzas call'd out by the judicious and diligent Clerk

'He fetches his next Thought from Tyburn, and seems very apprehensive lest there should happen any Innovations in the Tragedies of his Friend Paul Lorrain

'In the mean time, Sir, this gloomy Writer, who is so mightily scandaliz'd at a gay Epilogue after a serious Play, speaking of the Fate of those unhappy Wretches who are condemn'd to suffer an ignominious Death by the Justice of our Laws, endeavours to make the Reader merry on so improper an occasion, by those poor Purlesque Expressions of Tragical Dramas, and Monthly Performances

I am, Sir, with great Respect, Your most obedient, most humble Servant,
Philomedeus

Justitiae partes sunt non violare homines Vere cum duce non offendere — Iull

AS Regard to Decency is a great Rule of Life in general, but more especially to be consulted by the Fickle World, I cannot overlook the following Letter which describes an egregious Offender

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I was this Day looking over your Papers, and reading in that of December the 6th with great delight, the amiable Grief of Astrea for the Absence of her Husband, it threw me in a great deal of Reflection. I cannot say but this arose very much from the Circumstances of my own Life, who am a Soldier, and expect every Day to receive Orders which will oblige me to leave behind me a Wife that is very dear to me and that very deservingly. She is, at present, I am sure, no way below your Astrea for Conjugial Affection. But I see the Behaviour of some Women so little suited to the Circumstances wherein my Wife and I shall soon be, that it is with a Reluctance I never knew before, I am going to my Duty. What puts me to present Pain, is the Example of a young Lady, whose Story you shall have as well as I can give it you. Horatius, an Officer of good Rank in her Majesty's Service, happen'd in a certain Part of England to be brought to a Country Gentleman's House, where he was receiv'd with that more than ordinary Welcome, with which Men of domestic Inclination such few Soldiers whom a military Life, from the variety of Adventures, has not render'd overbearing, but humane, easy, and agreeable. Horatius stay'd here some time, and had easy Access at all hours, as well as unavoidable Conversation at some parts of the Day with the beautiful Sylvia, the Gentleman's Daughter. People who live in Cities are wonderfully struck with every little Country Abode they see where they take the Air and 'tis natural to fancy they could live in every neat Cottage (by which they pass) much happier than in their present Circumstances. The turbulent way of Life which Horatius is us'd to, made him reflect with much Satisfaction on all the Advantages of a sweet Retreat on dry and arid mountains, the rest, you'll think it not probable it might enter into his Thought, that such a Woman as Sylvia would consociate the Hypocrisy of the World is so debauched with me in Considerations, that Horatius knew it would be receiv'd as an Act of Generosity, if he asked for a Woman of the Highest Merit, without further Questions, of a Parent who had nothing to add to her personal Qualifications. The Wedding was celebrated at her Father's House. When that was over, the generous Husband did not proportion his Provision for her to the Circumstances of her Fortune, but considered his Wife as his Darling, his Pride, and his Vanity, or rather that it was in the Woman he had chosen that a Man of Sense could shew Pride or Vanity with an Excuse, and therefore adorn'd her with rich Habits and valuable Jewels. He did not however omit to admonish her that he did his very utmost in this, that it was an Occupation he could not but be guilty of to a Woman he had so much Pleasure in, desir'd her to consider it as such, and begged of her also to take these Matters rightly, and believe the Gems, the Gowns, the Laces would still become her better, if her Air and Behaviour was such, that it might appear she dress'd thus rather in Compliance to his Humour than Way, th in out of any value she her self had for the Trifles. To this Iesson, too hard for Woman, Horatius add'd, that she must be sure to cry with her Friends in the Country till his Return. As soon as Horatius departed, Sylvia saw in her Looking glass that the Love he conceiv'd for her was wholly owing to the Accident of seeing her and she is convinc'd it was only her Misfortune the rest of Mankind had not beheld her, or Men of much greater Quality and Merit had continu'd for one so genteel, tho' bred in Obscurity, so very witty, tho' never requir'd with Court or Town. She therefore resolv'd not to hide so much Excellence from the World, but without any Regard to the Absence of the most generous Man alive, she is now the gayest Lady about this Town, and has shut out the Thoughts of her Husband by a constant Retinue of the finest young Fellows this Age has produced to entertain whom, she squanders away all Horatius is able to supply her with tho' that Supply is purchas'd with no less Difficulty than the Hazard of his Life.

Now, Mr SPECTATOR, would it not be a Work becoming your Office to treat this Criminal as she deserves? You should give it the severest Reflections you can. You should tell Women, that they are more accountable for their Behaviour in Absence than after Death. The Devil are not dishonour'd by their Levities the living may return, and be laugh'd at by empty Tops, who will not fail to turn into Ridicule the good Man who is so unseasonable as to be still alive, and come and spoil good Company.

I am,
SIR,
your most Obedient

All Strictness of Behaviour is so unmercifully laugh'd at in our Age, that the other much worse Extreme is the more common folly. But let any Woman consider which of the two Offences an Husband would the more easily forgive, that of being less entertaining, than she could to please Company, or raising the Desires of the whole Room to his disadvantage and she will easily be able to form her Conduct. We have indeed carry'd Womens Characters too much into publick Life, and you shall see them now a days affect a sort of Imitation but I cannot help venturing to disoblige them for their Service, by telling them, that the utmost of a Woman's Character is contain'd in Domestic Life, she is blamable or praiseworthy according as her Carriage affects the House of her Father or her Husband. All she has to do in this World, is contain'd within the Duties of a Daughter, a Sister, a Wife, and a Mother. All this may be well performed, tho' a Lady should not be the very finest Woman at an Opera or an Assembly. They are likewise consistent with a moderate share of Wit, a plain Dress, and a modest Air. But when the very Brains of the Sex are turn'd, and they place their Ambition on Circumstances, wherein to excel is no addition to what is truly commendable, where can this end, but as it frequently does, in their placing, all their Industry, Pleasure and Ambition on things, which will naturally make the Grati-cations of Life last, at best, no longer than Youth and good Fortune? And when we consider the least ill Consequence, it can be no less than looking on their own Condition as Years advance, with a disrelish of Life, and falling into Contempt of their own Persons, or being the Derision of others. But when they consider themselves as they ought, no other than an additional Part of the Species, (for their own Happiness and Comfort, as well as that of those for whom they were born) their Ambition to excell will be directed accordingly, and they will in no part of their Lives want Opportunities of being shining Ornaments to their Fathers, Husbands, Brothers, or Children

WILL HONEYCOMB, who loves to shew upon occasion all the little Learning he has picked up, told us yesterday at the Club, that he thought there might be a great deal said for the Transmigration of Souls, and that the Eastern Parts of the World believed in that Doctrine to this day. Sir Paul Rycaut,* says he, gives us an Account of several well disposed Mahometans that purchase the Freedom of any little Bird they see confined to a Cage, and think they merit as much by it, as we should do here by ransoming any of our Countrymen from their Captivity at Algiers. You must know, says WILL, the Reason is, because they consider every Animal as a Brother or Sister in disguise, and therefore think themselves obliged to extend their Charity to them, tho' under such mean Circumstances. They'll tell you, says WILL, that the Soul of a Man, when he dies, immediately passes into the Body of another Man, or of some Brute, which he resembled in his Humour, or his Fortune, when he was one of us.

As I was wondering what this profusion of Learning would end in, WILL told us that Jack Freeloze, who was a Fellow of Whim, made Love to one of those Ladies who throw away all their Fondness [on?] Parrots, Monkeys, and Lap-dogs. Upon going to pay her a Visit one Morning, he writ a very pretty Epistle upon this Hint. Jack, says he, was conducted into the Parlour, where he dived himself for some time with her favourite Monkey, which was chained in one of the Windows, till at length observing a Pen and Ink lie by him, he writ the following Letter to his Mistress, in the Person of the Monkey, and upon her not coming down so soon as he expected, left it in the Window, and went about his Business.

The Lady soon after coming into the Parlour, and seeing her Monkey look upon a Paper with great Earnestness, took it up, and to this day is in some doubt, says WILL, whether it was written by Jack or the Monkey.

Madam,

'Not having the Gift of Speech, I have a long time waited in vain for an Opportunity of making myself known to you, and having at present the Conveniences of Pen, Ink, and Paper by me, I gladly take the occasion of giving you my History in Writing, which I could not do by word of Mouth. You must know, Madam, that about a thousand Years ago I was an Indian Brachman, and versed in all those mysterious Secrets which your European Philosopher, called Pythagoras, is said to have learned from our Fraternity. I had so ingratiated my self by my great Skill in the occult Sciences with a Dæmon whom I used to converse with, that he promised to grant me whatever I should ask of him. I desire that my Soul might never pass into the Body of a brute Creature, but this he told me was not in his Power to grant me. I then begged that into whatever Creature I should chance to Transmigrate, I might still retain my Memory, and be conscious that I was the same Person who lived in different Animals. Thus he told me was within his Power, and accordingly promised on the word of a Dæmon that he would grant me what I desired. From that time forth I lived so very unblameably, that I was made President of a College of Brachmans, an Office which I discharged with great Integrity till the day of my Death.

'I was then shuffled into another Human Body, and acted my Part so very well in it, that I became first Minister to a Prince who reigned upon the Banks of the Ganges. I here lived in great Honour for several Years, but by degrees lost all the Innocence of the Brachman, being obliged to rifle and oppress the People to enrich my Sovereign, till at length I became so odious that my Master, to recover his Credit with his Subjects, shot me thro' the Heart with an Arrow, as I was one day addressing my self to him at the Head of his Army.

* Sir Paul Rycaut, the son of a London merchant, after an education at Trinity College, Cambridge, went in 1661 to Constantinople as Secretary to the Embassy. He published in 1668 his 'Present State of the Ottoman Empire,' in three Books, and in 1670 the work here quoted, 'A Particular Description of the Mahometan Religion, the Seraglio, the Maritime and Land Forces of Turkey,' abridged in 1701 in Savage's History of the Turks, and translated into French by Besnier in 1707. Consul afterwards at Smyrna, he wrote by command of Charles II a book on 'The Present State of the Greek and American Churches,' published 1679. After his return from the East he was made Privy Councillor and Judge of the High Court of Admiralty. He was knighted by James II, and one of the first Fellows of the Royal Society. He published between 1687 and 1700, the year of his death, Knolles's History of the Turks, with a continuation of his own, and also translated Platina's Lives of the Popes and Garcilaso de la Vega's History of Peru.

'Upon my next remove I found my self in the Woods, under the shade of a Jack all, and soon listed my self in the Service of a Lion. I used to yelp near his Den about midnight, which was his time of rousing and seeking after his Prey. He always followed me in the Rear, and when I had run down a fat Buck, a wild Goat, or an Hare, after he had served very plentifully upon it himself, would now and then throw me a Bone that was but half picked for my Encouragement; but upon my Being unsuccessful in two or three Chases, he gave me such a confounded Gripe in his Anger, that I died of it.

'In my next Transmigration I was again set upon two Legs, and became an Indian Traveller, but having been guilty of great Extravagances, and being marry'd to an expensive Jade of a Wife, I run so curiously in debt, that I durst not shew my Head. I could no sooner step out of my House, but I was arrested by some body or other that lay in wait for me. As I ventured abroad one Night in the Dusk of the Evening, I was taken up and hurry'd into a Dungeon, where I died a few Months after.

'My Soul then enter'd into a Flying Fish, and in that State led a most melancholy Life for the space of six Years. Several Fishes of Prey pursued me when I was in the Water, and if I betook my self to my Wings, it was ten to one but I had a flock of Birds aiming at me. As I was one day flying amidst a fleet of English Ships, I observed a huge Sea Gull whetting his Bill and hovering just over my Head. Upon my dipping into the Water to avoid him, I fell into the Mouth of a monstrous Shark that swallow'd me down in an instant.

'I was some Years afterwards, to my great surprise, in eminent Brinker in Lombard street, and remembering how I had formerly suffered for want of Money, became so very sordid and avaritious, that the whole Town cried shame of me. I was a miserable little old Fellow to look upon, for I had in a manner starved my self, and was nothing but Skin and Bone when I died.

'I was afterwards very much troubled and amazed to find my self dandied into an Emmet's Figure, and did not know but some time or other I might be reduced to a Mite if I did not mend my Manners. I therefore applied my self with great diligence to the Offices that were allotted me, and was generally look'd upon as the noblest Ant in the whole Molehill. I was at last picked up, as I was groaning under a Burden, by an unlucky Coal Sparrow that lived in the Neighbourhood, and had before made great depredations upon our Commonwealth.

'I then better'd my Condition a little, and lived a whole Summer in the Shade of a Bee, but being tired with the painful and penurious Life I had undergone in my two last Transmigrations, I fell into the other Extrem, and turned Drone. As I one day headed a Party to plunder an Hive, we were received so warmly by the Swarm which defended it, that we were most of us left dead upon the Spot.

'I might tell you of many other Transmigrations which I went thro' how I was a Town-

'Rake, and afterwards did Penitence in a Fry. Gelding for ten Years is also how I was a Taylor, a Shrimp, and a Tom tit. In the last of these my Shapes I was shot in the Christmas Holidays by a young Jack a ripes, who would needs try his new Gun upon me.

'But I shall pass over these and other several Strages of Life, to remind you of the young Beau who made love to you about Six Years since. You may remember, Madam, how he musked, and danced, and sung, and play'd a thousand Tricks to gain you, and how he was at last carry'd off by a Cold that he got under your Window one Night in a Scremde. I was that unfortunate young Fellow, whom you were then so cruel to. Not long after my shifting that unlucky Body, I found myself upon a Hill in Attolopia, where I lived in my present Grotesque Shape, till I was caught by a Servant of the English Factory, and sent over into Gnat Britain. I need not inform you how I came into your Hands. You see, Madam, this is not the first time that you have had me in a Chain. I am, however, very happy in this my Captivity, as you often bestow on me those Kisses and Caresses which I would have given the World for, when I was a Man. I hope this Discovery of my Person will not tend to my Disadvantage, but that you will still continue your accustomed Favours to

Your most Devoted

MR SPECTATOR,

'I THINK it has not yet fallen into your Way to discourse on little Ambition, or the many whimsical Ways Men fall into, to distinguish themselves among their Acquaintance. Such Observations, well pursued, would make a pretty History of low Life. I my self am got into a great Reputation, which arose (as most extraordinary Occurrences in a Man's Life seem to do) from a mere Accident. I was some Days ago unfortunately engaged among a Set of Gentlemen, who esteem a Man according to the Quantity of Food he throws down at a Meal. Now I, who am ever for distinguishing my self according to the Notions of Superiority which the rest of the Company entertain, ate so immoderately for their Applause, as had life to have cost me my Life. What added to my Misfortune was, that having naturally a good Stomach, and having lived soberly for some time, my Body was as well prepared for this Contention as if it had been by Appointment. I had

'quickly vanquished every Glutton in Company but one, who was such a Prodigy in his Way, and withal so very merry during the whole Entertainment, that he insensibly betrayed me to continue his Competitor, which in a little time concluded in a complete Victory over my Rival after which, by Way of Insult, I ate a considerable Proportion beyond what the Spectators thought me obliged in Honour to do. The Effect however of this Engagement, has made me resolve never to eat more for Renown and I have, pursuant to this Resolution, compounded three Wigers I had depending on the Strength of my Stomach, which happened very luckily, because it was stipulated in our Articles either to play or pay. How a Man of common Sense could be thus engaged, is hard to determine, but the Occasion of this, is to desire you to inform several Gluttons of my Acquaintance, who look on me with Envy, that they had best moderate their Ambition in time, lest Infamy or Death attend their Success. I forgot to tell you, Sir, with what unspeakable Pleasure I received the Acclamations and Applause of the whole Board, when I had almost eat my Antagonist into Convulsions. It was then that I returned his Mirth upon him with such success as he was hardly able to swallow, though prompted by a Desire of Fame, and a passionate Fondness for Distinction. I had not endeavoured to excel so far, had not the Company been so loud in their Approbation of my Victory. I don't question but the same Thirst after Glory has often caused a Man to drink Quarts without taking Breath, and prompted Men to many other difficult Enterprises, which if otherwise pursued, might turn very much to a Man's Advantage. This Ambition of mine was indeed extravagantly pursued, however I can't help observing, that you hardly ever see a Man commended for a good Stomach, but he immediately falls to eating more (tho' he had before dined) as well to confirm the Person that commended him in his good Opinion of him, as to convince any other at the Table, who may have been inattentive enough not to have done Justice to his Character.

*I am, Sir,
Your most humble Servant,
Epitome Munition*

MR SPECTATOR,

'I have writ to you three or four times to desire you would take notice of an impertinent Custom the Women, the fine Women, have lately fallen into, of taking Snuff.' This silly

'Trick' is attended with such a Coquet Air in some Ladies, and such a sedate masculine one in others, that I cannot tell which most to complain of, but they are to me equally disagreeable. Mrs Sauter is so imprinted of being without it, that she takes it as often as she does Salt at Meals and as she affects a wonderful Pace and Negligence in all her manner, an upper Lip mixed with Snuff and the Snuff, is what is presented to the Observation of all who have the honour to eat with her. The pretty Creature her Neice does all she can to be as disagreeable as her Aunt, and if she is not as offensive to the Eye she is quite as much to the Ear, and makes up all she wants in a confident Air, by a nau-secous Rattle of the Nose, when the Snuff is delivered, and the Fingers make the Stops and Closures on the Nostrils. This, perhaps, is not a very courtly Improvement in speaking of Ladies that is very true but where rises the Offence? Is the appearance of the Spectator. It dates from Sir George Rooke's expedition against Cadix in 1702. Before that time snuff taking in England was confined to a few luxurious foreigners and English who had travelled abroad. They took their snuff with pipes of the size of quills out of small spring boxes. The pipes let out a very small quantity upon the back of the hand, and this was snuffed up the nostrils with the intention of producing a sneeze which, says Lillie, 'I need not say forms now no part of the design or rather fashion of snuff taking,' least of all in the ladies who took part in this method of snuffing defiance at the public enemy. When the fleet, after the failure of its enterprise against Cadix proceeded to cut off the French ships in Vigo Bay, on the way it plundered Port St Mary and adjacent places, where, among other merchandize, seizure was made of several thousand barrels and casks, each containing four tin canisters of snuffs of the best growth and finest Spanish manufacture. At Vigo, among the merchandize taken from the shipping there destroyed, were prodigious quantities of gross snuff, from the Hartz, in bales, bags, and scrowes (untanned buffalo hides, used with the hairy side inwards, for making pelisses), which were designed for manufacture in different parts of Spain. Altogether fifty tons of snuff were brought home as part of the prize of the officers and sailors of the fleet. Of the coarse snuff, called Vigo snuff, the sailors, among whom it was shared, sold a wagon loads at Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Chatham, for not more than three pence or four pence a pound. The greater part of it was bought up by Spanish Jews, to their own very considerable profit. The fine snuffs taken at Port St Mary, and divided among the officers, were sold by some of them at once for a small price, while others held their stocks and, as the snuff so taken became popular and gave a pititonic impulse to the introduction of a fashion which had hitherto been almost confined to foreigners, they got very high prices for it. This accounts for the fact that the ladies too had added the use of the perfumed snuff box to their other fashionable accomplishments.

*For I that day was absent, as befit, Bound on a Voyage uncoil'd and obscure,
Far on Excursion towards the Gates of Hell, Squad'd in full Legion (such Command we had)
To see that none thence issued forth a Spy, Or Enemy, while God was in his Word, Lest he, incens'd at such Eruption bold, Destruction with Creation might have mix'd*

There is no question but our Poet drew the Image in what follows from that in Virgil's sixth Book, where Aeneas and the Sibyl stand before the Adamantine Gates, which are there described as shut upon the Place of Torments, and listen to the Groans, the Clank of Chains, and the Noise of Iron Whips, that were heard in those Regions of Pain and Sorrow

*Fast we found, fast shut
The dismal Gates, and barricado'd strong, But long ere our Approaching heard within Noise, other than the Sound of Dance or Song, Torment, and loud Lament, and furious Rage*

Adam then proceeds to give an account of his Condition and Sentiments immediately after his Creation. How agreeably does he represent the Posture in which he found himself, the beautiful Landship that surrounded him, and the Gladness of Heart which grew up in him on that occasion?

*As new wak'd from soundest Sleep, Soft on the flow'ry Herb I found me laid In balmy Sweat, which with his Beams the Sun Soon dried, and on the reeking Moisture fed Straight towards Heav'n my round'ring Eyes I turn'd, And gaz'd awhile the ample Sky, till rais'd
By quick instinctive Motion, up I sprung, As thitherward endeavouring, and upright Stood on my Feet. About me round I saw Hill, Dale, and shady Woods, and sunny Plains, And liquid lapse of minni'ring Streams, by these Creatures that liv'd, and mov'd, and walk'd, or flew,
Birds on the Branches warbling, all things smil'd
With Fragrance, and with Joy my Heart o'er-flow'd*

Adam is afterwards describ'd as surpriz'd at his own Existence, and taking a Survey of himself, and of all the Works of Nature. He likewise is represented as discovering by the Light of Reason, that he and every thing about him must have been the Effect of some Being infinitely good and powerful, and that this Being had a right to his Worship and Adoration. His first Address to the Sun, and to those Parts of the Creation which made the most distinguished Figure is very natural and amusing to the Imagination

*Thou Sun, said I, fair Light, And thou enlighten'd Earth, so fresh and gay, Ye Hills and Dales, ye Rivers, Woods and Plains,
And ye that live and move, fair Creatures tell, Tell if you saw, how came I thus, how here?*

His next Sentiment, when upon his first going to sleep he fancies himself losing his Existence, and falling away into nothing, can never be sufficiently admired. His Dream, in which he still preserves the Consciousness of his Existence, together with his removal into the Garden which was prepared for his Reception, are also Circumstances finely imagined, and grounded upon what is delivered in Sacred Story

These and the like wonderful Incidents in this Part of the Work, have in them all the Beauties of Novelty, at the same time that they have all the Graces of Nature. They are such as none but a great Genius could have thought of, tho' upon the perusal of them, they seem to rise of themselves from the Subject of which he treats. In a word, tho' they are natural, they are not obvious, which is the true Character of all fine Writing

The Impression which the Interdiction of the Tree of Life left in the Mind of our first Parent, is describ'd with great Strength and Judgment, as the Image of the several Beasts and Birds passing in review before him is very beautiful and lively

*Each Bird and Beast behold Approaching two and two, these cowering low With Blandishment, each Bird stoop'd on his Wing
I nam'd them as they pass'd*

Adam, in the next place, describes a Conference which he held with his Maker upon the Subject of Solitude. The Poet here represents the supreme Being, as making in Essay of his own Work, and putting to the trial that reasoning Faculty, with which he had endued his Creature. Adam urges, in this Divine Colloquy, the Impossibility of his being happy, tho' he was the Inhabitant of Paradise, and Lord of the whole Creation, without the Conversation and Society of some rational Creature, who should partake those Blessings with him. This Dialogue, which is supported chiefly by the Beauty of the Thoughts, without other poetical Ornaments, is as fine a Part as any in the whole Poem. The more the Reader examines the Justness and Delicacy of its Sentiments, the more he will find himself pleased with it. The Poet has wonderfully preserved the Character of Majesty and Condescension in the Creator, and at the same time that of Humility and Adoration in the Creature, as particularly in the following Lines

Thus I presumptuous, and the Vision bright, As with a Smile more brighten'd, thus reply'd, &c

I, with leave of Speech implor'd And humble Deprecation, thus reply'd Let not my Words offend thee Heavenly Power, My Maker, be propitious while I speak, &c

Adam then proceeds to give an account of his second Sleep, and of the Dream in which he beheld the Formation of Eve. The new Passion that was awaken'd in him at the sight of her, is touch'd very finely reduc'd his Fortune below the Caprice of acting according to his natural Temper, than to say of him, That Gentleman was generous. My beloved Author therefore has, in the Sentence on the Top of my Paper, turn'd his Eye with a certain Satiety from beholding the Addresses to the People by Largees and publick Entertainments, which he asserts to be in general vicious, and are always to be regulated according to the Circumstances of Time and a Man's own Fortune. A constant Benignity in Commerce with the rest of the World, which ought to run through all a Man's Actions, has Effects more useful to those whom you oblige, and less ostentatious in your self. He turns his Recommendation of this Virtue in commercial Life, and according to him a Citizen who is frank in his Kindnesses, and abhors Severity in his Demands: he who in buying, selling, lending, doing acts of good Neighbourhood, is just and easy: he who appears naturally averse to Disputes, and above the Sense of little Sufferings, bears a nobler Character, and does much more good to Mankind, than any other Man's Fortune without Commerce can possibly support. For the Citizen above all other Men has Opportunities of arriving at that highest Fruit of Wealth, to be liberal without the least Expence of a Man's own Fortune. It is not to be denied but such a Practice is liable to hazard: but this therefore adds to the Obligation, that, among Traders, he who obliges is as much concerned to keep the Favour a Secret, as he who receives it. The unhappy Distinctions among us in England are so great, that to celebrate the Intercourse of commercial Friendship, (with which I am daily made acquainted) would be to raise the virtuous Man so many Enemies of the contrary Party. I am obliged to conceal all I know of Tom the Bounteous, who lends at the ordinary Interest, to give Men of less Fortune Opportunities of making greater Advantages. He conceals, under a rough Air and distant Behaviour, a bleeding Compassion and womanish Tenderness. This is governed by the most exact Circumspection, that there is no Industry waiting in the Person whom he is to serve, and that he is guilty of no improper Expences. This I know of Tom, but who dare say it of so known a Tory? The same Care I was forced to use some time ago in the Report of another's Virtue, and said fifty instead of a hundred, because the Man I pointed at was a Whig. Actions of this kind are popular without being invidious for every Man of ordinary Circumstances looks upon a Man who has this known Benignity in his Nature, as a Person ready to be his Friend upon such Terms as he ought to expect it, and the Wealthy, who may envy such a Character, can do no Injury to its Interests but by the Imitation of it, in which the good Citizens will rejoice to be rivall'd. I know not how to form to my self a greater Idea of Humane Life, than in what is the Practice of some wealthy Men whom I could name, that make no step to the Improvement of their own Fortunes, wherein they do not also advance those of other Men, who would languish in Poverty without that Munificence. In a Nation where there are so many publick Funds to be supported, I know not whether he can be called a good Subject, who does not embark some part of his Fortune with the State, to whose Vigilance he owes the Security of the whole. This certainly is an immediate way of laying an Obligation upon many, and extending his Benignity the furthest a Man can possibly, who is not engaged in Commerce. But he who trades, besides giving the State some part of this sort of Credit he gives his Banker, may in all the Occurrences of his Life have his Eye upon removing Writ from the Door of the Industrious, and defending the unhappy upright Man from Bankruptcy. Without this Benignity, Pride or Vengeance will precipitate a Man to chuse the Receipt of half his Demands from one whom he has undone, rather than the whole from one to whom he has shewn Mercy. This Benignity is essential to the Character of a fair Trader, and any Man who designs to enjoy his Wealth with Honour and Self Satisfaction. Nay, it would not be hard to maintain, that the Practice of supporting good and industrious Men, would carry a Man further even to his Profit, than indulging the Propensity of serving and obliging the Fortune. My Author argues on this Subject, in order to incline Men's Minds to those who want them most, after this manner, We must at ways consider the Nature of things, and govern our selves accordingly. The wealthy Man, when he has repaid you, is upon a Balance with you, but the Person whom you favour'd with a Loan, if he be a good Man, will think himself in your Debt after he has paid you. The Wealthy and the Conspicuous are not obliged by the Benefit you do them, they think they confer a Benefit when they receive one. Your good Offices are always suspected, and it is with them the same thing to expect their Favour as to receive it. But the Man below you, who knows in the Good you have done him, you respected himself more than his Circumstances, does not act like an obliged Man, only to him from whom he has received a Benefit, but also to all who are capable of doing him one. And whatever little Offices he can do for you, he is so far from agnifying it, that he will labour to extenuate it in all his Actions and Expressions. Moreover, the Regard to what you do to a great Man, at best is taken notice of no further than by himself or his Family, but what you do to a Man of an humble Fortune, (provided always that he is a good and a modest Man) raises the Affections towards you of all Men of that Character (of which there are many) in the whole City.

There is nothing gains a Reputation to a Preacher so much as his own Practice, I am therefore casting about what Act of Benignity is in the Power of a SPECTATOR. Alas, that lies but in a very narrow compass, and I think the most immediate under my Patronage, are either Players, or such whose Circumstances bear an Affinity with theirs. All therefore I am able to do at this time of this Kind, is to tell the Town that on Friday the 21th of this Instant April, there will be perform'd in York-Buildings a Consort of Vocal and Instrumental Musick, for the Benefit of Mr Edward Keen, the Father of twenty Children, and that this Day the haughty George Powell hopes all the good natured part of the Town will favour him, whom they Applauded in Alexander, Timon, Icar, and Orestes, with their Company this Night, when he hazards all his heroic Glory for their Approbation in the humbler Condition of honest Jack Falstaff 1

Quis furor & Crues! qua tanta licentia ferri!
Lucan

I DO not question but my Country Readers I have been very much surprized at the several Accounts they have met with in our publick Papers of that Species of Men among us, lately known by the Name of Mohocks. I find the Opinions of the Learned, as to their Origin and Designs, are altogether various, insomuch that very many begin to doubt whether indeed there were ever any such Society of Men. The Error which spread it self over the whole Nation some Years since, on account of the Irish, is still fresh in most Peoples Memories, tho' it afterwards appeared there was not the least Ground for that general Consternation.

The late Pinch Icar was, in the Opinion of many deep and penetrating Persons, of the same nature. These will have it, that the Mohocks are like those Spectres and Apparitions which frighten several Towns and Villages in her Majesty's Dominions, tho' they were never seen by any of the Inhabitants. Others are apt to think that these Mohocks are a kind of Bull Beggars, first invented by prudent married Men and Masters of Families, in order to deter their Wives and Daughters from taking the Air at unseasonable Hours, and that when they tell them the Mohocks will catch them, it is a Caution of the same nature with that of our Fore Fathers, when they bid their Children have a care of Rare-lead and Bloody bones.

For my own part, I am afraid there was too much Reason for that great Alarm the whole City has been in upon this Occasion: tho' at the same time I must own that I am in some doubt whether the following Pieces are Genuine and Authentick, and the more so, because I am not fully satisfied that the Name by which the Emperor subscribes himself, is altogether conformable to the Indian Orthography.

I shall only further inform my Readers, that it was some time since I receiv'd the following Letter and Manifesto, tho' for particular Reasons I did not think fit to publish them till now.

SIA,

'Finding that our earnest Endeavours for the Good of Mankind have been barely and maliciously represented to the World, we send you enclosed our Imperial Manifesto, which it is our Will and Pleasure that you forthwith communicate to the Publick, by inserting it in your next daily Paper. We do not doubt of your ready Compliance in this Particular, and therefore bid you heartily Farewell.

Sign'd, Trw Waw Eben Zan Kaladar,
Emperor of the Mohocks

The Manifesto of Trw Waw Eben Zan Kaladar, Emperor of the Mohocks

'Whereas we have received Information from sundry Quarters of this great and populous City, of several Outrages committed on the Legs, Arms, Noes, and other Parts of the good People of England, by such as have styled themselves our Subjects, in order to vindicate our Imperial Dignity from those false Aspersions which have been cast on it, as if we our selves might have encouraged or abetted any such Practices we have, by these Presents, thought fit to signify our utmost Abhorrence and Detestation of all such tumultuous and irregular Proceedings, and do hereby further give notice, that if any Person or Persons has or have suffered any Wound, Hurt, Damage or Detriment in his or their Limb or Limbs, otherwise than shall be hereafter specified, the said Person or Persons, upon applying themselves to such as we shall appoint for the Inspection and Redress of the Grievances aforesaid, shall be forthwith committed to the Care of our principal Surgeon, and be cured at our own Expence, in some one or other of those Hospitals which we are now erecting for that purpose.

'And to the end that no one may, either through Ignorance or Indifference, incur those Penalties which we have thought fit to inflict on Persons of loose and dissolute Lives, we do hereby notify to the Publick, that if any Man be knocked down or assaulted while he is employed in his lawful Business, at proper Hours, that it is not done by our Order, and we do hereby permit and allow any such person so knocked down or assaulted, to rise again, and defend himself in the best manner that he is able.

'We do also command all and every our good Subjects, that they do not presume, upon any Pretext whatsoever, to issue and rally forth from their respective Quarters, till between the Hours of Eleven and Twelve. That they never Tip the Lion upon Man, Woman or Child, till the Clock at St. Distan's shall have struck One.

'That the Sweat be never given but between the Hours of One and Two always provided, that our Hunters may begin to Hunt a little after the Close of the Evening, any thing to the contrary herein notwithstanding. Provided also, that if ever they are reduced to the Necessity of Pissing, it shall always be in the most fleshy Parts, and such as are least exposed to view.

'It is also our Imperial Will and Pleasure, that our good Subjects the Swatters do establish their Hummums in such close Places, Alleys, Nooks, and Corners, that the Patient or Patients may not be in danger of catching Cold.

'That the Tumblers, to whose Care we chiefly commit the Female Sex, confine themselves to Drury Lane and the Purlieus of the Temple, and that every other Party and Division of our Subjects do each of them keep within the respective Quarters we have allotted to them. Provided nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall

'in any wise be construed to extend to the Hunters, who have our full Licence and Permission to enter into any Part of the Town where ever their Game shall lead them

'And whereas we have nothing more at our Imperial Heart than the Reformation of the Cities of London and Westminster, which to our unspeakable Satisfaction we have in some measure already effected, we do hereby earnestly pray and exhort all Husbands, Fathers, Housekeepers and Masters of Families, in either of the aforesaid Cities, not only to repair themselves to their respective Habitations at early and seasonable Hours, but also to keep their Wives and Daughters, Sons, Servants, and Apprentices, from appearing in the Streets at those Times and Seasons which may expose them to a military Discipline, as it is practised by our good Subjects the Mohocks: and we do further promise, on our Imperial Word, that as soon as the Reformation aforesaid shall be brought about, we will forthwith cause all Hostilities to cease

In diem placare parat virtute relicta — Hor

MR SPECTATOR,

I HAVE not seen you lately at any of the Places where I visit, so that I am afraid you are wholly unacquainted with what passes among my part of the World, who are, tho' I say it, without Controversy, the most accomplished and best bred of the Town. Give me leave to tell you, that I am extremely discomposed when I hear Scandal, and am in utter Enemy to all manner of Detraction, and think it the greatest Impudence that People of Distinction can be guilty of. However, it is hardly possible to come into Company, where you do not find them pulling one another to pieces, and that from no other Provocation but that of hearing any one commended Merit, both as to Wit and Beauty, is become no other than the Possession of a few trifling People's Favour, which you cannot possibly arrive at, if you have really any thing in you that is deserving. What they would bring to pass, is, to make all Good and Evil consist in Report, and with Whispers, Calumnies and Impertinencies, to have the Conduct of those Reports. By this means Innocents are blasted upon their first Appearance in Town and there is nothing more required to make a young Woman the object of Envy and Hatred, than to deserve Love and Admiration. This abominable Endeavour to suppress or lessen every thing that is praise worthy, is as frequent among the Men as the Women. If I can remember what passed at a Visit last Night, it will serve as an Instance that the Sexes are equally inclined to Defamation, with equal Malice, with equal Impotence. Jack Triplett came into my Lady Argy's about Light of [the] Clock. You know the manner we sit at a Visit, and I need not describe the Circle but Mr Triplett came in, introduced by two Tapers, supported by a spruce Servant, whose Hair is under a Cap till my Lady's Candles are all lighted up, and the Hour of Ceremony begins. I say, Jack Triplett came in, and singing (for he is really good Company) 'Tarry Sec'ure, Charming Creature, — he went on, It is a most unreasonable thing that People cannot go peaceably to see their Friends, if these Murderers are let loose. Such a Shape! such an Air! what a Glance! was that as her Chariot pass'd by mine. My Lady herself interrupted him, Pray who is this fine Thing? — I warrant, says another, 'tis the Creature I was telling your Ladyship of just now. You were telling off! says Jack, I wish I had been so happy as to have come in and heard you, for I have not Words to say what she is. But if an agreeable Height, a modest Air, a Virgin Shame, and Impudence of being beheld, amidst a Blizz of ten thousand Charms — The whole Room flew out — Oh Mr Triplett! — When Mrs. Lofty, a known Prude said she believed she knew whom the Gentleman meant, but she was indeed, as he civilly represented her, impatient of being beheld — Then turning to the Lady next to her — The most unbr'd Creature you ever saw. Another pursued the Discourse. As unbr'd, Madam, as you may think her, she is extremely bely'd if she is the Novice she appears, she was last Week at a Ball till two in the Morning. Mr Triplett knows whether he was the happy Man that took Care of her home, but — This was followed by some particular Exception that each Woman in the Room made to some peculiar Grace or Advantage so that Mr Triplett was beaten from one Limb and Feature to another, till he was forced to resign the whole Woman. In the end I took notice Triplett recorded all this Malice in his Heart, and saw in his Countenance, and a certain waggish Shrug, that he design'd to repeat the Conversation. I therefore let the Discourse die, and soon after took an Occasion to commend a certain Gentleman of my Acquaintance for a Person of singular Modesty, Courage, Integrity, and withal as a Man of an entertaining Conversation, to which Advantages he had a Shape and Manner peculiarly graceful. Mr Triplett, who is a Woman's Man, seem'd to hear me with Patience enough commend the Qualities of his Mind. He never heard indeed but that he was a very honest Man, and no Fool but for a fine Gentleman, he must ask Pardon. Upon no other Foundation than this, Mr Triplett took occasion to give the Gentleman a Paysee, by what Method some part of the Estate was acquired, how much it was beholden to Marriage for the present Circumstances of it. After all, he could see nothing but a common Man in his Person, his Breeding or Understanding. Thus, Mr SPECTATOR, this impertinent Humour of diminishing every one who is produced in Conversation to their Advantage runs thro' the World, and I am, I confess, so fearful of the Force of ill Tongues, that I have begged of all those who are my Well-wishers never to com'mend me, for it will but bring my Faults into Examination, and I had rather be unobserved, than conspicuous for disputed Perfections. I am confident a thousand young People, who would have been Ornaments to Society, have, from Fear of Scandal, never dared to exert themselves in the polite Arts of Life. Their Lives have passed away in an odious Rusticity, in spite of great Advantages of Person, Genius and Fortune. There is a vicious Error of being blamed in some well inclin'd People, and a wicked Pleasure in suppressing them in others: both which I recommend to your Spectatorial Wisdom to remedy upon, and if you can be successful in it, I need not say how much you will deserve of the Town, but new Toasts will owe to you the Beauty, and new Wits their Fame. I am,

SIR,

Your most Obedient

Humble Servant,

R Mary

Quos ille timorem

Maximus haud urget lethi mæus: inde ruendi
In ferrum nec sibi proavis, aut uerget capaces Aloris. — Lucan

I AM very much pleas'd with a Consolatory Letter of Phalaris, to one who had lost a Son that is a young Man of great Merit. The Thought with which he comforts the afflicted Father, is, to the best of my Memory, as follows. That he should consider Death had set a kind of Seal upon his Son's Character, and placed him out of the Reach of Vice and Infamy. That while he liv'd he was still within the Possibility of falling away from Virtue, and losing the Time of which he was possessed. Death only closes a Man's Reputation, and determines it as good or bad.

Thus, among other Motives, may be one Reason why we are naturally averse to the touching out into a Man's Præise till his Heart is lodg'd in the Dust. Whilst he is capable of changing, we may be forced to retract our Opinions. He may forfeit the Esteem we have conceived of him and some time or other appear to us under a different Light from what he does it present. In short, as the Life of any Man cannot be call'd happy, or unhappy, so neither can it be pronounced vicious or virtuous, before the Conclusion of it.

It was upon this consideration that Epaminondas, being asked whether Chabrias, Sphurates, or he himself, deserved most to be esteemed? You must first see us die, said he, before that Question can be answered.

As there is not a more melancholy Consideration to a good Man than his being obnoxious to such a Change, so there is nothing more glorious than to keep up an Uniformity in his Actions, and preserve the Beauty of his Character to the last.

The End of a Man's Life is often compared to the winding up of a well-written Play, where the principal Persons still act in Character, whatever the Fate is which they undergo. There is scarce a great Person in the Grecian or Roman History, whose Death has not been remark'd upon by some Writer or other, and censured or applauded according to the Genius or Principles of the Person who has descanted on it. Monsieur de St. Evremont is very particular in setting forth the Constancy and Courage of Petrus Arbutus during his last Moments, and thinks he discovers in them a greater Firmness of Mind and Resolution than in the Death of Demetrius, Cato, or Socrates. There is no question but this polite Author's Affection of appearing singular in his Remarks, and making Discoveries which had escaped the Observation of others, threw him into this course of Reflection. It was Petrus is a Man, that he died in the same Guilty of Temper in which he lived. But as his Life was altogether loose and dissolute, the Indifference which he showed at the Close of it is to be looked upon as a piece of natural Carelessness and Levity, rather than Fortitude. The Resolution of Socrates proceeds from very different Motives, the Consciousness of a well spent Life, and the prospect of a happy Eternity. If the ingenious Author above mentioned was so pleas'd with Guilty of Humour in a dying Man, he might have found a much nobler Instance of it in our Countryman Sir Thomas More.

This great and learned Man was famous for enlivening his ordinary Discourses with Wit and Plevantancy, and, as Erasmus tells him in an Epistle Dedicatory, acted in all parts of Life like a second Democritus.

He died upon a Point of Religion, and is respected as a Martyr by that Side for which he suffer'd. That innocent Mirth which had been so conspicuous in his Life did not forsake him to the last. He maintain'd the same Cheerfulness of Heart upon the Scaffold, which he us'd to shew at his Table and upon his many his Head on the Block, gave Instances of it in Good-Humour with which he had always entertained his Friends in the most ordinary Occurrences. His Death was of a piece with his Life. There was nothing in it new, forced or affected. He did not look upon the severing of his Head from his Body as a Circumstance that ought to produce any Change in the Disposition of his Mind: and as he died under a fixed and settled Hope of Immortality, he thought any unusual degree of sorrow and Concern improper on such an Occasion, as had nothing in it which could deject or terrify him.

There is no great danger of Imitation from this Example. Men's natural Fears will be a sufficient Guard against it. I shall only observe, that what was Philosophy in this extraordinary Man, would be Frenzy in one who does not resemble him as well in the Cheerfulness of his Temper, as in the Sanctity of his Life and Manners.

I shall conclude this Paper with the Instance of a Person who seems to me to have shewn more Intrepidity and Greatness of Soul in his dying Moments, than what we meet with among any of the most celebrated Greeks and Romans. I met with this Instance in the History of the Re-

volutions in Portugal, written by the Abbot de Vertot¹

When Don Sebastian, King of Portugal, had invaded the Territories of Muly Moluc, Emperor of Morocco, in order to dethrone him, and set his Crown upon the Head of his Nephew, Moluc was warring wry with a Distemper which he himself knew was incurable. However, he prepared for the Reception of so formidable an Enemy. He was indeed so far spent with his Sickness, that he did not expect to live out the whole Day, when the last decisive Battel was given, but knowing the fatal Consequences that would happen to his Children and People, in case he should die before he put an end to that War, he commanded his principal Officers that if he died during the Engagement, they should conceal his Death from the Army, and that they should ride up to the Litter in which his Corpse was carried, under Pretence of receiving Orders from him as usual. Before the Battel begun, he was carried through all the Ranks of his Army in an open Litter, as they stood drawn up in Array, encouraging them to fight valiantly in defence of their Religion and Country. Finding afterwards the Battel to go against him, tho' he was very near his last Agonies, he threw himself out of his Litter, rallied his Army, and led them on to the Charge, which afterwards ended in a compleat Victory on the side of the Moors. He had no sooner brought his Men to the Engagement, but finding himself utterly spent, he was again replaced in his Litter, where lying his Finger on his Mouth, to enjoin Secrecy to his Officers, who stood about him, he died a few Moments after in that Posture. Ea animi elatio quæ cernitur in periculis, si Justitia vacat pugnatque pro suis commodis, in quo est—Tull

CAPTAIN SENTREY was last Night at the Club, and produced a Letter from Ipswich, which his Correspondent desired him to communicate to his Friend the SPECTATOR. It contained an Account of an Engagement between a French Privateer, commanded by one Donusick Pottiere, and a little Vessel of that Place laden with Corn, the Master whereof, as I remember, was one Goodwin. The Englishman defended himself with incredible Bravery, and beat off the French, after having been boarded three or four times. The Enemy still came on with greater Fury, and hoped by his Number of Men to carry the Prize, till at last the Englishman finding himself sunk, spruce, and ready to perish, struck. But the Effect which this singular Gallantry had upon the Captain of the Privateer, was no other than an unmanly Desire of Vengeance for the Loss he had sustained in his several Attacks. He told the Ipswich Man in a speaking-Trumpet, that he would not take him aboard, and that he strayed to see him sink. The Englishman at the same time observed a Disorder in the Vessel, which he rightly judged to proceed from the Disorder in which the Ship's Crew had of their Captain's Inhumanity. With this Hope he went into his Boat, and approached the Enemy. He was taken in by the Sailors in spite of their Commander but though they received him against his Command, they treated him when he was in the Ship in the manner he directed. Pottiere caused his Men to hold Goodwin, while he beat him with a Stick till he frunted with Loss of Blood, and Rage of Heart after which he ordered him into Irons without allowing him any Food, but such as one or two of the Men stole to him under peril of the like Usage. After having kept him several Days overwhelmed with the Misery of Stench, Hunger, and Soreness, he brought him into Calais. The Governor of the Place was soon acquainted with all that had passed, dismissed Pottiere from his Charge with Ignominy, and gave Goodwin all the Relief which a Man of Honour would bestow upon an Enemy barbarously treated, to recover the Imputation of Cruelty upon his Prince and Country.

When Mr SENTREY had read his Letter, full of many other circumstances which aggravate the Barbarity, he fell into a sort of Criticism upon Magnanimity and Courage, and argued that they were inseparable and that Courage, without regard to Justice and Humanity, was no other than the Fierceness of a wild Beast. A good and truly bold Spirit, continued he, is ever actuated by Reason and a Sense of Honour and Duty. The Affection of such a Spirit exerts itself in an Impudent Aspect, an over-bearing Confidence, and a certain Negligence of giving Offence. This is visible in all the cocking Youths you see about this Town, who are noisy in Assemblies, unruly by the Presence of wise and virtuous Men, in a word, insensible of all the Honours and Decencies of human Life. A shameless Fellow takes advantage of Merit clothed with Modesty and Magnanimity, and in the Eyes of little People appears sprightly and agreeable, while the Man of Resolution and true Gallantry is overlooked and disregarded, if not despised. There is a Propriety in all things and I believe what you Scholars call just and sublime, in opposition to turgid and bombast Expression, may give you an Idea of what I mean, when I say Modesty is the certain Indication of a great Spirit, and Impudence the Affection of it. He that writes with Judgment, and never rises into improper Warmths, manifests the true Force of Genius in like manner, he who is quiet and equal in all his Behaviour, is supported in that Deportment by what we may call true Courage. Alas, it is not so easy a thing to be a brave Man as the unthinking part of Mankind imagine To die, is not all that there is in it. The Privater we were just now talking of, had Boldness enough to attack his Enemy but not Greatness of Mind enough to admire the same Quality exerted by that Enemy in defending himself. Thus his base and little Mind was wholly taken up in the sordid regard to the Prize, of which he failed and the damage done to his own Vessel and therefore he used an honest War, who defended his own from him, in the Manner as he would a Thief that should rob him.

He was equally disappointed, and had not Spirit enough to consider that one Case would be Laudable and the other Criminal. Malice, Rancour, Hatred, Vengeance, are what tear the Breasts of men in Fight but Fame, Glory, Conquests, Desires of Opportunities to pardon and oblige their Opposers are what glow in the Minds of the Gallant. The Captain ended his Discourse with a Specimen of his Book-Learning and gave us to understand that he had read a French Author on the Subject of Juvenal in point of Gallantry. I love, said Mr. SPECTER, a Critick who mixes the Rules of Life with Annotations upon Writers. My Author, added he, in his Discourse upon Epick Poem, takes occasion to speak of the same Quality of Courage driven in the two different Characters of Turnus and Aeneas. He makes Courage the chief and greatest Ornament of Turnus, but in Aeneas there are many others which out shine it, amongst the rest that of Piety. Turnus is therefore all along painted by the Poet full of Ostentation, his Language haughty and vain glorious as placing his Honour in the Manifestation of his Valour. Aeneas speaks little, is slow to Action, and shows only a sort of defensive Courage. If Equipage and Address make Turnus appear more courageous than Aeneas, Conduct and Success prove Aeneas more valiant than Turnus. T

Ir te omis domus inclinata recurrit —Virg

IF we look into the three great Heroick Poems which have appeared in the World, we may observe that they are built upon very slight Foundations. Homer lived near 300 Years after the Trojan War and, as the writing of History was not then in use among the Greeks, we may very well suppose that the Tradition of Achilles and Ulysses had brought down but very few particulars to his knowledge tho' there is no question but he has wrought into his two Poems such of their remarkable Adventures, as were still talked of among his Contemporaries.

The Story of Aeneas, on which Virgil founded his Poem, was likewise very bare of Circumstances and by that means afforded him an Opportunity of embellishing it with Fiction, and giving a full range to his own Invention. We find, however, that he has interwoven, in the course of his Fable, the principal Particulars, which were generally believed among the Romans, of Aeneas his Voyage and Settlement in Italy.

The Reader may find an Abridgment of the whole Story as collected out of the ancient Historians, and as it was received among the Romans, in Dionysius Halicarnassensis.

Since none of the Criticks have considered Virgil's Fable, with relation to this History of Aeneas, it may not, perhaps, be amiss to examine it in this Light, so far as regards my present Purpose. Whoever looks into the Abridgment above mentioned, will find that the Character of Aeneas is filled with Piety to the Gods, and a superstitious Observation of Prodigious, Oracles, and Predictions. Virgil has not only preserved this Character in the Person of Aeneas, but has given a place in his Poem to those particular Prophecies which he found recorded of him in History and Tradition. The Poet took the matters of Fact as they came down to him, and circumstanced them after his own manner, to make them appear the more natural, agreeable, or surprising. I believe very many Readers have been shocked at that ludicrous Prophecy, which one of the Harpyes pronounces to the Trojans in the third Book, namely, that before they had built their intended City, they should be reduced by Hunger to eat their very Tables. But, when they hear that this was one of the Circumstances that had been transmitted to the Romans in the History of Aeneas, they will think the Poet did very well in taking notice of it. The Historian above mentioned acquaints us, a Prophetess had foretold Aeneas that he should take his Voyage Westward, till his Companions should eat their Tables and that accordingly, upon his landing in Italy, as they were eating their Flesh upon Calves of Brawn, for want of other Conventences, they afterwards fed on the Cakes themselves upon which one of the Company said merrily, We are eating our Tables. They immediately took the Hint, says the Historian, and concluded the Prophecy to be fulfilled. As Virgil did not think it proper to omit so material a particular in the History of Aeneas it may be worth while to consider with how much Judgment he has qualified it, and taken off every thing that might have appeared improper for a Passage in an Heroick Poem. The Prophetess who foretells it, is an Hungry Harpy, as the Person who discovers it is young Ascanius.

Such an observation, which is beautiful in the Mouth of a Boy, would have been ridiculous from any other of the Company. I am apt to think that the changing of the Trojan Fleet into Water-Nymphs, which is the most violent Machine in the whole Aeneid, and has given offence to several Criticks may be accounted for the same way. Virgil himself, before he begins that Relation, premises, that what he was going to tell appeared incredible, but that it was justified by Tradition. What further confirms me that this Change of

² Dionysius says that the prophecy was either, as some write given at Dodona, or, as others say, by a Sybil, and the exclamation was by one of the sons of Aeneas, as it is related, or he was some other of his comrades

the Plot was a celebrated Circumstance in the History of Aeneas, is, that Orin has given place to the same Metamorphosis in his Account of the heathen Mythology.

None of the Critics I have met with having considered the Fable of the Aeneid in this Light, and taken notice how the Tradition, on which it was founded, illustrates those Parts in it which appear the most exceptionable, I hope the Length of this Reflection will not make it unacceptable to the curious Part of my Readers.

The History, which was the Basis of Plillon's Poem, is still shorter than either that of the Iliad or Aeneid. The Poet has likewise taken care to insert every Circumstance of it in the Body of his Fable. The ninth Book, which we are here to consider, is raised upon that brief Account in Scripture, wherein we are told that the Serpent was more subtle than any Beast of the Field, that he tempted the Woman to eat of the forbidden Fruit, that she was overcome by this Temptation, and that Adam followed her Example. From these few Particulars, Plillon has formed one of the most Entertaining Fables that Invent on ever produce. He has disposed of these several Circumstances among so many beautiful and natural Fictions of his own, that his whole Story looks only like a Comment upon sacred Writ, or rather seems to be a full and complete Relation of what the other is only an Epitome. I have insisted the longer on this Consideration, as I look upon the Disposition and Contrivance of the Fable to be the principal Beauty of the ninth Book, which has more Story in it, and is fuller of Incidents, than any other in the whole Poem. Satan's traversing the Globe, and still keeping within the Shadow of the Night, as fearing to be discovered by the Angel of the Sun, who had before detected him, is one of those beautiful Imaginations with which he introduces this his second Series of Adventures. Having examined the Nature of every Creature, and found out one which was the most proper for his Purpose, he again returns to Paradise, and, to avoid Discovery, sinks by Night with a River that runs under the Garden, and rises up again through a Fountain that issued from it by the Tree of Life. The Poet, who, as we have before taken notice, speaks as little as possible in his own Person and, after the Example of Homer, fills every Part of his Work with Manners and Characters introduces a Soliloquy of this infernal Agent, who was thus restless in the Destruction of Man. He is then described as gliding through the Garden under the resemblance of a Mist, in order to find out that Creature in which he design'd to tempt our first Parents. This Description has something in it very Poetical and Surprising.

So saying, through each Thicket Dark or Dry, Like a black Mist, low creeping, he held on His Midnight Search, where soonest he might find

The Serpent him fast sleeping soon he found In Labyrinth of many a Round self-roll'd, His Head the mists, well stor'd with subtle Wiles

² [run]

The Author afterwards gives us a Description of the Morning, which is wonderfully suitable to a Divine Poem, and peculiar to that first Season of Nature. He represents the Earth, before it was erect, as a great Altar, breathing out its Incense from all Parts, and sending up pleasant Savour to the Nostrials of its Creator, to which he adds a noble Idea of Adam and Eve, as offering their Morning Worship, and filling up the Unversal Consort of Praise and Adoration.

*As when, as soon as Light began to dawn
It shon on the first and lowly Earth, that breathed Her Morning Incense, when all things that Breathe*

From the Earth's great Altar send up silent Praise

To the Creator, and his Nostrils fill With grateful Smell, for he came the human Part

As if to bid their vocal Woes up to the Choir Of Creatures 'singing Voice—

The Dispute which follows between our two first Parents, is represented with great Art. It proceeds from a Difference of Judgment, not of Passion, and is managed with Reason, not with Heat. It is such a Dispute as we may suppose might have happened in Paradise, had Man continued Happy and Innocent. There is a great Delicacy in the Moralities which are interposed in Adam's Discourse, and which the most ordinary Reader cannot but take notice of. That Force of Love which the Father of Mankind so finely describes in the eighth Book, and which is inserted in my List Satan's sly Pique, shews itself here in many fine Instances. As in those fond Regards he cast towards Eve at her parting from him.

Her long with ardent I look'd as Eye pursued She's gone, but desiring more her stay Oft I to her his Charge of quick return Repeated, she to him as oft engaged To be return'd by noon amid the Bower

In his Impatience and Amusement during her Absence.

*Admiring thus, what Wastu & desirous for return, had as Of choices? Flovers a Garland, to adorn Her tresses, and her rural Labour crown
As heaves of oft are wont their Hardest Queen Greet? Joy he promised to his thoughts, and new Solace in her return, so long delay'd*

But particularly in that passionate Speech, where seeing her irrecoverably lost, he resolves to perish with her rather than to live without her.

*Some cursed Fraud Or Enemy, with Legions thee, yet unknown,
And me with thee! all ruin'd, for with thee Certain my Resolution is to die!
How can I live without thee, how forego Thy sweet Converse and Love so deary to me,
To live again in these wild Woes forlorn?*

² [arises]

Should God create another Eve and I Another Rib afford, yet loss of thee Would never from my Heart² no, nor I feel The Link of Nature draw me Ilesh of Flesh, Bone of my Bone tho' at a distance from thy State, Mine ne'er shall be parted, Bliss or Woe!

The Beginning of this Speech, and the Preparation to it are animated with the same Spirit as the Conclusion, which I have here quoted.

The several Wiles which are put in practice by the Tempter, when he found Eve separated from her Husband, the many pleasing Images of Nature which are intermix'd in this part of the Story, with its gradual and regular Progress to the final Catastrophe, are so very remarkable that it would be superfluous to point out their respective Beauties.

I have avoided mentioning any particular Similitudes in my Remarks on this great Work, because I have given a general Account of them in my Paper on the first Book. There is one, however, in this part of the Poem, which I shall here quote as it is not only very beautiful, but the closest of any in the whole Poem. I mean that where the Serpent is described as rolling forward in all his Pride, unmounted by the evil Spirit, and conducting Eve to her Destruction, while Adam was at too great a distance from her to give her his Assistance. These several Particulars are all of them wrought into the following Similitude.

*Hope elevates, as if Joy Brighten his Crest, as when a river brings Fire, Compact of unctuous Vapour, which the Night Condenses, and the Cold in currents round, Keeps still through Agitation to a Flame, (Which oft, they say, some evil Spirit attends) Holding and blazing with delusive Light, Mistaken thus and Night-vandlers from its Way
To logs and Mirres, and oft through Poi-son Peep,*

Flare sweet and up and lost, from succour far

That secret Intoxication of Pleasure, with all those transient flushings of Guilt and Joy which the Poet represents in our first Parents upon their eating the forbidden Fruit, to [those] flaggings of Spirits, damps of Sorrow, and mutual Accusations which succeed it, are concern'd with a wonderful Imagination, and described in very natural Sentiments.

When Dido in the fourth Æneid yielded to that fatal Temptation which ruin'd her, Virgil tells us the Earth trembled the Heavens were fill'd with Flashes of Lightning, and the Nymphs howled upon the Mountain-Tops. Milton, in the same poetical Spirit, has described all Nature as disturbed upon Eve's eating the forbidden Fruit.

*So saying, her rash Hand in evil hour Forth reaching to the Fruit, she pluckt, she eat Earth felt the wound, and Nature from her Seat Sighing, through all her Works gave signs of Woe
That all was lost——*

² [that]

Upon Adam's falling into the same Guilt, the whole Creation appears a second time in Conditions

It scried not to eat Against his better knowledge, not deceiv'd, But fondly overcome with female Charm Lur'd from his side, from her Intrails, as age In Pangs, and Nature gave a second Grain, She sowed, and man uttering Plunder, some said Drops

It set at compleatness of the mortal Sin——

As all Nature suffer'd by the Guilt of our first Parents, these Symptoms of Ironic and Condemnation are wonderfully imagined, not only as Produces, but as Marks of her Sympathizing in the Fall of Man.

Adam's Converse with Eve, after having eaten the forbidden Fruit, is an exact Copy of that between Jupiter and Juno in the fourteenth Iliad.
Juno there approaches Jupiter with the Girdle which she had received from Venus, upon which he tells her, that she appeared more charming and desirable than she [had ever] done before, even when their Loves were at the highest. The Poet afterwards describes them as reposing on a Summit of Mount Ida, which produced under them a Bed of Flowers, the Icos, the Crocus, and the Hyacinth, and concludes his Description with their falling asleep.

I let the Reader compare this with the following Passage in Milton, which begins with Adam's Speech to Eve.

*For we did this Beauty, since the Day
I saw thee first, as I wedded thee, adorn'd With all Perfection, so enthrall my Sense With order to enjoy thee, fairer to view
I have seen, Bounteous of this various Tree
So said he, and forlorn of Glance or Joy Of amorous Intent, walk in drows'ood Of Lull, whose Eye dar'd contagious Fair
Her hand to seize, and to a slady Bank Which overhad with'erlant Roof embow'd, He led her nothing loth Flowers on the Couch,*

*Pansies, and Violets, and Asphodel, And Hyacinth, Earth's freshest softest Lap
There they their fill of Love, and Love's disport,*

*Too largely, of their mutual Guilt the Seal,
The Solace of their Sin, till down Sleep Oppress'd them——*

As no Poet seems ever to have studied Homer more, or to have more resembled him in the Graciousness of Genius than Milton, I think I should have given but a very imperfect Account of his Beauties, if I had not observed the most remarkable Passages which look like Parallels in these two great Authors. I might, in the course of these criticisms, have taken notice of many particular Images and Expressions which are translated from the Greek Poet but as I thought this would have appeared too minute and over-curious, I have purposely omitted them. The greater Incidents, however, are not only set off

Si ad honestatem nati sumus, ea aut sola expetenda est, aut certe omni pondere gravior est habenda quam reliqua omnia — Jull

WILL HONEYCOMB was complaining to me yesterday, that the Conversation of the Town is so altered of late Years, that a fine Gentleman is at a loss for Matter to start Discourse, as well as unable to fall in with the Talk he generally meets with. WILL takes notice, that there is now an Evil under the Sun which he supposes to be entirely new, because not mentioned by any Satyrists or Moralists in any Age. Men, said he, grow Knaves sooner than they ever did since the Creation of the World before. If you read the Tragedies of the last Age, you find the artful Men and Persons of Intigue, are advanced very far in Years, and beyond the Pleasures and Sillies of Youth. but now WILL observes, that the Young have taken in the Vices of the Aged, and you shall have a Man of Five and Twenty crafty, false, and intriguing, not ashamed to overreach, cozen, and beguile. My Friend adds, that till about the latter end of King Charles's Reign, there was not a Rascal of any Eminence under forty in the Places of Resort for Conversation, you now hear nothing but what relates to the improving Men's Fortunes, without regard to the Methods toward it. This is so fashionable, that young Men form themselves upon a certain Neglect of every thing that is candid, simple, and worthy of true Esteem, and affect being yet worse than they are, by acknowledging in their general turn of Mind and Discourse, that they have not any remaining Value for true Honour and Honesty, preferring the Capacity of being Artful to gain their Ends, to the Merit of despising those Ends when they come in competition with their Honesty. All this is due to the very silly Pride that generally prevails, of being valued for the Ability of carrying their Point in a word, from the Opinion that shallow and inexperienced People entertain of the short liv'd Force of Cunning. But I shall, before I enter upon the various Faces which Folly cover'd with Artifice puts on to impose upon the Unthinking, produce a great Authority¹ for asserting, that nothing but Truth and Ingenuity has any lasting good Effect, even upon a Man's Fortune and Interest.

Truth and Reality have all the Advantages of Appearance, and many more. If the Shew of any thing be good for any thing, I am sure Sincerity is better. For why does any Man dissemble, or seem to be that which he is not, but because he thinks it good to have such a Quality as he pretends to? for to counterfeit and dissemble, is to put on the Appearance of some real Excellency. Now the best way in the World for a Man to seem to be any thing, is really to be what he would seem to be. Besides that it is many times as troublesome to make good the Pretence of a good Quality, as to have it, and if a Man have it not, it is ten to one but he is discover'd to want it, and then all his Pains and Labour to seem to have it is lost. There is something unnatural in Painting, which a skilful Eye will easily discern from native Beauty and Complexion.

It is hard to personate and act a Part long for where Truth is not at the bottom, Nature will always be endeavouring to return, and will peep out and betray her self one time or other. Therefore if any Man think it convenient to seem good, let him be so indeed, and then his Goodness will appear to every body's Satisfaction, so that upon all accounts Sincerity is true Wisdom. Particularly as to the Affairs of this World, Integrity hath many Advantages over all the fine and artificial ways of Dissimulation and Deceit. It is much the plainer and easier, much the safer and more secure way of dealing in the World. It has less of Trouble and Difficulty, of Entanglement and Perplexity, of Danger and Hazard in it. It is the shortest and nearest way to our End, carrying us thither in a straight line, and will hold out and last longest. The Arts of Deceit and Cunning grow continually grow weaker and less effectual and serviceable to them that use them, whereas Integrity gains Strength by use, and the more and longer any Man practiseth it, the greater Service it does him, by confirming his Reputation and encouraging those with whom he hath to do to repose the greatest Trust and Confidence in him, which is an unspeakable Advantage in the Business and Affairs of Life.

Truth is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out, it is always near at hand, and sits upon our Lips, and is ready to drop out before we are aware, whereas if I ye is troublesome, and sets a Man's Invention upon the rack, and one Trick needs a great many more to make it good. It is like building upon a false Foundation, which continually stands in need of Props to shoo it up, and proves at last more chargeable, than to have rais'd a substantial Building at first upon a true and solid Foundation for Sincerity is firm and substantial, and there is nothing hollow and unsound in it, and because it is plain and open, fears no Discovery of which the Crafty Man is always in danger, and when he thinks he walks in the dark, all his Pretences are so transparent, that he that runs may read them. He is the last Man that finds himself to be found out and whilst he takes it for granted that he makes Fools of others, he renders himself ridiculous.

Add to all this, that Sincerity is the most commendous Wisdom, and an excellent Instrument for the speedy dispatch of Business. It creates Confidence in those we have to deal with, saves the Labour of many Enquiries, and brings things to an issue in few Words. It is like travelling in a plain beaten Road, which commonly brings a

'Such are all the Parts of Practical Geometry I have known a Man contract a Friendship with a Minister of State, upon cutting a Durl in his Window, and remember a Clergyman who got out of the best Benefices in the West of England, by setting a Country Gentleman's Affairs in some Method, and giving him an exact Survey of his Estate

'While I am upon this Subject, I cannot forbear mentioning a Particular which is of use in every Station of Life, and which methinks every Master should teach his Scholars I mean the writing of English Letters To this End, instead of perplexing them with Latin Epistles, Themes and Verses, there might be a punctual Correspondence established between two Boys, who might yet in any imaginary Parts of Business, or be allow'd sometimes to give a range to their own Fancies, and communicate to each other whatever Trifles they thought fit, provided neither of them ever fail'd at the appointed time to answer his Correspondent's Letter

'I believe I may venture to affirm, that the generality of Boys would find themselves more advantaged by this Custom, when they come to be Men, than by all the Greek and Lat in their Masters can teach them in seven or eight Years

'The want of it is very visible in many learned Persons, who, while they are admiring the Styles of Demosthenes or Cicero, want Phrases to express themselves on the most common Occasions I have seen a Letter from one of these Latin Orators, which would have been deservedly laugh'd at by a common Attorney

'Under this Head of Writing I cannot omit Accounts and Short-hand, which are learned with little pains, and very properly come into the number of such Arts as I have been here recommending

'You must doubtless, Sir, observe that I have hitherto chiefly insisted upon these things for such Boys as do not appear to have any thing extraordinary in their natural Talents, and consequently are not qualified for the finer Parts of Learning yet I believe I might carry this Matter still further, and venture to assert that a Lad of Genius has sometimes occasion for these little Acquirements, to be as it were the fore-runners of his Parts, and to introduce [him] into the World

'History is full of Examples of Persons, who tho' they have had the largest Abilities, have been obliged to insinuate themselves into the Favour of great Men by these trivial Accomplishments as the compleat Gentleman, in some of our modern Comedies, makes his first Advances to his Mistress under the disguise of a Painter or a Dancing-Master

'The Difference is, that in a Lad of Genius these are only so many Accomplishments, which in another are Essentials the one diverts himself with them, the other works at them In short, I look upon a great Genius, with these little Additions, in the same Light as I regard the Grand Signior, who is obliged, by an express Command in the Alcoran, to learn and practise some Handycraft Trade Tho' I need not have gone for my Instance farther than Germany, where several Emperors have voluntarily done the same thing Leopold the last, I would in Word and I have heard there are several handycraft Works of his making to be seen at Venna so neatly turned, that the best Joiner in Europe might safely own them, without an disgrace to his Profession

'I would not be thought, by any thing I have said, to be unjust improv'n, a Boys Genius to the utmost pitch it can be carry'd What I would endeavour to show in this Essay is, that there may be Methods taken, to make Learning advantageous even to the meanest Capricies

I am, SIR,

Yours, &c

Mr SPECTATOR,

YOU have in some of your Discourses described most sorts of Women in their distinct and proper Classes, as the Ape, the Coquet, and many others, but I think you have never yet said anything of a Devotee A Devotee is one of those who dispraise Religion by their indiscreet and unseasonable introduction of the Mention of Virtue on all Occasions[s] She professes she is a hat nobody ought to doubt she is an I betrays the Labour she is put to, to be what she ought to be with Cheerfulness and Alacrity She lives in the World, and denies her self none of the Diversions of it, with a constant Declaration how she did all things in it are to her She is never her self but at Church, there she displays her Virtue, and is so fervent in her Devotions, that I have frequently seen her Pray her self out of Breath While other young Ladies in the House are dancing, or playing at Questions and Commands, she reads aloud in her Closet She says all Love is ridiculous, except 't be Celestial but she speaks of the Passion of one Mortal to another with too much Bitterness, for one that had no Jealousy mixed with her Contempt of it. If at any time she sees a Man

¹ Leopold the last was also Leopold the First He died May 6, 1705, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Joseph, who died while the Spectator was being issued, and had now been followed by his brother, the Archduke Charles whose claim to the crown of Spain England had been supporting, when his recession to the German throne had not seemed probable His coronation as Charles VI was, therefore, one cause of the peace. Leopold, born in 1640, and educated by the Jesuits, became Emperor in 1688, and reigned 49 years He was an adept in metaphysics and theology, as well as in wood turning, but a feeble and oppressive ruler, whose empire was twice saved for him by Sobieski from the Turks, and from the French by Marlborough.

fully increase to the Distributer's Hand, and see their God in Person Feeding and Refreshing his Creatures! Oh Envyed Happiness! But why do I say Envyed? as if our [God] did not still preside over our temperate Meals, cheerful Hours, and innocent Conversations

Put tho' the sacred Story is every where full of Miracles not inferior to this, and tho' in the midst of those Acts of Divinity he never gave the least Hint of a Design to become a Secular Prince, yet had not hitherto the Apostles themselves any other than Hopes of worldly Power, Preferment, Riches and Pomp for Peter, upon an Accident of Ambition among the Apostles hearing his Master explain that his Kingdom was not of this World, was so scandalized¹ that he whom he had so long followed should suffer the Ignominy, Shame, and Death which he foretold that he took him aside and said, Be it far from thee, Lord, this shall not be unto thee For which he suffered a severe Reprehension from his Master, as having in his View the Glory of Man rather than that of God

The great Change of things began to draw near, when the Lord of Nature thought fit as a Saviour and Deliverer to make his publick Entry into Jerusalem with more than the Power and Joy, but none of the Ostentation and Pomp of a Triumph he came Humble, Meek, and Lowly with an unfeigned new Ecstasy, Multitudes strewed his Way with Garments and Olive-Branches, Crying with loud Gladness and Acclamation, *Hosanna to the Son of David, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord*¹ At this great King's Accession to his Throne, Men were not Ennobled, but Sav'd Crimes were not Remitted, but Sins Forgiven he did not bestow Medals, Honours, Favours, but Health, Joy, Sight, Speech The first Object the Blind ever saw, was the Author of Sight while the Lame Ran before, and the Dumb repeated the Hosanna! Thus attended, he Entered into his own House, the sacred Temple and by his Divine Authority expell'd Traders and Worldlings that profaned it and thus did he, for a time, use a great and despotick Power, to let Unbelievers understand, that 'twas not Want of, but Superiority to all Worldly Dominion, that made him not exert it But is this then the Saviour? is this the Deliverer? Shall this Obscure Nazarene command Israel, and sit on the Throne of *David*² Their proud and disdainful Hearts, which were petrified with the Love and Pride of this World, were impregnable to the Reception of so mean a Benefactor, and were now enough exasperated with Benefits to conspire his Death Our Lord was sensible of their Design, and prepared his Disciples for it, by recounting to 'em now more distinctly what should befall him but Peter with an ungrounded Resolution, and in a Flush of Temper, made a strange Protestation, that tho' all Men were offended in him, yet would not he be offended It was a great Article of our Saviour's Business in the World, to bring us to a Sense of our Inability, without God's Assistance, to do any thing great or good he therefore told Peter, who thought so well of his Courage and Fidelity, that they would both fail him, and even he should deny him Thrice that very Night

But what Heart can conceive what Tongue utter the Sequel? Who is that yonder buffeted, mock'd, and spurr'd? Whom do they drag like a Felon? Whither do they carry my Lord, my King, my Saviour, and my God? And will he die to Expiate those very Injuries? See where they have nailed the Lord and Giver of Life! How his Wounds blacken, his Body swells, and Heart heaves with Pity and with Agony! Oh Almighty Sufferer, look down, look down from thy trust if thou art Infamy! Lo he inclines his Head to his sacred Bosom! Hark, he Groans! see, he Expires! The Earth trembles the Temple rends, the Rocks burst, the Dead Arise! What are the Quack? Which are the Dead? Sure Nature, all Nature is departing with her Creation

THE Tenth Book of Paradise Lost has a greater variety of Persons in it than any other in the whole Poem The Author upon the winding up of his Action introduces all those who had any Concern in it, and shews with great Beauty the Influence which it had upon each of them It is like the last Act of a well-written Tragedy in which all who had a part in it are generally drawn up before the Audience, and represented under those Circumstances in which the Determination of the Action places them

I shall therefore consider this Book under four Heads, in relation to the Celestial, the Infernal, the Human, and the Imaginary Persons, who have their respective Parts allotted in it

To begin with the Celestial Persons The Guardian Angels of Paradise are described as returning to Heaven upon the Fall of Man, in order to approve their Vigilance, their Arrival their Manner of Reception, with the Sorrow which appeared in themselves, and in those Spirits who are said to Rejoice at the Conversion of a Sinner, are very finely laid together in the following Lines.

*Up into Heaven from Paradise in haste
Th' Angelick Guards ascended, in the and sad

The same Divine Person, who in the foregoing Parts of this Poem interceded for our first Parents before their Fall overthrew the Rebel Angels and created the World, is now represented as descending to Paradise, and pronouncing Sentence upon the three Offenders. The Cool of the Evening, being a Circumstance with which Holy Writ introduces this great Scene, it is poetically described by our Author who has also kept religiously to the Form of Words in which the three several Sentences were p'issed upon Adam, Eve, and the Serpent. He has rather chosen to neglect the Numerousness of his Verse, than to deviate from those Speeches which are recorded on this great occasion. The Guilt and Confusion of our first Parents standing naked before their Judge, is touched with great Piety. Upon the Arrival of Sin and Death into the Works of the Creation, the Almighty is again introduced as speaking to his Angels that surrounded him

See! with which I cast these Dogs of Hell ad wnce, To waste and har'ock you in World, which I So fair and good creat'd, &c

The following Passage is formed upon that glorious Image in Holy Writ, which compares the Voice of an innumerable Host of Angels, uttering Hallelujahs to the Voice of mighty Thunderings, or of many Waters

He ended, and the Heavenly Audience loud Sung Hallelujah, as the sound of Seas Through Multitude that sang Just are thy Ways

Righteous are thy Decrees in all thy Works, Who can extenuate thee?

Tho' the Author in the whole Course of his Poem, and particularly in the Book we are now examining, has infinite Allusions to Places of Scripture, I have only taken notice in my Remarks of such as are of a Poetical Nature, and which are woven with great Beauty into the Body of this Fable. Of this kind is that Passage in the present Book, where describing Sin and Death as marching thro' the Works of Nature, he adds,

Behind her Death

*Close following pace for pace, not mounted yet
On his pale Horse*

Which alludes to that Passage in Scripture, so wonderfully poetical, and terrifying to the Imagination. And I look'd, and behold a pale Horse, and his Name that sat on him was Death, and Hell follow'd with him and Power was given into them over the fourth Part of the Earth, to kill with Sword, and with Hunger, and with Famine, and with the Beasts of the Earth. Under this first Herd of Celestial Persons we must likewise take notice of the Command which the Angels receiv'd, to produce the several Changes in Nature, and sully the Beauty of the Creation. Accordingly they are represented as inserting the Stars and Planets with malignant Influences, vealing the Light of the Sun, bringing down the Winter into the milder Regions of Nature, planting Winds and Storms in several Quarters of the Sky, storing the Clouds with Thunder, and in short, perverting the whole Frame of the Universe to the Condition of its criminal Inhabitants. As this is a noble Incident in the Poem, the following Lines, in which we see the Angels heaving up the Earth, and placing it in a different Posture to the Sun from what it had before the Fall of Man, is conceived with that sublime Imagination which was so peculiar to this great Author

*Some say he bid his Angels turn ascanse
The Poles of Earth twice ten Degrees and more From the Sun's Axis, they with Labour push'd Oblique the Centric Globe*

We are in the second place to consider the Infernal Agents under the view which Milton has given us of them in this Book. It is observed by those who would set forth the Greatness of Virgil's Plan, that he conducts his Reader thro' all the Parts of the Earth which were discover'd in his time Asia, Africa, and Europe are the several Scenes of his Fable. The Plan of Milton's Poem is of an infinitely greater Extent, and fills the Mind with many more astonishing Circumstances. Satan, having surrounded the Earth seven times departs at length from Paradise. We then see him steering his Course among the Constellations, and after having traversed the whole Creation pursuing his Voyage thro' the Chaos, and entering into his own Infernal Dominions.

His first appearance in the Assembly of fallen Angels, is work'd up with Circumstances which give a delightful Surprise to the Reader but there is no Incident in the whole Poem which does this more than the Transformation of the whole Audience, that follows the Account their Leader gives them of his Expedition. The gradual Change of Satan himself is describ'd after Osai's manner, and may vie with any of those celebrated Transformations which are look'd upon as the most beautiful Parts in that Poet's Works.

Milton never fails of improving his own Hints, and bestowing the last finishing Touches to every Incident which is admitted into his Poem. The unexpected Hiss which rises in this Episode, the Dimensions and Bulk of Satan so much superior to those of the Infernal Spirits who lay under the same Transformation, with the annual Change which they are supposed to suffer, are Instances of this kind. The Beauty of the Diction is very remarkable in this whole Episode, as I have observed in the sixth Paper of these Remarks the great Judgment with which it was contriv'd.

The Parts of Adam and Eve, or the human Persons, come next under our Consideration. Milton's Art is no where more shewn than in his conducting the Parts of these our first Parents. The Representation he gives of them, without falsifying the Story, is wonderfully contriv'd to influence the Reader with Pity and Compassion towards them. Tho' Adam involves the whole Species in Misery, his Crime proceeds from a Weakness which every Man is inclined to pardon and commiserate, as it seems rather the Frailty of Human Nature, than of the Person who offended. Every one is apt to excuse a Fault which he himself might have fallen into. It was the Excess of Love for Eve, that ruin'd Adam, and his Posterity. I need not add, that the Author is justifi'd in this Particular by many of the Fathers, and the most orthodox Writers. Milton has by this means fill'd a great part of his Poem with that kind of Writing which the French Critics call the Tender, and which is in a particular manner engaging to all sorts of Readers.

Adam and Eve, in the Book we are now considering, are likewise drawn with such Sentiments as do not only interest the Reader in their Afflictions, but rouse in him the most melting Passions of Humanity and Commiseration. When Adam sees the several Changes in Nature produced about him, he appears in a Disorder of Mind suitable to one who had forfeited both his Innocence and his Happiness, he is filled with Horror, Remorse, Despair, in the Anguish of his Heart he expostulates with his Creator for having given him an unasked Existence.

Did I request thee, Maker, from my Clay To mould me Man? did I solicit thee From Darkness to promote me? or here place In this delicious Garden? As my Will Concurr'd not to my Being, 'twere but right And equal to reduce me to my Dust, Desirous to resign, and render back All I receiv'd—

He immediately after recovers from his Presumption, owns his Doom to be just, and begs that the Death which is threaten'd him may be inflicted on him.

*Why delays
His Hand to execute, what his Decree Fix'd on this day? Why do I overlive?
Why am I mock'd with Death, and lengthen'd out To deathless Pain? how gladly would I meet Mortality my Sentence, and be Earth Insensible! how glad would lay me down,*

*As in my Mother's Lap? there should I rest And sleep secure, his dreadful Voice no more Would thunder in my Ears no fear of worse
To me and to my Offspring, would torment me With cruel Expectation—*

This whole Speech is full of the like Emotion, and varied with all those Sentiments which we may suppose natural to a Mind so broken and disturb'd. I must not omit that generous Concern which our first Father shews in it for his Posterity, and which is so proper to affect the Reader.

*Hide me from the Face
Of God, whom to behold was then my height
Of Happiness! yet well, if here would end
The Misery, I deserv'd it, and would bear
My own Deservings, but this will not serve,
All that I eat, or drink, or shall beget Is propagated Curse. O Voice once heard Delightful ye, Increase and Multiply Now Death to hear!*

*In me all Posterity stands curs'd! Fair Patrimony, That I must leave ye Sons! O were I able To waste it all my self, and leave you none!
So dismal cried, how would you bless Me, now your Curse! Ah, why should all Mankind,
For one Man's Fault, thus guiltless be condemn'd, If guiltless? But from me what can proceed
But all corrupt—*

Who can afterwards behold the Father of Mankind extended upon the Earth, uttering his midnight Complaints, bewailing his Existence, and wishing for Death, without sympathizing with him in his Distress?

*Thus Adam to himself lamented loud, Thro' the still Night, not now, (as ere Man fell) Wholesome, and cool, and mild, but with black Air Accompanied, with Damps and dreadful Gloom, Which to his evil Conscience represented
All things with double Terror. On the Ground Outstretch'd he lay, on the cold Ground! and oft Curs'd his Creation, Death as oft accus'd Of tardy Execution—*

The Part of Eve in this Book is no less passionate, and apt to sway the Reader in her Favour. She is represented with great Tenderness as approaching Adam, but is spurn'd from him with a Spirit of Uprubbing and Indignation, conformable to the Nature of Man, whose Passions had now gained the Dominion over him. The following Passage, wherein she is described as renewing her Addresses to him, with the whole Speech that follows it, have something in them exquisitely moving and pathetic.

*He added not and from her turn'd. But Eve Not so repuls'd, with Tears that ceas'd not flowing,
And Presses all disorder'd, at his feet Fell humble, and embracing them, besought*

His Power, and is proceeding to her Plaint Forsake I must, Adam! Witness Heaven! Let's rise, and Reverence in Heaven bear thee, and worship thee as a God, Unhappy does it! His Suppliants
 I beg, and clasping Knees, then I kneel (Witness Hea-ven!) as good as I do, I Thy Counsel, I have, I have distress, My only Sin is this, and thou! I do not Withered, I have, I have, I have
 Withered, I have, I have, I have Between us I would then be Part, &c

Acen's Reposelement to her is worth it up in the same Spirit of Lenient, & if it were proposed to her Husband in the Illudine of her Despair, that to put in their Grief from a seeming upon Poverty they should resolve to live Childless, or, if that could no be done they should seek their own Deaths by violent Methods. As these Sentiments naturally engage the Reader to regard the Mother of Mankind with more than ordinary Commiseration, the likewise in a very fine Mord. The Resolution of doing to end our Vices does not show such a degree of Magnanimity as a Resolution to bear them, and submit to the Dispensations of Providence. Our Author here the effort with great Delicacy, represented I have a returning, thus thought in Adams & approving it.

We are, in the last place, to consider the Imaginary Persons, or Death and Sin who act a large Part in this Book. Such beautiful extended Allegories are certainly so none of the finest Compositions of Genius, but as I have before observed, are no less creditable to the Nature of in Heruck Poem. This of Sin and Death is very exquisite in its kind if not a wonder. I am a Part of such a Work. The Truth contained in it is so clear and open, that I shall not be in explaining them, but shall only observe that a Reader who knows the Strength of the English Tongue, will be amazed to think how the Poet could find such apt Words and Phrases to describe the Action(s) of those two imaginary Persons, and particularly in that Part where Death is exhibited as forming a Bridge over the Cataract of Work suitable to the Genius of Milton.

Since the Subject I am upon, I take me an Opportunity of speaking more at large of such Shadowy and Imaginary Persons as may be introduced into Heruck Poems. I shall beg leave to explain my self in a Matter which is curious in its kind, and which none of the Critics have treated of. It is certain Homer and Virgil are full of imaginary Persons, who are very beautiful in Poetry when met are just shown, without being engaged in any Series of Action. Homer indeed represents Sleep as a Person, and describes a short Part to him in his Iliad,² but we must consider that tho' we now regard such a Person as a creature shown, and unsentient, the Heathens made Services of him, placed him in their Temples, and looked upon him as a real Deity. When Homer mentions of a her such Allegorical Person, it is only in the Explanatory which comes in ordinarily. I thought to the Mind in the most pleasing manner, and may rather be looked upon as Poets of Persons than Allegorical Descriptions. Instead of telling us that Men naturally fly when they are terrified, he in odious the Persons of Titan and Zeus, who, he tell us, are inseparable Composites. Instead of saying that the time was when Adam ought to have received his Reposement, he tells us, that the Heaven brought him his Reward. In stead of describing the Effects which Adam as Zeus produced in that he tells us that the Furies of it were encompassed by Zeus and Proserpine, Jupiter, Mars, and Death. In the same Figure of speaking, he represents Victory as following Prometheus, Deity as the Mother of Luners and Mercury, Zeus as dressed by the Genius, Religion as wearing Terrestrial and Compassion like a garment. I might give several other Instances of it of Homer, as well as a great many out of Virgil. Virgil has likewise very often made use of the same way of speaking, as where he tells us, that Ulysses sat on the right Hand of the Messiah when he marched forth as a the Peel Angels, that at the rising of the Sun the Heaven unbarred the Gates of Light, that Demeter was the Daughter of Sun. Of the same nature are the Expressions, where describing, the singing of the Nightingale he adds, Silphium and Pharos, and upon the Messiah's bidding Peace to the Cures, Cerberus and his Law. I might add innumerable Instances of our Poets using in this beautiful Figure. It is plain that these I have mentioned in which Persons of an Imaginary Nature are introduced, are such short Allegories as are not designed to be taken in the literal Sense, but only to convey particular Circumstances to the Reader after an unusual and entertaining Manner. But when such Persons are introduced as principal Actors, and engaged in a Series of Adventures, they take too much upon them, and are by no means proper for in Heruck Poem, which ought to appear credible in its principal Part. I cannot therefore, therefore, thinking that Sin and Death are improper Agents in a Work of this nature, a Stranger and Necessity in one of the Tragedies of Eschylus, who represented those two Persons ruling down Prometheus to a Rock, for which he has been

Sleep a wife, the youngest of the Graeces. Sleep makes her swear by Sun that she will hold to her word, and when she has done so flies off in her company, sits in the hope of a night hark in a pine tree upon the peak of Ida, whence when Zeus was subdued by love and sleep Sleep went down to the ships to tell Poseidon that now was his time to help the Graec.

² In the Prometheus Bound of Eschylus, the binding of Prometheus by pitiless Strength, who moel at compassion in the god Hephaestus charged to serve him in this office, upon the

² In the fourteenth Book, where Herc visits the home of Sleep, the brother of Death and offers him the bribe of a gold chain if he will shut the eyes of Zeus, Sleep does not think it can be done. Herc then doubles her bribe, and offers justly censured by the greatest Critics. I do not know any imaginary Person made use of in a more sublime manner of thinking than that in one of the Prophets, who describing God as descending from Heaven, and visiting the Sins of Man kind, adds that dreadful Circumstance, Before him went the Pestilence. It is certain this imaginary Person might have been described in all her purple Spots. The Scor might have marched before her, Pain might have stood at her right Hand, Wrathy on her Left, and Death in her Rear. She might have been introduced as gliding down from the Tail of a Comet, or darted upon the Earth in a Flash of Lightning. She might have trampled the Atmosphere with her Breath the very glaring of her Eyes might have scattered Infection. But I believe every Reader will think, that in such sublime Writing, the mentioning of her as it is done in Scripture, has something in it more just, as well as great than all that the most fanciful Poet could have bestowed upon her in the Richness of his Imagination. CHARLES LILLIE attended me the other day and made me a Present of a large Sheet of Paper, on which is delineated a Pavement of Mosaic Work, lately discovered at Stunsfield near Woodstock. A Person who has sublimest of the ancient dramas Addison is wrong in saying that there is a personification here of Strength and Necessity. Heptastatos does indeed say that he obeys Necessity but his personified companions are Strength and Force, and of these Force appears only as the dumb attendant of Strength. Addison's 'greatest critics' had something to learn when they were blind to the significance of the contrast between Visible Strength at the opening of this poem, and the close with sublime prophecy of an unseen Power of the future that disturbs Zeus on his throne and gathers his thunders about the undaunted Prometheus.

*Now let the all-revelling storm at once descend, Let him, who thunders, strike storms and the crash
Of subterraneous thunders, into ruin
And wild confusion whirl and mingle all I or a part of these. It is said that I speak
If he is forced to come to cast him from his throne*
(Mrs Webster's translation)

so much the Gift of Speech as Mr Lillie, and can carry on a Discourse without Reply, had great Opportunity on that Occasion to expatiate upon so fine a Piece of Antiquity. Among other things, I remember, he gave me his Opinion, which he drew from the Ornament of the World, That this was the Floor of a Room dedicated to Mirth and Concord. Viewing this Work, made as I may run over the many gay Impressions I had read in ancient Authors, which contained Invitations to Joy, Ease and Anxiety, and gave a Loose to that pleasing Forgetfulness wherein Men put off their Character of Business, and enjoy their very Selves. These Hours were usually passed in Rooms adorned for that purpose, and set out in such a manner, as the Objects all around the Company gladdened their Hearts, which, joined to the cheerful Looks of well-chosen and agreeable Friends, gave new Vigour to the Air, produced the latent Fire of the Modest, and gave Grace to the slow Humour of the Reserved. A judicious Mixture of such Company, crowned with Chaplets of Flowers, and the whole Apartment glittering with gay Lights, cheered with a Profusion of Roses, artificial Falls of Water, and Intervals of soft Notes to Songs of Love and Wine, suspended the Cares of human Life, and made a Festival of mutual Kindness. Such Parties of Pleasure as these, and the Reports of the agreeable Passages in their Jollities, have in all Ages awakened the dull Part of Mankind to pretend to Mirth and Good-Humour, without Capacity for such Entertainments for if I may be allowed to say so, there are in hundred Men fit for any Employment to one who is capable of passing a Night in the Company of the first Taste, without showing any Member of the Society, overruling his own Part of the Conversation, but equally receiving and contributing to the Pleasure of the whole Company. When one considers such Collections of Companions in past Times, and such as one might name in the present Age, with how much Speculation a Man needs reflect upon the outward Gravity of those who affect the Frolic with an ill Grace? I have a Letter from a Correspondent of mine, who desires me to admonish all loud, mischievous, airy, dull Companions, that they are mistaken in what they call a Frolic. Irregularity in its self is not what creates give Notice the Exact Delineation of the same is Engraven and Imprinted on a large Elephant sheet of Paper, which are to be sold at Mr Charles Lillie's, Perfumer, at the corner of Beauford Buildings, in the Strand, at 15. A B There are to be had, at the same Place, at one Guinea each, on superline Atlas Paper, some painted with the same variety of Colours that the said Pavement is beautified with this piece of Antiquity is esteemed by the Learned to be the most considerable ever found in Britain. The fine pavement discovered at Stonefield in 1771 measure 35 feet by 67, and although by this time groundworks of more than a hundred Roman villas have been laid open in this country, the Stonefield pavement is still one of the most considerable of its kind.

Pleasure and Mirth, it is to see a Man who knows what Rule and Decency are descend from them agreeably in our Company, is what denominates him a pleasant Companion. Instead of that, you find many whose Mirth consists only in doing Things which do not become them, with a secret Consciousness that all the World know they are better. To this is always added something invidious to themselves or others. I have heard of some very merry Fellows, among whom the Frolick was started and passed by a great Majority, that every Man should immediately draw a Tooth after which they have gone in a body and smoked a Ciglar. The same Company, at another Night, has each Man burned his Cravat and one perhaps, whose I write would hear it, has thrown a long Wig and lace hat into the same Fire. Thus they have jested themselves stark naked, and run into the Streets, and frightened Women very successfully. There is no Inhabitant of any stranding in Coast of Guinea but can tell you a hundred good Humours, where People have come off with little Blood shed, and yet scowled all the witty Hours of the Night. I know a Gentleman that has several Wounds in the Head by Watch Poles, and has been thrice run through the Body to carry on a good Jest. He is very old for a Man of so much Good-Humour, but to this day he is seldom merry, but he has reason to be so at the same time. As it is by the Favour of these Gentlemen I am humbly of Opinion, that a Man may be a very witty Man, and never of one Statute of this Kingdom not excepting even that of Stabbing.

The Writers of Plays have what they call Unity of Time and Place to give a Justice to their Representations, and it would not be unuseful if all who pretend to be Compositors would confine their Action to the Place of Melina, for a Frolick earned further may be better performed by other Animals than Men. It is not to rid much Ground, or do much Mischief, that should denominate a pleasant Fellow, but that is truly I believe which is the Play of the Mind, and consists of various and unforced Allies of Imagination. Testimony of Spirit is a very uncommon Talent, and must proceed from an Assembly of agreeable Qualities in the same Person. There are some few whom I think peculiarly happy in it, but it is a Talent one cannot name in a Man, especially when one considers that it is never very graceful but where it is regarded by him who possesses it in the second Place. The best Man that I know of for heightening the Revel Gaiety of a Company, is Lashon, whose Joivl Humour diffuses itself from the highest Person at an Entertainment to the meanest Water. Merry Tales, accompanied with apt Gestures and lively Representations of Circumstances and Persons, beguile the gravest Mind into a Consent to be as humorous as himself. Add to this, that when a Man is in his good Grace, he has a Mirrour, that does not debase the Person he represents, but which, taking from the Gravity of the Character adds to the Agreeableness of it. This pleasant Fellow gives one some Idea of the ancient Pantomime, who is said to have given the Audience, in Dumb-show, an exact Idea of any Character or Passion, or an intelligible Relation of any publick Occurrence, with no other Expression than that of his Looks and Gestures. If all who have been obliged to these Talents in Parours, will be at Love for Love to-morrow Night they will but pay him what they owe him, it so easy a Rate is being present at a Play which no body would omit seeing, that had, or had not ever seen it before.

VIR.

AS we were at the Club last Night, I observed that my Friend Sir Roger, contrary to his usual Custom, sat very silent and instead of minding what was said by the Company, was whistling to himself in a very thoughtful Mood, and playing with a Card. I asked Sir Andrew Littleport who sat between us, and as we were both observing him we saw the Knight strike his Head and heard him say to himself, I foolish Menus! I can't tell it. Sir Andrew gave him a gentle Pat upon the Shoulder, and offered to try him a Bottle of Wine that he was thinking of the Widow. My old Friend started, and recovering out of his brown Study, told Sir Andrew that once in his Life he had been in the right. In short, after some little Hesitation, Sir Roger told us in the fulness of his Heart that he had just received a Letter from his Steward, which acquainted him that his old Rival and An-agonist in the County Sir David Dunham had been making a Visit to the Widow. However, says Sir Roger, I can never think that she'll have a Man that's half a Year older than I am, and a noted Republican into the Bargain.

WILL HOWARDSON, who looks upon Love as his particular Province interrupting our Friend with a janty Laugh, I thought, knight, says he, thou hast lived long enough in the World, not to pin thy Happiness upon one that is a Woman and a Widow. I think that without Vanity I may pretend to know as much of the Female World as any Man in Great Britain, tho the chief of my Knowledge consists in this, that they are not to be known. WILL immediately, with his usual Lucency, rambl'd into an Account of his own Amours. I am now, says he upon the Verge of Fifty, (tho' by the way we all knew he was turned of Threescore) You may easily guess, continued WILL, that I have not lived so long in the World without having had some thoughts of settling in it, as the Phrase is. To tell you truly, I have several times tried my Fortune that way, though I can't much boast of my Success.

² See note on p. 378. Congreve's Love for Love was to be acted at Drury Lane on Tuesday night 'At the desire of several Ladies of Quality for the Benefit of Mr. Estcourt'.

I made my first Addresses to a young Lady in the Country, but when I thought things were pretty well drawing to a Conclusion, her Father happening to hear that I had formerly boarded with a Surgeon, the old Part forbade me his House, and within a fortnight after married his Daughter to a Fox hunter in the Neighbourhood.

I made my next Applications to a Widow, and attacked her so briskly, that I thought myself within a Fortnight of her. As I waited upon her one Morning, she told me that she intended to keep her Ready Money and Jointure in her own Hand, and desired me to call upon her Attorney in Leons-Inn, who would adjust with me what it was proper for me to add to it. I was so rebuffed by this Overture, that I never enquired either for her or her Attorney afterwards.

A few Months after I addressed my self to a young Lady, who was an only Daughter, and of a good Family. I danced with her at several Balls, squeezed her by the Hand, said soft things to her, and, in short, made no doubt of her Heart, and though my Fortune was not equal to hers, I was in hopes that her fond Father would not deny her the Man she had fixed her Affections upon. But as I went one day to the House in order to break the matter to him, I found the whole Family in Confusion, and heard to my unspeakable Surprise, that Miss Fenny was that very Morning run away with the Butler.

I then courted a second Widow, and am at a Loss to this day how I came to miss her, for she had often commended my Person and Behaviour. Her Maid indeed told me one Day that her Mistress had said she never saw a Gentleman with such a Spudle Pair of Legs as Mr. Ho enjoyed.

After this I had Siege to four Heiresses successively, and being a handsome young Dog in those Days, quickly made a Breach in their Hearts, but I don't know how it came to pass, tho' I seldom failed of getting the Daughter's Consent, I could never in my Life get the old People on my side.

I could give you an Account of a thousand other unsuccessful Attempts, particularly of one which I made some Years since upon an old Woman, whom I had certainly bonied away with flying Colours, if her Relations had not come pouring in to her Assistance from all Parts of England, nay, I believe I should have got her at last, had not she been carried off by an ill and Frost.

As WILL's Transitions are extremely quick, he turn'd from Sir ROGER, and applying himself to me, told me there was a Passage in the Book I had considered last Saturday, which deserved to be writ in Letters of Gold, and taking out a Pocket-Milton read the following Lines, which are Part of one of Adam's Speeches to Eve after the Fall.

— O! why did our Creator woe! that people's highest Heaven With Spirits masculine, create at last This Novelty on Earth, this fair Defect
Of Nature! and not fill the World at once With Men, as Angels, without Feminine!
Or find some other way to generate

*Man! and? 'Tis Mischief had not then befall'n, And more that shall befall, unnumerable Disturbances on Earth, if rough Female Snakes, As a trait Conjunction with it is Sex, for evil He never shall find out fit Mate, but such As soe misfortune brings him, or mistake, Or, whom he wishes most, shall seldom find Through her perverseness, but shall see her gawd
by a far worse, or if she love, will held By Parents, or his lastest Choice too late shall meet atree by link'd, and Wedlock bound To a full Adversary, I s Hate or St an e, Which infinite Calamity shall cause To hurran Life, and Ho ishold Peace confound!*

SIR ROGER listened to this Passage with great Attention, and desiring Mr. HO to come to fold down a Leaf at the Place, and lend him his Book, the Knight put it up in his Pocket, and told us that he would read over those Verses again before he went to Bed. X

I HAVE nothing to do with the Business of this Day, any further than affixing the piece of Latin on the Head of my Paper, which I think a Motto not unsuitable, since if Silence of our Poverty is a Recommendation, still more commendable is his Modesty who conceals it by a decent Dress.

MR. SPECTATOR,

'There is an Evil under the Sun which has not yet come within your Speculation and is, the Censure Disesteem, and Contempt which some young Fellows meet with from particular Persons, for the reasonable Methods they take to avoid them in general. This is by appearing in a better Dress, than may seem to a Relation regularly consistent with a small Fortune, and therefore may occasion a judgment of a suitable Extravagance in other Particulars. But the Disadvantage with which the Man of narrow Circumstances acts and speaks is so seemingly set forth in a little Book called the Christian Hero,² that the appearing to be otherwise is not only pardonable but necessary. I very often nows the hurry of Conclusions that are made in contempt of a Person that appears to be calumnious, which makes it very excusable to prepare one's self for the Company of those that are of a superior Quality and Fortune, by appearing to be in a better Condition than one is, so far as such Appearance shall not make us really of worse.

² The passage is nearly at the beginning of Steel's third chapter, 'It is in every body's observation with what disadvantage a Poor Man enters upon the most ordinary affairs, &c.

'suffers hard Reflections from any particular Person upon this Account, that such Persons would enquire into his manner of spending his Time, of which they no further Information can be had than that he remains so many Hours in his Chamber, &c. if this is cleared to inquire that a reasonable Creature wrong with a narrow Fortune does not make the best use of this Retirement would be a Conclusion extremely uncomfortable from what has or will be said I hope no Conclusion can be extorted, applying, that I would have any young Fellow spend more Time than the common Lesson which his Studies require, or more Money than his Fortune or Ability may admit of, in the pursuit of an Acquaintance with his Betters. For as to his Time, the loss of that ought to be valued to more substantial Accomplishments for each irreparable Moment of which he ought to believe he stands religiously Accountable. And as to his Dress, I shall engage myself no further than in the modest Defence of two plain Suits a Year. For being perfectly satisfied in his manner of Consequence of making a Man of a Man by presenting him with a good and durable Suit, I would by no means be thought to controvert that Consent by maintaining the Advantage of Foppery. It is an Affectation which adorns of much Profit that a Sir name of tolerable Sees dressed like a Gentleman will be better received by the Quality if we buy than one of much better Parts whose Dress is regulated by the notions of Frivolity. A Man's Appearance talks within the Censure of every one that sees him; his Parts and Learning, very few are Judges of, and even upon these few, I cannot at first be well intruded for Policy and good Breeding will counsel him to be reserved in words, and to support himself only by the common Subject of Conversation. Indeed among the injudicious, the Words Deceit, Idiom, fine Image, & structure of Pen and Gown are the more trouble use of with a singularly comely Gravity, will maintain the Figure of moderate Riches, and Depth of Character.

'All Gentlemen of Fortune, at least the young, and middle aged, are apt to pride themselves a little too much upon their Dress, and consequently to value others in some measure upon the same Consideration. With what Confusion is a Man of figure obliged to return the Civilities of the Hat to a Person whose Air and Attire hardly entitle him to it? For whom nevertheless the other has a particular Esteem, tho' he is ashamed to have it challenged in so public a Manner. It must be allowed that any young Fellow that affects to dress and appear genteelly, might with artificial Management save ten Pound a Year instead of fine Holland he might incurr in Sackcloth, and in other Particulars be proportionably shabby. But of what great Service would this Sum be to avert any Misfortune, whilst it would leave him deserted by the little good Acquaintance he has, and prevent his gaining any other? As the Appearance of an easy Fortune is necessary towards making one I don't know but it might be of advantage sometimes to throw into ones Discourse certain Exclamations

'about Rant Sack, and to shew a marvellous Surprise upon his Fall as well as the most affected Triumph upon its Rise. The Veneration and Respect which the Practice of all Ases has preserved to Appearance, without doubt suggested to our Forefathers that wise and Politick Custom to apply and recommend themselves to the publick by all those Decorations upon their Sign posts and Houses which the most eminent Hands in the Neighbourhood can furnish them with. What can be more attractive to a Man of Letters, than that immense Collection of all Ages and Languages which a skilful Book seller, in conjunction with a Painter, shall mix upon his Column and the Externities of his Shop? The same Spirit of maintaining a handsome Appearance reigns among the grave and solid Apprentices of the Law, where I could be particularly dull in knowing, if the Word Apprenticeship be significant of a Parrot, and you may easily distinguish who his most likely made his Pretence to Business by the whitest and most ornamental frame of his Window. If indeed the Chamber is a Ground Room, and has Rules before the Lunary of necessity more extended, and the Pomp of Business better maintained. And what can be a greater Indication of the Dignity of Dress, than that burdensome Liberty which is the regular Habit of our Judges, Nobles, and Peers, with which upon certain Days we see them incumbered? And though it may be said this is useful and necessary for the Dignity of the State, yet the wisest of them have been remarkable before they arrived at their present Station, for being very well dressed Persons. As to my own Part, I am near Thirty, and since I left School have not been idle which is a modern Phrase for having studied hard. I brought off a clean Shaven of Moral Philosophy and a tolerable Jar of Metaphysics from the University since that I have been employed in the clear Part of the perplexed Style and Statute of the Law, which so hereditarily descends to all its Professors. To all which severe Studies I have thrown in, in proper Intervals the pretty Learning of the Classics. Nowithstanding which I am what Shakspeare calls a learned Fool, or I believe which makes me undervalue the more fully, that since the regular Methods of thinking, I receive and a Fortune by the increase of a Profession is so very slow and uncertain, a Man should take all reasonable Opportunities by enlarging a good Acquaintance, to court that Time and Chance which is said to happen to every Man.

*Tartarus ardet et trem, quod protinus omnis

I HAVE lately received the following Letter from a Country Gentleman

[clearing] Henry IV Pt I Act iii sc 2

Mr SPECTATOR,
 'The Night before I left London I went to see a Play, called The Humorous Lieutenant.
 Upon the Rising of the Curtain I was very much surprized with the great Consort of Cat calls which was exhibited thit evening, and began to think with myself that I had made a Mistake, and gone to a Musick-Meeting, instead of the Play-house. It appeared indeed a little odd to me to see so many Persons of Quality of both Sexes assembled together at a kind of Cutter wawling, for I cannot look upon that Performance to have been any thing better, whatever the Musicians themselves might think of it. As I had no Acquaintance in the House to ask Questions of and was forced to go out of Town early the next Morning, I could not learn the Secret of this Matter. What I would therefore desire of you, is, to give some account of this strange Instrument, which I found the Company called a Cat-call, and particularly to let me know whether it be a piece of Musick lately come from Italy. For my own part, to be free with you, I would rather hear an English Fiddle though I durst not shew my Dislike whilst I was in the Play-house, it being my Chance to sit the very next Man to one of the Performers

I am, SIR,
 Your most affectionate Friend and Servant,
 John Shallow, Esq

In compliance with Squire Stallows Request, I design this Paper as a Dissertation upon the Cat call. In order to make myself a Master of the Subject, I purchased one the Beginning of last Week, though not without great difficulty, being inform'd at two or three Toy-shops that the Players had lately bought them all up. I have since consulted many learned Antiquaries in relation to its Original, and find them very much divided among themselves upon that Particular. A Fellow of the Royal Society, who is my good Friend, and a great Proficient in the Mathematical Part of Musick, concludes from the Simplicity of its Make, and the Uniformity of its Sound, that the Cat call is older than any of the Inventions of Jubal. He observes very well, that Musical Instruments took their first Rise from the Notes of Birds, and other melodious Animals; and what, says he, was more natural than for the first Ages of Mankind to imitate the Voice of a Cat that lived under the same Roof with them?
 He added, that the Cat had contributed more to Harmony than any other Animal, as we are not only beholden to her for this Wind Instrument but for our String Musick in general.

Another Virtuoso of my Acquaintance will not allow the Cat call to be older than Thespis, and is apt to think it appeared in the World soon after the antient Comedy for which reason it has still a place in our Drumstick Entertainments. Nor must I here omit what a very curious Gentleman, who is lately return'd from his Travels, has more than once assured me, namely that there was lately dug up at Rome the Statue of a Momus, who holds an Instrument in his Right Hand very much resembling our Modern Cat call.

There are others who ascribe this Invention to Orpheus, and look upon the Cat-call to be one of those Instruments which that famous Musician made use of to draw the Beasts about him. It is certan, that the Roaring of a Cat does not call together a greater Audience of that Species than this Instrument, if dexterously play'd upon in proper Time and Place.

But notwithstanding these various and learned Conjectures, I cannot forbear thinking that the Cat call is originally a Piece of English Musick.
 Its Resemblance to the Voice of some of our British Songsters, as well as the Use of it, which is peculiar to our Nation, confirms me in this Opinion. It has at least received great Improvements among us whether we consider the Instrument it self, or these several Quavers and Graces which are thrown into the phrasing of it. Every one might be sensible of this who heard that remarkable overgrown Cat-call which was plac'd in the Center of the Pit, and presided over all the rest at [the] celebrated Performance lately exhibited in Drury Lane.

Having said thus much concerning the Original of the Cat-call, we are in the next place to consider the Use of it. The Cat call exerts it self to most advantage in the British Theatre. It very much Improves the Sound of Nonsense, and often goes along with the Voice of the Actor who pronounces it, as the Violin or Harpsichord accompanies the Italian Recitativo.

It has often supplied the Place of the antient Chorus, in the Works of Mr  In short, a brad Poet has as great an Antipathy to a Cat call, as many People have to a real Cat.

Mr Collier, in his ingenious Essay upon Musick,² has the following Passage

I believe its possible to invent an Instrument that shall have a quite contrary Effect to those Martial ones now in use. An Instrument that shall sink the Spirits, and shake the Nerves, and curdle the Blood, and inspire Despair, and Cowardice and Consternation, at a surprizing rate. 'Tis probable the Roaring of Lions, the Warbling of Cats and Scratch O's, together with a Mixture of the Howling of Dogs, judiciously imitated and compounded, might go a great way in this Invention. Whether such As to Musick as this might not be of Service in a Camp, I shall leave to the Military Men to consider.

What this learned Gentleman supposes in Speculation, I have known actually verified in Practice

'her,' who have ensured our Safety at our Meals, and driven Jealousy from our Cups in Conversation, deserve the Custom and Thanks of the whole Town and it is your Duty to remind them of the Obligation

I am, SIR,
Your Humble Servant,
Tom Pottle

MR SPECTATOR,

'I AM a Person who was long immured in a College, read much, saw little, so that I knew no more of the World than what a Lecture or a View of the Map taught me. By this means I improved in my Study, but became unpleasant in Conversation. By conversing generally with the World, I grew almost unfit for the Society of the Living: so by a long Confinement I contracted an ungainly Aversion to Conversation and ever discoursed with Pain to my self, and little Entertainment to others. At last I was in some measure made sensible of my failing and the Mortification of never being able to speak to, or speaking, unless the Discourse ran upon Books, put me upon forcing my self amongst Men. I immediately affected the polite Company, by the frequent use of which I hoped to wear off the Rust I had contracted; but by an uncouth Imitation of Men used to act in publick, I got no further than to discover I had a Mind to appear a finer thing than I really was.

'Such I was, and such was my Condition, when I became an ardent Lover and passionate Admirer of the Leauteous Belinda. Then it was that I really began to improve. This Passion changed all my Errors and Diffidencies in my

Then follows their long advertisement, which ends with a note that 'Their New Ports, just landed, being the only New Ports in Merchants Hands, and above One Half of all that is in London, will begin to be sold at the old prices the 12th inst (April) at all their Taverns and Cellars.'

'general Behaviour, to the sole Concern of pleasing her. I had not now to study the Action of a Gentleman, but Love possessing all my Thoughts, made me truly be the thing I had a Mind to appear. My Thoughts grew free and generous, and the Ambition to be agreeable to her I admired, produced in my Carriage a firm Similitude of that disengaged Manner of my Belinda. The way we are in at present is, that she sees my Passion, and sees I at present forbear speaking of it through prudential Regards. This Respect to her she returns with much Civility, and makes my Value for her as little a Misfortune to me, as is consistent with Discretion. She sings very charmingly and is readier to do so at my Request, because she knows I love her. She will dance with me rather than another, for the same Reason. My Fortune must alter from what it is, before I can steal my Heart to her, and her Circumstances are not considerable enough to make up for the Narrowness of mine. But I write to you now, only to give you the Character of Belinda, as a Woman that was Address enough to demonstrate a Gratitude to her Lover, without giving him Hopes of Success in his Passion. Belinda has from a great Wit, governed by as great Prudence, and both adorned with Innocence, the Happiness of always being ready to discover her real Thoughts. She has in many of us, who now are her Admirers, but her Treatment of us is so just and proportioned to our Merit towards her, and what it were in our selves, that I protest to you I have neither Jealousy nor Hatred toward my Rivals. Such is her Goodness, and the Acknowledgment of every Man who admires her, that he thinks he ought to believe she will treat him who best deserves her. I will not say that this Peace among us is not owing to Self-love, which prompts each to think himself the best Describer. I think there is something uncommon and worthy of Imitation in this Lady's Character. If you will please to Print my Letter, you will oblige the little Fraternity of happy Rivals, and in a more particular Manner,

SIR,

Your most humble Servant,

Imago—Virg

MILTON has shewn a wonderful Art in describing that variety of Passions which arise in our first Parents upon the Breach of the Commandment that had been given them. We see them gradually passing from the Triumph of their Guilt thro Remorse Shame, Despair Contrition, Prayer, and Hope, to a perfect and complete Repentance. At the end of the tenth Book they are represented as prostrating themselves upon the Ground and watering the Earth with their Tears. To which the Poet joins this benediction utiful Circumstance, that they offer'd up their penitential Prayers, on the very Place where their Judge appear'd to them when he pronounced their Sentence.

—*They for'k, with to the place Repair'd where he judg'd them, prostrate fell Before him Reverent, and both confess'd Humbly their Faults, and Pardon begg'd, with Tears
Watering the Ground*—

[There is a Beauty of the same kind in a Tragedy of Sophocles, where Oedipus, after having put out his own Eyes, instead of breaking his Neck from the Palace-Battlements (which furnishes so elegant an Entertainment for our English Audience) desires that he may be conducted to Mount Cithæron, in order to end his Life in that very Place where he was exposed in his Infancy, and where he should then have died, had the Will of his Parents been executed.]

As the Author never fails to give a poetical Turn to his Sentiments, he describes in the Beginning of this Book the Acceptance which these their Prayers met with, in a short Allegory, form'd upon that beautiful Passage in holy Writ And another Angel came and stood at the Altar, having a golden Censer, and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the Prayers of all Saints upon the Golden Altar, which was before the Throne And the Smoke of the Incense which came with the Prayers of the Saints, ascend'd up before God

—To Heav'n their Prayers Flew up, nor miss'd the Way, by various Winds Blown vagabond or frustrate in they pass'd Dimensionless through heavenly Doors, then clad With Incense, where the Golden Altar fum'd, By their great Intercessor, came in sight Before the Father's Throne—

We have the same Thought expressed a second time in the Intercession of the Messiah, which is conceived in very Emphatical Sentiments and Expressions

Among the Poetical Parts of Scripture, which Milton has so finely wrought into this Part of his Narration, I must not omit that wherein Ezekiel speaking of the Angels who appear'd to him in a Vision, adds, that every one had four Faces, and that their whole Bodies, and their Backs, and their Hands, and their Wings, were full of Eyes round about —*The Cohort bright

Of watchful Cherubims, four Faces each And like a double Janus, all their Shape Spangled with Eyes*—

The Assembling of all the Angels of Heaven to hear the solemn Decree pass'd upon Man, is represented in very lively Ideas The Almighty is here describ'd as remembering Mercy in the midst of Judgment, and commanding Michael to deliver his Message in the mildest Terms lest the Spirit of Man, which was already broken with the Sense of his Guilt and Misery, should fail before him

—*Yet lest they faint
At the sad Sentence rigorously urg'd,
For I behold them soft'ned, and with Tears Bewailing their Excess, all Terror hude*

The Conference of Adam and Eve is full of moving Sentiments Upon their going abroad after the melancholy Night which they had pass'd together, they discover the Lion and the Eagle pursuing each of them their Prey towards the Eastern Gates of Paradise There is a double Beauty in this Incident, not only as it presents great and just Omens, which are always agreeable in Poetry, but as it expresses that Liberty which was now produced in the Animal Creation The Poet to shew the like Changes in Nature, as well as to grace his Poem with a noble Prodigy, represents the Sun in an Eclipse This particular Incident has likewise a fine Effect upon the Imagination of the Reader, in regard to what follows for at the same time that the Sun is under an Eclipse, a bright Cloud descends in the Western Quarter of the Heavens, filled with an Host of Angels, and more luminous than the Sun it self The whole Theatre of Nature is darkned, that this glorious Machine may appear in all its Lustre and Magnificence

—*Why in the East
Darkness ere Days mid course, and morning Light*

—*More orient in that Western Cloud that dawns O'er the blue Firmament a radiant White,
And slow ascends, with something heav'nly franght!*

—He e'd not, for by this the heav'nly Bands Dropt from a Sky of Jasper lighted now In Paradise, and on a Hill made halt, A glorious Apparition—

I need not observe how properly this Author, who always suits his Parts to the Actors whom he introduces, has employ'd Michael in the Expulsion of our first Parents from Paradise The Archangel on this Occasion neither appears in his proper Shape, nor in that familiar Manner with which Raphael the sociable Spirit entertain'd the Father of Mankind before the Fall His Person, his Port, and Behaviour, are suitable to a Spirit of the highest Rank and exquisitely describ'd in the following Passage

—*Th' Archangel soon drew nigh,
Not in his Shape Celestial, but as Man Clad to meet Man over his lucid Arms
A Military Vest of Purple flow'd, Livelier than Melbourn, or the Grain Of Sarra, worn by Kings and Heroes old,
In time of Truce His had dy'd the Woof His stary Helm, unbric'd, shew'd him prime In Manhood where Youth ended, by his side,
As in a glistering Zodiack, hung the Sword, Sword's dire dread, and in his Hand the Spear Adam lov'd to love, he Kingly from his State Inclin'd not, but his coming thus declar'd*

Eve's Complaint upon hearing that she was to be removed from the Garden of Paradise is wonderfully beautiful The Sentiments are not only proper to the Subject, but have something in them particularly soft and womanish

*Must I then leave thee, Paradise? Thus leave
I thee, a native Soil, to see happy Walks and Shades, Fit haunts of Gods? When I had hope to spend Quiet, if I should, the respite of that Day That must be mortal to us both. O Flow'rs,
That never will in other Climate grow,
My early Visitation, and my last
At Even, when I bid part with tender Hand
From the first opening Bud, and gave you Names,*

Who now shall rear you to the Sun, or rank Your Tribes, and water from the ambrosial Fountain?

Thee, lastly, a spiritual Beauty, by me adorn'd With what to Sight or Smell was sweet, from thee

*How shall I part, and whither wander down Into a lower World, to this obscure
And wild? how shall we breathe in other Air Less pure, accusom'd to immortal Fruits?*

Adam's Speech abounds with Thoughts which are equally moving, but of a more masculine and elevated Turn. Nothing can be conceived more Sublime and Poetical than the following Passage in it

*This most afflicts me, that departing hence
As from his Face I shall be hid, deprived
His blessed Countenance, here I could frequent, With Worship, place by place where he would suff'd*

*Presence Divine, and to my Sons relate,
O, this Mount Le appar'd, near this Tree Stood visible, among these Pines his Voice
I heard, here with him at this Fountain talk'd,
So many grateful Affairs I would relate Of grassy Turf, and pile up every Stone
Of lustre from the Brook, in memory
Or monument to Ages, and thereon Offer sweet-smelling Gums and Fruits and Flowers*

*In yonder cell or World where shall I seek His bright Appearances, or Footsteps trace?
For though I fled him angry, yet recall'd To Life prolong'd as I promised Race, I now Glaucy behold though but his utmost Skirts
Of Glory, and far off his Steps adore*

The Angel afterwards leads Adam to the highest Mount of Paradise, and lays before him a whole Hemisphere, as a proper Stage for those Visions which were to be represented on it. I have before observed how the Plan of Milton's Poem is in many Particulars greater than that of the Iliad or Æneid. Virgil's Hero, in the last of these Poems, is entertained with a Sight of all those who are to descend from him: but though that Episode is justly admired as one of the noblest Designs in the whole Æneid, every one must allow that this of Milton is of a much higher Nature. Adam's Vision is not confined to any particular Tribe of Mankind, but extends to the whole Species.

In this great Review which Adam takes of all his Sons and Daughters, the first Objects he is presented with exhibit to him the Story of Cain and Abel, which is drawn together with much Closeness and Propriety of Expression. That Cuniosity and natural Horror which arises in Adam at the Sight of the first dying Man, is touched with great Beauty.

But have I now seen Death? is this the way I must return to native Dust? O Sight Of Fear or soul, and ugly to behold, Herrid to think, so v' terrible to feel!

The second Vision sets before him the Image of Death in a great Variety of Appearances. The Angel, to give him a general Idea of those Effects which his Guilt had brought upon his Posterity, places before him a large Hospital or Lazar-House, fill'd with Persons lying under all kinds of mortal Disorders. How finely has the Poet told us that the sick Persons languish'd under lingering and miserable Distempers, by an apt and judicious use of such Imaginary Beings as those I mentioned in my last Saturday's Paper.

*Dire was the tossing, deep the Groans. Despair Tended the Sic'ls, his from Couch to Couch, As o'er them to impatient Death his Day
Shook, but delay'd to strike, though oft invoked.
Wail'd. Vo us, as their chief Good and final Hope*

The Passion which likewise rises in Adam on this Occasion, is very natural.

*Sight so deform, what Heart of Rock could long Dry-eyed behold? Adam could not, but rapt, T'no' not of Woman born, Con passion quell'd
His best of Man, and gave him up to Tears*

The Discourse between the Angel and Adam, which follows, abounds with noble Morals.

As there is nothing more delightful in Poetry than a Contrast and Opposition of Incidents, the Author, after this melancholy Prospect of Death and Sickness, raises up a Scene of Mirth, Love, and Jollity. The secret Pleasure that steals into Adam's Heart as he is intent upon this Vision, is imagined with great Delicacy. I must not omit the Description of the loose female Troop, who seduced the Sons of God, as they are called in Scripture.

For that fair female Troop thou saw'st, that seem'd

Of Goddesses so Blithe, so smooth so Gay, Yet envious of all Good wherein consists Woman's domestick Honour and chief Praise, Bred only and complicit to the taste Of lustful Appetence, to sing, to dance, To dress, and to be the Tongue, and roll the Eye

*To these that sober Race of Men, whose Lives Religious tir'd them the Sons of God,
Shall yield up all their Virtue, all their Fame Ignobly, to the Frains and to the Smiles
Of those fair Atheists—*

The next Vision is of a quite contrary Nature, and filled with the Horrors of War. Adam at the Sight of it melts into Tears, and breaks out in that passionate Speech,

*—O what are these!
Death's Ministers, not Men, who thus deal Death
In unanuity to Men, and multiply Ten Thousandfold the Sin of him who slew*

*Must I then leave thee, Paradise? Thus leave Thee, native Soil, these happy Walks and Shades, Fit haunts of Gods? When I had hope to spend Quiet, though sad, the residue of that Day That must be mortal to us both. O Flowers,
That never will in other Climate grow,
My early Visitation, and my last
At Even, which I bred up with tender Hand
From the first opening Bud, and gave you
Names,*

*No now shall rear you to the Sun, or rank
Your Tribes, and water from the ambrosial
Fountain?*

Thee, lastly, nuptial Bowels, by me adorned With what to Sight or Smell was sweet, from thee

*How shall I part, and whither wander down
Into a lower World, to this obscure
And wild? how shall we breathe in other Air
Less pure, accustom'd to immortal Fruits?*

Adam's Speech abounds with Thoughts which are equally moving, but of a more masculine and elevated Turn. Nothing can be conceived more Sublime and Poetical than the following Passage in it

*This most affects me, that departing hence
As from his Face I shall be hid, deprived
His blessed Countenance, here I could frequent With Worship, place by place where he vouchsaf'd*

*Presence Divine, and to my Sons relate,
O: thus Mount Ile appas'd, unear this Tree
Stood visible, among these Pines his Voice
I heard, here with him at this Fountain talk'd,
So many grateful Altars I would rear Of grassy Turf, and pile up ever a Stone
Of lustre from the Brook, in memory
Or monument to Ages, and thereon Offer sweet-smelling Gums and Fruits and Flowers*

*In yonder nether World where shall I seek His bright Appearances, or Footsteps trace?
For though I fled I am angry, yet recall'd To Life prolonged and promised Race, I now Glaadly behold though but his utmost Skirts
Of Glory, and far off his Steps adore*

Horrid to think! how horrible to feel!*

The second Vision sets before him the Image of Death in a great Variety of Appearances. The Angel, to give him a general Idea of those Effects which his Guilt had brought upon his Posterity, places before him a large Hospital or Lazar-House, fill'd with Persons lying under all kinds of mortal Diseases. How finely has the Poet told us that the sick Persons languished under lingering and incurable Distempers, by an apt and judicious use of such Imaginary Beings as those I mentioned in my last Saturday's Paper

*Dire was the tossing, deep the Groans Despair Tended the Sick, busy from Couch to Couch, As disorder triumph'd Death his Dart
Shook, but delay'd to strike, though oft invoked
With Vows, as then chief God and final Hope*

The Passion which likewise rises in Adam on this Occasion, is very natural

*Sight so deform, what Heart of Rock could loag Dry-eyed behold? Adam could not, but wept, Tear'd not of Woman born, Con passion quell'd a
His best of Man, and gave him up to Tears*

The Discourse between the Angel and Adam, which follows, abounds with noble Morals

As there is nothing more delightful in Poetry than a Contrast and Opposition of Incidents, the Author, after this melancholy Prospect of Death and Sickness, raises up a Scene of Mirth, Love, and Jollity. The secret Pleasure that steals into Adam's Heart as he is intent upon this Vision, is imagined with great Delicacy. I must not omit the Description of the loose female Troop, who seduced the Son of God, as they are called in Scripture.

*For that fair female Troop thou saw'st, that
seem'd*

*Of Goddesses, so Blithe, so Smiling, so Gay, Yet empty of all Good, whereon consists Woman's domestic Honour and chief Praise, Bred only and complicate to the taste Of lustful Appetite, to sing, to dance, To dress, and tattle the Tongue, and roll the Eye
To these that sober Race of Men, whose Lives Religious tied them the Sons of God,
Shall yield up all their Virtue, all their Fame
Ignobly, to the Frowns and to the Smiles
Of those fair Atheists—*

The next Vision is of a quite contrary Nature, and filled with the Horror of War. Adam at the Sight of it melts into Tears, and breaks out in that passionate Speech,

*O what are these!
Death's Minsters, not Men, who thus deal Death Unhumanly to Men, and multiply
Ten Thousandfold the Sin of him who slew*

His Brother for of whom such Massacre Make they but of their Brethren, Men of Men?

Milton, to keep up an agreeable Variety in his Visions, after having roused in the Mind of his Reader the several Ideas of Terror which are conformable to the Description of War, presses on to those softer Images of Triumph and Victory, in that Vision of Lewdness and Luxury which ushers in the Flood.

As it is visible that the Poet had his Eye upon Ovid's Account of the universal Deluge, the Reader may observe with how much Judgment he has avoided every thing that is redundant or puerile in the Latin Poet. We do not here see the Wolf swimming among the Sheep, nor any of those wanton Imaginations, which Seneca found fault with, as unbecoming the great Catastrophe of Nature. If our Poet has imitated that Verse in which Ovid tells us that there was nothing but Sea, and that that Sea had no Shore to it, he has not set the Thought in such a Light as to incur the Censure which Critics have pressed upon it. The latter part of that Verse in Ovid is idle and superfluous, but just and beautiful in Milton.

Tamque mare et tellus nullum discrimen habebant, Nil nisi pontus erat, decra it quoque litorea ponto—Ovid

—Sea cover'd Sea, Sea without Shore—Milton

In Milton the former Part of the Description does not forestall the latter. How much more great and solemn on this Occasion is that which follows in our English Poet,

—And in their Palaces Where Luxury late reign'd, Sea Monsters —chaff'd—
And stabl'd—

than that in Ovid, where we are told that the Sea Calves lay in those Places where the Goats were used to browse? The Reader may find several other parallel Passages in the Latin and English Description of the Deluge, wherein our Poet has visibly the Advantage. The Sky's being overcharged with Clouds, the descending of the Rains, the rising of the Sea, and the Appearance of the Rainbow, are such Descriptions as every one must take notice of. The Circumstances relating to Paradise is so finely imagined, and suitable to the Opinions of many learned Authors, that I cannot forbear giving it a Place in this Paper.

—Then shall this Mount Of Paradise by night of Waves be mor'd Out of his Place, push'd by the horn'd Flood With all his Verdure spoil'd, and Trees adrift Down the great River to the opening Gulf,
And there take root, on Island salt and bare,
The haunt of Seals and Orcs and Sea Mews —clang—

sioned in Adam, is exquisitely graceful, and copied after Virgil, though the first Thought it introduces is rather in the Spirit of Ovid.

*How didst thou grieve then, Adam, to behold
The End of all thy Offspring, Laid so sad, Depopulation! the another I loathe
Of Tears and Sorrows, a Load thee also drown'd,
And sink thee as thy Sons, till gently rear'd
By the Angel, on thy Laid thou stood'st at last, Thou comfortless as when a Father mourns His Children, all to new destroy'd at once*

I have been the more particular in my Quotations out of the eleventh Book of Paradise Lost, because it is not generally reckoned among the most shining Books of this Poem for which Reason the Reader might be apt to overlook those many Passages in it which deserve our Admiration. The eleventh and twelfth are indeed built upon that single Circumstance of the Removal of our first Parents from Paradise, but tho' this is not in it self so great a Subject as that in most of the foregoing Books, it is extended and diversified with so many surprising Incidents and pleasing Episodes, that these two last Books earn by no means be looked upon as unequal Parts of this Divine Poem. I must further add, that had not Milton represented our first Parents as driven out of Paradise, his Fall of Man would not have been complete, and consequently his Action would have been imperfect.

MR SPECTATOR,²

A Lady of my Acquaintance, for whom I have too much Respect to be easy while she is doing an indiscreet Action, has given occasion to this Trouble. She is a Widow, to whom the Indulgence of a tender Husband has entrusted the Management of a very great Fortune, and a Son about sixteen, both which she is extremely fond of. The Boy has Parts of the middle Size, neither shining nor despicable, and has passed the common Exercises of his Years with tolerable Advantage, but is without what you would call a forward Youth. By the Help of this last Qualification, which serves as a Varnish to all the rest he is enabled to make the best Use of his Learning and display it to full length upon all Occasions. Last Summer he distinguished himself two or three times very remarkably, by puzzling the Vicar before an Assembly of most of the Ladies in the Neighbourhood, and from such weighty Considerations as these, as it too often unfortunately falls

² Dr Thomas Birch, in a letter dated June 15, 1764, says that this letter was by Mr Philip Yorke, afterwards Earl of Hardwicke, who was author also of another piece in the Spectator, but his son could not remember what that was.

'out, the Mother is become invincibly persuaded that her Son is a great Scholar, and that to chain him down to the ordinary Methods of Education with others of his Age, would be to cramp his Faculties, and do an irreparable Injury to his wonderful Capacity.

'I happened to visit at the House last Week, and missing the young Gentleman at the Tea-Table, where he seldom fails to officiate, could not upon so extraordinary a Circumstance void inquiring after him. My Lady told me, he was gone out with her Woman, in order to make some Preparations for their Equipage for that she intended very speedily to carry him to travel. The Oddness of the Expression shock'd me a little; however, I soon recovered my self enough to let her know, that all I was willing to understand by it was, that she designed this Summer to shew her Son his Estate in a distant County, in which he has never yet been. But she soon took care to rob me of that agreeable Mistake, and let me into the whole Affair. She enlarg'd upon young Master's prodigious Improvements, and his comprehensive Knowledge of all Book Learning, concluding, that it is now high time he should be made acquainted with Men and Things, that she had resolv'd he should make the Tour of France and Italy, but could not bear to have him out of her Sight, and therefore intended to go along with him.

'I was going to rally her for so extravagant a Resolution, but found my self not in fit Humour to meddle with a Subject that demand'd the most soft and delicate Touch imaginable. I was afraid of dropping something that might seem to bear hard either upon the Son's Abilities, or the Mother's Discretion, being sensible that in both these Cases, tho' supported with all the Powers of Reason, I should, instead of gaining her Ladyship over to my Opinion, only expose my self to her Disesteem. I therefore immediately determin'd to refer the whole Matter to the SPECTATOR.

'When I came to reflect at Night, as my Custom is, upon the Occurrences of the Day, I could not but believe that this Humour of carrying a Boy to travel in his Mother's Lap, and that upon pretence of learning Men and Things, is a Case of an extraordinary Nature, and carries on it a particular Stamp of Folly. I did not remember to have met with its Parallel within the Compass of my Observation, tho' I could call to mind some not extremely unlike it. From hence my Thoughts took Occasion to ramble into the general Notion of Travelling, as it is now made a Part of Education. Nothing is more frequent than to take a Lad from Grammar and Law, and under the Tuition of some poor Scholar, who is willing to be bribed for thirty Pounds a Year, and a little Victuals, send him crying and snivelling into foreign Countries. Thus he spends his time as Children do at Puppet-Shows, and with much the same Advantage, in staring and gazing at an amazing Variety of strange things, strange indeed to one who is not prepared to comprehend the Reasons and Meaning of them, whilst he should be laying the solid Foundations of Knowledge in his Mind, and furnishing it with just Rules to direct his future Progress in Life under some skillful Master of the Art of Instruction.

'Can there be a more astonishing Thought in Nature, than to consider how Men should fall into so palpable a Mistake? It is a large Field, and my very well excus'd sprightly Genius, but I don't remember you have yet taken a Turn in it. I wish, Sir, you would make People understand, that Travel is really the last Step to be taken in the Institution of Youth, and to set out with it, is to begin where they should end.

'Certainly the true End of visiting Foreign Parts, is to look into their Customs and Policies, and observe in what Particulars they excel or come short of our own, to learn some odd Peculiarities in our Manners, and wear off such awkward Stiffnesses and Affectations in our Behaviour, as may possibly have been contracted from constantly associating with one Nation of Men, by a more free, general and mixed Conversation. But how can any of these Advantages be attained by one who is a mere Stranger to the Customs and Policies of his native Country, and has not yet fix'd in his Mind the first Principles of Manners and Behaviour? To endeavour it, is to build a gawdy Structure without any Foundation, or, if I may be allow'd the Expression, to work a rich Embroidery upon a Cobweb.

'Another End of travelling which deserves to be consider'd, is the Improving our Taste of the best Authors of Antiquity, by seeing the Places where they lived, and of which they wrote, to compare the natural Face of the Country with the Descriptions they have given us, and observe how well the Picture agrees with the Original. This must certainly be a most charming Exercise to the Mind that is rightly turn'd for it, besides that it may in a good measure be made subservient to Morality, if the Person is capable of drawing just Conclusions concerning the Uncertainty of human things, from the ruinous Alterations Time and Barbarity have brought upon so many Palaces, Cities and whole Countries, which make the most illustrious Figures in History. And this Hint may be not a little improved by examining every Spot of Ground that we find celebrated as the Scene of some famous Action or retaining any Footsteps of a Cato, Cicero or Brutus, or some such great virtuous Man. A nearer View of any such Particular, tho' really little and trifling in it self, may serve the more powerfully to warm a generous Mind to an Emulation of their Virtues, and a greater Ardency of Ambition to imitate their bright Examples, if it comes duly temper'd and prepar'd for the Impression. But this I believe you'll hardly think those to be, who are so far from entering into the Sense and Spirit of the Ancients, that they don't yet understand their Language with any [Exactness].

Veni magis, quia vere calor reddit ossibus—
Virg

THE Author of the Menagiana acquaints us, that discoursing one Day with several Ladies of Quality about the Effects of the Month of May, which infuses a kindly Warmth into the Earth, and all its Inhabitants the Marchioness of S— who was one of the Company, told him, That though she would promise to be chaste in every Month besides, she could not engage for her self in May. As the beginning therefore of this Month is now very near, I design this Paper for a Caveat to the Fair Sex, and publish it before April is quite out, that if any of them should be caught tripping, they may not pretend they had not timely Notice

I am induced to this, being perswaded the above mentioned Observation is as well calculated for our Climate as for that of France, and that some of our British Ladies are of the same Constitution with the French Marchioness

I shall leave it among Physicians to determine what may be the Cause of such an Anniversary Inclination whether or no it is that the Spirits after having been as it were frozen and congealed by Winter, are now turned loose, and set a rumbling, or that the gay Prospects of Fields and Meadows, with the Courtship of the Birds in every Bush naturally unbend the Mind, and soften it to Pleasure, or that, as some have imagined a Woman is prompted by a kind of Instinct to throw herself on a Ped of Lovers, and not to let those beautiful Couches which Nature has provided be useless. However it be, the Effects of this Month on the lower part of the Sex, who act without Disguise, [are] very visible. It is at this time that we see the young Wenches in a Country Parish dancing round a May Pole, which one of our learned Antiquaries supposes to be a Relique of a certain Pagan Worship that I do not think fit to mention

It is likewise on the first Day of this Month that we see the ruddy Milk Maid exerting her self in a most sprightly manner under a Pyramid of Silver Pankards, and, like the Virgin Sappho, oppress'd by the costly Ornaments which her Benefactors lay upon her

I need not mention the Ceremony of the Green Gown, which is also peculiar to this gay Season

The same periodical Love-Fit spreads through the whole Sex, as Mr Dryden well observes in his Description of this merry Month

2 [sic] and in first Reprint.

*For thee, swet Month, the Groves green Lanes wear,
 If not the first, the fairest of the Year,
 For thee the Graces lead the dancing Hours,
 And Nature's ready Pencil paints the Flowers
 The sprightly Mays commands our Mouth to keep The Virgils of her Night, and breaks their Sleep, Each gentle Breast with kindly Warmth she moves, Inspires new Flames, revives extinguish'd Loves*

Accordingly among the Works of the great Masters in Painting, who have drawn this general Season of the Year, we often observe Cusids confused with Zephirus flying up and down promiscuously in several Parts of the Picture. I cannot but add from my own Experience, that about this time of the Year Love Letters come up to me in great Numbers from all Quarters of the Nation.

I reciev'd an Epistle in particular by the last Post from a Polish Gentleman, who makes heavy Complaints of one Zelmida, whom it seems he has courted unsuccessfully these three Years past. He tells me that he designs to try her this May, and if he does not carry his Point, he will never think of her more.

Having thus furly admonish'd the female Sex, and bid before them the Dangers they are exposed to in this critical Month, I shall in the next place lay down some Rules and Directions for their better avoiding those Calamities which are so very frequent in this Season.

In the first place, I would advise them never to venture abroad in the Fields, but in the Company of a Parent, a Guardian, or some other sober discreet Person. I have before shewn how apt they are to trip in a flow'ry Meadow, and shall further observe to them, that Proserpine was out a Maying, when she met with that fatal Adventure to which Milton alludes when he mentions —That sun Field

Of Fenn, where Proserpine gathering Flowers, Herself a fairer Flower, by gloomy Dis
Was gather'd—

Since I am got into Quotations, I shall conclude this Head with Virg's Advice to young People, while they are gathering wild Strawberries and Nosegays, that they should have a care of the Snake in the Grass.

In the second place, I cannot but approve those Prescriptions, which our Astrological Physicians give in their Almanacks for this Month: such as use a spare and simple Diet, with the moderate Use of Phlebotomy.

Under this Head of Abstinence I shall also advise my fair Readers to be in a particular manner careful how they meddle with Romances, Chocolate, Novels, and the like Inflamers, which I look upon as very dangerous to be made use of during this great Carnival of Nature.

As I have often declared, that I have nothing more at heart than the Honour of my dear Country Women, I would beg them to consider, whenever their Resolutions begin to fail them, that there are but one and thirty Days of this soft Season, and that if they can but weather out this one Month, the rest of the Year will be easy to them. As for that Part of the fair-Sex who stay in Town I would advise them to be particularly cautious how they give them selves up to their most innocent Intermittents. If they cannot forsake the Play house I would recommend Tragedy to them rather than Comedy, and should think the Puppet show much easier for them than the Opera, all the while the Sun is in Gemini.

The Reader will observe that this Paper is written for the use of those Ladies who think it worth while to war against Nature in the Cause of Honour. As for that abandoned Crew, who do not think Virtue worth contending for, but give up their Reputation at the first Summons, such Warnings and Remonstrations are thrown away upon them. A Prostitute is the same easy Creature in all Months of the Year, and makes no difference between May and December. X

THESE are such wild Inconsistencies in the Thoughts of a Man in love, that I have often reflected there can be no reason for allowing him more Liberty than others possess'd with I renny, but that his Distemper has no Malice in it to any Mortal. That Devotion to his Mistress breeds in his Mind a general tenderness which exerts it self towards every Object is well as his Fair one. When this Passion is represented by Writers, it is common with them to endeavour at certain Quaintnesses and Turns of Imagination, which are apparently the Work of a Mind at ease, but the Men of true Taste can easily distinguish the Exertion of a Mind which overflows with tender Sentiments, and the Labour of one which is only describing Distress. In Performances of this kind, the most absurd of all things is to be witty, every Sentiment must grow out of the Occasion, and be suitable to the Circumstances of the Character. Where this Rule is transgressed, the humble Servant, in all the fine things he says, is but shewing his Mistress how well he can dress, instead of saying how well he loves. Love and Drapery is as much a Man, as Wit and Turn is Passion.

MR SPECTATOR,

The following Verses are a Translation of a 'Lagland Love-Song, which I met with in

* This quotation is made up of two passages in Dryden's version of Chaucer's Knight's Tale, 'Parlour and Arcite'. The first four lines are from Bk. II. ll. 663—666, the other four lines are from Bk. I. ll. 176—179.

† Paradise Lost, Bk. IV. ll. 268—271.

'Scheffer's History of that Country' I was agreeably surprized to find a Spirit of Tender 'ness and Poetry in a Region which I never suspected for Delicacy. In hotter Climates, tho' altogether uncivilized, I had not wonder'd if I had found some sweet wild Notes among the Natives where they live in Groves of Oranges and hear the Melody of Birds about them. But a Lapland Lyric, bearing the Sentiments of Love and Poetry, not a worthy old Greene or Rome, a regular Ode from a Climate pinched with Frost, and curd with Darkness so great a Part of the Year where usurping that the poor Natives should get Food, or be tempted to propagate their Species this, I confess, seemed a greater Miracle to me than the famous Stones of their Drums, their Winds and Incantments.

I am the bolder in commanding this Northern Song, because I have faithfully kept to the Sentiments, without adding or diminishing and put in to no greater Praise from my Translation, than they who smooth and clean the Furs of that Country which have suffered by Curriers. The Numbers in the Original are as loose and unequal, as those in which the British Ladies sport their Pindaricks, and perhaps the truest of them might not think it a disagreeable Present from a Lover. But I have ventured to bind it in stricter Measures as being more proper for our

¹ John Scheffer, born in 1621, at Strasburg, was at the age of 27 so well known for his learning, that he was invited to Sweden, where he received a liberal pension from Queen Christina as her librarian, and was also a Professor of Law and Rhetoric in the University of Upsal. He died in 1679. He was the author of 27 works, among which is his 'Lapponia,' a Latin description of Lapland, published in 1673, of which an English version appeared at Oxford in folio, in 1674. The song is there given in the original Lapp, and in a rendering of Scheffer's Latin less conventionally polished than that published by the Spectator, which is Ambrose Philips's translation of a translation. In the Oxford translation there were six stanzas of the kind

With bright test beams let the Sun shine me On Orma Moor

*Could I be sure That from the top of the lofty Pine I Orma Moor might see,
I to his highest top could climb,
And with man's labour try
To come to aery My Mistress if that there she be*

Could I but know amidst a hat Flowers Or in that Shade she stays,

*The goodly Bowers
With all their verdant Pride,
Their Blossoms and their Spring,
Which make my Mistress disappear,
And her in envious Darkness hide,
I from the Roots and Beds of Earth would tear*

In the same chapter another song is given of which there is a version in No 406 of the Spectator

'Tongue, tho' perhaps wilder Graces may better suit the Genius of the Lapland Language
'It will be necessary to imagine that the Author of this Song, not having the Liberty of visiting his Mistress at her Father's House was in hopes of spying her at a Distance in the Fields

I

The sun & Sun, whose glad some Ray Is seen in Fair to Rural Play, Display the Mist as it is in the Skies, As I bring my Orma Moor Eyes

II

*Oh! were I seen in Dear to new,
I'd climb the Pine Tree's topmost Bough, Aloft in Air that quivering plays,
And round and round I'd gaze*

III

*If Orma Moor, where art thou land?
What is it that conceals my sleeping Maid?
Fast by the Root's edge I'll tear
The Trees that hide her, pro and Fair*

IV

Oh! I could ride the Clouds and Skies, Or on the Raven's Pinions rise To Storks, to Swans, a moment stay, To cast a Lover on his way

V

My Bliss too long my Bride denies, Apace she waxes Summer flies Nor yet the winter Blasts I fear, Not Storms or Night shall keep me here

VI

*What may for Strength and Steel compare?
Oh! Love is far stronger far By Bolts of Steel are Limbs confid' But cruel Love chains the Mind*

VII

*No longer let perplex thy Breast, When Thoughts torment the first are best,
'Tis no ad to go, 'tis Death to stay, Away to Orma, I'll e'er way*

Mr SPECTATOR, April the 10th.

I am one of those despicable Creatures called a Chamber-Maid, and have lived with a Mistress for some time, whom I love as my Life, which has made my Duty and Pleasure inseparable. My greatest Delight has been in being employed about her Person and indeed she is very seldom out of Humour for a Woman of her Quality. But here lies my Complaint, Sir, To bear with me is all the Encouragement she is pleased to bestow upon me for she gives her cast off Cloaths from me to others, some she is pleased to bestow in the House to those that neither wants nor wears them and some to Hangers-on, that frequents the House daily, who comes dressed out in them. Thus, Sir, is a very mortifying Sight to me, who am a little necessitous for Cloaths and loves to appear what I am, and causes an Uneasiness, so that I can't serve with that Cheerfulness as formerly, which my Mistress takes notice of, and calls Envy and Ill-

'Temper at seeing others preferred before me

I HAVE often pleas'd my self with considering the two kinds of Benefits which accrue to the Publick from these my Speculations, and which, were I to speak after the manner of Iogencrates, I would distinguish into the Material and the Formal. By the latter I understand those Advantages which my Readers receive, as their Minds are either improv'd or delighted by these my daily Labours, but having already several times descanted on my Endeavours in this Light, I shall at present wholly confine my self to the Consideration of the former. By the Word Material I mean those Benefits which arise to the Publick from these my Speculations, as they consume a considerable quantity of our Paper Manufacture, employ our Artisans in Printing, and find Business for great Numbers of Indigent Persons.

Our Paper-Manufacture takes into it several mean Materials which could be put to no other use, and affords Work for several Hands in the collecting of them, which are incapable of any other Employment. Those poor Retainers, whom we see so busy in every Street, deliver in their respective Gleanings to the Merchant. The Merchant carries them in Loads to the Paper Mill, where they pass thro' a fresh Set of Hands, and give life to another Trade. Those who have Mills on their Estates, by this means considerably raise their Rents, and the whole Nation is in a great measure supply'd with a Manufacture, for which formerly she was oblig'd to her Neighbours.

The Materials are no sooner wrought into Paper, but they are distributed among the Presses, where they are set innumerable Artists at Work, and furnish Business to another Mystery. From hence, accordingly as they are stain'd with News or Politicks, they fly thro' the Town in Post Men, Post-Boys, Daily-Courants, Reviews, Medleys, and Examiners. Men, Women, and Children contend who shall be the first Bearers of them, and get their daily Sustenance by spreading them.

In short, when I trace in my Mind a Bundle of Rags to a Quire of Spectators, I find so many Hands employ'd in every Step they take thro' their whole Progress, that while I am writing a Spectator, I fancy my self providing Bread for a Multitude.

If I do not take care to oblige some of my witty Readers, they will be apt to tell me, that my Paper, after it is thus printed and published, is still beneficial to the Publick on several Occasions.
I must confess I have lighted my Pipe with my own Works for this twelve month past. My Ladyridly often sends up her little Daughter to devour some of my old Spectators, and has frequently told me, that the Paper they are printed on is the best in the World to wrap Spice in.
They likewise make a good Foundation for a Mutton-pye, as I have more than once experienced, and were very much sought for, last Christmas, by the whole Neighbourhood.

It is pleasant enough to consider the Changes that a Linen Linnenment undergoes, by passing thro' the several Hands above mentioned. The finest pieces of Holland, when worn to Tatters, assume a new Whiteness more beautiful than their first, and often return in the shape of Letters to their Native Country. A Lady's Shift may be re-metamorphos'd into Pilestifledoux, and come into her Possession a second time. A Beau may peruse his Cravat after it is worn out, with greater Pleasure and Advantage than ever he did in a Cravat. In a word, a Piece of Cloth, after having officiated for some Years as a Towel or a Napkin, may by this means be rais'd from a Dunghill, and become the most valuable Piece of Furniture in a Prince's Cabinet.

The politest Nations of Europe have endeavoured to vie with one another for the Reputation of the finest Printing. Absolute Governments, as well as Republicks, have encouraged an Art which seems to be the noblest and most beneficial that was ever invented among the Sons of Men.
The present King of France, in his Pursuits after Glory, has particularly distinguished himself by the promoting of this useful Art, inasmuch that several Books have been printed in the Louvre at his own Expence, upon which he sets so great a value, that he considers them as the noblest Present he can make to foreign Princes and Ambassadors. If we look into the Commonwealths of Holland and Venice, we shall find that in this Particular they have made themselves the Envy of the greatest Monarchies. Elever and Aldus are more frequently mentioned than any Pensioner of the one or Doge of the other.

The several Presses which are now in England, and the great Encouragement which has been given to Learning for some Years last past, has made our own Nation as glorious upon this Account, as for its late Triumphs and Conquests.
The new Edition which is given us of Cæsar's Commentaries, has already been taken notice of in foreign Gazettes, and is a Work that does no tour to the English Press.¹ It is no wonder that an Edition should be very correct, which has passed thro' the Hands of one of the most accurate learned and judicious Writers this Age has produced. The Beauty of the Paper of the Character, and of the several Cuts with which this noble Work is illustrated, makes it the finest Book that I have ever seen. And is a true Instance of the Felicity of Genius, which tho' it does not cure the Fast in a very Art generally cure it to greater Effect than any other Country in the World. I am particularly glad that this Author comes from a British Private house in a great Magnificence as he is the first who has given us any tolerable Account of our Country.

My Illustrious Readers, if any such there are will be surprised to hear the talk of Learning and the Glory of a Nation and of Printing as an Art that gives a Reputation to a People more when it flourishes. When Men in this are taken up with Ambition they cannot look upon any thing as great or valuable which does not bring with it an extraordinary Power or Interest to the Person who is concerned in it. But as I shall never in this Paper so far as to engage with Letters and Liberal Arts, I shall only regard such kind of Reverses with that Eye which is due to so deplorable a Degree of Stupidity and Ignorance.

AS the Spectator is in a kind of Paper of News from the natural World, as others are from the busy and political Part of Mankind, I shall translate the following Letter written to an eminent French Gentleman in this Town from Paris, which gives us the Exit of an Heroine who is a Pattern of Patience and Generosity.

SIR,

Paris, April 18, 1712

'Tis is so many Years since you left your native Country, that I am to tell you the Characters of your nearest Relations as much as if you were an utter Stranger to them. The Occasion of this is to give you an account of the Death of Madam de Villacerse, whose Departure out of this Life I know not whether a Man of your Philosophy will call unfortunate or not, since it was attended with some Circumstances as much to be desired as to be lamented. She was her whole Life happy in an uninterrupted Health and was always happy in the Possession of Temper and Greatness of Mind. On the 10th instant that Lady was taken with an Indisposition which confined her to her Chamber, but was such as was so short that she took a little Bed, and yet was never so well as of my Satisfaction in being out of it. It is notoriously known that some Years ago Monsieur de Villacerse, one of the most considerable Surgeons in France, was devotedly in love with this Lady. Her Quality placed her above any Application to her in the account of his Passion, but as we can always have some regard to the Person whom she loves to be her real Admirer, she now took it in her head (upon Advice of her Physicians) to lose some of her blood to send for Monsieur de Villacerse on that occasion. I happened to be there at that time and my near Relation gave me the Privilege to be present. As soon as her Arm was stripped bare, and he began to press it in order to raise the Vein, his Colour changed and I observed him jerked with a sudden Tremor which made me take the liberty to speak of it to my Cousin with some Apprehension. She smiled, and said she knew Mr. Festeau had no Inclination to do her Injury. He seemed to recover himself, and smiling also proceeded in his Work. Immediately after the Operation he cried out that it was the most unfortunate of all Men for that he had opened an Artery instead of a Vein. It is impossible to express the Artist's Distraction at the Patient's Composure. I will not dwell on little Circumstances, but go on to inform you, that within three days time it was thought necessary to take off her Arm. She was so far from using Festeau as it would be natural to one of a lower Spirit to treat him that she would not let him be absent from any Consultation about her present Condition, and on every occasion asked whether he was satisfied in the Measures (that) were taken about her. Before this was done she ordered her Will to be drawn, and after having been about a quarter of an hour alone she bid the Surgeons of whom poor Festeau was one, go on in their Work. I know not how to give you the Term of Art, but there appeared such Symptoms after the Amputation of her Arm, that it was visible she could not live four and twenty hours. Her Behaviour was so magnanimous throughout this whole Affair, that I was particularly curious in taking Notice of what passed as her Life approached nearer and nearer, and took Notice of what she said to all about her, particularly Word for Word what she spoke to Mr. Festeau, which was as follows.

¹ Just published, 1712 by Dr Samuel Clarke, then 37 years old. He had been for 12 years Chaplain to the Bishop of Norwich, and Louis Le Clerc tutor in 1704-5, when he took for his subject the Being and Attributes of God and the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion. He had also translated Newton's Optics, and was become chaplain to the Queen, Rector of St James's, Westminster, and D.D. of Cambridge. The recitations of heterodoxy that followed him through his after life date from this year, 1712, in which, besides the edition of Caesar, he published a book on the Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity.

'Sir, you gave me inexpressible Sorrow for the Anguish with which I see you overwhelmed. I am removed to all Intents and Purposes from the Interests of human Life, therefore I am to begin to think like one wholly unconcerned in

"it I do not consider you as one by whose Error I have lost my Life no, you are my Benefactor, as you have hasten'd my Entrance into a happy Immortality This is my Sense of this Accident, but the World in which you live may have I thought of it to your Disadvantage, I have therefore taken Care to provide for you in my Will, and have placed you above what you have to fear from their Ill Nature"

"While this excellent Woman spoke these Words, Festeau looked as if he received a Condemnation to die, instead of a Pension for his Life Madam de Villacerse lived till Eight of [the] Clock the next Night and tho' she must have laboured under the most exquisite Torments, she possessed her Mind with so wonderful a Patience, that one may rather say she ceased to breathe than she died at that hour You who had not the happiness to be personally known to this Lady, have nothing but to rejoice in the Honour you had of being related to so great Merit, but we who have lost her Conversation, cannot so easily resign our own Happiness by Reflection upon hers

I am,

SIR,

Your affectionate Kinsman, and most obedient humble Servant,

Paul Regnaud

There hardly can be a greater Instance of an Heroick Mind, than the unprejudiced Manner in which this Lady weighed this Misfortune. The regard of Life it self could not make her overlook the Contrition of the unhappy Man, whose more than Ordinary Concern for her was all his Guilt. It would certainly be of singular Use to human Society to have an exact Account of this Lady's ordinary Conduct, which was Crowned by so uncommmon Magnanimity. Such Greatness was not to be acquired in her last Article, nor is it to be doubted but it was a constant Practice of all that is praise-worthy, which made her capable of beholding Death, not as the Dissolution, but Consummation of her Life

Segnans irritant animos demissa per aures Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus—

Hor

MILTON, after having represented in Vision the History of Mankind to the first great Period of Nature, dispatches the remaining part of it in Narration. He has devised a very handsome Reason for the Angel's proceeding with Adam after this manner though doubtless the true Reason was the Difficulty which the Poet would have found to have shadowed out so mixed and complicated a Story in visible Objects. I could wish, however, that the Author had done it, whatever Pains it might have cost him. To give my Opinion freely, I think that the exhibiting part of the History of Mankind in Vision, and part in Narrative, is as if an History-Painter should put in Colours one half of his Subject, and write down the remaining part of it. If Milton's Poem flags any where, it is in this Narration, where in some places the Author has been so attentive to his Divinity, that he has neglected his Poetry. The Narration, however, rises very happily on several Occasions, where the Subject is capable of Poetical Ornaments, as particularly in the Confusion which he describes among the Builders of Babel, and in his short Sketch of the Plagues of Egypt. The Storm of Hail and Fire, with the Darkness that overspread the Land for three Days, are described with great Strength. The beautiful Passage which follows, is raised upon noble Hints in Scripture

Thus with ten thousand

The River Dragon tamed at length submits To let his Sojourners depart, and oft Humbles his stubborn Heart, but still as Ice More harden'd after Thaw, till in his Rage Pursues whom he late dismiss'd, the Sea Swallows him with his Host, but them lets pass As on dry Land between two Crystal Walls, A-d-d by the Rod of Moses so to stand Divided

The River-Dragon is an Allusion to the Crocodile, which inhabits the Nile, from whence Egypt derives her Plenty. This Allusion is taken from that Sublime Passage in Ezekiel, Thus saith the Lord God, behold I am against thee, Pharaoh King of Egypt, the great Dragon that lieth in the midst of his Rivers, which hath said, my River is mine own, and I have made it for my self. Milton has given us another very noble and poetical Image in the same Description, which is copied almost Word for Word out of the History of Moses

*All Night he will pursue, but his Approach Darkness defends between till morning Watch, Then through the fiery Pillar and the Cloud God looking forth, will trouble all his Host,
And crize their Chariot Wheels when by command Moses once more his potent Rod extends Over the Sea the Sea his Rod obeys On their embattel'd Ranks the Waves return And overwhelm their Wais*

As the principal Design of this Episode was to give Adam an Idea of the Holy Person, who was to reanimate human Nature in that Happiness and Perfection from which it had fallen, the Poet confines himself to the Line of Abraham, from whence the Messiah was to Descend. The Angel is described as seeing the Patriarch actually travelling towards the Land of Promise, which gives a particular Liveliness to this part of the Narration

*I see him, but thou canst not, with what Faith
He leaves his Gods, his Friends, his Native Soil, Ur of Chaldaea, passing now the Ford To Haran, after him a cumbrous Train Of Herds and Flocks, and numerous Servitude, Not wand'ring poor, but trusting all his Wealth
With God, who call'd him, in a Land unknown Canaan he now attains, I see his Tents Pitch'd about Sechem, and the neighbouring Plain*

Of Moreh, there by Providence is Gifts to his Progeny of all that I as'd, From Hamath to the Desert South (Things by their Names I call, though yet unnamed)

As I arg'd his Vision in the sixth Æneid probably gave Milton the Hint of this whole Episide, the last Line is a Translation of that Verse where Aeneas mentions the Names of Places, which they were to bear hereafter

Hæc tamen in crura, rursus sunt sine nomine terre

The Poet has very finely represented the Joy and Gladness of Heart which rises in Adam upon his discovery of the Messiah. As he sees his Day at a distance through Types and Shadows, he rejoices in it; but when he finds the Redemption of Man completed, and Paradise again renewed, he breaks forth in Rapture and Transport

*O Goodness infinite, Goodness immense!
Thou art all this Good of Earth shall produce, &c*

I have hinted in my sixth Paper on Milton, that in Heroick Poem, according to the Opinion of the best Critics, ought to end happily, and leave the Mind of the Reader, after having conducted it through many Doubts and Fears, Sorrows and Disquietudes, in a State of Tranquillity and Satisfaction. Milton's Fable, which had so many other Qualifications to recommend it, was deficient in this Particular. It is here therefore, that the Poet has shewn a most exquisite Judgment, as well as the finest Invention by finding out a Method to supply this natural Defect in his Subject. Accordingly he leaves the Adversary of Mankind in the last View which he gives us of him, under the lowest State of Mortification and Disappointment. We see him chewing Ashes, grovelling in the Dust and laden with super-numerary Pains and Torments. On the contrary, our two first Parents are comforted by Dreams and Visions, cheered with Promises of Salvation, and, in a manner, raised to a greater Happiness than that which they had forfeited. In short, Satan is represented miserable in the height of his Triumphs, and Adam triumphant in the height of his Misery.

Milton's Poem ends very nobly. The last Speeches of Adam and the Arch Angel are full of Moral and Instructive Sentiments. The Sleep that fell upon Eve and the Effects it had in quieting the Disorders of her Mind produces the same kind of Consolation in the Reader who cannot peruse the last beautiful Speech which is ascribed to the Mother of Mankind, without a secret Pleasure and Satisfaction.

*Whence thou return'st, and whither went'st, I know,
For God is also in Sleep, and Dreams ad us,
What he hath sent propitious, some great Good Prospaging, since with Sorrow and Heart's Distress*

*Wearied I fell asleep, but now lead on,
In me is no delay, will thee to go,
Is to stay here, without thee here to stay,*

Is to hence in willing thou to me Art all things under Heaven, all Places thou, Who for this virtuous Crime art banish'd hence This farther Consolation yet see ere I carry hence, though all by me is lost Such Farewell, unworthy, am-enchafed, By me the promised Seed shall all restore

The following Lines, which conclude the Poem, rise in a most glorious Blaze of Poetical Images and Expressions.

Heaven is in his Æthiopicks acquaints us, that the Motion of the Gods differs from that of Mortals; the former do not stir their Feet, nor proceed Step by Step, but slide over the Surface of the Earth by an uniform Swimming of the whole Body. The Reader may observe with how Poetical a Description Milton has attributed the same kind of Motion to the Angels who were to take Possession of Paradise.

*So spake our Mother Eve and Adam heard Well pleas'd but answer'd none, for now too nigh
Th' infernal stord, and from the other Hill
To their fix'd Station all in bright Array
The Cherubim descended, in the Groin'd Gliding between us, as evening Mist Rise from a River, on the Marshy glides,
And gathers ground fast at the Labrier's Heel Honest and returning, Hark! I rent'st meed, The brandish'd Sword of God before them blaz'd Fierce as a Comet*

The Author helped his Invention in the following Passage, by reflecting on the Behaviour of the Angel who, in Holy Writ, has the Conduct of Job and his Family. The Circumstances drawn from that Relation are very gracefully made use of on this Occasion.

*In either Hand the hastening Angel caught Our lucre Parents, and to the Eastern Gate Led to em ascent, and down the Cliff as fast
To the subjected Plain, th' undissu'd They look'd back, &c.*

The [Scene¹] which our first Parents are surprized with upon their looking back on Paradise, wonderfully strikes the Reader's Imagination as nothing can be more natural than the Fear they shed on that Occasion.

*They looking back, all the Eastern side bel old Of Paradise, so late their happy Seat, Wonderfully that span my brand the Gate With dreadful faces throng'd and fiery Arms
Some natural Fears they dropp'd, but us'd Their reason,*

The World was all before them, whither to chuse Their Place of Rest, and Providence their Guide

If I might presume to offer at the smallest Alteration in this divine Work, I should think the Poem would end better with the Passage here quoted, than with the two Verses which follow.

They had in hand, with vanquishing Steps and slow, Through Eden to seek their solitary Ways

¹ [Prospect]

look all round us and behold the different I'm employments of Mankind, you hardly see one who is not, as the Player is, in an assumed Character. The Lawyer, who is vehement and loud in a Cause, wherein he knows he has not the Truth of the Question on his Side, is a Player as to the personated Part, but incomparably meaner than he is to the Prostitution of himself for Hire, because the Pleader's Likelihood introduces Injustice the Player feigns for no other end but to divert or instruct you. The Divine, whose Prayers transport him to say any thing with any View but promoting the Interests of true Piety and Religion is a Player with a still greater Imputation of Guilt, in proportion to his depreciating a Character more sacred. Consider all the different Pursuits and Employments of Men, and you will find half their Actions tend to nothing else but Disguise and Imposture, and all that is done which proceeds not from a Man's very self, is the Action of a Player. For this Reason it is that I in the frequent men of the Stage. It is, with me, a Matter of the highest Consideration what Parts are well or ill performed, what Passions or Sentiments are ridiculed or calumniated, and consequently what Manners and Customs are transused from the Stage to the World, which reciprocally imitate each other. As the Writers of Fick Poems introduce shadowy Persons, and represent Vices and Virtues under the Characters of Men and Women so I, who am a SPECTATOR in the World, may perhaps sometimes mis-use of the Names of the Actors on the Stage, to represent or admonish those who transact Affairs in the World. When I am commending Wilks for representing the Tenderneſs of a Husband and a Father in Alfred,¹ the Continence of a reformed Prodigal in Harry, the Fourth, the winning Emptiness of a young Man of Good nature and Wealth in the Irf to the Jubilee,² the Officiousness of an artful Servant in the For,³ when thus I celebrate Wilks, I talk to all the World who are engaged in any of those Circumstances. If I were to speak of Merit neglected, misapplied, or misunderstood, might not I say Escount has a great Capacity? But it is not the Interest of others who bear a Figure on the Stage that his Talents were understood, it is their Business to impose upon him what cannot become him, or keep out of his hands any thing, in which he would shine. Were one to rouse a Suspicion of himself in a Man who passes upon the World for a fine thing, in order to alarm him, one might say, if I ord Escount were not on the Stage, Cibber acts the false Pretensions to a genteel Behaviour so very justly, he would have in the generosity of Mankind more that would admire than decide him. When we come to Characters directly Comical, it is not to be imagined what Effect a well regulated Stage would have upon Men's Manners. The Craft of an Usurer, the Absurdity of a rich Fool, the rufward Rousness of a Fellow of half Courage, the ungraceful

Mirth of a Creature of half Wit, might be forever put out of Countenance by proper Parts for Don Quixote by acting Corbachio,⁴ the other Night, must have given all who saw him a thorough Detestation of aged Avarice. The Pettulancy of a peevish old Fellow, who loves and hates, he knows not why, is very excellently performed by the Ingenious Mr William Penkethman in the Pops Fortune,⁵ where, in the Character of Don Choleric Snap Shorto de Pesty, he answers no Questions but to those whom he likes, and want no account of any thing from those he approves. Mr Penkethman is also Master of as many Tricks in the Dumb-Scene as can be expected from a Man in the Circumstances of being ready to perish out of Fear and Hunger. He wanders throughout the whole Scene very mysteriously, without neglecting his Victuals. If it be, as I have heard it sometimes mentioned, a great Qualification for the World to follow Business and Pleasure too, what is it in the Ingenious Mr Penkethman to represent a Sense of Pleasure and Pain at the same time as you may see him do this Evening?⁶

As it is certain that a Stage ought to be wholly suppressed, or judiciously encouraged, while there is one in the Nation, Men turned for regular Pleasure cannot employ their Thoughts more usefully, for the Diversion of Mankind, than by convincing them that it is in themselves to raise this Entertainment to the greatest Height. It would be a great Improvement, as well as Embellishment to the Theatre, if Dancing were more regarded, and taught to all the Actors. One who has the Advantage of such an agreeable Person as Mrs Bicknell, joined with her Capacity of Imitation, could in proper Gesture and Motion represent all the decent Characters of Female Life. An amiable Modesty in one Aspect of a Dancer, an assumed Confidence in another, a sudden Joy in another, a falling off with an Impudence of being beheld, a Return towards the Audience with an unsteady Resolution to approach them,

Such elegant Entertainments as these, would polish the Town into Judgment in their Gratifications, and Delicacy in Pleasure is the first step People of Condition take in Reformation from Vice. Mrs. Bicknell has the only Capacity for this sort of Dancing of any on the Stage, and I dare say all who see her Performance to-morrow Night, when sure the Romp will do her best for her own Benefit, will be of my Mind.

Famne igitur laudas quod se sapientibus unus Ridebat— Juv

I SHALL communicate to my Reader the following Letter for the Entertainment of this Day

SIR,

You know very well that our Nation is more famous for that sort of Men who are called Il luns and Humourists, than any other Country in the World. For which reason it is observed that our English Comedy excels that of all other Nations in the Novelty and Variety of its Characters.

Among those innumerable Sets of Whims which our Country produces, there are none whom I have regarded with more Curiosity than those who have invented any particular kind of Diversion for the Entertainment of themselves or their Friends. My Letter shall single out those who take delight in sorting a Company that has something of Burlesque and Ridicule in its Appearance. I shall make my self understood by the following Example. One of the Wits of the last Age who was a Man of a good Estate, thought he never laid out his Money better than in a Jest. As he was one Year at the Bath, observing that in the great Confluence of fine People, there were several among them with long Chins, a part of the Visage by which he himself was very much distinguished, he invited to dinner half a Score of these remarkable Persons who had their Mouths in the Middle of their Faces. They had no sooner placed themselves about the Table, but they began to stare upon one another, not being able to imagine what had brought them together. Our English Proverb says,

*'Tis merry in the Hall,
If hen Beards wag all*

It proved so in the Assembly I am now speaking of, who seeing so many Peaks of Faces agitated with Laughter, Drinking, and Discourse, and observing all the Chins that were present meeting together very often over the Center of the Table, every one grew sensible of the Jest, and came into it with so much Good Humour, that they lived in strict Friendship and Alliance from that Day forward.

The same Gentleman some time after picked together a Set of Oglers, as he called them, consisting of such as had an unlucky Cast in their Eyes. His Diversion on this Occasion was to see the cross Brows, mistle on Signs, and wrong Connivances that passed amidst so many broken and refracted Rays of Sight.

The third Last which this merry Gentleman exhibited was to the Stammerers, whom he got together in a sufficient Body to fill his Table. He had ordered one of his Servants, who was placed behind a Screen, to write down their Table Talk, which was very easy to be done without the help of Short hand. It appears by the Notes which were taken, that tho' their Conversation never fell, there were not above twenty Words spoken during the first Course that upon serving up the second, one of the Company was a quarter of an Hour in telling them that the Ducklins and [Asparagus] were very good and that another took up the same time in declaring himself of the same Opinion. This Jest did not, however, go off so well as the former for one of the Guest being a brave Man, and full of Resentment that he knew how to express went out of the Room and sent the facetious Inviter a Challenge in Writing, which though it was afterwards dropp'd by the Interposition of Friends, put a Stop to these ludicrous Entertainments.

Now, Sir, I dare say you will agree with me, that as there is no Moral in these Jest, they ought to be discouraged, and looked upon rather as pieces of Unpleasantness than Wit. However, as it is natural for one Man to refine upon the Thought of another, and impossible for any single Person how great soever his Parts may be, to invent an Art, and bring it to its utmost Perfection. I shall here give you an account of an honest Gentleman of my Acquaintance who upon hearing the Character of the Wit above mentioned has himself assumed it, and endeavoured to convert it to the Benefit of Mankind. He invited half a dozen of his Friends one day to Dinner, who were each of them famous for inserting several redundant Phrases in their Discourse, as d'y hear me, d'y see, that is, and so Sir. Each of the Guests making frequent use of his particular License, appeared so ridiculous to his Neighbour, that he could not but reflect upon himself as appearing equally ridiculous to the rest of the Company. By this means, before they had sat long together, every one talking with the greatest Circumpection, and carefully avoiding his favourite Expletive, the Conversation was cleared of its Redundancies, and had a greater Quantity of Sense, tho' less of Sound in it.

The same well meaning Gentleman took occasion, at another time, to bring together such of his Friends as were addicted to a foolish habitual Custom of Swearing. In order to shew the Absurdity of the Practice, he had recourse to

² George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, Dryden's Zimri, and the author of the Rehearsal

¹ [Sparrow grass] and in first Reprint

'Tavern successively, and keep a sort of moving Club Having often met with their Faces, and observed a certain slinking Way in their dropping in one after another, I had the Curiosity to enquire into their Characters, being the rather moved to it by their agreeing in the Singularity of their Dress and I find upon due Examination they are a Knot of Parish Clerks, who have taken a fancy to one another, and perhaps settle the Bills of Mortality over their Half-pints I have so great a Value and Veneration for any who have but even an assenting Amen in the Service of Religion, that I am afraid lest these Persons should incur some Scandal by this Practice and would therefore have them, without Railery, advised to send the Florence and Pulletts home to their own Houses, and not pretend to live as well as the Overseers of the Poor

I am, SIR,
Your most humble Servant,

MR SPECTATOR,

May 6

'I was last Wednesday Night at a Tavern in the City, among a Set of Men who call themselves the Lawyers Club You must know, Sir, this Club consists only of Attorneys and at this Meeting every one proposes the Cause he has then in hand to the Board, upon which each Member gives his Judgment according to the Experience he has met with If it happens that any one puts a Case of which they have had no Precedent, it is noted down by their Clerk Will Goosequill, (who registers all their Proceedings) that one of them may go the next Day with it to a Counsel This indeed is commendable, and ought to be the principal End of their Meeting but had you been there to have heard them relate their Methods of managing a Cause, their Manner of drawing out their Bills and, in short, their Arguments upon the several ways of abusing their Clients, with the Applause that is given to him who has done it most artfully, you would before now have given your Remarks on them They are so conscious that their Discourses ought to be kept secret, that they are very cautious of admitting any Person who is not of their Profession When any who are not of the Law are let in, the Person who introduces him, says, he is a very honest Gentleman, and he is taken in, as their Cant is, to pay Costs I am admitted upon the Recommendation of one of their Principals, as a very honest good natured Fellow that will never be in a Plot; and only desires to drink his Bottle and smoke his Pipe You have formerly remarked upon several Sorts of Clubs and as the Tendency of this is only to increase Fraud and Deceit, I hope you will please to take Notice of it

I am (with Respect)

Your humble Servant,

MR. LOCKE, in his Treatise of Human Understanding, has spent two Chapters upon the Abuse of Words.² The first and most palpable Abuse of Words, he says, is, when they are used without clear and distinct Ideas The second, when we are so inconstant and unsteady in the Application of them, that we sometimes use them to signify one Idea, sometimes another He adds, that the Result of our Contemplations and Reasonings, while we have no precise Ideas fixed to our Words, must needs be very confused and absurd To avoid this Inconvenience, more especially in moral Discourses, where the same Word should constantly be used in the same Sense, he earnestly recommends the use of Definitions A Definition, says he, is the only way whereby the precise Meaning of Moral Words can be known He therefore accuses those of great Negligence, who Discourse of Moral things with the least Obscurity in the Terms they make use of, since upon the forementioned ground he does not scruple to say, that he thinks Morality is capable of Demonstration as well as the Mathematics

I know no two Words that have been more abused by the different and wrong Interpretations which are put upon them, than those two, Modesty and Assurance To say such an one is a modest Man, sometimes indeed passes for a good Character, but at present is very often used to signify a sheepish awkward Fellow, who has neither Good-breeding, Politeness, nor any Knowledge of the World

Again, A Man of Assurance, tho' at first it only denoted a Person of a free and open Carriage, is now very usually applied to a profligate Wretch, who can break through all the Rules of Decency and Morality without a Blush

I shall endeavour therefore in this Essay to restore these Words to their true Meaning, to prevent the Idea of Modesty from being confounded with that of Sheepishness, and to hinder Impudence from passing for Assurance

If I was put to define Modesty, I would call it The Reflection of an Ingenious Mind, either when a Man has committed an Action for which he censures himself, or fancies that he is exposed to the Censure of others

For this Reason a Man truly Modest is as much so when he is alone as in Company, and as subject to a Blush in his Closet, as when the Eyes of Multitudes are upon him

² Book III, Chapters 10, 11 Words are the subject of this book ch 10 is on the Abuse of Words, ch 11 of the Remedies of the foregoing imperfections and abuses

I do not remember to have met with any Instance of Modesty with which I am so well pleased, as that celebrated one of the young Prince, whose Father being a tributary King to the Romans had several Complaints laid against him before the Senate, as Tyrant and Oppressor of his Subjects. The Prince went to Court to defend his Father but coming into the Senate and hearing a Multitude of Crimes proved upon him, was so oppressed when it came to his turn to speak, that he was unable to utter a Word. The Story tells us, that the Fathers were more moved at this Instance of Modesty and Innocence than they could have been by the most Pathetical Oration and, in short, pardoned the guilty Father for this early Promise of Virtue in the Son.

I take Assurance to be the Faculty of possessing my own self, or of seeing and doing independent of the without any Vicissitudes or Enormities in the Mind. This which generally gives a Man Assurance is a moderate Knowledge of the World, but above all a Mind fixed and determined in itself to do nothing against the Rules of Honour and Decency. An open and assured Behaviour is the natural Consequence of such a Resolution. A Man thus armed, his Words or Actions are at any time misinterpreted, returns within himself and from a Consciousness of his own Integrity, assumes Force enough to despise the little Censures of Ignorance or Malice.

Every one ought to cherish and encourage in himself the Modesty and Assurance I have here mentioned.

A Man without Assurance is liable to be made uneasy by the Tolly or Ill nature of every one he converses with. A Man without Modesty is lost to all Sense of Honour and Virtue.

It is more than probable that the Prince above mentioned possessed both these Qualifications in a very eminent degree. Without Assurance he would not have undertaken to speak before the most august Assembly in the World without Modesty he would have played the Clown he had taken upon him, tho' it had appeared ever so scandalous.

I do not what has been said, it is plain, that Modesty and Assurance are both useful and necessary well meet in the same Person. When they are thus mixed and blended together they compose what we endeavour to express when we say a modest Assurance, by which we understand the just Mean between Bashfulness and Impudence.

I shall conclude with observing, that is the same Man may be both Modest and Assured, so it is also possible for the same Person to be both Impudent and Bashful.

We have frequent Instances of this odd kind of Mixture in People of depraved Minds and mean Education who tho' they are not able to meet a Man's Eyes, or pronounce a Sentence without Confusion, can voluntarily commit the greatest Villanies, or most indecent Actions.

Such a Person seems to have made a Resolution to do ill even in spite of himself, and in defiance of all those Checks and Restraints his Temper and Complexion seem to have laid in his

Upon the whole, I would endeavour to establish this Maxim, That the Practice of Modesty is the most proper Method to give a Man a becoming Assurance in his Words and Actions. Modesty always seeks to shelter itself in one of the two extremes, and is sometimes attended with both.

Author's reputation and subsequent reputation

THE PL is a Fault, which, tho' common wants a Name. It is the very contrary to Prudence. As we lose the present Hour by delaying, from Day to Day to execute what we ought to do immediately so most of us lose an Opportunity to sit still and throw away the Time in our Possession, by Prospecting on what is past, imaginary we have already acquitted our selves, and established our Characters in the sight of Mankind. But when we thus put a Value upon our selves for what we have already done, any further thing to explain our selves in order to assist our future Conduct, that will give us an overweening opinion of our Merit to the prejudice of our present Indus-try. The great Rule, methinks, should be to manage the Instant in which we stand with Fortitude, Languinity and Moderation, according to Men's respective Circumstances. If our past Action reproaches us, they cannot be atoned for by our own severe Reflections so effectually as by contrary Behaviour. If they are praiseworthy, the Memory of them is of no use but to ret suitably to them. Thus a good present Behaviour is an implicit Repentance for any Misusage in what is past, but present Slackness will not make up for past Activity. Time first swallowed up all that the Contemportories did Yesterday, as irrevocably as it has the Actions of the Antediluvians. But we are now awake, and what shall we do to Day, to Day which passes while we are yet speaking? Shall we remember the Tolly of last Night or resolve upon the Course of Virtue to-morrow? Last Night is certainly gone, and to-morrow may never arrive. This Instant make use of. Can you oblige my M of Honour and Virtue? Do it immediately. Can you visit a sick Friend? Will it receive him to see you later, and suspend your own Love and Pleasure to comfort his Weakness, and hear the Impertinencies of a Wretch in Pain? Don't stay to take Coffee, but be gone. Your Mistress will bring Sorrow, and your bottle Madness. Go to neither. Such Virtues and Divisions are these are mentioned because they occur to all Men. But every Man sufficiently convinced, that to suspend the use of the present Moment, and resolve better for the future only, is imprudent. Iolly. What I attempted to consider, was the Mischief of setting such a Value upon what is past, as to think we have done enough. Let a Man have filled all the Offices of Life with the highest Dignity till Yesterday, and begin to live only to himself to Day, he must expect he will in the Effects upon his Reputation be considered as the Man who did Yesterday. The Man who distinguishes himself from the rest, stands in a Press of People, those before him intercept his Progress, and those behind him, if he does not urge on, will tread him down. Cæsar, of whom it was said, that he thought not of doing while he there was anything left for him to do, went on in performing the greatest Exploits, without assuming to himself a Privilege of taking Rest upon the Foundation of the Merit of his former Actions. It was the manner of that glorious Captain to write down what Scenes he passed through, but it was rather to keep his Affairs in Method, and capable of a clear Review in case they should be examined by others, than that he built a Renown upon anything which was past. I shall produce two Fragments of his to demonstrate, that it was his Rule of Life to support himself rather by what he should perform than what he had done already. In the Tablet which he wore about him the same Year, in which he obtained the Battle of Pharsalia, there were found these loose Notes for his own Conduct. It is supposed, by the Circumstances they alluded to, that they might be set down the Evening of the same Night.

'My Part is now but begun, and my Glory must be sustained by the Use I make of this Victory otherwise my Loss will be greater than that of Pompey. Our personal Reputation will rise or fall as we bear our respective Fortunes. All my private Enemies among the Prisoners shall be spared. I will forget this, in order to obtain such another Day. Irresistible is ashamed to see me. I will go to his Tent and be reconciled in private. Give all the Men of Honour who take part with me, the Terms I offered before the Battle. Let them owe this to their Friends who have been long in my Interests. Power is weakened by the full Use of it, but extended by Moderation. Gallus is proud, and will be servile in his present Fortune, let him wait. Send for Strabus. He is modest, and his Virtue is worth gaining. I have cooled my Heart with Reflection and am fit to rejoice with the Army to-morrow. He is a popular General who can expose himself like a private Man during a Battle but he is more popular who can rejoice but like a private Man after a Victory.

What is particularly proper for the Example of all who pretend to Industry in the Pursuit of Honour and Virtue, is, That this Hero was more than ordinarily sollicitous about his Reputation when a common Mind would have thought it self in Security, and given it self a Loose to Joy and Triumph. But though this is a very great Instance of his Temper, I must confess I am more taken with his Reflections when he retired to his Closet in some Disturbance upon the repeated ill Omens of Calphurnia's Dream the Night before his Death. The literal Translation of that Fragment shall conclude this Paper.

'Be it so [then.] If I am to die to-morrow, that is what I am to do to-morrow. It will not be

'then, because I am willing it should be then. nor shall I escape it because I am unwilling. It is in the Gods when but in my self how I shall die. If Calphurnia's Dreams are fumes of Indigestion, how shall I behold the Day after to-morrow? If they are from the Gods, their Admonition is not to prepare me to escape from their Decree, but to meet it. I have lived to a Fullness of Days and of Glory, what is there that Cæsar has not done with as much Honour as ancient Heroes? Cæsar has not yet died. Cæsar is prepared to die. 1

I HAVE more than once had occasion to mention a noble Saying of Serapion the Philosopher, That a virtuous Person struggling with Misfortunes, and rising above them, is an Object on which the Gods themselves may look down with Delight. I shall therefore set before my Reader a Scene of this kind of Distress in private Life, for the Speculation of this Day.

An eminent Citizen, who had lived in good Fashion and Credit, was by a Train of Accidents, and by an unavoidable Perplexity in his Affairs, reduced to a low Condition. There is a Modesty usually attending fruitless Poverty, which made him rather chuse to reduce his Manner of Living to his present Circumstances, than solicit his Friends in order to support the Show of an Estate when the Substance was gone. His Wife, who was a Woman of Sense and Virtue, began her self on this Occasion with uncommon Decency, and never appeared so amiable in his Eyes as now. Instead of upbraidng him with the ample Fortune she had brought, or the many great Offers she had refused for his sake, she redoubled all the Instances of her Affection, while her Husband was continually pouring out his Heart to her in Complaints that he had ruined the best Woman in the World. He sometimes came home at a time when she did not expect him and surprized her in Tears, which she endeavour'd to conceal, and always put on an Air of Cheerfulness to receive him. To lessen their Experience, their eldest Daughter whom I shall call Aranda, was sent into the Country, to the House of an honest Furrier, who had married a Servant of the Family. This young Woman was apprehensive of the Ruin which was approaching, and had privately engaged a Friend in the Neighbourhood to give her an account of what passed from time to time in her Father's Affairs. Anania was in the Bloom of her Youth and Beauty, when the Lord of the Manor, who often called in at the Farmer's House as he follow'd his Country Sports, fell passionately in love with her. He was a Man of great Generosity, but from a loose Education had contracted a hearty Aversion to Marriage. He therefore entertained a Design upon Amanda's Virtue, which at present he thought fit to keep private. The innocent Creature who never suspected his Intentions, was pleased with his Person and having observed his growing Passion for her hoped by so advantageous a Match she might quickly be in a capacity of supporting her impoverished Relations. One day as he called to see her, he found her in Tears over a Letter she had just received from her Friend which gave an Account that her Father had lately been strapp'd of every thing by an Execution. The Lover, who with some Difficulty found out the Cause of her Grief, took this occasion to make her a Proposal. It is impossible to express Amanda's Confusion when she found his Pretensions were not honourable. She was now deserv'd of all her Hopes, and had no Power to speak. In rushing from him in the utmost Disturbance, locked her self up in her Chamber. He immediately dispatched a Messenger to her Father with the following Letter.

SIR,
I have heard of your Misfortune, and have offer'd your Daughter, if she will live with me, to settle on her four hundred Pounds a year, and to lay down the Sum for which you are now distressed. I will be so ingenious as to tell you that I do not intend Marriage. But if you are wise, you will use your Authority with her not to be too nice, when she has an opportunity of saving you and your Family, and of making her self happy.

I am, &c

This Letter came to the Hands of Amanda's Mother. She open'd and read it with great Surprise and Concern. She did not think it proper to explain her self to the Messenger, but desiring him to call again the next Morning, she wrote to her Daughter as follows.

Dearest Child,

Your Father and I have just now received a Letter from a Gentleman who pretends Love to you, with a Proposal that insults our Misfortunes and would throw us to a lower Degree of Wretchedness than any thing which is come upon us. How could this barbarous Man think, that the tenderest of Parents would be tempted to supply their Wants by giving up the best of Children to Infamy and Ruin? It is a mean and cruel Artifice to make this Proposal at a time when he thinks our Necessities must compel us to any thing, but we will not eat the Bread of Shame, and therefore we charge thee not to think of us, but to avoid the Snare which is laid for thy Virtue. Fewer of pitying us. It is not so bad as you have perhaps been told. All things will yet be well, and I shall write my Child better News.

I have been interrupted. I know not how I was moved to say things would mend. As I was going on I was startled by a Noise of one that knocked at the Door, and hath brought us an unexpected Supply of a Debt which had long been owing. Oh! I will now tell thee all. It is some days I have lived almost without Support, having convey'd what little Money I could raise to your poor Father—I thou wilt weep to think where he is, yet be assured he will be soon at Liberty. That cruel Letter would have broke his Heart, but I have concealed it from him. I have no Complain at present besides little Fanny, who stands watching my Tools as I write, and is crying for her Sister. She says she is sure you are not well, having discover'd that my present Trouble is about you. But do not think I would thus repeat my Sorrows, to grieve thee. No it is to inter it thee not to make them insupportable, by adding what would be worse than all. Let us bear cheerfully in Affliction, which we have not brought on our selves, and remember there is a Power who can better deliver us out of it than by the Loss of thy Innocence. Heaven preserve my dear Child.

Thy Affectionate Mother —

The Messenger, notwithstanding he promised to deliver this Letter to Amanda, carry'd it first to his Master, who he imagin'd would be glad to have an Opportunity of giving it into her Hands himself. His Master was impatient to know the Success of his Proposal, and therefore broke open the Letter privately to see the Contents. He was not a little mov'd it so true a Picture of Virtue in Distress. But at the same time was infinitely surpris'd to find his Offers rejected. However, he resolv'd not to suppress the Letter, but carefully seal'd it up again, and carried it to Amanda. All his Endeavours to see her were in vain, till she was assured he brought a Letter from her Mother. He would not part with it, but upon Condition that she should read it without leaving the Room. While she was perusing it, he fixed his Eyes on her Face with the deepest Attention. Her Concern gave a new Softness to her Beauty, and when she burst into Tears, he could no longer refrain from bearing a Part in her Sorrow, and telling her, that he too had read the Letter and was resolv'd to make Reparation for having been the Occasion of it. My Reader will not be displeas'd to see this Second Epistle which he now wrote to Amanda's Mother.

MADAM,

I am full of Shame, and will never forgive my self, if I have not your Pardon for what I lately wrote. It was far from my Intention to add Trouble to the Afflicted nor could any thing, but my being a Stranger to you have betray'd me into a Fault, for which, if I live, I shall endeavour to make you amends, as a Son. You cannot be unhappy while Amanda is your Daughter nor shall be, if any thing can prevent it, which is in the Power of,

MADAM,

Your most obedient Humble Servant —

This Letter he sent by his Steward, and soon after went up to Town himself, to compleat the generous Act he had now resolv'd on. By his Friendship and Assistance Amanda's Father was quickly in a condition of retrieving his perplex'd Affairs. To conclude, he marry'd Amanda, and enjoy'd the double Satisfaction of having restored a worthy Family to their former Prosperity, and of making himself happy by an Alliance to their Virtues

MR SPECTATOR,
I HAVE observed that the Officer you some time ago appointed as Inspector of Signs, has not done his Duty so well as to give you an Account of very many strange Occurrences in the publick Streets, which are worthy of, but have escaped your Notice. Among all the Oddnesses which I have ever met with, that which I am now telling you of gave me most Delight. You must have observed that all the Criers in the Street attract the Attention of the Passengers, and of the Inhabitants in the several Parts, by something very particular in their Tone it self, in the dwelling upon a Note, or else making themselves wholly unintelligible by a Scream. The Person I am so delighted with has nothing to sell, but very gravely receives the Bounty of the People, for no other Merit but the Homage they pay to his Manner of signifying to them that he wants a Subsidy. You must, sure, have heard speak of an old Man, who walks about the City, and that part of the Suburbs which lies beyond the Tower, performing the Office of a Day-Watchman, followed by a Goose, which bears the Bob of his Ditty, and confirms what he says with a Quack, Quack. I gave little heed to the mention of this known Circumstance, till, being the other day in those Quarters, I passed by a decrepit old Fellow with a Pole in his Hand, who just then was bawling out, Half an Hour after one o' Clock, and immediately a dirty Goose behind him made her Response, Quack, Quack. I could not forbear attending this grave Procession for the length of half a Street, with no small amazement to find the whole Place so familiarly acquainted with a melancholy Mid-night Voice at Noon day, giving them the Hour, and exhorting them of the Departure of Time, with a Bounce at their Doors. While I was full of this Novelty, I went into a Friend's House, and told him how I was diverted with their whimsical Monitor and his Equipage. My Friend gave me the History and interrupted my Commendation of the Man, by telling me the Livelihood of these two Animals is purchased rather by the good Parts of the Goose, than of the Leader. For it seems the Peripatetic who wall ed before her was a Watchman in that Neighbourhood and the Goose of her self by frequent hearing his Tone, out of her natural Vigilance, not only observed, but answered it very regularly from Time to Time. The Watchman was so affected with it, that he bought her, and has taken her in Partner, only altering their Hours of Duty from Night to Day. The Town has come into it, and they live very comfortably. This is the Matter of Fact. Now I desire you, who are a profound Philosopher, to consider this Alliance of Instinct and Reason. Your Speculation may turn very naturally upon the Force the superior Part of Mankind may have upon the Spirits of such as, like this Watchman, may be very near the Standard of Geese. And you may add to this practical Observation, how in all Ages and Times the World has been carry'd away by odd unaccountable things, which one would think would pass upon no Creature which had Reason, and, under the Symbol of this Goose, you may enter into the Manner and Method of leading Creatures, with their Eyes open, thro' thick and thin, for they know not what, they know not why.

All which is humbly submitted to your Spectatorial Wisdom, by,

SIR,
Your most humble Servant,
Michael Gander

MR SPECTATOR,
I have for several Years had under my Care the Government and Education of young Ladies, which I trust I have endeavour'd to discharge with due regard to their several Capacities and Fortunes. I have left nothing undone to imprint in every one of them an humble courteous Mind, accompanied with a graceful becoming Mien, and have made them pretty much acquainted with the Household Part of Family Affairs. But still I find there is something very much wanting in the Air of my Ladies, different from what I observe in those that are esteemed your fine bred Women. Now, Sir, I must own to you, I never suffered my Girls to learn to Dance, but since I have read your Discourse of Dancing, where you have described the Beauty and Spirit there is in regular Motion, I own myself your Convert, and resolve for the future to give my young Ladies that Accomplishment. But upon importing my Design to their Parents, I have been made very uneasy, for some Time, because several of them have declared, that if I did not make use of the Master they recommended, they would take away their Children. There was Colonel Jumper's Lady, a Colonel of the Irish Bands, that has a great Interest in her Parish, she recommends Mr Frott for the prettiest Master in Town, that no Man teaches a Jigg like him, that she has seen him rise six or seven Capers together with the greatest Ease imaginable, and that his Scholars twist themselves more ways than the Scholars of any Master in Town. Besides there is Madam Prun, an Alderman's Lady, recommends a Master of her own Name, but she declares he is not of their Family, yet a very extraordinary Man in his way for besides a very soft Air he has in Dancing, he gives them a particular Behaviour at a Tea-Table, and in presenting their Snuff-Box, to twirl, flip, or flirt a Fan and how to place Patches to the best advantage, either for Fat or Lean, Long or Oval Faces. My Lady says there is more in these Things than the World imagines. But I must confess the major Part of those I am concern'd with have it to me. I desire therefore, according to the in'closed Direction, you would send your Correspondent who has writ to you on that Subject to my House. If proper Application this way can give Innocence new Charms, and make Virtue legible in the Countenance, I shall spare no Charge to make my Scholars in their very Figures and Limbs, bear witness how careful I have been in the other Parts of their Education

I am, SIR,

Your most humble Servant,

LOVE was the Mother of Poetry, and still produces, among the most ignorant and barbarous & thousand imaginary Distresses and Poetical Complaints. It makes a Footman talk like Orondatus, and converts a brutal Rustick into a gentle Swain. The most ordinary Pickernin or Mechnick in Love, bleeds and pines away with a certain Llegence, and Tenderness of Sentiments which this Passion naturally inspires.

These inward Languishings of a Mind infected with this Softness, have given birth to a Phyrse which is made use of by all the melting Tribe, from the highest to the lowest, I mean that of dying for Love.

Romances, which owe their very Being to this Passion, are full of these metaphorical Deaths. Heroes and Heroines, Knights, Squires, and Damsels, are all of them in a dying Condition. There is the same kind of Mortality in our Modern Tragedies, where every one grips, faints bleeds and dies. Many of the Poets to describe the Execution which is done by this Passion, represent the Fair Sex as Bans licks that destroy with their Eyes. But I think Mr Cowley has with greater Justness of Thought compared a beautiful Woman to a Porcupine, that sends an Arrow from every Part.

I have often thought, that there is no way so effectual for the Cure of this general Infirmary, as a Man reflecting upon the Motives that produce it. When the Passion proceeds from the Sense of any Virtue or Perfection in the Person beloved, I would by no means discourage it: but if a Man considers that all his heavy Compliments of Wounds and Deaths rise from some little Affections of Coquetry which are improved into Charms by his own fond Imagination, the very lying before himself the Cause of his Distemper, may be sufficient to effect the Cure of it.

It is in this view that I have looked over the several Bundles of Letters which I have received from Dying People and composed out of them the following Bill of Mortality, which I shall lay before my Reader without any further Preface, as hoping that it may be useful to him in discovering those several Places where there is most Danger, and those fatal Arts which are made use of to destroy the Heedless and Unwary.

Lysander, slum in a Puppet-show on the third of September.

Phrysis, shot from a Casement in Pickadilly F S, wounded by Zeluinda's Scarlet Stocking as she was stepping out of a Coach.

Will Simple, smitten at the Opera by the Glance of an Eye that was aimed at one who stood by him.

The Vanlorce, lost his Life at a Ball.

Tim Tattle, kill'd by the Tap of a Fan on his left Shoulder by Coquettilla, as he was talking carelessly with her in a Bow window.

Sir Simon Softly, murder'd at the Play house in Drury lane by a Crown.

Philander, mortally wounded by Cleora, as she was adjusting her Tuckers.

Ralph Gafely, Esq, hit by a random Shot at the Ring.

F A, caught his Death upon the Water April the 31st.

W W, killed by an unknown Hand, that was playing with the Glove off upon the Side of the Front-Box in Drury Lane.

Sir Christopher Cray, hurt by the Brush of a Whalebone Petticoat.

Sylvestus, shot through the Sticks of a Fan at St James's Church.

Damon, struck thro' the Heart by a Diamond Necklace.

Thomas Trusty, Francis Goosequill, William Mearwell, Edward Callow, Esqrs, standing in a Row, fell all four at the same time, by an Ogle of the Widow Trapland.

Tom Rattle, chancing to tread upon a Lady's Tail as he came out of the Play house, she turned full upon him, and laid him dead upon the Spot.

Died Tasterell, slum by a Blush from the Queen's Box in the third Act of the Trip to the Jubilee.

Samuel Felt, Haberdasher, wounded in his Walk to Islington by Mrs Susannah Crossstich, as she was clambering over a Stile.

Scire tui in nihil est nisi te scire hoc sciat alter Pers

I HAVE often wonder'd that all natur'd Position which has been sometimes maintained in the Schools, and is compris'd in an old Latin Verse, namely, that *A Man's Knowledge is worth nothing, if he communicates what he knows to any one besides*¹ There is certainly no more sensible Pleasure to a good-natur'd Man, than if he can by any means gratify or inform the Mind of another I might add, that this Virtue naturally carries its own reward along with it since it

is almost impossible it should be exercised without the Improvement of the Person who practices it The reading of Books, and the daily Occurrences of Life, are continually furnishing us with Matter for Thought and Reflection It is extremely natural for us to desire to see such our Thoughts put into the Dress of Words, without which indeed we can scarce have a clear and distinct Idea of them ourselves When they are thus clothed in Expressions, nothing so truly shews us whether they are just or false, as those Effects which they produce in the Minds of others

I am apt to flatter my self, that in the Course of these my Speculations, I have treated of several Subjects, and had down many such Rules for the Conduct of a Man's Life, which my Readers were either wholly ignorant of before, or which at least those few who were acquainted with them looked upon as so many Secrets they have found out for the Conduct of themselves, but were resolv'd never to have made publick

I am the more confirm'd in this Opinion from my having received several Letters, wherein I am censur'd for having prostituted Learning to the Imbrues of the Vulgar, and made her, as one of my Correspondents phrases it, a common Strumpet I am charg'd by another with laying open the Arcana, or Secrets of Prudence, to the Eyes of every Reader

The narrow Spirit which appears in the Letters of these my Correspondents is the less surprizing, as it has shewn itself in all Ages There is still extant an Epistle written by Alexander the Great to his Tutor Aristotle, upon that Philosopher's publishing some part of his Writings in which the Prince complains of his having made known to all the World, those Secrets in Learning which he had before communicated to him in private Lectures concluding, *That he had rather excel the rest of Mankind in Knowledge than in Power*¹

Luisa de Padilla, a Lady of great Learning, and Countess of Aranda, was in like manner angry with the famous Gratian,² upon his publishing his Treatise of the Discreto, wherein she fancied that he had laid open those Maxims to common Readers which ought only to have been reserved for the Knowledge of the Great

These Objections are thought by many of us

² Baltazar Gratian's Discreto has been mentioned before in the Spectator, being well known in England through a French translation See note on p. 420 Gratian, in Spain, became especially popular as a foremost representative of his time in transferring the humour for conceits—cultismo, as it was called—from verse to prose He began in 1630 with a prose tract, the Hiero, laboured in short ingenious sentences, which went through six editions He wrote also an Art of Poetry after the new style His chief work was the Criticon, an allegory of the Spring, Autumn, and Winter of life The Discreto was one of his minor works All that he wrote was published, not by himself, but by a friend, and in the name of his brother Lorenzo, who was not an ecclesiastic

much weight, that they often defend the above-mentioned Authors, by affirming they have affected such an Obscurity in their Style and Manner of Writing, that tho' every one may read their Works, there will be but very few who can comprehend their Meaning.

Persius, the Latin Satirist affected Obscurity for another Reason with which however Mr Cowley is so offended, that writing to one of his Friends, You, sa, he, tell me, that you do not know whether Persius be a good Poet or no, because you cannot understand him for which very Reason I affirm that he is not so.

However, this Art of writing intelligibly has been very much improved, and followed by several of the Moderns, who observing the general Inclination of Mankind to dive into a Secret and the Reputation many have acquired by concealing their Meaning under obscure Terms and Phrases, resolve, that they may be still more abstruse, to write without any Meaning at all. This Art, as it is at present practised by many eminent Authors consists in throwing so many Words at a venture into different Periods, and leaving the curious Reader to find out the Meaning of them.

The Egyptians who made use of Hieroglyphicks to signify several things, expressed a Man who confined his Knowledge and Discoveries altogether within himself, by the Figure of a Dark-Lantern closed on all sides, which, tho' it was illuminated within, afforded no manner of Light or Advantage to such as stood by it. For my own part, as I shall from time to time communicate to the Publick whatever Discoveries I happen to make, I should much rather be compared to an ordinary Lamp, which consumes and wastes itself for the benefit of every Passenger.

I shall conclude this Paper with the Story of Rosicrucius's Sepulchre. I suppose I need not inform my Readers that this Man was the Founder of the Rosicrucian Sect, and that his Disciples still pretend to new Discoveries, which they are never to communicate to the rest of Mankind.

Rosicrucius had been made fashionable by the Abbé de Villars, who was assassinated in 1675. His Comte de Gabalis was a popular little book in the Spectator's time. I suppose I need not inform my readers that there never was a Rosicrucian or a Rosicrucian sect. The Rosicrucian pamphlets which appeared in Germany at the beginning of the 17th century, dating from 'the Discovery of the Brotherhood of the Honourable Order of the Rosy Cross,' a pamphlet published in 1600, by a Lutheran clergyman, Valentin Andreae, were part of a hoax designed perhaps originally as means of establishing a sort of charitable masonic society of social reformers. Missing that aim, the Rosicrucian story lived to be adorned by superstitious fancy, with ideas of mystery and magic, which in the Comte de Gabalis were methodized into a consistent romance. It was from this romance that Pope got what he called the Rosicrucian machinery of his Rape of the Lock. The Abbé de Villars, professing to give very full particulars, had told how the Rosicrucians assigned sylphs to the air, gnomes to the earth, nymphs to the water, salamanders to the fire.

A certain Person having occasion to dig somewhat deep in the Ground where this Philosopher lay interred, met with a small Door having a Wall on each side of it. His Curiosity, and the Hopes of finding some hidden Treasure, soon prompted him to force open the Door. He was immediately surprized by a sudden Blaze of Light, and discovered a very fair Vault. At the upper end of it was a Statue of a Man in Armour sitting by a Table, and leaning on his Left Arm. He held a Truncheon in his right Hand, and had a Lamp burning before him. The Man had no sooner set one Foot within the Vault, than the Statue erecting itself from its leaning Posture, stood bolt upright and upon the Fellow's advancing another Step, lifted up the Truncheon in his Right Hand. The Man still ventured a third Step when the Statue with a furious Blow broke the Lamp into a thousand Pieces, and left his Guest in a sudden Darkness.

Upon the Report of this Adventure, the Country People soon came with Lights to the Sepulchre, and discovered that the Statue which was made of Brass was no longer more than a Piece of Clock-work, that the Floor of the Vault was all loose, and underlaid with several Springs, which, upon any Man's entering, naturally produced that which had happened.

Rosicrucius, says his Disciples, made use of this Method, to shew the World that he had re-invented the ever burning Lamps of the Ancients, tho' he was resolv'd no one should reap any Advantage from the Discovery. X.

Resalem patienter habet — Ovid.

SIR, Thursday, May 8, 1712.
THE Character you have in the World of being the Lady's Philosopher, and the pretty Advice I have seen you give to others in your Papers, make me address my self to you in this abrupt Manner, and do desire your Opinion what in this Age a Woman may call a Lover. I have lately had a Gentleman that I thought made Pretensions to me inasmuch that most of my Friends took Notice of it and thought we were really married which I did not take much Pains to undeceive them, and especially a young Gentlewoman of my particular Acquaintance which was then in the Country. She coming to Town, and seeing our Intimacy so great, she gave her self the Liberty of taking me to task concerning it. I ingenuously told her we were not married, but I did not know what might be the Event. She soon got acquainted with the Gentleman, and was pleased to take upon her to examine him about it. Now whether a new Face had made a greater Conquest than the old, I'll leave you to judge. But I am inform'd that he utterly deny'd all Pretensions to Courtship, but withal profess'd a sincere Friendship for me but whether Marriages are propos'd by way of Friendship or not, is what I desire to know, and what I may really call a Lover. There are so many who talk in a into any Depths of Sorrow Mirth is like a Flash of Lightning, that breaks thro' a Gloom of Clouds, and glitters for a Moment, Cheerfulness keeps up a kind of Day-light in the Mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual Serenity

Men of austere Principles look upon Mirth as too wanton and dissolute for a State of Probation, and as filled with a certain Triumph and Insolence of Heart, that is inconsistent with a Life which is every Moment obnoxious to the greatest Dangers Writers of this Complexion have observed, that the sacred Person who was the great Pattern of Perfection was never seen to Laugh

Chearfulness of Mind is not liable to any of these Exceptions it is of a serious and composed Nature, it does not throw the Mind into a Condition improper for the present State of Humanity, and is very conspicuous in the Characters of those who are looked upon as the greatest Philosophers among the Heathens, as well as among those who have been deservedly esteemed as Saints and Holy Men among Christians.

If we consider Cheerfulness in three Lights, with regard to our selves, to those we converse with, and to the great Author of our Being, it will not a little recommend it self on each of these Accounts The Man who is possessed of this excellent Frame of Mind, is not only easy in his Thoughts, but a perfect Master of all the Powers and Faculties of his Soul His Imagination is always clear, and his Judgment undisturbed His Temper is even and unruffled, whether in Action or in Solitude He comes with a Relish to all those Goods which Nature has provided for him, tastes all the Pleasures of the Creation which are poured about him, and does not feel the full Weight of those accidental Evils which may befall him

If we consider him in relation to the Persons whom he converses with, it naturally produces Love and Good-will towards him A cheerful Mind is not only disposed to be affable and obliging, but raises the same good Humour in those who come within its Influence A Man finds himself pleased, he does not know why, with the Cheerfulness of his Companion It is like a sudden Sun-shine that awakens a secret Delight in the Mind, without her attending to it The Heart rejoices of its own accord, and naturally flows out into Friendship and Benevolence towards the Person who has so kindly an Effect upon it

When I consider this cheerful State of Mind in its third Relation, I cannot but look upon it as a constant habitual Gratitude to the great Author of Nature An inward Cheerfulness is an implicit Praise and Thanksgiving to Providence under all its Dispensations It is a kind of Acquiescence in the State wherein we are placed, and a secret Approbation of the Divine Will in his Conduct towards Man

There are but two things which, in my Opinion, can reasonably deprive us of this Cheerfulness of Heart The first of these is the Sense of Guilt A Man who lives in a State of Vice and Impenitence, can have no little to that Evenness and Tranquility of Mind which is the Health of the Soul, and the natural Effect of Virtue and Innocence Cheerfulness in an ill Man deserves a harder Name than Language can furnish us with, and is many degrees beyond what we commonly call Folly or Madness.

Atheism, by which I mean a Disbelief of a Supreme Being, and consequently of a future State, under whatsoever Titles it shelters it self, may likewise very reasonably deprive a Man of this Cheerfulness of Temper There is something so particularly gloomy and offensive to human Nature in the Prospect of Non-Existence, that I cannot but wonder, with many excellent Writers, how it is possible for a Man to out-live the Expectation of it For my own Part, I think the Being of a God is so little to be doubted that it is almost the only Truth we are sure of, and such a Truth as we meet with in every Object, in every Occurrence, and in every Thought If we look into the Characters of this Tribe of Infidels, we generally find they are made up of Pride, Spleen, and Cavil It is indeed no wonder, that Men, who are uneasy to themselves, should be so to the rest of the World and how is it possible for a Man to be otherwise than uneasy in himself, who is in danger every Moment of losing his entire Existence, and dropping into Nothing?

The vicious Man and Atheist have therefore no Pretence to Cheerfulness, and would act very unreasonably, should they endeavour after it It is impossible for any one to live in Good-Humour, and enjoy his present Existence, who is apprehensive either of Torment or of Annihilation, of being miserable, or of not being at all

After having mention'd these two great Principles, which are destructive of Cheerfulness in their own Nature, as well as in right Reason, I cannot think of any other that ought to banish this happy Temper from a Virtuous Mind Pain and Sickness, Shame and Reproach, Poverty and old Age, nay Death it self, considering the Shortness of their Duration, and the Advantage we may reap from them, do not deserve the Name of Evils A good Mind may bear up under them with Fortitude, with Indolence and with Cheerfulness of Heart The tossing of a Tempest does not discompose him, which he is sure will bring him to a Joyful Harbour

A Man, who uses his best endeavours to live according to the Dictates of Virtue and right Reason has two perpetual Sources of Cheerfulness in the Consideration of his own Nature, and of that Being on whom he has a Dependence If he looks into himself, he cannot but rejoice in that Existence, which is so lately bestowed upon him, and which, after Millions of Ages, will be still new, and still in its Beginning How many Self-Congratulations naturally arise in the Mind, when it reflects on this its Entrance into Eternity, when it takes a View of those improveable Faculties, which in a few Years, and even at its first setting out, have made so considerable a Progress, and which will be still receiving an Increase of Perfection, and consequently an Increase of Happiness The Consciousness of such a Being spreads a perpetual Diffusion of Joy through the Soul of a virtuous Man and makes him look upon

'any English Monarch, nor cover it with so much Honour. The Crown and Sceptre seemed to be the Queen's least Ornaments: those, other Princes wore in common with her, and her great personal Virtues were the same before and since: but such was the Fame of her Administration of Affairs at home, such was the Reputation of her Wisdom and Felicity in choosing Ministers, and such was then esteemed their Faithfulness and Zeal, their Diligence and great Abilities in executing her Commands, to such a height of military Glory did her great General and her Armies carry the British Name abroad: such was the Harmony and Concord between her and her Allies, and such was the Blessing of God upon all her Counsels and Undertakings, that I am as sure as History can make me, no Prince of ours was ever yet so prosperous and successful, so beloved, esteemed, and honoured by their Subjects and their Friends, nor near so formidable to their Enemies. We were, as all the World imagined then, just entering on the ways that promised to lead to such a Peace, as would have answered all the Prayers of our religious Queen, the Care and Vigilance of a most able Ministry, the Promises of a willing and obedient People, as well as all the glorious Joys and Hazards of the Soldiers: when God, for our Sins, permitted the Spirit of Discord to go forth, and, by troubling sore the Camp, the City, and the Country, (and oh! that it had altogether spared the Places sacred to his Worship!) to spoil, for a time, this beautiful and pleasing Prospect, and give us, in its stead, I know not what. Our Enemies will tell the rest with Pleasure. It will become me better to pray to God to restore us to the Power of obtaining such a Peace, as will be to his Glory, the Safety, Honour, and the Welfare of the Queen and her Dominions, and the general Satisfaction of all her High and Mighty Allies.

—Thesepectora juncta fide—Ovid

I INTEND the Paper for this Day is a loose Essay upon Friendship, in which I shall throw my Observations together without any set Form, that I may avoid repeating what has been often said on this Subject.

Friendship is a strong and habitual Inclination in two Persons to promote the Good and Happiness of one another. Tho' the Pleasures and Advantages of Friendship have been largely celebrated by the best moral Writers, and are considered by all as great Ingredients of human Happiness, we very rarely meet with the Practice of this Virtue in the World.

Every Man is ready to give in a long Catalogue of those Virtues and good Qualities he expects to find in the Person of a Friend, but very few of us are careful to cultivate them in our selves.

Love and Esteem are the first Principles of Friendship, which always is imperfect where either of these two is wanting.

As, on the one hand, we are soon ashamed of loving a Man whom we cannot esteem so, on the other, tho' we are truly sensible of a Man's Abilities, we can never raise ourselves to the Warmths of Friendship, without an affectionate Good will towards his Person.

Friendship immediately banishes Envy under all its Disguises. A Man who can once doubt whether he should rejoice in his Friend's being happier than himself, may depend upon it that he is an utter Stranger to this Virtue.

There is something in Friendship so very great and noble, that in those fictitious Stories which are invented to the Honour of any particular Person, the Authors have thought it necessary to make their Hero a Friend and a Lover. Achilles his Patroclus, and Aeneas his Achates. In the first of these Instances we may observe, for the Reputation of the Subject I am treating of, that Grace was almost ruin'd by the Hero's Love, but was preserved by his Friendship.

The Character of Achates suggests to us an Observation we may often make on the Intimacies of great Men, who frequently chuse their Companions rather for the Qualities of the Heart than those of the Head, and prefer Fidelity in an easy inoffensive complying Temper to those Endowments which make a much greater Figure among Mankind. I do not remember that Achates, who is represented as the first Favourite, either gives his Advice, or strikes a Blow, thro' the whole Eniad.

A Friendship which makes the least noise, is very often most useful, for which reason I should prefer a prudent Friend to a zealous one.

Atticus, one of the best Men of ancient Rome, was a very remarkable Instance of what I am here speaking. This extraordinary Person, amidst the Civil Wars of his Country when he saw the Designs of all Parties equally tended to the Subversion of Liberty, by constantly preserving the Esteem and Affection of both the Competitors, found means to serve his Friends on either side: and while he sent Money to young Marcius, whose Father was declared an Enemy of the Commonwealth, he was himself one of Sylla's chief Favourites, and always near that General.

During the War between Cesar and Pompey, he still maintained the same Conduct. After the Death of Cesar he sent Money to Brutus in his Troubles, and did a thousand good Offices to Antony's Wife and Friends when that Party seemed ruin'd. Lastly, even in that bloody War between Antony and Augustus, Atticus still kept his place in both their Friendships, inasmuch that the first, says Corneilius Nepos, whenever he was absent from Rome in any part of the Empire, was punctually to him what he was doing, what he read, and whither he intended to go, and the latter gave him constantly an exact Account of all his Affairs.

A Likeness of Inclinations in every Particular is so far from being requisite to form a Benevolence in two Minds towards each other, as it is generally imagined, that I believe we shall find some of the firmest Friendships to have been contracted between Persons of different Humours, the Mind being often pleased with those Perfections which are new to it, and which it does not find among its own Accomplishments. Beside, that a Man in some measure supplies his own Defects, and fancies himself at second hand possessed of those good Qualities and Endowments, which are in the possession of him who in the Eye of the World is looked on as his other self.

The most difficult Province in Friendship is the letting a Man see his Faults and Errors, which should, if possible, be so contrived, that he may perceive our Advice is given him not so much to please ourselves as for his own Advantage. The Reproaches therefore of a Friend should always be strictly just, and not too frequent.

The violent Desire of pleasing in the Person reproved, may otherwise change into a Despair of doing it, while he finds himself condemn'd for Faults he is not conscious of. A Mind that is softened and humanized by Friendship, cannot bear frequent Reproaches: either it must quite sink under the Oppression or abate considerably of the Value and Esteem it had for him who bestows them.

The proper Business of Friendship is to inspire Life and Courage, and a Soul thus supported, outdoes itself: whereas if it be unexpectedly deprived of these Succours, it droops and languishes.

We are in some measure more inexcusable if we violate our Duties to a Friend, than to a Relation, since the former arise from a voluntary Choice, the latter from a Necessity to which we could not give our own Consent.

As it has been said on one side that a Man ought not to break with a faulty Friend, that he may not expose the Weakness of his Choice, it will doubtless hold much stronger in his respect to a worthy one, that he may never be upbraided for having lost so valuable a Treasure which was once in his Possession.

Cum Fratribus scire, cum Remissis iocunde, cum Senibus grauter, cum Juuentute comiter vivere—Lull

THE piece of Laïs on the Head of this Paper is part of a Character extremely vicious, but I have set down no more than may fill in with the Rules of Justice and Honour. Cicero spoke it of Catiline, who, he said, lived with the Sad severely, with the Cheerful agreeably, with the Old gravely, with the Young pleasantly, he added, with the Wicked boldly, with the Wanton lasciviously. The two last Instances of his Complaisance I forbear to consider, having it in my thoughts at present only to speak of obsequious Behaviour as it sits upon a Companion in Pleasure, not a Man of Design and Intrigue. To vary with every Humour in this Manner, cannot be agreeable, except it comes from a Man's own Temper and natural Complexion, to do it out of his Ambition to excel that Way, is the most fruitless and unbecoming Prostitution imaginable. To put on an artificial Part to obtain no other End but an unjust Praise from the Undiscerning, is of all Endeavours the most despicable. A Man must be sincerely pleased to become Pleasure or not to interrupt that of others. For this Reason it is a most calamitous Circumstance, that many People who want to be alone or should be so, will come into Conversation. It is certain, that all Men who are the least given to Reflection, are seized with an Inclination that Way: when, perhaps, they had rather be incited to Company: but indeed they had better go home, and be tired with themselves, than force themselves upon others to recover their good Honour. In all this the Cases of communicating to a friend a sad Thought or Difficulty, in order to relieve [a] heavy Heart, stands excepted: but what is here meant, is, that a Man should always go with Inclination to the Turn of the Company he is going into, or not pretend to be of the Party. It is certainly a very happy Temper to be able to live with all kinds of Dispositions, because it argues a Man that lies open to receive what is pleasing to others, and no obstinately bent on any Particularity of its own.

This is that which makes me pleased with the Character of my good Acquaintance Alonso. To meet him at the Tables and Conversations of the Wise the Impertinent, the Crave he relishes, and the Witty and yet his own Character has nothing in it that can make him particularly agreeable to any one Set of Men, but Alonso has natural good Sense, good Nature and Discretion, so that every Man enjoys himself in his company, and tho' Alonso contributes nothing to the Entertainment he never was at a Place where he was not welcome a second time. Without these subordinate good Qualities of Alonso, a Man of Wit and Learning would be painful to the Generality of Mankind, instead of being pleasing. Witty Men are apt to imagine they are agreeable as such, and by that means grow the worst Companions imaginable: they deride the Absent or rally the Present in a wrong manner, not knowing that if you pinch or tickle a Man till he is uneasy in his Seat, or ungracefully distinguished from the rest of the Company, you equally hurt him.

I was going to say, the true Art of being agreeable in Company, (but there can be no such thing as Art in it) is to appear well pleased with those you are engaged with, and rather to seem well entertained, than to bring Entertainment to others. A Man thus disposed is not indeed what we ordinarily call a good Companion, but essentially is such, and in all the Parts of his Conversation has something friendly in his Behaviour, which conciliates Mens Minds more than the highest Saltes of Wit or Starts of Humour can possibly do. The Feebleness of Age in a Man of this Turn, has something which should be treated with respect even in a Man no otherwise venerated able. The forwardness of Youth when it proceeds from Austerity and not Insolence, has also its Allowances. The Companion who is formed for such by Nature, gives to every Character of Ill its due Regards, and is ready to account for their Imperfections, and receive their Accomplishments as if they were his own. It must appear that you receive Law from, and not give it to your Company, to make you agreeable.

I remember Tufty, speaking, I think, of Author, says, Ita in eo factus est ut, quæ nulla arte prædici possunt. He had a witty Mirth, which could not be acquired by a Man. This Quality must be of the kind of which I am now speaking for all sorts of behaviour which depend upon Observation and Knowledge of Life, is to be acquired but that which no one can describe, and is apparently the Act of Nature must be every where prevalent, because every thing it meets is a fit Occasion to exert it: for he who follows Nature, can never be improper or unreasonable.

How unaccountable then must their Behaviour be who, without any manner of Consideration of what the Company they have just now entered are upon, give themselves the Air of a Messenger, and make as distinct Relations of the Occurrences they last met with as if they had been dispatched from those they talk to, to be punctually exact in a Report of those Circumstances. It is unpardonable to those who are met to enjoy one another, that a fresh Man shall pop in, and give us only the last part of his own Life, and put a stop to ours during the History. If such a Man comes from Claret, whether you will or not, you must hear how the Stoc's go, and tho' you are ever so intently employed on a graver Subject, a young Fellow of the other end of the Town will take his place, and tell you, Mrs. Such-a-one is charmingly handsome, because he just now saw her. But I think I need not dwell on this Subject, since I have acknowledged there can be no Rules made for excelling this Way and Precept, of this kind fire like Rules for writing Poetry, which, as said, may have prevented all Poets, but never made good ones.

No 387¹ Saturday, May 24, 1712 [Addison]

Quid parè traxit quiet — Hor

IN my last Saturday's Paper I spoke of Cheerfulness as it is a Moral Habit of the Mind, and accordingly mentioned such moral Motives as are apt to cherish and keep alive this happy Temper in the Soul of Man. I shall now consider Cheerfulness in its natural State, and reflect on those Motives to it, which are indifferent either as to Virtue or Vice.

Cheerfulness is, in the first place, the best Promoter of Health. Repinings and secret Murmurs of Heart, give imperceptible Strokes to those delicate Fibres of which the vital parts are composed, and wear out the Machine insensibly, not to mention those violent Ferments which they stir up in the Blood, and those irregular disturbed Motions, which they raise in the animal Spirits. I scarce remember, in my own Observation, to have met with many old Men, or with such, who (to use our English Phrase) wear it, that had not at least a certain Indolence in their Humour, if not a more than ordinary Graciousness and Cheerfulness of Heart. The truth of it is, Health and Cheerfulness mutually beget each other with this difference, in it we seldom meet with a great degree of Health which is not attended with a certain Cheerfulness, but very often see Cheerfulness where there is no great degree of Health.

Cheerfulness bears the same friendly regard to the Mind as to the Body. It bruihes all an anxious Care and Discontent, soothes and composes the Passions, and keeps the Soul in a perpetual Calm. But having already touched on this last Consideration, I shall here take notice, that the World, in which we are placed, is filled with innumerable Objects that are proper to raise and keep alive this happy Temper of Mind.

If we consider the World in its Subserviency to Man, one would think it was made for our Use but if we consider it in its natural Beauty and Harmony, one would be apt to conclude it was made for our Pleasure. The Sun, which is as the great Soul of the Universe, and produces all the Necessaries of Life, has a particular Influence in clearing the Mind of Man, and making the Heart glad.

Those several living Creatures which are made for our Service or Sustenance at the same time either fill the Woods with their Musick, furnish us with Game, or raise pleasing Ideas in us by the delightfulness of their Appearance, Fountains, Lakes, and Rivers, are as refreshing to the Imagination, as to the Soul through which they pass.

There are Writers of great Distinction, who have made it an Argument for Providence, that the whole Earth is covered with Green, rather than with any other Colour, as being such a right Mixture of Light and Shade, that it comforts and strengthens the Eye instead of weakening or grieving it. For this reason several Painters have a green Cloth hanging near them, to ease the Eye upon, after too great an Application to their Colouring. A famous modern Philosopher accounts for it in the following manner. All Colours that are more luminous, overpower and dissipate the animal Spirits which are employ'd in Sight on the contrary, those that are more obscure do not give the animal Spirits a sufficient Exercise, whereas the Rays that produce in us the Idea of Green, fall upon the Eye in such a due proportion, that they give the animal Spirits their proper Play, and by keeping up the struggle in a just Balance, excite a very pleasing and agreeable Sensation. Let the Cause be what it will the Effect is certain, for which reason the Poets ascribe to this particular Colour the Epithet of Chearful

To consider further this double End in the Works of Nature, and how they are at the same time both useful and entertaining, we find that the most important Parts in the vegetable World are those which are the most beautiful. These are the Seeds by which the several Races of Plants are propagated and continued, and which are always lodged in Flowers or Blossoms. Nature seems to hide her principal Design, and to be industrious in making the Earth gay and delightful, while she is carrying on her great Work, and intent upon her own Preservation. The Husbandman after the same manner is employed in laying out the whole Country into a kind of Garden or Landskip, and making every thing smile about him, whilst in reality he thinks of nothing but of the Harvest, and Increase which is to arise from it.

We may further observe how Providence has taken care to keep up this Chearfulness in the Mind of Man, by having formed it after such a manner, as to make it capable of conceiving Delight from several Objects which seem to have very little use in them, as from the Wildness of Rocks and Desarts, and the like grotesque Parts of Nature. Those who are versed in Philosophy may still carry this Consideration higher, by observing that if Matter had appeared to us endowed only with those real Qualities which it actually possesses, it would have made but a very joyless and uncomfortable Figure, and why has Providence given it a Power of producing in us such imaginary Qualities, as Tastes and Colours, Sounds and Smells, Heat and Cold, but that Man, while he is conversant in the lower Stations of Nature, might have his Mind cleared and delighted with agreeable Sensations? In short, the whole Universe is a kind of Theatre filled with Objects that either raise in us Pleasure, Amusement, or Admiration.

The Reader's own Thoughts will suggest to him the Vicissitude of Day and Night, the Change of Seasons, with all that Variety of Scenes which diversify the Face of Nature, and fill the Mind with a perpetual Succession of beautiful and pleasing Images.

I shall not here mention the several Entertainments of Art, with the Pleasures of Friendship, Books, Conversation, and other accidental Diversions of Life, because I would only take notice of such Incitements to a Chearful Temper, as offer themselves to Persons of all Ranks and Conditions, and which may sufficiently shew us that Providence did not design this World should be filled with Murmurs and Repinings, or that the Heart of Man should be involved in Gloom and Melancholy.

I the more inculcate this Chearfulness of Temper, as it is a Virtue in which our Countrymen are observed to be more deficient than any other Nation. Melancholy is a kind of Demon that haunts our Island, and often conveys her self to us in an Easterly Wind. A celebrated French Novelist, in opposition to those who begin their Romances with the flow'ry Season of the Year, enters on his Story thus: In the gloomy Month of November, when the People of England hang and drown themselves, a disconsolate Lover walketh out into the Fields, &c.

Every one ought to fence against the Temper of his Climate or Constitution, and frequently to indulge in himself those Considerations which may give him a Serenity of Mind, and enable him to bear up chearfully against those little Evils and Misfortunes which are common to humane Nature, and which by a right Improvement of them will produce a Satiety of Joy, and an uninterrupted Happiness.

At the same time that I would engage my Reader to consider the World in its most agreeable Lights, I must own there are many Evils which naturally spring up amidst the Entertainments that are provided for us; but these, if rightly consider'd, should be far from overcasting the Mind with Sorrow, or destroying that Chearfulness of Temper which I have been recommending. This Interspersion of Evil with Good, and Pain with Pleasure, in the Works of Nature, is very truly ascribed by Mr. Locke, in his Essay on Human Understanding, to a moral Reason, in the following Words:

Beyond all this, we may find another Reason why God hath scattered up and down several Degrees of Pleasure and Pain, in all the things that environ and affect us, and blended them together, in almost all that our Thoughts and Senses have to do with, that we findin'g Imperfection, Dissatisfaction, and Want of complete Happiness in all the Enjoyments which the Creatures can afford us, might be led to seek it in the Enjoyment of him, with whom there is Fulness of Joy, and at whose Right Hand are Pleasures for evermore. MR SPECTATOR,

IT is my Custom, when I read your Papers, to read over the Quotations in the Authors from whence you take them. As you mention'd a Passage lately out of the second Chapter of Solomon's Song, it occasion'd my looking into it, and upon reading it I thought the Ideas so exquisitely soft and tender, that I could not help making this Paraphrase of it, which, now it is done, I can as little forbear sending to you. Some Marks of your Approbation, which I have already receiv'd, have given me so sensible a Taste of them, that I cannot forbear endeavouring after them as often as I can with any Appearance of Success.

I am SIR,
Your most [obedientst] humble Ser-ant

NOTHING has more surprized the Learned in England, than the Price which a small Book, intitled Specimen à la l'etia triump fante,¹ bore in a late Auction. This Book was sold for [thirty?] Pound As it was written by one Ferdinandus Brunus a professed Atheist, with a design to depreciate Religion, every one was apt to fancy, from the extraordinary Price it bore, that there must be something in it very formidable.

I must confess this happening to get a sight of one of them myself, I could not forbear perusing it with this Apprehension, but found there was so very little Danger in it that I shall venture to give my Readers a fair Account of the whole² in upon which this wonderful Treatise is built.

The Author pretends that Jupiter once upon a Time resolved on a Reformation of the Constellations for which purpose having summoned the Stars together, he complains to them of the great Decay of the Worship of the Gods, which he thought so much the harder, having called several of those Celestial Bodies by the Names of the Heathen Deities, and by that means made the Heavens as it were a Book of the Part in Theology. Momus tells him, that this is not to be wondered at, since there were so many scandalous Stories of the Deities upon which the Author takes occasion to cast Reflections upon all other Religions, concluding, that Jupiter after a full Hearing, discarded the Deities out of Heaven, and called the Stars by the Names of the Moral Virtues.

This short Tale, which has no Pretence in it to Reason or Argument, and but a very small Share of Wit, has however recommended it self wholly by its Impiety to those weak Men, who would distinguish themselves by the Singularity of their Opinions.

There are two Considerations which have been often urged against Atheists, and which they never yet could get over. The first is, that the greatest and most eminent Persons of all Ages have been against them, and always complied with the publick Forms of Worship established in their respective Countries, when there was nothing in them either derogatory to the Honour of the Supreme Being, or prejudicial to the Good of Mankind.

The Plato's and Cicero's among the Ancients the Bacon's, the Boyle's, and the Lockes among our own Countrymen, are all Instances of what I have been saying not to mention any of the Divines however celebrated since our Adversaries challenge all those, as Men who have too much Interest in this Cause to be impartial Evidences.

But what has been often urged as a Consideration of much more Weight, is, not only the Opinion of the Better Sort, but the general Consent of Mankind to this great Truth, which I think could not possibly have come to pass, but from one of the three following Reasons: either that the Idea of a God is innate and co-existent with the Mind it self, or that this Truth is so very obvious that it is discovered by the first Extension of Reason in Perusing one of the most ordinary Capricious or, lastly, that it has been delivered down to us thro' all Ages by a Tradition from the first Man.

The Atheists are equally confounded to which ever of these three Causes we assign it, they have been so pressed by this last Argument from the general Consent of Mankind that after great search and pains they pretend to have found out a Nation of Atheists, I mean it is Polite People the Hottentots.

I do not shock my Readers with a Description of the Customs and Manners of these Barbarians who are in every respect as far one degree above Priests, having no Idolatry among them, but a confused [Gallies] which is neither well understood by themselves or others.

It is not however to be imagined how much the Atheists have gloried in their good Friends and Allies.

If we boast of a Secretes, or a Secrecia they may now confront them with these great Philosophers the Hottentots.

Tho' even this Point has, not without Reason, been several times controverted, I see no manner of harm it could do Religion, if we should entirely give them up this elegant Part of Mankind.

Methodists nothing more shews the Weakness of their Cause, than that no Division of their fellow Creatures join with them, but that among whom they themselves own Reason is almost diffused and who have little else but their Shape which can entitle them to any Place in the Species.

Besides these poor Creatures there have now and then been Instances of a few crazed People in several Nations, who have denied the Existence of a Deity.

The Catalogue of these is however very short, even Vannus,³ the most celebrated Champion

² Vannus, like Giordano Bruno, has his memory dishonoured through the carelessness with which men tale for granted the assertions of his enemies. Whether burnt or not, every religious thinker of the sixteenth century who opposed himself to the narrowest views of those who claimed to be the guardians of orthodoxy was remorselessly malignd. If he was the leader of a party, there were hundreds to maintain his honour against calumny. If he was a solitary searcher after truth, there was nothing but his single life and work to set against the host of his defamers.

³ The book was bought in 1711 for £28 by Mr Walter Charrel at the sale of the library of Mr Charles Barnard. It had been bought in 1706 at the sale of Mr Digor's library with five others for two shillings and a penny. Although Giordano Bruno was burnt as a heretic, he was a noble thinker, no professed atheist, but a man of the reformed faith, who was in advance of Calvin, a friend of Sir Philip Sydney, and as good a man as Mr Budgell.

*Use scanty Diet, and forbear your Ill, Shun Secrecy, and talk in open sight
So shall you soon regain your present civil Plight*

Instead of this Care over their Words and Actions, recommended by a Poet in old Queen Hecuba's Day, the modern Way is to do and - is what you please, and yet be the fairest sort of Woman in the World. If Fathers and Brothers will defend a Lady's Honour, she is quite as safe as in her own Innocence. Many of the Distressed, who suffer under the Malice of evil Tongues, are so harmless that they are every Day they live able 'till twelve at Noon concern themselves with nothing but their own Persons 'till ten, take their necessary Food between that time and four, visit, go to the Play, and sit up at Cards 'till towards the ensuing Morn. and the malicious World shall draw Conclusions from innocent Charities, short Whispers, or pretty familiar Railleries with fashionable Men, that these Fair ones are not as rigid as Vestals. It is certain, say these goodest Creatures very well, that Virtue does not consist in constraining Behaviour and wry Faces that must be allowed but there is a Decency in the Aspect and Manner of Ladies constricted from an Habit of Virtue, and from general Reflections that regard a modest Conduct, all which may be understood, tho' they cannot be described. A young Woman of this sort claims in I deem mixed with Affection and Honour, and meets with no Defamation - or if she does, the wild Malice is overcome with an undisturbed Perseverance in her Innocence. To speak freely, there are such Coquets of Coquets about this Town, that if the Poets were not kept by some impertinent Tongues of their own Sex which keep them under some Restraint, we should have no manner of Engagement upon them to keep them in any tolerable Order.

As I am a SPECTATOR, and behold how plainly one Part of Womankind brillance the Behaviour of the other, whatever I may think of Libellers or Slanderers, I cannot wholly suppress them, no more than a General would discourage Spies. The Enemy would easily surprize him whom they knew had no Intelligence of their Motions. It is so far otherwise with me, that I feel knowledge. I permit a She-Slanderer or two in every Quarter of the Town, to live in the Characters of Coquets, and take all the innocent Freedoms of the rest, in order to send me Information of the Behaviour of their respective Sisterhoods.

But as the Matter of Respect to the World, which looks on, is carried on, methinks it is so very easy to be what is in the general called Virtuous, that it need not cost one Hour's Reflection in a Month to preserve that Appellation. It is pleasant to hear the pretty Rogues talk of Virtue and Vice among each other. She is the laziest Creature in the World, but I must confess strictly Virtuous. The peevishest Hussy being, but as to her Virtue she is without Blemish. She has not the least Charity for any of her Acquaintance, but I must allow rigidly Virtuous. As the unthinking Part of the Male World call every Man a Man of Honour, who is not a Coward so the Crowd of the other Sex terms every Woman who will not be a Wench, Virtuous

WHEN Homer represents Phoebus, the Tutor of Achilles, as persuading his Pupil to lay aside his Resentments, and give himself up to the Intricacies of his Countrymen, the Poet, in order to make him speak in Character, assigns to him a Speech full of those Fables and Allegories which old Men take Delight in relating, and which are very proper for Instruction. The Gaea, says he, *suffer themselves to be persuaded upon by Libellators. When Mortals are offered themselves by their own weakness, they offend them by Vices and Sacrifices. You must know, Achilles, that the Furies are the Daughters of Jupiter. They are crippled by frequent kneeling, have their Faces full of Care and Wrinkles, and their Eyes always cast towards Heaven. They are constant Attendants on the Goddess Atene, and mark behind her. This Goddess walks forward with a bold and haughty Air, and being very light of foot, runs thro' the whole Earth, grieving and afflicting the Souls of Men. She gets the start of Pallas, who always follows her, in order to heal those Persons whom she wounds. He who loves these Daughters of Jupiter, when they draw near to him, receives great benefit from them, but as for him who rejects them, they intrude their Father to give his Oracles to the Goddess Athena to punish him for his Hardness of Heart. This noble Allegory needs but little Explanation for a heather the Goddess Athena signifies Injury, as some have explained it, or Guilt in general, as others, or divine Justice, as I am the more apt to think the Interpretation is obvious enough.*

I shall produce another Heathen Fable relating to Prayers, which is of a more diverting kind. One would think by some Passages in it, that it was composed by Lucian, or at least by some Author who has endeavour'd to imitate his Way of Writing but as Dissertations of this Nature are more curious than useful, I shall give my Reader the Fable, without any further Enquiries after the Author.

To the SPECTATOR

The Transformation of Titchin into a Looking-Glass

I WAS lately at a Tea Table, where some young Ladies entertained the Company with a Relation of a Cogit in the Neighborhood, who had been discovered practising before her Glass To turn the Discourse, which from being witty grew to be malicious the Mistress of the Family took occasion, from the Subject to wish that there were to be found among Men such faithful Monitors to dress the Mind by, as we consult to adorn the Body. She added, that if a sincere Friend were miraculously changed into a Looking-Glass, she should not be ashamed to ask its Advice very often. This whimsical Thought worked so much upon my Fancy the whole Evening, that it produced a very odd Dream¹

Althought, that as I stood before my Glass, the Image of a Youth, of in open ingenious Aspect, appeared in it who with a small shrill Voice spoke in the following manner

The Looking Glass, you see, was heretofore a Man, even I, the unfortunate idiot. I had two Brothers, whose Deformity in Shape was made out by the Cleanness of their Understanding. It must be owned however, that is generally happens) they had each a Perverseness of Humour suitable to their Distortion of Body. The eldest, whose Belly sunk in monstrously, was a great Coward and his spleenetic contracted Temper made him take fire immediately, he made Objects that he set him appear greater than they were. The second, whose Breast swelled into a bold Relievo, on the contrary, took great pleasure in lessening every thing, and was perfectly the Reverse of his Brother. These Oddnesses pleased Company once or twice, but disgusted when often seen for which reason the young Gentlemen were sent from Court to study Mathematics at the University.

I need not acquaint you, that I was very well made, and reckoned a bright polite Gentleman. I was the Confidant and Darling of all the Fair and if the Old and Ugly spoke ill of me, all the World knew it was because I scorned to flatter them. No Bill no Assembly was attended till I had been consulted. Flamma colour'd her Hair before me, Celia shew'd me her Teeth, Panthea heaved her Bosom, Cleora brandish'd her Diamonds. I have seen Cloe's Foot, and tied ritually the Garters of Rhodope.

'Tis a general Maxim, that those who do not upon themselves, can have no violent Affection for another. But on the contrary, I found that the Womens Passion for me rose in proportion to the Love they bore to themselves. This was verify'd in my Aunt with Varensa, who was so constant to me, that it was pleasantly said, had I been little enough, she would have hung me at her Girdle. The most doting, crous Pyral I had, was a gay empty Fellow, who by the Strength of a long Intercourse with Varensa, joined to his natural Endowments, had formed himself into a perfect Ke emblemance with her. I had been dissatisfied, had I not observed that he frequently ask'd my Opinion about Matters of the last Consequence. This made me still more considerable in his Eye.

Tho I was eternally cur'd by the Ladies such was their Opinion of my Honour, that I was never envied by the Men. Aged my Lover of Varensa one day thought he had caught her in an Amorous Conversation for that he was so much I'd since that he could hear nothing, he imagine I trace things from her Arts and Gestures. Sometimes with a secret Look she stepped back in a listening Posture, and brighten'd into an innocent Smile. Quick by after she swelled into an Air of Majesty and then then kept her Eyes half shut after a Fashion her Manner, then covered her Blushes with her Hand, breath'd a Sigh, and seem'd ready to sink down. In such the furious Lover but how great was his Surprise to see no one there but the innocent Idiot, with his Back against the Wall bawling to Windows.

'T was cruel to recount all my Adventures. Let me haste to that which end me my Life, and Varensa her Happiness.

She had the misfortune to have the Small-Pox, upon which I was expressly forbid to Sight, it being apprehended that it would increase her Temper and that I should infallibly catch it at the first Look. As soon as she was fix'd to leave her Bed she stole out of her Chamber, and found me all alone in an adjoining Apartment. She run with Transport to her Darling, and without Mixture of Fear, let I should doubt her. But, oh me! what was her Fury when she heard me say I was afraid and shuddered at so loathsome a Spectacle. She stamp'd back, swollen with Rage to see if I had the Insolence to repeat it. I did, with this Addition, that her ill meditated Passion had increased her Ugliness. I moved infirmen distracted she snatch'd a Poison and with all her Force stabbed me to the Heart. Dying I preserv'd my Sincerity, and expressed the Truth, tho in broken Words and by reproachful Crimes to the last I mimick'd the Deformity of my Murderess.

Cupid, who always attends the Fair, and pity'd the Fate of so useful a Servant as I was obtained of the Destiny, that my Body should be made incorruptible, and retain the Qualities my Mind had possessed. I immediately lost the Figure of a Man and became smooth, polish'd, and bright, and to this day am the first I favour of the Ladies.

¹ [so odd a Dream, that no one but the SPECTATOR could believe that the Brain, clogged in Sleep, could furnish out such a regular Wildness of Imagination]

alize this natural Pleasure of the Soul, and to improve this vernal Delight, as Milton calls it, into a Christian Virtue. When we find our selves inspired with this pleasing Instinct, this secret Satisfaction and Complacency arising from the Beauties of the Creation, let us consider to whom we stand indebted for all these Entertainments of Sense, and who it is that thus opens his Hand and fills the World with Good. The Apostle instructs us to take advantage of our present Temper of Mind, to graft upon it such a religious Exercise as is particularly conformable to it, by that Precept which advises those who are sad to pray, and those who are merry to sing Psalms. The Cheerfulness of Heart which springs up in us from the Survey of Nature's Works, is an admirable Preparation for Gratitude. The Mind has gone a great way towards Praise and Thanksgiving, that is filled with such a secret Gladness. A grateful Reflection on the supreme Cause who produces it, sanctifies it in the Soul, and gives it its proper Value. Such an habitual Disposition of Mind consecrates every Field and Wood, turns an ordinary Walk into a morning or evening Sacrifice, and will improve those transient Gleams of Joy, which naturally brighten up and refresh the Soul on such Occasions, into an inviolable and perpetual State of Bliss and Happiness. Bene colligitur hæc Pueris et Mulierculis et Servis et Servorum similibus Liberis esse grata. Gravi vero homini et ea quæ sunt Judicio certo ponderanti probari posse nullo modo —Tull.

I HAVE been considering the little and frivolous things which give Men Accesses to one another, and Power with each other, not only in the common and indifferent Accidents of Life, but also in Matters of greater importance. You see in Elections for Members to sit in Parliament, how far saluting Rows of old Women, drinking with Clowns, and being upon a level with the lowest Part of Mankind in that wherein they themselves are lowest, their Diversions, will carry a Candidate. A Capacity for prostituting a Man's Self in his Behaviour, and descending to the present Humour of the Vulgar, is perhaps as good an Ingredient as any other for making a considerable Figure in the World: and if a Man has nothing else, or better, to think of, he could not make his way to Wealth and Distinction by proper Methods, than studying the particular Bent or Inclination of People with whom he converses, and working from the Observation of such their Bias in all Matters wherein he has any Intercourse with them. For his Ease and Comfort he may assure himself, he need not be at the Expence of any great Talent or Virtue to please even those who are possessed of the highest Qualifications. Pride in some particular Disguise or other, (often a Secret to the proud Man himself) is the most ordinary Spring of Action among Men. You need no more than to discover what a Man values himself for: then of all things admire that Quality, but be sure to be failing in it your self in comparison of the Man whom you court. I have heard, or read of a Secretary of State in Spain, who served a Prince who was happy in an elegant use of the Latin Tongue, and often writ Dispatches in it with his own Hand. The King shewed his Secretary a Letter he had written to a foreign Prince, and under the Colour of asking his Advice, laid a Trap for his Applause. The honest Man read it as a faithful Counsellor, and not only excepted against hystying himself down too much by some Expressions, but mended the Phrase in others. You may guess the Dispatches that Evening did not take much longer Time. Mr Secretary, as soon as he came to his own House, sent for his eldest Son, and communicated to him that the Family must retire out of Spain as soon as possible: for, said he, the King knows I understand Latin better than he does.

This egregious Fault in a Man of the World, should be a Lesson to all who would make their Fortunes. But a Regard must be carefully had to the Person with whom you have to do: for it is not to be doubted but a great Man of common Sense must look with secret Indignation or bridled Laughter, on all the Slaves who stand round him with ready Faces to approve and smile at all he says in the gross. It is good Comedy enough to observe a Superior talking half Sentences, and playing an humble Admirer's Countenance from one thing to another, with such Perplexity that he knows not whither to sneer in Approbation of. But this kind of Complaisance is peculiarly the Manner of Courts in all other Places you must constantly go farther in Compliance with the Persons you have to do with, than a mere Conformity of Looks and Gestures. If you are in a Country Life, and would be a leading Man, a good Stomach, a loud Voice, and a rustic Cheerfulness will go a great way, provided you are able to drink, and drink any thing. But I was just now going to draw the Manner of Behaviour I would advise People to practise under some Maxim, and intimated, that every one almost was governed by his Pride. There was an old Fellow about forty Years ago so peevish and fretful, though a Man of Business, that no one could come at him. But he frequented a particular little Coffee house, where he triumphed over every body at Trick track and Baggammon. The way to pass his Office well, was first to be insulted by him at one of those Games in his leisure Hours: for his Vanity was to shew, that he was a Man of Pleasure as well as Business. Next to this sort of Insinuation, which is called in all Places (from its taking its Birth in the Households of Princes) making one's Court, the most prevailing way is, by what better-bred People call a Present, the Vulgar a Bribe. I humbly conceive that such a thing is conveyed with more Gallantry in a Billet-doux that should be understood at the Bank, than in gross Money. But as to a sabborn People, who are so surly as to accept of neither Note or Cash, having formerly dabbled in Chymistry, I can only say that one part of Matter asks one thing, and another

— Quid nunc ratio est, Is ipseus at te fin' Ovid

BEWARE of the Ides of March, said the Roman Augur to Julius Caesar. Beware of the 15th of May, says the British Spectator to his fair Country women. The Caution of the first was unhappily neglected, and Caesar's Confidence cost him his Life. I am apt to flatter myself that my pretty Readers had much more regard to the Advice I gave them, since I have yet received very few Accounts of any notorious Trips made in the last Month.

But tho' I hope for the best, I shall not pronounce too positively on this point, 'till I have seen forty Weeks well over, at which Period of Time, as my good Friend Sir ROGER has often told me, he has more Business as a Justice of Peace, among the dissolute young People in the Country, than in any other Season of the Year.

Neither must I forget a Letter which I received near a Fortnight since from a Lady, who, it seems, could hold out no longer, telling me she looked upon the Month as then out, for that she had all along reckoned by the New Style.

On the other hand, I have great reason to believe, from several angry Letters which have been sent to me by disappointed Lovers, that my Advice has been of very signal Service to the fair Sex, who, according to the old Proverb, were Forwarr'd forearm'd.

One of these Gentlemen tells me, that he would have given me an hundred Pounds, rather than I should have publish'd that Paper for that his Mistress, who had promised to explain herself to him about the Beginning of May, upon reading that Discourse told him that she would give him her Answer in June.

Florus acquaints me, that when he desired Sylvia to take a Walk in the Fields, she told him the Spectator had forbidden her.

Another of my Correspondents, who writes himself Mat Measer, complains, that whereas he constantly used to Breakfast with his Mistress upon Chocolate, going to wait upon her the first of May, he found his usual Treat very much changed for the worse and has been forced to feed ever since upon Green Lett.

make use of them with Moderation, 'till about the middle of the Month, when the Sun shall have made some Progress in the Crab. Nothing is more dangerous, than too much Confidence and Security. The Trojans, who stood upon their Guard all the while the Grecians lay before their City, when they fancied the Siege was raised, and the Danger past, were the very next Night burnt in their Beds. I must also observe, that as in some Climates there is a perpetual Spring, so in some Female Constitutions there is a perpetual May. These are a kind of Valetudinarians in Christy, whom I would continue in a constant Diet. I cannot thin these wholly out of Danger, 'till they have looked upon the other Sex at least Five Years through a Pair of Spectacles. WILL HONEYCOMB has often assured me, that 'tis much easier to steele one of this Species, when she has press'd her grand Climacterick, than to carry off an ity Girl on this side Five and Twenty and that a Rake of his Acquaintance, who had in vain endeavour'd to gain the Affections of a young Lady of Fifteen, had at last made his Fortune by running away with her Grandmother.

But as I do not design this Speculation for the Evergreens of the Sex, I shall again apply myself to those who would willingly listen to the Dictates of Reason and Virtue, and can now hear me in cold Blood. If there are any who have forfeited their Innocence, they must now consider themselves under that Melancholy View, in which Chamont regards his Sister in those beautiful Lines

*Lo! she flourish'd, Grew sweet to Sense, and lovely to the Eye
'Till at the last a cruel Spouler came, Cropt this fair Rose, and rifled all its Sweetness, Then cast it like a loathsome Weed away.*

On the contrary, she who has observed the timely Cautions I gave her and lived up to the Rules of Modesty, will now Flourish like a Rose in June, with all her Virgin Blushes and Sweetness about her. I must, however, desire these last to consider, how shameful it would be for a General, who has made a Successful Campaign, to be surprized in his Winter Quarters. It would be no less dishonourable for a Lady to lose in any other Month of the Year, what she has been at the pains to preserve in May.

There is no Charm in the Female Sex, that can supply the place of Virtue. Without Innocence, Beauty is unlovely, and Quality contemptible, Good breeding degenerates into Wantonness, and Wit into Impudence. It is observed, that all the Virtues are represented by both Painters and Statuaries under Female Shapes, but if any one of them has a more particular Title to that Sex, it is Modesty. I shall leave it to the Divines to guard them against the opposite Vice, as they may be overpower'd by Temptations. It is sufficient for me to have warn'd them against it as they may be led astray by Instinct.

I desire this Paper may be read with more than ordinary Attention, at all Tea-tables within the Cities of London and Westminster.

AS the Stoick Philosophers discard all Passions in general, they will not allow a Wise Man so much as to pity the Afflictions of another. If thou seest thy Friend in Trouble, says Epictetus, thou may'st put on a look of Sorrow, and condole

Ipsworth School and Clare Hall, Cambridge, became a Fellow in 1693, and then Chaplain to Bishop Moore. In 1696 he published his New Theory of the Earth, which divided attention with Burnet's Sacred Theory of the Earth already mentioned. In 1700 Whiston was invited to Cambridge, to act as deputy to Sir Isaac Newton, whom he succeeded in 1703 as Lucasian Professor.
For holding some unorthodox opinions as to the doctrines of the early Christians, he was, in 1710, deprived of his Professorship, and banished from the University. He was a pious and learned man, who, although he was denied the Sacrament, did not suffer himself to be driven out of the Church of England till 1747. At last he established a small congregation in his own house in accordance with his own notion of primitive Christianity. He lived till 1752.

² No L———y of that time has written plays that are remembered. The John Lacy whom Charles II admired so much that he had his picture painted in three of his characters, died in 1681, leaving four comedies and an imitation of Shakespeare's Trampl, of the Shrew. He was a kind some man first dancing-master, then quartermaster, then an admired comedian. Hanley would hardly have used a blank in referring to a well known writer who died thirty years before.
There was another John Lacy advertising in the Pest boy Aug 3, 1711, 'The Steeleids, or the 'Trial of Wit, a Poem in three cantos, with a 'motto—

'Then will I say, swell'd with poetic rage,
'That I, John Lacy, have reform'd the age.'

with him, but take care that this Sorrow be not real¹. The more rigid of this Sect would not comply so far as to shew even such an outward Appearance of Grief, but when one told them of any Calamity that had befallen even the nearest of their Acquaintance, would immediately reply, What is that to me? If you aggravated the Circumstances of the Affliction, and shew'd how our Misfortune was followed by another, the Answer was still, All this may be true, but what is it to me?

For my own part, I am of Opinion, Compassion does not only refine and civilize Humane Nature, but has something in it more pleasing and agreeable than what can be met with in such an indolent Happiness, such an Indifference to Mankind as that in which the Stoicks plac'd their Wisdom.
As Love is the most delightful Passion, Pity is nothing else but Love softned by a degree of Sorrow. In short, it is a kind of pleasing Anguish, as well as generous Sympathy, that knits Man kind together, and blends them in the same common Lot.

Those who have laid down Rules for Rhetoric or Poetry, advise the Writer to work himself up, if possible, to the Pitch of Sorrow which he endeavours to produce in others. There are none therefore who stir up Pity so much as those who impute their own Sufferings. Grief has a natural Eloquence belonging to it, and breaks out in more moving Sentiments than be supplied by the finest Imagination. Nature on this Occasion dictates a thousand passionate things which cannot be supplied by Art.

It is for this Reason that the short Speeches or Sentences which we often meet with in Histories, make a deeper Impression on the Mind of the Reader, than the most labour'd Strokes in a well-written Tragedy. Truth and Matter of Fact sets the Person actually before us in the one, whom Fiction places at a greater Distance from us in the other. I do not remember to have seen any

'When you see a Neighbour in Tears, and 'hear him lament the Absence of his Son, the 'Hazards of his Voyage into some remote Part of the World, or the Loss of his Estate keep upon your Guard, for fear lest some false Idea that may rise upon these Occasions, surprise you into a Mistake, as if this Man were really miserable, upon the Account of these outward Accidents. But be sure to distinguish wisely, and tell your self immediately, that the Thing which really affects this Person is not really the Accident it self, (for other People, under his Circumstances, are not equally affected with it) but merely the Opinion which he hath form'd to himself concerning this Accident. Notwithstanding all which, you may be allow'd, as far as Expressions and outward Behaviour go, to comply with him, and if Occasion require, to bear a part in his Sighs, and Tears too. But then you must be sure to take care, that this Compliance does not infect your Mind, nor betray you to an unward and real Sorrow, upon any such Account.'

ment. Made English from the Greek by George any one less engaged than she was Cynthia was musing Yesterday in the Piazza in Covent-Garden, and was saying to himself that he was a very ill Man to go on in visiting and professing Love to Flavia, when his Heart was enthralled to another. It is an Infirmity that I am not constant to Flavia, but it would be still a greater Crime, since I cannot continue to love her, to profess that I do. To marry a Woman with the Coldness that usually indeed comes on after Marriage, is running ones self with ones Eyes open, besides it is really doing her an Injury. This last Consideration, forsooth, of injuring her in persisting, made him resolve to break off upon the first favourable Opportunity of making her angry. When he was in this Thought, he saw Robin, the Porter who waits at Will's Coffee house passing by Robin, you must know, is the best Man in Town for carrying a Billet, the Fellow has a thin Body, swift Step, demure Looks, sufficient Sense, and knows the Town. This Man carried Cynthia's first Letter to Flavia, and by frequent Errands ever since, is well known to her. The Fellow covers his Knowledge of the Nature of his Messages with the most exquisite low Humour imaginable. The first he obliged Flavia to take, was, by complaining to her that he had a Wife and three Children, and if she did not take that Letter, which he was sure, there was no Harm in, but rather Love, his Family must go supperless to Bed, for the Gentleman would pay him according as he did his Business. Robin therefore Cynthia now thought fit to make use of, and gave him Orders to wait before Flavia's Door, and if she called him to her, and asked whether it was Cynthia who passed by, he should at first be loth to own it was, but upon Impertunity confess it. There needed not much Search into that Part of the Town to find a well-dressed Hussey fit for the Purpose Cynthia designed her. As soon as he believed Robin was posted, he drove by Flavia's Lodgings in an Hackney Coach and a Woman in it. Robin was at the Door talking with Flavia's Maid, and Cynthia pulled up the Glass as surprized, and hid his Associate. The Report of this Circumstance soon flew up Stairs, and Robin could not deny but the Gentleman favoured his Master, yet if it was he, he was sure the Lady was but his Cousin whom he had seen ask for him, adding that he believed she was a poor Relation, because they made her wait one Morning till he was awake. Flavia immediately writ the following Epistle, which Robin brought to Will's.

SIR,

June 4 1712

'Tis in vain to deny it, bravest falsest of Men—
I find my Maid, as well as the Bearer, saw you
The injured I have

After Cynthia had read the Letter, he asked Robin how she looked, and what she said at the Delivery of it. Robin said she spoke short to him, and called him back again, and had nothing to say to him, and bid him and all the Men in the World go out of her Sight, but the Maid followed, and bid him bring an Answer.

Cynthia returned as follows

Madam,

June 4, Three Afternoon, 1712

'That your Maid and the Bearer has seen me

As soon as Robin arrived with this, Flavia answered

Dear Cynthia,

'I have walked a Turn or two in my Antichamber since I writ to you, and have recovered my self from an impertinent I it which you ought to forgive me, and desire you would come to me immediately to laugh off the Jealousy that you and a Creature of the Town went by in an Hackney-Coach an Hour ago

'I will not open the Letter which my Cynthia writ, upon the Misapprehension you must have been under when you writ, for want of hearing the whole Circumstance.

Robin came back in an Instant, and Cynthia to answer

Madam,

'It is certain I went by your Lodgings with a Gentlewoman to whom I have the Honour to be known, she is indeed my Relation, and a pretty sort of Woman. But your starting Manner of Writing, and owning you have not done me the Honour so much as to open my Letter, has in it something very unaccountable, and alarms one that has had Thoughts of passing his Days with you. But I am born to admire you with all your little Imperfections Utinam in se. 'ent' deserves Per.

HYPOCRISIE, or the fashionable Lend of the Town, is very different from Hypocritism in the City. The modern Hypocrite endeavours to appear more vicious than he really is, the other kind of Hypocrite more virtuous. The former is afraid of every thing that has the Shew of Religion in it, and would be thought engaged in many Criminal Gallantries and Amours, which he is not guilty of. The latter assumes a Face of Sanctity, and covers a Multitude of Vices under a seeming Religious Deportment.

But there is another kind of Hypocritism, which differs from both these, and which I intend to make the Subject of this Paper. I mean that Hypocritism by which a Man does not only deceive the World, but very often imposes on himself. That Hypocritism, which conceals his own Heart from him, and makes him believe he is more virtuous than he really is, and either not attend to his Vices, or mistake even his Vices for Virtues. It is this fatal Hypocritism and Self-deceit which is taken notice of in those Words, We cannot understand his Errors, because thou art a secret Framer.

If the open Professor of Impiety deserve the utmost Application and Endeavours of Moral Writers to recover them from Vice and Folly, how much more may those by a Chain to their Care and Corruption, who are walking in the Paths of Death, while they fancy themselves engaged in a Course of Virtue? I shall endeavour, therefore, to lay down some Rules for the Discovery of those Vices that lurk in the secret Corners of the Soul and to show my Reader those Methods by which he may arrive at a true and impartial Knowledge of himself. The usual Means prescribed for this Purpose, are to examine our selves by the Rules which are laid down for our Direction in Sacred Writ, and to compare our Lives with the Life of that Person who acted up to the Perfection of Human Nature, and is the standing Example, as well as the great Guide and Instructor, of those who receive his Doctrine. Though these two Heads cannot be too much insisted upon, I shall but just mention them, since they have been handled by many Great and Eminent Writers.

I would therefore propose the following Methods to the Consideration of such as would find out their secret Faults, and make a true Estimate of themselves.

In the first Place, let them consider well what are the Characters which they bear among their Enemies. Our Friends very often flatter us, as much as our own Hearts. They either do not see our Faults, or conceal them from us, or soften them by their Representations, after such a manner, that we think them too trivial to be taken notice of. An Adversary, on the contrary, makes a stricter Search into us, discovers every flaw and Imperfection in our Temper, and though his Malice may set them in too strong a Light, it is generally some Ground for what it advances. A Friend exaggerates a Man's Virtues, an Enemy inflames his Crimes. A Wise Man should give a just Attention to both of them, so far as they may tend to the Improvement of the one, and Diminution of the other. Plutarch has written an Essay on the Benefits which a Man may receive from his Enemies; and, among the good Fruits of Enmity, mentions this in particular, that by the Reproaches which it casts upon us we see the worst side of our selves, and open our Eyes to several Blemishes and Defects in our Lives and Conversations which we should not have observed, without the Help of such ill-natured Monitors.

In order likewise to come at a true Knowledge of our selves, we should consider on the other hand how far we may deserve the Praises and Approbations which the World bestows upon us. Whether the Actions they celebrate proceed from laudable and worthy Motives, and how far we are really possessed of the Virtues which gain us Applause among those with whom we converse. Such a Reflection is absolutely necessary, if we consider how apt we are either to value or condemn ourselves by the Opinions of others, and to sacrifice the Report of our own Hearts to the Judgment of the World.

In the next Place, that we may not deceive ourselves in a Point of so much Importance, we should not lay too great a Stress on any supposed Virtues we possess that are of a doubtful Nature. And such we may esteem all those in which Multitudes of Men dissent from us, who are as good and wise as our selves. We should always act with great Caution and Circumspection in Points, where it is not impossible that we may be deceived. Intemperance, Zest, Bigotry, and Persecution for any Party or Opinion, how praiseworthy soever they may appear to weak Men of our own Principles, produce infinite Calamities among Mankind, and are highly Criminal in their own Nature: and yet how many Persons eminent for Piety suffer such monstrous and absurd Principles of Action to take Root in their Minds under the Colour of Virtues? For my own Part, I must own I never yet knew any Party so just and reasonable, that a Man could follow it in its Height and Violence, and at the same time be innocent.

We should likewise be very apprehensive of those Actions which proceed from natural Constitution, favourite Passions, particular Education, or whatever promotes our worldly Interest or Advantage. In these and the like Cases, a Man's Judgment is easily perverted, and a wrong Bias hung upon his Mind. These are the Inlets of Prejudice, the unguarded Avenues of the Mind, by which a thousand Errors and secret Faults find Admission, without being observed or taken Notice of. A wise Man will suspect those Actions to which he is directed by something [besides¹] Reason, and always apprehend some concealed Evil in every Resolution that is of a disputable Nature, when it is conformable to his particular Temper, his Age, or Way of Life, or when it favours his Pleasure or his Profit.

There is nothing of greater Importance to us than thus diligently to sift our Thoughts, and examine all these dark recesses of the Mind, if we would establish our Souls in such a solid and substantial Virtue as will turn to Account in that great Day, when it must stand the Test of infinite Wisdom and Justice.

I shall conclude this Essay with observing that the two kinds of Hypocrisy I have here spoken of, namely that of deceiving the World, and that of imposing on our selves, are touched with wonderful Beauty in the hundred and thirty ninth Psalm. The Tolly of the first kind of Hypocrisy is there set forth by Reflections on God's Omniscience and Omnipresence, which are celebrated in as noble Strains of Poetry as any other I ever met with, either Sacred or Profane. The other kind of Hypocrisy, whereby a Man deceives himself, is intimated in the two last Verses, where the Psalmist addresses himself to the great Searcher of Hearts in that emphatical Petition Try me, O God, and seek the ground of my heart, prove me, and examine my Thoughts. Look well if there be any way of wickedness in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. L

IT should, methinks, preserve Modesty and its Interests in the World, that the Transgression of it always creates Offence: and the very Purposes of Wantonness are defeated by a Carriage which has in it so much Boldness, as to imtimulate that Fear and Reluctance are quite extinguish'd in an Object which would be otherwise desirable. It was said of a Wit of the last Age,

*Sedley has that prevailing gentle Art,
Which can with a resistless Charm impart
The loosest Wishes to the chastest Heart, Raise such a Conflict, kindle such a Fire, Between declining Virtue and Desire,
That the poor vanquish'd Maid dissolves away
In Dreams all Night, in Sighs and Tears all Day.*¹

This prevailing gentle Art was made up of Complaisance, Courtship, and artful Conformity to the Modesty of a Woman's Manners. Rusticity, broad Expression, and forward Obtrusion, offend those of Education, and make the Transgressors odious to all who have Merit enough to attract Regard. It is in this Taste that the Scenery is so beautifully ordered in the Description which Antony makes, in the Dialogue between him and Dolabella, of Cleopatra in her Barge.

*Her Galley down the Silver Cydnos row'd, The Tackling Silk, the Streamers wav'd with Gold,
The gentle Winds were lodg'd in purple Sails Her Nymphs, like Nereids, round her Couch were plac'd,
Where she, another Sea born Venus, lay,
She lay, and lean'd her Cheek upon her Hand,
And cast a Look so languishingly sweet,
As if, secure of all Beholders Hearts, Neglecting she could take em Boys like Cupids Stood fanning with their painted Wings the Winds That play'd about her Face, but if she smil'd,
A darting Glory seem'd to blaze abroad,
That Men's desiring Eyes were never weary'd, But hung upon the Object. To soft Flutes
The Silver Oars kept Time and while they play'd, He Hearing gave new Pleasure to the Sight,
And both to Thought.*²

Here the Imagination is warmed with all the Objects presented, and yet there is nothing that is lascivious, or what raises any Idea more loose than that of a beautiful Woman set off to Advantage. The like, or a more delicate and careful Spirit of Modesty, appears in the following Passage in one of Mr. Philip's Pastorals³

*Breathe soft ye Winds, ye Waters gently flow, Shield her ye Trees, ye Flowers around her grow, Ye Swans, I beg you, pass in Silence by,
My Love in yonder Vale asleep does lie.*

Desire is corrected when there is a Tenderness or Admiration expressed which partakes the Passion. Licentious Language has something brutal in it, which disgraces Humanity, and leaves us in the Condition of the Savages in the Field. But it may be ask'd to what good Use can tend a Discourse of this Kind at all? It is to alarm chaste Ears against such as have what is above called the prevailing gentle Art. Masters of that I don't are capable of clothing their Thoughts in so soft a Dress, and something so distant from the secret Purpose of their Heart, that the Imagination of the Unguarded is touched with a Fondness which grows too insensibly to be resisted. Much Care and Concern for the Lady's Welfare, to seem afraid lest she should be annoyed by the very Air which surrounds her, and this uttered rather with kind Looks, and expressed by an Interjection in Ah, or in Oh, at some little Hazard in moving or making a Step, than in any direct Profession of Love, are the Methods of skillful Admirers. They are honest Arts when their Purpose is such, but infamous when misapplied. It is certain that many a young Woman in this Town has had her Heart irrecoverably won, by Men who have not made one Advance which ties their Admirers, tho' the Female languish with the utmost Anxiety. I have often, by way of Admonition to my female Readers, given them Warning against agreeable Company of the other Sex, except they are well acquainted with their Characters. Women may disguise it if they think fit, and the more to do it, they may be wroth at me for saying, it but I say it is natural to them, that they have no Manner of Approbation of Men, without some Degree of Love. For this Reason he is dangerous to be entertained as a Friend or Visitant who is capable of gaining any eminent Esteem or Observation, though it be never so remote from Pretensions as a Lover. If a Man's Heart has not the Abhorrence of any treacherous Design, he may easily improve Approbation into Kindness, and Kindness into Passion. There may possibly be no manner of Love between them in the Eyes of all their Acquaintance, no it is all Friendship, and yet they may be as fond as Shepherd and Shepherdess in a Pastoral, but still the Nymph and the Swain may be to each other no other I warrant you, than Pyraides and Orestes.

*When Lucy decks with Flowers her swelling Breast,
And on her Ellow leans, dissembling Rest, Unable to refrain my madding Aid, Nor Sleep nor Pasture worth my Care I find Once Delia slept, on easy Moss reclin'd, Her lovely Limbs half bare, and ride the Wind,
I smooth'd her Coats, and stole a silent Kiss Condemn me Shepherds if I did amiss.*

Such good Offices as these, and such friendly Thoughts and Concerns for one another, are what make up the Amity, as they call it, between Man and Woman.

It is the Permission of such Intercourse, that makes a young Woman come to the Arms of her Husband, after the Disappointment of four or five Passions which she has successively had for different Men, before she is prudentially given to him for whom she has neither Love nor Friendship. For what should a poor Creature do that has lost all her friends? There's Marmot the Agreeable, has, to my Knowledge, had a Friendship for Lord Walsford, which had like to break his Heart; then she had so great a Friendship for Colonel Hardy, that she could not endure any Woman else should do any thing but rail at him. Many and fatal have been Disasters between Friends who have fallen out, and their Resentments are more keen than ever those of other Men can possibly be. But in this it happens unfortunately, that as there ought to be nothing concerned from one friend to another, the Friends of different Sexes (very often) find fatal Effects from their Unanimity.

For my Part, who study to pass Life in as much Innocence and Tranquillity as I can, I shun the Company of agreeable Women as much as possible and must confess that I have, though a tolerable good Philosopher, but a low Opinion of Platonic Love for which Reason I thought it necessary to give my fair Readers a Caution against it, having, to my great Concern, observed the Waste of a Platonist lately swell to a Roundness which is inconsistent with that Philosophy.

I SHALL publish for the Entertainment of this Dry, or odd sort of a Packet, which I have just received from one of my female Correspondents

MR SPECTATOR,

'Since you have often confess'd that you are not displeased your Paper should sometimes convey the Complaints of distressed Lovers to each other, I am in Hopes you will favour one who gives you an undoubted Instance of her Reformation, and at the same time a convincing Proof of the happy Influence your Labour have had over the most Incurable Part of the most Incurable Sex. You must know, Sir, I am one of that Species of Women, whom you have often Characteriz'd under the Name of Fits, and that I send you these Lines, as well to do Publick Penance for having so long continu'd in a known Error, as to beg Pardon of the Party offended. I the rather chuse this way, because it in some measure answers the Terms on which he intimated the Breach between us might possibly be made up, as you will see by the Letter he sent me the next Day after I had discarded him which I thought fit to send you a Copy of, that you might the better know the whole Case.

'I must further acquaint you, that before I jilted him, there had been the greatest Intimacy between us for an Year and half together, during all which time I cherish'd his Hopes, and

'solved to preserve my Innocence. The only Way I can think of to avoid the fatal Consequences of the Discovery of this Matter, is to fly away for ever which I must do to avoid my Husband's fatal Resentment against the Man who attempts to abuse him, and the Shame of exposing the Parent to Infamy. The Persons concerned will know these Circumstances relate to em and though the Regard to Virtue is dead in them, I have some Hopes from their Fear of Shame upon reading this in your Paper which I conjure you to do, if you have any Compassion for Injured Virtue.

Sylva

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I am the Husband of a Woman of Merit, but am fallen in Love, as they call it, with a Lady of her Acquaintance, who is going to be married to a Gentleman who deserves her. I am in a Trust relating to this Lady's Fortune, which makes my Concurrence in this Matter necessary but I have so irresistible a Rage and Envy rise in me when I consider his future Happiness, that against all Reason, Equity, and common Justice, I am ever playing mean Tricks to suspend the Nuptials. I have no manner of Hopes for my self Emilia, for so I'll call her, is a Woman of the most strict Virtue, her Lover is a Gentleman who of all others I could wish my Friend, but Envy and Jealousie, though placed so unjustly, waste my very Being and with the Torment and Sense of a Demon, I am ever cursing what I cannot but approve. I wish it were the Beginning of Repentance, that I sit down and describe my present Disposition with so hellish an Aspect but to present the Destruction of these two excellent Persons would be more welcome to me than their Happiness. Mr SPECTATOR, pray let me have a Paper on these terrible grounds of Sufferings, and do all you can to exorcise Crows who are in some Degree possessed as I am

Cannibal

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I have no other Means but this to express my Thanks to one Man, and my Resentment against another. My Circumstances are as follow: I have been for five Years last past courted by a Gentleman of greater Fortune than I ought to expect, as the Market for Women goes. You must be sure have observed People who live in that sort of Way, as all their Friends reckon it will be a Match, and are marked out by all the World for each other. In this View we have been regarded for some Time, and I have above these three Years loved him tenderly. As he is very careful of his Fortune, I always thought he lived in a near Manner to lay up what he thought was wanting in my Fortune to make up what he might expect in another. Within few Months I have observed his Carriage very much altered, and he has affected a certain Air of getting me alone, and talking with a mighty Profusion of passionate Words. How I am not to be resisted longer, how irresistible his Wishes are, and the like. As long as I have been acquainted with him, I could not on such Occasions say down-right to him, You know you may make me yours when you please. But the other Night he with great Frankness and Impudence explained to me, that he thought of me only as a Mistress. I answered this Declaration as it deserv'd upon which he only doubled the Terms on which he proposed my yielding. When my Anger heightened upon him, he told me he was sorry he had made so little Use of the unguarded Hours we had been together so remote from Company, as indeed, continued he, so we are at present. I flew from him to a neighbouring Gentlewoman's House, and tho' her Husband was in the Room, threw my self on a Couch, and burst into a Passion of Tears. My Friend desired her Husband to leave the Room. But, said he, there is something so extraordinary in this, that I will partake in the Affliction and be it what it will, she is so much your Friend, that she knows she may command what Services I can do her. The Man sat down by me, and spoke so like a Brother, that I told him my whole Affliction. He spoke of the Injury done me with so much Indignation, and animated me against the Iove he said he saw I had for the Wretch who would have betrayed me, with so much Reason and Humanity to my Weakness, that I doubt not of my Perseverance. His Wife and he are my Comforters, and I am under no more Restraint in their Company than if I were alone and I doubt not but in a small time Contempt and Hatred will take Place of the Remains of Affection to a Rascal.

I am,

SIR,

Your affectionate Reader,
Dorinda

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I had the Misfortune to be an Uncle before I knew my Nephews from my Nieces, and now we are grown up to better Acquaintance they deny me the Respect they owe. One upbraids me with being their Familiar, another will hardly be persuaded that I am an Uncle, a third calls me Little Uncle, and a fourth tells me there is no Duty at all due to an Uncle. I have a Brother-in-law whose Son will win all my Affection, unless you shall think this worthy of your Cognizance, and will be pleased to prescribe some Rules for our future reciprocal Behaviour. It will be worthy the Particularity of your Genius to lay down Rules for his Conduct who was as I were born an old Man, in which you will much oblige,

SIR,

Your most obed ent Ser-ant,

Qui mores hominum multorum vidit— Hor

WHEN I consider this great City in its several Quarters and Divisions, I look upon it as an Aggregate of various Nations distinguished from each other by their respective Customs, Manners and Interests. The Courts of two Countries do not so much differ from one another, as the Court and City in their peculiar Ways of Life and Conversation. In short, the Inhabitants of St James's, notwithstanding they live under the same Laws, and speak the same Language, are a distinct People from those of Cheapside, who are likewise removed from those of the Temple on the one side, and those of Smithfield on the other, by several Climates and Degrees in their way of Thinking and Conversing together.

For this Reason, when any publick Affair is upon the Anvil, I love to hear the Reflections that arise upon it in the several Districts and Parishes of London and Westminster, and to ramble up and down a whole Day together, in order to make my self acquainted with the Opinions of my Ingenious Countrymen. By this means I know the Faces of all the principal Politicians within the Bills of Mortality, and as every Coffee house has some particular Statesman belonging to it, who is the Mouth of the Street where he lives, I always take care to place my self near him, in order to know his Judgment on the present Posture of Affairs. The last Progress that I made with this Intention, was about three Months ago, when we had a current Report of the King of France's Death. As I foresaw this would produce a new Face of things in Europe, and many curious Speculations in our British Coffee houses, I was very desirous to learn the Thoughts of our most eminent Politicians on that Occasion.

That I might begin as near the Fountain-Head as possible, I first of all called in at St. James's, where I found the whole outward Room in a Puz of Politics. The Speculations were but very indifferent towards the Door, but grew finer as you advanced to the upper end of the Room, and were so very much improved by a Knot of Theorists, who sat in the inner Room, within the Steams of the Coffee-Pot, that I there heard the whole Spanish Monarchy disposed of, and all the Line of Bourbon provided for in less than a Quarter of an Hour.

I afterwards called in at Giles's, where I saw a Board of French Gentlemen sitting upon the Life and Death of their Grand Monarque. Those among them who had espoused the Whig Interest, very positively affirmed, that he departed this Life about a Week since, and therefore proceeded without any further Delay to the Release of their Friends on the Gallies, and to their own Re-establishment; but finding they could not agree among themselves, I proceeded on my intended Progress.

Upon my Arrival at Jenny Man's, I saw an alert young Fellow that cocked his Hat upon a Friend of his who entered just at the same time with my self, and accosted him after the following Manner. Well Jacq, the old Prig is dead at last. Sharp's the Word. Now or never, Boy. Up to the Walls of Paris directly. With several other deep Reflections of the same Nature.

I met with very little Variation in the Politics between Claring-Cross and Covent Garden. And upon my going into Will's I found their Discourse was gone off from the Death of the French King to that of Monsieur Boileau, Racine, Corneille, and several other Poets, whom they regretted on this Occasion, as Persons who would have obliged the World with very noble Elegies on the Death of so great a Prince, and so eminent a Patron of Learning.

At a Coffee house near the Temple, I found a couple of young Gentlemen engaged very smartly in a Dispute on the Succession to the Spanish Monarchy. One of them seemed to have been retained as Advocate for the Duke of Anjou, the other for his Imperial Majesty. They were both for regulating the Title to that Kingdom by the Statute Laws of England, but finding them going out of my Depth, I passed forward to Paul's Church-Yard, where I listen'd with great Attention to a learned Man, who gave the Company an Account of the deplorable State of France during the Minority of the deceased King.

I then turned on my right Hand into Juch-street, where the chief Politician of that Quarter, upon hearing the News, (after having taken a Pipe of Tobacco, and ruminated for some time) If, says he, the King of France is certainly dead, we shall have Plenty of Mackerell this Season: our Fishery will not be disturbed by Privateers, as it has been for these ten Years past. He afterwards considered how the Death of this great Man would afflict our Pilchards, and by several other Remarks infused a general Joy into his whole Audience.

I afterwards entered a By Coffee house that stood at the upper end of a narrow Lane, where I met with a Nonjuror, engaged very warmly with a Laceman who was the great Support of a neighbouring Conventicle. The Matter in Debate was, whether the late French King was most like Augustus Caesar, or Nero. The Controversie was carried on with great Heat on both Sides, and as each of them looked upon me very frequently during the Course of their Debate I was under some Apprehension that they would appeal to me, and therefore hid down my Penny at the Bar, and made the best of my way to Cheapside.

I here gazed upon the Signs for some time before I found one to my Purpose. The first Object I met in the Coffee room was a Person who expressed a great Grief for the Death of the French King; but upon his explaining himself I found his Sorrow did not arise from the Loss of the Monarch, but for his having sold out of the Bank about three Days before he heard the News of it. Upon which a Haberdasher, who was the Oracle of the Coffee house, and had his Circle of Admirers about him, called several to witness that he had declared his Opinion above a Week before, that the French King was certainly dead to which he added, that considering the late Advices we had received from France, it was impossible that it could be otherwise. As he was laying these together, and dictating to his Hearers with great Authority, there came in a Gentleman from Garratay's, who told us that there were several Letters from France just come in, with Advice that the King was in good Health, and was gone out Hunting the very Morning the Post came away. Upon which the Haberdasher stole off his Hat that hung upon a wooden Pegg by him, and retired to his Shop with great Confusion. This Intelligence put a Stop to my Travels, which I had prosecuted with [much¹] Satisfaction not being a little pleased to hear so many different Opinions upon so great an Event, and to observe how naturally upon such a Piece of News every one is apt to consider it with a Regard to his own particular Interest and Advantage. L

NATURE does nothing in vain the Creator of the Universe has appointed every thing to a certain Use and Purpose, and determin'd it to a settled Course and Sphere of Action, from which, if it in the least deviates, it becomes unfit to answer those Ends for which it was designed. In like manner it is in the Dispositions of Society, the civil Oeconomy is formed in a Chain as well as the natural and in either Case the Breach but of one Link puts the Whole into some Disorder. It is, I think, pretty plain, that most of the Absurdity and Ridicule we meet with in the World, is generally owing to the impertinent Affectation of excelling in Characters. Men are not fit for, and for which Nature never designed them.

Every Man has one or more Qualities which may make him useful both to himself and others. Nature never fails of pointing them out, and while the Infant continues under her Guardianship, she brings him on in this Way and then offers her self for a Guide in what remains of the Journey. If he proceeds in that Course, he can hardly miscarry. Nature makes good her Engagements for as she never promises what she is not able to perform, so she never fails of performing what she promises. But the Misfortune is, Men despise what they may be Masters of, and affect what they are not fit for. They reckon themselves already possessed of what their Genius inclined them to, and so bend all their Ambition to excel in what is out of their Reach. Thus they destroy the Use of their natural Talents, in the same manner as covetous Men do their Quiet and Repose. They can enjoy no Satisfaction in what they have, because of the absurd Inclination they are possessed with for what they have not.

Cleantes had good Sense, a great Memory, and a Constitution capable of the closest Application. In a Word, there was no Profession in which Cleantes might not have made a very good Figure. But this won't satisfy him, he takes up in unaccountable Fondness for the Character of a fine Gentleman. All his Thoughts are bent upon this instead of attending a Dissection, frequenting the Courts of Justice or studying the Fathers. Cleantes reads Plays, dances dresses, and spends his Time in drawing-rooms instead of being a good Lawyer, Divine, or Physician. Cleantes is a downright Coxcomb, and will remain to all that knew him a contemptible Example of Talents misapplied. It is to this Affectation the World owes its whole Race of Coxcombs. Nature in her whole Drama never drew such a Part. She has sometimes made a Fool, but a Coxcomb is always of a Man's own making, by applying his Talents otherwise than Nature designed, who ever bears an high Resentment for being put out of her Course, and never fails of taking her Revenge on those that do so. Opposing her Lendency in the Application of a Man's Parts, has the same Success as declining from her Course in the Production of Vegetables by the Assistance of Art and an hot Bed, we may possibly extort an unwilling Plant, or an untimely Sallad but how weak, how tasteless and insipid? Just as insipid as the Poetry of Valerio. Valerio had an universal Character, was genteel, had Learning, thought justly, spoke correctly 'twas believed there was nothing in which Valerio did not excel and 'twas so far true, that there was but one Valerio had no Genius for Poetry, yet he's resolved to be a Poet, he writes Verses, and takes great Pains to convince the Town, that Valerio is not that extraordinary Person he was taken for.

If Men would be content to graft upon Nature, and assist her Operations, what mighty Effects might we expect? Fully would not stand so much alone in Oratory, Virgil in Poetry, or Cesar in War. To build upon Nature, is laying the Foundation upon a Rock. Every thing disposes us self into Order as it were of Course, and the whole Work is half done as soon as undertaken. Cicero's Genius inclined him to Oratory, Virgil's to follow the Train of the Muses, they piously obeyed the Admonition, and were rewarded. Had Virgil attended the Bar, his modest and ingenious Virtue would surely have made but a very indifferent Figure. And Fully's declamatory Inclination would have been as useless in Poetry. Nature, if left to her self, leads us on in the best Course, but will do nothing by Compulsion and Constraint and if we are not satisfied to go her Way, we are always the greatest Sufferers by it.

Wherever Nature designs a Production, she always disposes Seeds proper for it, which are as absolutely necessary to the Formation of any moral or intellectual Excellence, as they are to the Being and Growth of Plants. And I know not by what Fate and Folly it is, that Men are taught not to reckon him equally absurd that will write Verses in Spite of Nature, with that Gardener that should undertake to raise a Jonquil or Tulip without the Help of their respective Seeds.

As there is no Good or bad Quality that does not affect both Sexes, so it is not to be imagined but the fair Sex must have suffered by an Affectation of this Nature, at least as much as the other. The ill Effect of it is in none so conspicuous as in the two opposite Characters of Celia and Iras. Celia has all the Charms of Person together with an abundant Sweetness of Nature, but wants Wit, and has a very ill Voice. Iras is ugly and ungenteel, but has Wit and good Sense. If Celia would be silent, her Beholders would adore her. If Iras would talk, her Hearers would admire her. But Celia's Tongue runs incessantly, while Iras gives her self silent Airs and soft Language, so that 'tis difficult to persuade ones self that Celia has Beauty and Iras Wit. Each neglects her own Excellence, and is ambitious of the other's Character. Iras would be thought to have as much Beauty as Celia, and Celia as much Wit as Iras.

The great Misfortune of this Affectation is, that Men not only lose a good Quality, but also contract a bad one. They not only are unfit for what they were designed, but they assign themselves to what they are not fit for, and instead of making a very good Figure one Way, make a very ridiculous one another. If Semanthe would have been satisfied with her natural Complexion, she might still have been celebrated by the Name of the Olive Beauty, but Semanthe has taken up an Affectation to White and Red, and is now distinguished by the Character of the Lady that paints so well. In a word, could the World be reformed to the Obedience of that famed Dictate, I follow Nature, which the Oracle of Delphos pronounced to Cicero when he consulted what Course of Studies he should pursue, we should see almost every Man as eminent in his proper Sphere as Tully was in his, and should in a very short time find Impertinence and Affectation banished from among the Women, and Coxcombs and false Characters from among the Men. For my Part, I could never consider this preposterous Repugnancy to Nature any otherwise, than not only as the greatest Folly, but also one of the most heinous Crimes, since it is a direct Opposition to the Disposition of Providence, and (as Tully expresses it) like the Sin of the Giants, an actual Rebellion against Heaven.

I AM very sorry to find, by the Opera Bills for this Day, that we are likely to lose the greatest Performer in Dramatick Musick that is now living, or that perhaps ever appeared upon a Stage. I need not requirunt my Reader, that I am speaking of Signior Nicolini.¹ The Town is highly obliged to that Excellent Artist, for having shewn us the Italian Musick in its Perfection, as well as for that generous Approbation he lately gave to an Opera of our own Country, in which the Composer endeavoured to do Justice to the Beauty of the Words, by following that Noble Example, which has been set him by the greatest Foreign Masters in that Art.

I could heartily wish there was the same Application and Endeavours to cultivate and improve our Church-Musick, as have been lately bestowed on that of the Stage. Our Composers have one very great Incitement to it. They are sure to meet with Excellent Words, and, at the same time, a wonderful Variety of them. There is no Passion that is not finely expressed in those parts of the inspired Writings, which are proper for Divine Songs and Anthems.

There is a certain Coldness and Indifference in the Phrases of our European Languages, when they are compared with the Oriental Forms of Speech, and it happens very luckily, that the Hebrew Idioms run into the English Tongue with a particular Grace and Beauty. Our Language has received innumerable Elegancies and Improvements, from that Infusion of Hebraisms, which are derived to it out of the Poetical Passages in Holy Writ. They give a Force and Energy to our Expressions, warm and animate our Language, and convey our Thoughts in more ardent and intense Phrases, than any that are to be met with in our own Tongue. There is something so pathetic in this kind of Diction, that it often sets the Mind in a Flame, and makes our Hearts burn within us. How cold and dead does a Prayer appear, that is composed in the most Elegant and Polite Forms of Speech which are natural to our Tongue, when it is not heightened by that Solemnity of Phrase, which may be drawn from the Sacred Writings. It has been said by some of the Ancients, that if the Gods were to talk with Men, they would certainly speak in Plato's Style; but I think we may say, with Justice, that when Mortals converse with their Creator, they cannot do it in so proper a Style as in that of the Holy Scriptures.

If any one would judge of the Beauties of Poetry that are to be met with in the Divine Writings, and examine how kindly the Hebrew Manners of Speech mix and incorporate with the English Language, after having perused the Book of Psalms, let him read a literal Translation of Horace or Pindar. He will find in these two last such an Absurdity and Confusion of Style, with such a Comparative Poverty of Imagination, as will make him very sensible of what I have been here advancing.

Since we have therefore such a Treasury of Words, so beautiful in themselves, and so proper for the Airs of Musick, I cannot but wonder that Persons of Distinction should give so little Attention and Encouragement to that Kind of Musick, which would have its Foundation in Reason, and which would improve our Virtue in proportion as it raised our Delight. The Passions that are excited by ordinary Compositions generally flow from such silly and absurd Occasions, that a Man is ashamed to reflect upon them seriously; but the Fear the Love, the Sorrow, the Indignation that are awakened in the Mind by Hymns and Anthems, make the Heart better, and proceed from such Causes as are altogether reasonable and praise-worthy. Pleasure and Duty go hand in hand, and the greater our Satisfaction is, the greater is our Religion.

Musick among those who were styled the chosen People was a Religious Art. The Songs of Sion, which we have reason to believe were in high Repute among the Courts of the Eastern Monarchs, were nothing else but Psalms and Pieces of Poetry that adored or celebrated the Supreme Being. The greatest Conqueror in this

Holy Nation, after the manner of the old Grecian Lyricks did not only compose the Words of his Divine Odes, but generally set them to Musick himself. After which, his Works, tho' they were consecrated to the Tabernacle, became the National Entertainment, as well as the Devotion of his People.

The first Original of the Drama was a Religious Worship consisting only of a Chorus, which was nothing else but an Hymn to a Deity. As Luxury and Voluptuousness prevailed over Innocence and Religion, this Form of Worship degenerated into Tragedies, in which however the Chorus so far remembered its first Office, as to brand every thing that was vicious, and recommend every thing that was laudable, to intercede with Heaven for the Innocent, and to implore its Vengeance on the Criminal.

Homer and Hesiod intimate to us how this Art should be applied, when they represent the Muses as surrounding Jupiter, and warbling their Hymns about his Throne. I might shew from innumerable Passages in Ancient Writers, not only that Vocal and Instrumental Musick were made use of in their Religious Worship, but that their most favourite Diversions were filled with Songs and Hymns to their respective Deities. Had we frequent Entertainments of this Nature among us, they would not a little purifie and exalt our Passions, give our Thoughts a proper Turn, and cherish those Divine Impulses in the Soul, which every one feels that has not stifled them by sensual and unmoderate Pleasures.

Musick, when thus applied, raises noble Ideas in the Mind of the Hearer, and fills it with great Conceptions. It strengthens Devotion, and advances Praise into Rapture. It lengthens out every Act of Worship, and produces more lasting and permanent Impressions in the Mind, than those which accompany any transient Form of Words that are uttered in the ordinary Method of Religious Worship.

THE following Letters bear a pleasing Image of the Joys and Satisfactions of private Life. The first is from a Gentleman to a Friend, for whom he has a very great Respect, and to whom he communicates the Satisfaction he takes in Retirement, the other is a Letter to me, occasioned by an Ode written by my Lapland Lover. This Correspondent is so kind as to translate another of Scheffer's Songs, in a very agreeable Manner. I publish them together, that the Young and Old may find something in the same Paper which may be suitable to their respective Taste in Solitude, for I know no Fault in the

Description of ardent Desires, provided they are honourable

Dear Sir,

You have obliged me with a very kind Letter, by which I find you shift the Scene of your Life from the Town to the Country, and enjoy that mixt State which wise Men both delight in, and are qualified for. Methinks most of the Philosophers and Moralists have run too much into Extremes, in praising entirely either Solitude or publick Life, in the former Men generally grow useless by too much Rest, and in the latter are destroyed by too much Precipitation. As Waters lying still, putrifie and are good for nothing, and running violently on, do but the more Mischief in their Passage to others, and are swallowed up and lost the sooner themselves. Those who, like you, can make themselves useful to all States, should be like gentle Streams, that not only glide through lonely Valles and Forests amidst the Flocks and Shepherds, but visit populous Towns in their Course, and are at once of Ornament and Service to them. But there is another sort of People who seem designed for Solitude, those I mean who have more to hide than to shew. As for my own Part, I am one of those of whom Seneca says, Hum Umbrales sunt, ut putent in turbido esse quicquid in luce est. Some Men, like Pictures, are fitter for a Corner than a full Light, and I believe such as have a natural Bent to Solitude, are like Waters which may be forced into Fountains, and exalted to a great Height, may make a much nobler Figure, and a much louder Noise, but after all run more smoothly, equally and plentifully, in their own natural Course upon the Ground. The Consideration of this would make me very well contented with the Possession only of that Quiet which Cowley calls the Companion of Obscurity, but whoever has the Muses too for his Companions, can never be idle enough to be uneasie. Thus, Sir, you see I would flatter my self into a good Opinion of my own Way of Living. Plutarch just now told me, that 'tis a human Life as in a Game at Tables, one may wish he had the highest Crust, but if his Chance be otherwise, he is even to play it as well as he can, and make the best of it.

I am, SIR,

Your most obliged,
and most humble Servant

MR. SPECTATOR

The Town being so well pleased with the fine Picture of artless Love, which Nature inspired the Laplander to paint in the Ode you lately printed, we were in Hopes that the ingenious Translator would have obliged it with the other also which Scheffer has given us, but since he has not, a much inferior Hand has ventured to send you this.

It is a Custom with the Northern Lovers to divert themselves with a Song, whilst they Journey through the fenny Moors to pay a visit to their Mistresses. This is addressed by the Lover to his Run Deer, which is the Creature that in that Country supplies the Want of Horses. The Circumstances which successively

'present themselves to him in his Way, are, I believe you will think, naturally interwoven. The Anxiety of Absence, the Gloominess of the Road, and his Resolution of frequenting only those, since those only can carry him to the Object of his Desires: the Dissatisfaction he expresses even at the greatest Swiftness with which he is carried, and his joyful Surprise at an unexpected Sight of his Mistress as she is bathing, seem beautifully described in the Original.

'If all those pretty Images of Rural Nature are lost in the Imitation yet possibly you may think fit to let this supply the Place of a long Letter, when Want of Leisure or Indisposition for Writing will not permit our being entertained by your own Hand. I propose such a Line, because tho' it is natural to have a Fondness for what one does one's self, yet I assure you I would not have any thing of mine displease a single Line of yours

—abst secundus Grater dictus—Ovid

MOST Foreign Writers who have given any Character of the English Nation, what ever Vices they ascribe to it, allow in general, that the People are naturally Modest. It proceeds, perhaps from this our National Virtue, that our Orators are observed to make use of less Gesture or Action than those of other Countries. Our Preachers stand stock still in the Pulpit, and will not so much as move a Finger to set off the best Sermons in the World. We meet with the same speaking Statues at our Bars, and in all publick Places of Debate. Our Words flow from us in a smooth continued Stream, without those Strummings of the Voice, Motions of the Body, and Majesty of the Hand, which are so much celebrated in the Orators of Greece and Rome. We can talk of Life and Death in cold Blood, and keep our Temper in a Discourse which turns upon every thing that is dear to us. Though our Zeal be absent in the finest Tropes and Figures, it is not able to surmount about us. I have heard it observed more than once by those who have seen Italy, that an untrivell'd Englishman cannot relish all the Beauties of Italian Pictures, because the Postures which are expressed in them are often such as are peculiar to that Country. One who has not seen an Italian in the Pulpit will not know what to make of that noble Gesture in Raphael's Picture of St Paul preaching at Athens, where the Apostle is represented as lifting up both his Arms, and pouring out the Thunder of his Rhetorick amidst an Audience of Pagan Philosophers.

It is certain that proper Gestures and vehement Exertions of the Voice cannot be too much studied by a publick Orator. They are a kind of Comment to what he utters and enforce every thing he says, with weak Hearers, better than the strongest Argument he can make use of. They keep the Audience awake, and fix their Attention to what is delivered to them, at the same time that they shew the Speaker in earnest and affected himself with what he so passionately recommends to others. Violent Gesture and Vociferation naturally shake the Hearts of the Ignorant, and fill them with a kind of Religious Horror. Nothing is more frequent than to see Women weep and tremble at the Sight of a moving Preacher, though he is placed quite out of their Hearing as in England we very frequently see People lulled asleep with solid and elaborate Discourses of Piety, who would be warmed and transported out of themselves by the Bellowsings and Distortions of Enthusiasm.

If Nonsense, when accompanied with such an Emotion of Voice and Body, has such an Influence on Men's Minds, what might we not expect from many of those Admirable Discourses which are printed in our Tongue, were they delivered with a becoming Ferour, and with the most agreeable Graces of Voice and Gesture?

We are told that the great Italian Orator very much impaired his Health by this late manner contentio, this Vehemence of Action, with which he used to deliver himself. The Greek Orator was likewise so very Famous for this Particular in Rhetorick, that one of his Antagonists, whom he had banished from Athens, reading over the Oration which had procured his Banishment, and seeing his Friends admire it, could not forbear asking them, if they were so much affected by the bare reading of it, how much more they would have been alarmed, had they heard him actually throwing out such a Storm of Eloquence?

How cold and dead a Figure in Comparison of these two great Men, does an Orator often make at the British Bar, holding up his Head with the most insipid Serenity, and stroking the sides of a long Wigg that reaches down to his Middle? The truth of it is, there is often nothing more ridiculous than the Gestures of an English Speaker: you see some of them running their Hands into their Pockets as far as ever they can thrust them, and others looking with great Attention on a piece of Paper that has nothing written in it: you may see many a smart Rhetorician turning his Hat in his Hands, moulding it into several different Cocks, examining sometimes the Lining of it, and sometimes the Button, during the whole course of his Harangue. A deaf Man would think he was Chirping a Beaver, when perhaps he is talking of the Fate of the British Nation. I remember, when I was a young Man, and used to frequent Westminster-Hall, there was a Counsellor who never pleaded without a Piece of Pack thread in his Hand, which he used to twist about a Thumb, or a Finger, all the while he was speaking. The Wiggs of those Days used to call it the Thread of his Discourse, for he was not able to utter a Word without it. One of his Clients, who was more merry than wise, stole it from him one Day in the midst of his Pleading, but he had better have let it alone, for he lost his Cause by his Jest.

I have all along acknowledged myself to be a Dumb Man, and therefore may be thought a very improper Person to give Rules for Oratory: but I believe every one will agree with me in this, that we ought either to try aside all kinds of Gesture, (which seems to be very suitable to the Genius of our Nation) or at least to make use of such only as are graceful and expressive. Decet affectus animi neque se nimium erigere, nec subiacere suis titulis —Tull. de Imitus

Mr. SPECTATOR,

I HAVE always been a very great Lover of your Speculations, as well in Regard to the Subject, as to your Manner of treating it. Human Nature I always thought the most useful Object of human Reason, and to make the Consideration of it pleasant and entertaining I always thought the best Employment of human Wit. Other Parts of Philosophy may perhaps be more wise, but this not only answers that End, but makes us better too. Hence it was that the Oracle pronounced Socrates the wisest of all Men living, because he judiciously made Choice of human Nature for the Object of his Thoughts. An Enquiry into which is much exceeds all other Learning, as it is of more Consequence to adjust the true Nature and Measures of Right and Wrong, than to settle the Distance of the Planets, and compute the Times of their Circumvolutions.

One good Effect that will immediately arise from a near Observation of human Nature, is, that we shall cease to wonder at those Actions which Men are used to reckon wholly unaccountable for as nothing is produced without a Cause, so by observing the Nature and Course of the Passions, we shall be able to trace every Action from its first Conception to its Death. We shall no more admire at the Proceedings of Catiline or Tiberius, when we know the one was actuated by a cruel Jealousie, the other by a furious Ambition for the Actions of Men follow their Passions as naturally as Light does Heat, or as any other Effect flows from its Cause. Reason must be employed in adjusting the Passions, but they must ever remain the Principles of Action.

The strange and absurd Variety that is so apparent in Men's Actions, shows plainly they can never proceed immediately from Reason, so pure a Fountain emits no such troubled Waters. They must necessarily arise from the Passions, which are to the Mind as the Winds to a Ship, they only can move it, and they too often destroy it: if fair and gentle, they guide it into the Harbour; if contrary and furious, they overset it in the Waves. In the same manner is the Mind assisted or endangered by the Passions. Reason must then take the Place of Pilot, and can never fail of securing her Charge if she be not wanting to herself. The Strength of the Passions will never be accepted as an Excuse for complying with them: they were designed for Subjection, and if a Man suffers them to get the upper Hand, he then betrays the Liberty of his own Soul.

As Nature has framed the several Species of Beings as it were in a Chain, so Man seems to be placed as the middle Link between Angels and Brutes. Hence he participates both of Flesh and Spirit by an admirable Tie, which in him occasions perpetual War of Passions: and as a Man inclines to the angelical or brute Part of his Constitution, he is then denominated good or bad, virtuous or wicked if Love, Mercy, and Good-nature prevail, they speak him of the Angel; if Hatred, Cruelty, and Envy predominate, they declare his Kindred to the Brute. Hence it was that some of the Ancients imagined, that as Men in this Life incline more to the Angel or Brute, so after their Death they should transigrate into the one or the other: and it would be no unpleasant Notion, to consider the several Species of Brutes, into which we may imagine that Tyrants, Misers, the Proud, Malignant, and Ill-natured might be changed.

As a Consequence of this Original, all Passions are in all Men, but all appear not in all. Constitution, Education, Custom of the Country, Reason, and the like Causes, may improve or abate the Strength of them, but still the Seeds

'remain, which are ever ready to sprout forth upon the least Encouragement I have heard of a Story of a good religious Man, who, having been bred with the Milk of a Goat, was very modest in Publick by a careful Reflection he made on his Actions, but he frequently had an Hour in Secret, wherein he had his Risks and Capers, and if we had an Opportunity of examining the Retirement of the strictest Philosophers no doubt but we should find perpetual Returns of those Passions they so artfully conceal from the Publick. I remember Matchavel observes, that every State should entertain a perpetual jealousy of its Neighbours, that so it should never be unprovided when an Emergency happens. In like manner should the Reason be perpetually on its Guard against the Passions, and never suffer them to carry on any Design that may be destructive of its Security yet at the same Time it must be careful, that it don't so far break their Strength as to render them contemptible, and consequently it self ungarded.

'The Understanding being of its self too slow and lazy to exert it self into Action, it's necessary it should be put in Motion by the gentle Gales of the Passions, which may preserve it from stagnating and Corruption for they are as necessary to the Health of the Mind, as the Circulation of the animal Spirits is to the Health of the Body they keep it in Life, and Strength, and Vigour, nor is it possible for the Mind to perform its Offices without their Assistance. These Motions are given us with our Being, they are little Spirits that are born and dye with us to some they are mild, easie, and gentle, to others wayward and unruly, yet never too strong for the Reins of Reason and the Guidance of Judgment.

'We may generally observe a pretty nice Proportion between the Strength of Reason and Passion the greatest Genius's have commonly the strongest Affections, as on the other hand, the weaker Understandings have generally the weaker Passions and 'tis fit the Fury of the Coursers should not be too great for the Strength of the Charioteer. Young Men whose Passions are not a little unruly, give small Hopes of their ever being considerable, the Fire of Youth will of course abate, and is a Fault, if it be a Fault that mends every Day but surely unless a Man has Fire in Youth, he can hardly have Warmth in Old Age. We must therefore be very cautious, lest while we think to regulate the Passions, we should quite extinguish them, which is putting out the Light of the Soul for to be without Passion, or to be hurried away with it, makes a Man equally blind. The extraordinary Severity used in most of our Schools has this fatal Effect, it breaks the Spring of the Mind, and most certainly destroys more good Genius's than it can possibly improve. And surely 'tis a mighty Mistake that the Passions should be so intirely subdued for little Irregularities are sometimes not only so be borne with, but to be cultivated too, since they are frequently attended with the greatest Perfections. All great Genius's have

'Fruits mixed with their Virtues, and resemble the flaming Bush which has Thorns amongst Lights.

'Since therefore the Passions are the Principles of human Actions, we must endeavour to manage them so as to retain their Vigour, yet keep them under strict Command we must govern them rather like free Subjects than Slaves, lest while we intend to make them obedient, they become obdurate, and unfit for those great Purposes to which they were designed. For my Part I must confess, I could never have any Regard to that Sect of Philosophers, who so much insisted upon an absolute Indifference and Vacancy from all Passion, for it seems to me a Thing very inconsistent for a Man to divest himself of Humanity, in order to acquire Tranquility of Mind, and to eradicate the very Principles of Action, because 'tis possible they may produce ill Effects.

I am, SIR,

Your Affectionate Admirer,

GRATIAN very often recommends the Fine Taste, as the utmost Perfection of an accomplished Man. As this Word arises very often in Conversation, I shall endeavour to give some Account of it, and to lay down Rules how we may know whether we are possessed of it, and how we may acquire that fine Taste of Writing, which is so much talked of among the Polite World.

Most Languages make use of this Metaphor, to express that Faculty of the Mind, which distinguishes all the most concealed Faults and nicest Perfections in Writing. We may be sure this Metaphor would not have been so general in all Tongues, had there not been a very great Conformity between that Mental Taste, which is the Subject of this Paper, and that Sensitive Taste which gives us a Relish of every different Flavour that affects the Palate. Accordingly we find, there are as many Degrees of Refinement in the intellectual Faculty, as in the Sense, which is marked out by this common Denomination.

I knew a Person who possessed the one in so great a Perfection, that after having tasted ten different Kinds of Tea, he would distinguish, without seeing the Colour of it, the particular Sort which was offered him and not only so, but any two Sorts of them that were mixt together in an equal Proportion may he has carried the Experiment so far, as upon tasting the Composition of three different Sorts, to name the Parcels from whence the three several Ingredients were taken. A Man of a fine Taste in Writing will discern, after the same manner, not only the general Beauties and Imperfections of an Author, but discover the several Ways of thinking and expressing himself, which diversify him from all other Authors, with the several foreign Infusions of Thought and Language, and the particular Author from whom they were borrowed.

After having thus far explained what is generally meant by a fine Taste in Writing, and shewn the Propriety of the Metaphor which is used on this Occasion, I think I may define it to be that Faculty of the Soul, which discovers the Beauties of an Author with Pleasure, and the Imperfections with Dislike. If a Man would know whether he is possessed of this Faculty, I would have him read over the celebrated Works of Antiquity, which have stood the Test of so many different Ages and Countries, or those Works among the Moderns which have the Sanction of the Politer Part of our Contemporaries. If upon the Perusal of such Writings he does not find himself delighted in an extraordinary Manner, or if, upon reading the admired Passages in such Authors, he finds a Coldness and Indifference in his Thoughts, he ought to conclude, not (as is too usual among tasteless Readers) that the Author wants those Perfections which have been admired in him, but that he himself wants the Faculty of discovering them.

He should, in the second Place, be very careful to observe, whether he tastes the distinguishing Perfections, or, if I may be allowed to call them so the Specifick Qualities of the Author whom he peruses whether he is particularly pleased with Livy for his Manner of telling a Story, with Sallust for his entering into those internal Principles of Action which arise from the Characters and Manners of the Persons he describes, or with Tacitus for his displaying those outward Motives of Safety and Interest, which give Birth to the whole Series of Transactions which he relates.

He may likewise consider, how differently he is affected by the same Thought which presents it self in a great Writer, from what he is when he finds it delivered by a Person of an ordinary Genius. For there is as much Difference in apprehending a Thought clothed in Cicero's Language, and that of a common Author, as in seeing an Object by the Light of a Taper, or by the Light of the Sun.

It is very difficult to lay down Rules for the Acquisition of such a Taste as that I am here speaking of. The Faculty must in some degree be born with us, and it very often happens that those who have other Qualities in Perfection are wholly void of this. One of the most eminent Mathematicians of the Age has assured me, that the greatest Pleasure he took in reading Virgil, was in examining Aeneas his Voyage by the Map. I question not but many a Modern Compiler of History, would be delighted with little more in that Divine Author, than in the bare Matters of Fact.

But notwithstanding this Faculty must in some measure be born with us, there are several Methods for Cultivating and Improving it, and without which it will be very uncertain, and of little use to the Person that possesses it. The most natural Method for this Purpose is to be conversant among the Writings of the most Polite Authors. A Man who has any Relish for fine Writing, either discovers new Beauties, or receives stronger Impressions from the Masterly Strokes of a great Author every time he peruses him. Besides that he naturally wears himself into the same manner of Speaking, and Thinking.

Conversation with Men of a Polite Genius is another Method for improving our Natural Taste. It is impossible for a Man of the greatest Parts to consider anything in its whole Extent, and in all its Variety of Lights. Every Man, besides those General Observations which are to be made upon an Author, forms several Reflections that are peculiar to his own Manner of Thinking, so that Conversation will naturally furnish us with Hints which we did not attend to, and make us enjoy other Men's Parts and Reflections as well as our own. This is the best Reason I can give for the Observation which several have made that Men of great Genius in the way of Writing seldom rise up singly, but at certain Periods of Time appear together, and in a Body as they did at Rome in the Reign of Augustus, and in Greece about the Age of Socrates. I cannot think that Cornelius, Lucius, Moliere, Boileau, la Fontaine, Brueyre, Bossu, or the Daniers, would have written so well as they have done, had they not been Friends and Contemporaries.

It is likewise necessary for a Man who would form to himself a finished Taste of good Writing, to be well versed in the Works of the best Critics both Ancient and Modern. I must confess that I could wish there were Authors of this kind, who beside the Mechanical Rules which a Man of very little Taste may discourse upon, would enter into the very Spirit and Soul of fine Writing, and shew us the several Sources of that Pleasure which rises in the Mind upon the Perusal of a noble Work. Thus although in Poetry it be absolutely necessary that the Unities of Time, Place and Action, with other Points of the same Nature, should be thoroughly explained and understood there is still something more essential to the Art, something that elevates and astonishes the Fancy, and gives a Greatness of Mind to the Reader, which few of the Critics besides Longinus have considered.

Our general Taste in England is for Epigram, Turns of Wit, and forced Conceits, which have no manner of Influence, either for the bettering or enlarging the Mind of him who reads them, and have been carefully avoided by the greatest Writers, both among the Ancients and Moderns. I have endeavour'd in several of my Speculations to brinish this Gothic Taste, which has taken Possession among us I entertained the Town, for a Week together, with an Essay upon Wit, in which I endeavour'd to detect several of those false kinds which have been admired in the different Ages of the World, and at the same time to shew wherein the Nature of true Wit consists. I afterwards give an Instance of the great Force which lies in a natural Simplicity of Thought to affect the Mind of the Reader, from such vulgar Pieces as have little else besides this single Qualification to recommend them. I have likewise examined the Works of the greatest Poet which our Nation or perhaps any other has produced, and particularized most of those rational and manly Beauties, which give a Value to that Divine Work I shall next Saturday enter upon an Essay on the Pleasures of the Imagination, which, though it shall consider that Subject at large, will perhaps suggest to the Reader what it is that gives a Beauty to many Passages of the finest Writers both in Prose and Verse As an Undertaking of this Nature is entirely new I question not but it will be received with Candour

*My Son, th' Instruction that my Words impart, Grave on the living Tablet of thy Heart,
And all the wholesome Precepts that I give, Observe with strictest Reverence, and live Let all thy Homage be to Wisdom paid, Seek her Protection and employ her Aid,
That she may keep thy Soul from Harm secure,
And turn thy Footsteps from the Harlot's Door, Who with curs'd Charnus lures the Unwary in,
And soothes with Flattery their Souls to Sin Once from my Window as I cast mine Eye On those that pass'd in giddy Numbers by,
A Youth among the foolish Youths I spy'd,
Who took not sacred Wisdom for his Guide
Just as the Sun withdrew his cooler Light,
And Evening soft led on the Shades of Night,
He stole in covert Twilight to his Fate,
And pass'd the Corner near the Harlot's Gate When, lo, a Woman comes Loos'd her Attire, and such her glaring Dress, As aptly did the Harlot's Mind express Subtle she is, and practis'd in the Arts,
By which the Wanton conquers heedless Hearts Stubborn and loud she is, she hates her Home Varying her Place and Person, she loves to roam Now she's within, now in the Street do's stray Now at each Corner stands, and waits her Prey
The Month she seiz'd, and laying now aside All Modesty, the Female's justest Pride, She said, with an Embrace, Here at my House*

Peace-offerings at this Day I paid my Dear,

Ana Pier dum peragro loca nullius ante Trita solo, si at u legros accerit fontis, Atque haurire Lucr

OUR Sight is the most perfect and most delightful of all our Senses. It fills the Mind with the largest Variety of Ideas, converses with its Objects at the greatest Distance, and continues the longest in Action without being tired or satiated with its proper Enjoyments. The Sense of Feeling can indeed give us a Notion of Extension, Shape, and all other Ideas it enter at the Eye, except Colours; but at the same time it is very much straitened and confined in its Operations, to the number, bulk, and distance of its particular Objects. Our Sight seems designed to supply all these Defects, and may be considered as a more delicate and diffusive kind of Touch, that spreads itself over an infinite Multitude of Bodies, comprehends the largest Figures, and brings into our reach some of the most remote Parts of the Universe.

It is this Sense which furnishes the Imagination with its Ideas, so that by the Pleasures of the Imagination or Fancy (which I shall use promiscuously) I here mean such as arise from visible Objects, either when we have them actually in our View, or when we call up their Ideas in our Minds by Paintings, Statues, Descriptions, or any like Occasion. We cannot indeed have a single Image in the Fancy that did not make its first Entrance through the Sight, but we have the Power of retaining, altering, and compounding those Images, which we have once received into all the varieties of Picture and Vision that are most agreeable to the Imagination; for by this Faculty a Man in a Dungeon is capable of entertaining himself with Scenes and Landscapes more beautiful than any that can be found in the whole Compass of Nature.

There are few Words in the English Language which are employed in a more loose and uncircumscribed Sense than those of the Fancy and the Imagination. I therefore thought it necessary to fix and determine the Notion of these two Words as I intend to make use of them in the Thread of my following Speculations, that the Reader may conceive rightly what is the Subject which I proceed upon. I must therefore desire him to remember, that by the Pleasures of the Imagination I mean only such Pleasures as arise originally from Sight, and that I divide these Pleasures into two Kinds. My Design being first of all to Discourse of those Primary Pleasures of the Imagination, which entirely proceed from such Objects as are before our Eyes, and in the next place to speak of those Secondary Pleasures of the Imagination which flow from the Ideas of visible Objects, when the Objects are not actually before the Eye, but are called up into our Memories or formed into agreeable Visions of Things that are either Absent or Ictitious.

The Pleasures of the Imagination, taken in the full Extent, are not so gross as those of Sense, nor so refined as those of the Understanding. The last are, indeed, more preferable, because they are founded on some new Knowledge or Improvement in the Mind of Man; yet it must be confessed, that those of the Imagination are great and transporting as the other. A beautiful Prospect delights the Soul as much as a Demonstration, and a Description in Homer has charmed more Readers than a Chapter in Aristotle. Besides, the Pleasures of the Imagination have this Advantage, above those of the Understanding, that they are more obvious, and more easy to be acquired. It is but opening the Eye, and the Scene enters. The Colours paint themselves on the Fancy, with very little Attention of Thought or Application of Mind in the Beholder. We are struck, we know not how, with the Symmetry of any thing we see, and immediately assent to the Beauty of an Object without enquiring into the particular Causes and Occasions of it.

A Man of a Polite Imagination is let into a great many Pleasures that the vulgar are not capable of receiving. He can converse with a Picture, and find an agreeable Companion in a Statue. He meets with a secret Refreshment in a Description, and often feels a greater Satisfaction in the Prospect of Fields and Meadows, than another does in the Possession. It gives him, indeed, a kind of Property in every thing he sees, and makes the most rude uncultivated Parts of Nature administer to his Pleasures. So that he looks upon the World, as it were in another Light, and discovers in it a Multitude of Charms, that conceal themselves from the generality of Mankind.

There are, indeed, but very few who know how to be idle and innocent, or have a Relish of any Pleasures that are not Criminal. Every Diversion they take is at the Expence of some one Virtue or another, and their very first Step out of Business is into Vice or Folly. A Man should endeavour, therefore, to raise the Sphere of his innocent Pleasures as wide as possible, that he may retire into them with Safety, and find in them such a Satisfaction is a wise Man would not blush to take. Of this Nature are those of the Imagination, which do not require such a Bent of Thought as is necessary to other more serious Employments, nor, at the same time, suffer the Mind to sink into that Negligence and Remissness, which are apt to accompany our more sensual Delights, but, like a gentle Exercise to the Faculties, awaken them from Sloth and Idleness, without putting them upon any Labour or Difficulty.

We might here add that the Pleasures of the Fancy are more conducive to Health, than those of the Understanding, which are worked out by dint of Thinking, and attended with too violent a Labour of the Brain. Delightful Scenes, whether in Nature, Painting, or Poetry, have a kindly Influence on the Body, as well as the Mind, and not only serve to clear and brighten the Imagination, but are able to disperse Grief and Melancholy, and to set the Animal Spirits in pleasing and agreeable Motions. For this Reason Sir Francis Bacon, in his Essay upon Health, has not thought it improper to prescribe to his Reader a Poem or a Prospect, where he particularly dissuades him from knotty and subtle Disquisitions, and advises him to pursue Studies that fill the Mind with splendid and illustrious Objects, as Histories, Fables, and Contemplations of Nature.

I have in this Paper by way of Introduction, settled the Notion of those Pleasures of the Imagination which are the Subject of my present Undertaking, and endeavoured, by several Considerations, to recommend to my Reader the Pursuit of those Pleasures. I shall, in my next Paper, examine the several Sources from whence these Pleasures are derived. O

No 412] Monday, June 23, 1712 [Addison

—Dixit sic brevis flos est—

I SHALL first consider those Pleasures of the Imagination, which arise from the actual View and Survey of outward Objects. And thus, I think, all proceed from the Sight of what is Great, Uncommon, or Beautiful. There may, indeed, be something so terrible or offensive, that the Horror or Loathsomeness of an Object may overbear the Pleasure which results from its Greatness, Novelty, or Beauty; but still there will be such a Mixture of Delight in the very Disgust it gives us, as any of these three Qualifications are most conspicuous and prevailing.

By Greatness, I do not only mean the Bulk of any single Object, but the Largeness of a whole View, considered as one entire Piece. Such are the Prospects of an open Champaign Country, a vast uncultivated Desert, of huge Heaps of Mountains, high Rocks and Precipices, or a wide Expanse of Waters, where we are not struck with the Novelty or Beauty of the Sight, but with that rude kind of Magnificence which appears in many of these stupendous Works of Nature. Our Imagination loves to be filled with an Object, or to grasp at any thing that is too big for its Capacity. We are flung into a pleasing Astonishment at such unbounded Views, and feel a delightful Stillness and Amazement in the Soul at the Apprehension[s] of them. The Mind of Man naturally hates every thing that looks like a Restriction upon it, and is apt to find itself under a sort of Confinement, when the Sight is pent up in a narrow Compass, and shortened on every side by the Neighbourhood of Walls or Mountains. On the contrary, a spacious Horizon is an Image of Liberty, where the Eye has Room to range abroad, to expatiate at large on the Immensity of its Views, and to lose itself in the vast Variety of Objects that offer themselves to its Observation. Such wide and undetermined Prospects are as pleasing to the Fancy as the Speculations of Eternity or Infinity are to the Understanding. But if there be a Beauty or Uncommonness joined with this Grandeur as in a troubled Ocean, a Heaven adorned with Stars and Meteors, or a spacious Landscape cut out into Rivers, Woods, Rocks, and English verse translation added of the quotation from Horace's Ode I xiii. The MS. shows with how much care Addison revised and corrected the first draught of his papers, especially where, as in the series of eleven upon Imagination here commenced, he meant to put out all his strength. In Blair's Rhetoric four Lectures, 20-23, are given to a 'critical Examination of the Style of Mr Addison in Nos 411, 412, 413, and 414 of the Spectator.' Akenside's poem on 'the Pleasures of the Imagination,' published in 1744, when he was 23 years old, was suggested by these papers. Many disquisitions upon Taste were written towards the close of the last century. They formed a new province in literature of which Addison here appears as the founder and first Lawgiver.

* From a MS. Note-book of Addison's, met with in 1858, Mr J Dykes Campbell printed at Glasgow, in 1854, 250 copies of some portions of the first draught of these papers on Imagination with his Essay on Jealousy (No 176) and that on Fame (No 255). The MS. was an old calf-bound 8vo volume obtained from a dealer. There were about 31 pages written on one side of each leaf in a beautiful print like hand, which contained the Essays in their first state. Passages were added by Addison in his ordinary handwriting upon the blank pages opposite to this carefully written text, and there are pieces in a third hand-writing which neither the Keeper of the MSS. Department of the British Museum nor the Librarian of the Bodleian could identify. The insertions in this third hand form part of the paper as finally published. Thus in the paper on Jealousy (No 171) it is to be the Meadows, the Pleasure still grows upon us, as it rises from more than a single Principle.

Every thing that is new or uncommon raises a Pleasure in the Imagination, because it fills the Soul with an agreeable Surprise, gratifies its Curiosity, and gives it an Idea of which it was not before possess'd. We are indeed so often conversant with one Set of Objects and tired out with so many repeated Shows of the same Things, that whatever is new or uncommon contributes a little to vary human Life, and to divert our Minds, for a while, with the Stringency of its Appearance. It serves us for a kind of Refreshment, and takes off from that Stupidity we are apt to complain of in our usual and ordinary Entertainments. It is this that bestows Charms on a Monster, and makes even the Imperfections of Nature [pleasing] to us. It is this that recommends Variety, where the Mind is every Instant call'd off to something new, and the Attention not sufficed to dwell too long, and waste it self on any particular Object. It is this, likewise, that improves what is great or beautiful, and makes it afford the Mind a double Entertainment. Groves, Fields, and Meadows, are at any Season of the Year pleasant to look upon, but never so much as in the Opening of the Spring, when they are all new and fresh, with their first Gloss upon them, and not yet too much accustomed and familiar to the Eye. For this Reason there is nothing that more charms a Prospect than Rivers, Jetteaus or Falls of Water, where the Scene is perpetually shifting, and entertaining the Sight every Moment with some thing that is new. We are quickly tired with looking upon Hills and Vallies, where every thing continues fixed and settled in the same Place and Posture, but find our Thoughts a little agitated and relieved at the Sight of such Objects as are ever in Motion, and sliding away from beneath the Eye of the Beholder.

But there is nothing that makes its Way more directly to the Soul than Beauty, which immediately diffuses a secret Satisfaction and Complacency through the Imagination, and gives a Pleasure to any thing that is Great or Uncommon. The very first Discovery of it strikes the Mind with an inward Joy and spreads a Cheerfulness and Delight through all its Faculties. There is not perhaps any real Beauty or Deformity more in one Piece of Matter than another, because we might have been so made, that whatsoever now appears loathsome to us might have shewn it self agreeable: but we find by Experience, that there are several Modifications of Matter which the Mind, without any previous Consideration, pronounces at first sight Beautiful or Deformed. Thus we see that every different Species of sensible Creatures has its different Notions of Beauty, and that each of them is most affected with the Beauties of its own Kind. This is no where more remarkable than in Birds of the same Shape and Proportion, where we often see the Male determined in his Courtship by the single Grin or Tincture of a Feather, and never discovering any Charms but in the Colour of its Species.

There is a second kind of Beauty that we find in the several Products of Art and Nature, which does not work in the Imagination with that Warmth and Violence as the Beauty that appears in our proper Species, but is apt however to raise in us a secret Delight, and a kind of Fondness for the Pleasures or Objects in which we discover it. This consists either in the Quiet or Variety of Colours, in the Symmetry and Proportion of Parts, in the Arrangement and Disposition of Bodies, or in a just Mixture and Concurrence of all together. Among these several Kinds of Beauty the Eye takes most Delight in Colours. We nowhere meet with a more glorious or pleasing Show in Nature than what appears in the Heavens at the rising and setting of the Sun, which is wholly made up of those different Strains of Light that shew themselves in Clouds of a different Situation. For this Reason we find the Poets, who are always addressing themselves to the Imagination, borrowing more of their Epithets from Colours than from any other Topic.

As the Fancy delights in every thing that is Great, Strange, or Beautiful and is still more pleas'd the more it finds of these Perfections in the same Object, so is it capable of receiving a new Satisfaction by the Assistance of another Sense. Thus my continued Sound, as the Musick of Birds, or a Fall of Water, awakens every moment the Mind of the Beholder, and makes him more attentive to the several Beauties of the Place that lie before him. Thus if there rises a Fragrancy of Smells or Perfumes, they heighten the Pleasures of the Imagination, and make even the Colours and Verdure of the Landship appear more agreeable for the Idens of both Senses recommend each other, and are pleasanter together than when they enter the Mind separately. As the different Colours of a Picture, when they are well disposed, set off one another, and receive an additional Beauty from the Advantage of their Situation (1)

—Causa latet, vis est et ottissima— Ovid

THOUGH in Yesterday's Paper we considered how every thing that is great, new, or beautiful, is apt to affect the Imagination with Pleasure, we must own that it is impossible for us to assign the necessary Cause of this Pleasure, because we know neither the Nature of an Idea, nor the Substance of a Human Soul which might help us to discover the Conformity or Disagreeableness of the one to the other and therefore for want of such a Light, all that we can do in Speculations of this kind is to reflect on those Operations of the Soul that are most agreeable, and to range under their proper Heads, what is pleasing or displeasing to the Mind, without being able to trace out the several necessary and efficient Causes from whence the Pleasure or Displeasure arises.

Ideal Causes lie more bare and open to our Observation, as there are often a great Variety that belong to the same Effect and these, tho' they are not altogether so satisfactory, are generally more useful than the other, as they give us greater Occasion of admiring the Goodness and Wisdom of the first Contriver.

One of the Ideal Causes of our Delight, in any thing that is great, may be this. The Supreme Author of our Being has so formed the Soul of Man, that nothing but himself can be its lot, adequate, and proper Happiness. Because, therefore, a great Part of our Happiness must arise from the Contemplation of his Being, that he might give our Souls a just Relish of such a Contemplation, he has made them naturally delight in the Apprehension of what is Great or Unlimited. Our Admiration which is a very pleasing Motion of the Mind, immediately rises at the Consideration of any Object that takes up a great deal of Room in the Fancy, and by Consequence, will improve into the highest Pitch of Astonishment and Devotion when we contemplate his Nature, that is neither circumscribed by Time nor Place, nor to be comprehended by the largest Capacity of a Created Being.

He has annexed a secret Pleasure to the Idea of any thing that is new or uncommon, that he might encourage us in the Pursuit after Knowledge, and engage us to search into the Wonders of his Creation, for every new Idea brings such a Pleasure along with it, as rewards any Pains we have taken in its Acquisition, and consequently serves as a Motive to put us upon fresh Discoveries.

He has made every thing that is beautiful in our own Species pleasant, that all Creatures might be tempted to multiply their Kind and fill the World with Inhabitants for 'tis very remarkable that when ever Nature is cross'd in the Production of a Monster (the Result of any unnatural Mixture) the Breed is incapable of propagating its Likeness, and of founding a new Order of Creatures so that unless all Animals were assured by the Beauty of their own Species Generation would be at an End, and the Earth unpeopled.

In the first Place, he has made every thing that is beautiful in all other Objects pleasant, or rather has made so many Objects appear beautiful, that he might render the whole Creation more gay and delightful. He has given almost every thing about us the Power of raising an agreeable Idea in the Imagination. So that it is impossible for us to behold his Works with Coldness, or Indifference, and to survey so many Beauties without a secret Satisfaction and Complacency. Things would make but a poor Appearance to the Eye, if we saw them only in their proper Figures and Motions. And what Reason can we assign for their exciting in us many of those Ideas which are different from any thing that exists in the Objects themselves, (for such are Light and Colours) were it not to add Supernumerary Ornaments to the Universe, and make it more agreeable to the Imagination? We are every where entertained with pleasing Shows and Apparitions, we discover Imaginary Glories in the Heavens and in the Earth, and see some of this Visionary Beauty poured out upon the whole Creation but what a rough unsightly Sketch of Nature should we be entertained with, did all her Colouring disappear, and the several Distinctions of Light and Shade vanish? In short, our Souls are at present delightfully lost and bewildered in a pleasing Delusion, and we walk about like the enchanted Hero of a Romance, who sees beautiful Castles, Woods and Meadows and at the same time hears the warbling of Birds, and the purring of Streams but upon the finishing of some secret Spell the fantastick Scene breaks up, and the disconsolate Knight finds himself on a barren Heath, or in a solitary Desert. It is not improbable that something like this may be the State of the Soul after its first Separation, in respect of the Images it will receive from Matter tho' indeed the Ideas of Colours are so pleasing and beautiful in the Imagination, that it is possible the Soul will not be deprived of them, but perhaps find them excited by some other Occasional Cause, as they are at present by the different Impressions of the subtle Matter on the Organ of Sight.

I have here supposed that my Reader is acquainted with that great Modern Discovery, which is at present universally acknowledged by all the Enquirers into Natural Philosophy. Namely, that Light and Colours, as apprehended by the Imagination are only Ideas in the Mind, and not Qualities that have any Existence in Matter. As this is a Truth which has been proved incontestably by many Modern Philosophers and is indeed one of the finest Speculations in that Science, if the English Reader would see the Notion explained at large, he may find it in the Eighth Chapter of the second Book of Mr. Lock's Essay on Human Understanding.

[To Addison's short paper there was added in number 413 of the Spectator the following letter, which was not included in the reprint into volumes

MR SPECTATOR,

June 24, 1712

I would not divert the Course of your Discourses when you seem bent upon obliging the World with a run of Thinking which, rightly attended to, may render the Life of every Man who reads it, more easy and happy for the future. The Pleasures of the Imagination are what bewilder Life, when Reason and Judgment do not interpose. It is therefore a worthy Action in you to look carefully into the Powers of Fancy, that other Men, from the Knowledge of them, may improve their Joys and ally their Griefs, by a just use of that Faculty. I say, Sir, I would not interrupt you in the progress of this Discourse, but if you will do me the Favour of inserting this Letter in your next Paper, you will do some Service to the Public, though not in so noble a way of Obliging, as that of improving their Minds. Allow me, Sir, to acquaint you with a Design (of which I am partly Author), though it tends to no greater Good than that of getting Money. I should not hope for the Favour of a Philosopher in this Matter, if it were not attempted under all the Restrictions which your Sagacity upon private Acquisitions.

The first Purpose which every good Man is to propose to himself, is the Service of his Prince and Country; after that is done, he cannot add to himself, but he must also be beneficial to them. This Scheme of Gain is not only consistent with that End, but has its very Being in Subordination to it, for no Man can be a Gainer here but at the same time he himself, or some other, must succeed in their Dealings with the Government. It is called the Multiplication Table, and is so far calculated for the immediate Service of Her Majesty, that the same Person who is fortunate in the Lottery of the State, may receive yet further Advantage in this Table. And I am sure nothing can be more pleasing to Her gracious Temper than to find out additional Methods of increasing their good Fortune who adventure anything in Her Service, or having Occasions for others to become capable of serving their Country who are at present in too low Circumstances to exert themselves. The manner of executing the Design is, by giving out Receipts for half Guineas received, which shall entitle the fortunate Bearer to certain Sums in the Table, as is set forth at large in the Proposals Printed the 23rd instant. There is another Circumstance in this Design which gives me hopes of your Favour to it, and that is what Tully advises, to wit, that the Benefit is made as diffusive as possible. Every one that has half a Guinea is put into a possibility, from that small Sum, to raise himself in easy Fortune when these little parcels of Wealth are, as it were, thus thrown back again into the Re donation of Providence we are to expect that some who live under Hardship or Obscurity, may be produced to the World in the Figure they deserve by this means. I doubt not but this last Argument will have Force with you, and I cannot add another to it, but what your

Severity will, I fear, very little regard, which is, that

I am, Sir,
Your greatest Admirer,

IF we consider the Works of Nature and Art, as they are qualified to entertain the Imagination, we shall find the first very defective, in Comparison of the former for though they may sometimes appear as Beautiful or Strange, they can have nothing in them of that Vastness and Immensity, which afford so great an Entertainment to the Mind of the Beholder. The one may be as Polite and Delicate as the other, but can never shew her self so August and Magnificent in the Design. There is something more bold and masterly in the rough careless Strokes of Nature, than in the nice Touches and Embellishments of Art. The Beauties of the most stately Garden or Palace lie in a narrow Compass, the Imagination immediately runs them over, and requires something else to gratify her but, in the wide Fields of Nature, the Sight wanders up and down without Confinement, and is fed with an infinite variety of Images, without any certain Stunt or Number. For this Reason we always find the Poet in Love with a Country-Place, where Nature appears in the greatest Perfection, and furnishes out all those Scenes that are most apt to delight the Imagination.

But tho' there are several of these wild Scenes, that are more delightful than any artificial Shows, yet we find the Works of Nature still more pleasant, the more they resemble those of Art. For in this case our Pleasure rises from a double Principle from the Agreeableness of the Objects to the Eye, and from their Similitude to other Objects. We are pleas'd as well with comparing their Beauties, as with surveying them, and can represent them to our Minds, either as Copies or Originals. Hence it is that we take Delight in a Prospect which is well laid out, and diversified with Fields and Meadows, Woods and Rivers, in those accidental Landscips of Trees, Clouds and Cities, that are sometimes found in the Veins of Marble in the curious Fret work of Rocks and Grottos and, in a Word, in any thing that hath such a Variety or Regularity as may seem the Effect of Design, in what we call the Works of Chance.

If the Products of Nature rise in Value, according as they more or less resemble those of Art, we may be sure that artificial Works receive a greater Advantage from their Resemblance of such as are natural, because here the Similitude is not only pleasant, but the Pattern more perfect. The prettiest Landſkip I ever ſaw, was one drawn on the Walls of a dark Room, which stood opposite on one ſide to a navigable River, and on the other to a Park. The Experiment is very common in Opticks. Here you might diſcover the Waves and Fluctuations of the Water in ſtrong and proper Colours, with the Picture of a Ship entering at one end, and ſailing by Degrees through the whole Piece. On another there appeared the Green Shadows of Trees, waving to and fro with the Wind, and Herds of Deer among them in Miniature, leaping about upon the Wall. I muſt confeſs, the Novelty of ſuch a Sight may be one occaſion of its Pleaſantneſs to the Imagination, but certainly the chief Reaſon is its near Reſemblance to Nature, as it does not only, like other Pictures, give the Colour and Figure, but the Motion of the Things it repreſents.

We have before obſerved, that there is generally in Nature ſomething more Grand and Auguſt, than what we meet with in the Curioſities of Art. When therefore, we ſee this imitated in any meaſure, it gives us a nobler and more exalted kind of Pleaſure than what we receive from the nicer and more accurate Productions of Art. On this Account our English Gardens are not ſo entertaining to the Fancy as thoſe in France and Italy, where we ſee a large Extent of Ground covered over with an agreeable mixture of Garden and Foreſt, which repreſent every where in artificial Rudeneſs, much more charming than that Neatneſs and Elegancy which we meet with in thoſe of our own Country. It might, indeed, be of ill Conſequence to the Publick, as well as unprofitable to private Perſons, to alienate ſo much Ground from Paſturing, and the Plow, in many Parts of a Country that is ſo well peopled, and cultivated to a far greater Advantage. But why may not a whole Eſtate be thrown into a kind of Garden by frequent Plantations, that may turn as much to the Profit, as the Pleaſure of the Owner? A Maſh overgrown with Willows, or a Mountain ſhaded with Oaks, are not only more beautiful, but more beneficial, than when they lie bare and undorned. Fields of Corn make a pleaſant Proſpect, and if the Walks were a little taken care of that lie between them, if the natural Embroidery of the Meadows were helped and improved by ſome ſmall Additions of Art, and the ſeveral Rows of Hedges ſet off by Trees and Flowers, that the Soil was capable of receiving, a Man might make a pretty Landſkip of his own Poſſeſſions.

Writers who have given us an Account of China, tell us the Inhabitants of that Country laugh at the Plantations of our Europeans, which are laid out by the Rule and Line, becauſe, they ſay, any one may place Trees in equal Rows and uniform Figures. They chuse rather to ſhew a Genius in Works of this Nature, and therefore always conceal the Art by which they direct themſelves. They have a Word, it ſeems, in their Language, by which they expreſs the particular Beauty of a Plantation that thus ſtrikes the Imagination at firſt Sight, without diſcovering what it is that has ſo agreeable an Effect. Our British Gardeners, on the contrary inſtead of humouring Nature, love to deviate from it as much as poſſible. Our Trees riſe in Cones, Globes, and Pyramids. We ſee the Marks of the Scissars upon every Plant and Buſh. I do not know whether I am ſingular in my Opinion, but, for my own part, I would rather look upon a Tree in all its Luſtrancy and Diffuſion of Boughs and Branches, than when it is thus cut and trimmed into a Mathematical Figure, and cannot but ſaſy that an Orchard in Flower looks infinitely more delightful, than all the little Labyrinths of the [moſt] finiſhed Parterre. But as our great Modellors of Gardens have their Magazines of Plants to diſpoſe of, it is very natural for them to tear up all the beautiful Plantations of Fruit Trees, and contrive a Plan that may moſt turn to their own Profit, in taking off their Evergreens, and the like Moveable Plants, with which their Shops are plentifully ſtocked.

Addo tot egregias artes, operumque laborem
Virg

HAVING already ſhewn how the Fancy is affected by the Works of Nature, and afterwards conſidered in general both the Works of Nature and of Art, how they mutually aſſiſt and compleat each other in forming ſuch Scenes and Proſpects as are moſt apt to delight the Mind of the Beholder, I ſhall in this Paper throw together ſome Reflections on that Particular Art, which has a more immediate Tendency than any other, to produce thoſe Primary Pleaſures of the Imagination, which have hitherto been the Subject of this Diſcourſe. The Art I mean is that of Architecture, which I ſhall conſider only with regard to the Light in which the foregoing Speculations have placed it, without entering into thoſe Rules and Maxims which the great Maſters of Architecture have laid down, and explained at large in numberleſs Treatiſes upon that Subject.

Greatneſs, in the Works of Architecture, may be conſidered as relating to the Bulk and Body of the Structure, or to the Manner in which it is built. As for the firſt, we find the Ancients, eſpecially among the Eaſtern Nations of the World, infinitely ſuperior to the Moderns.

Not to mention the Tower of Babel, of which an old Author ſays, there were the Foundations to be ſeen in his time, which looked like a ſpacious Mountain what could be more noble than the Walls of Babylon, its hanging Gardens, and its Temple to Jupiter Belus, that roſe a Mile high by Eight ſeveral Stones, each Story a Furlong in Height, and on the Top of which was the Babylonian Obſervatory, I might here, likewise, take of the Body, than in those of other Kinds There are, indeed, Figures of Bodies, where the Eye may take in two Thirds of the Surface, but as in such Bodies the Sight must split upon several Angles, it does not take in one uniform Idea, but several Ideas of the same kind Look upon the Outside of a Dome, your Eye half surrounds it look up into the Inside, and at one Glance you have all the Prospect of it the entire Concavity falls into your Eye at once, the Sight being in the Center that collects and gathers into it the Lines of the whole Circumference In a Square Pillar, the Sight often takes in but a fourth Part of the Surface and in a Square Concave, must move up and down to the different Sides, before it is Master of all the inward Surface For this Reason, the Fancy is infinitely more struck with the View of the open Air, and Skies, that passes through an Arch, than what comes through a Square, or any other Figure The Figure of the Rainbow does not contribute less to its Magnificence, than the Colours to its Beauty, as it is very poetically described by the Son of Sirach Look upon the Rainbow, and praise him that made it, very beautiful it is in its Brightness it encompasses the Heavens with a glorious Circle, and the Hands of the [most High] have bended it

Having thus spoken of that Greatness which affects the Mind in Architecture, I might next shew the Pleasure that arises in the Imagination from what appears new and beautiful in this Art but as every Beholder has naturally a greater Taste of these two Perfections in every Building which offers it self to his View, than of that which I have hitherto considered, I shal not trouble my Reader with any Reflections upon it It is sufficient for my present Purpose, to observe, that there is nothing in this whole Art which pleases the Imagination, but as it is Great, Uncommon, or Beautiful

Quatenus hoc simile est oculis, quod mente videmus—Lucr

I AT first divided the Pleasures of the Imagination, into such as arise from Objects that are actually before our Eyes, or that once entered in to our Eyes, and are afterwards called up into the Mind either barely by its own Operations, or on occasion of something without us, as Statues, or Descriptions We have already considered the first Division, and shall therefore enter on the other, which for Distinction sake, I have called the Secondary Pleasures of the Imagination When I say the Ideas we receive from Statues, Descriptions, or such like Occasions, are the same that were once actually in our View, it must not be understood that we had once seen the very Place, Action, or Person which are carved or described It is sufficient, that we have seen Places, Persons, or Actions, in general, which bear a Resemblance, or at least some remote Analogy with what we find represented Since it is in the Power of the Imagination, when it is once Stocked with particular Ideas, to enlarge, compound, and vary them at her own Pleasure

Among the different Kinds of Representation, Statuary is the most natural, and shews us something likeness the Object that is represented To make use of a common Instance, let one who is born Blind take an Image in his Hands, and trace out with his Fingers, the different Furrows and Impressions of the Chisel, and he will easily conceive how the Shape of a Man, or Beast, may be represented by it but should he draw his Hand over a Picture, where all is smooth and uniform, he would never be able to imagine how the several Prominencies and Depressions of a human Body could be shewn on a plain Piece of Canvas, that has in it no Unevenness or Irregularity Description runs yet further from the Things it represents than Painting for a Picture bears a real Resemblance to its Original, which Letters and Syllables are wholly void of Colours speak of Languages, but Words are understood only by such a People or Nation For this Reason, tho' Men's Necessities quickly put them on finding out Speech, Writing is probably of a later Invention than Painting particularly we are told, that in America when the Spaniards first arrived there Expresses were sent to the Emperor of Mexico in Paint, and the News of his Country delineated by the Strokes of a Pencil, which was a more natural Way than that of Writing, tho' at the same time much more imperfect, because it is impossible to draw the little Connexions of Speech, or to give the Picture of a Conjunction or an Adverb It would be yet more strange, to represent visible Objects by Sounds that have no Ideas annexed to them, and to make something like Description in Musick Yet it is certain, there may be confused, imperfect Notions of this Nature raised in the Imagination by an Artificial Composition of Notes and we find that great Masters in the Art are able, sometimes, to set their Hearers in the Heat and Hurry of a Battel, to overcast their Minds with melancholy Scenes and Apprehensions of Deaths and Funerals or to lull them into pleasing Dreams of Groves and Elysiums

In all these Instances, this Secondary Pleasure of the Imagination proceeds from that Action of the Mind, which compares the Ideas arising from the Original Objects, with the Ideas we receive from the Statue, Picture, Description, or Sound that represents them It is impossible for us to give the necessary Reason, why this Operation of the Mind is attended with so much Pleasure, as I have before observed on the same Occasion, but we find a great Variety of Entertainments derived from this single Principle For it is this that not only gives us a Relish of Statuary, Painting and Description, but makes us delight in all the Actions and Arts of Mimickry It is this that makes the several kinds of Wit pleasant, which consists, as I have formerly shewn, in the Affinity of Ideas And we may add, it is this also that raises the little Satisfaction we sometimes find in the different Sorts of false Wit, whether it consists in the Affinity of Letters, as in Anagram, Acrostick or of Syllables, as in Doggerel Rhymes, Lechons, or of Words, as in Puns, Quibbles or of a whole Sentence or Poem, to Wigs, and Altars. The first Cause, probably of unmixing Pleasure to this Operation of the Mind was to quieten and encourage us in our Searches after Truth, since the distinguishing one thing from another, and the right discerning betwixt our Ideas, depends wholly upon our comparing them together, and observing the Congruity or Discrepancy that appears among the several Works of Nature.

But I shall here confine myself to those Pleasures of the Imagination, which proceed from Ideas raised by Imagery, because most of the Observations that agree with Descriptions, are equally Applicable to Painting and Scenery.

Words, when well chosen, have so great a Force in them, that a Description often gives us more lively Ideas than the Sight of Things, themselves. The Reader finds a Scene drawn in stronger Colour, and printed more to the Life in his Imagination, by the help of Words, than by an actual Survey of the Scene which they describe. In this case the Poet seems to get the better of Nature he takes, in deed, the Landship after her, he gives it more vigorous Tinctures, heightens its Beauty, and so enlivens the whole Piece, that the Images which flow from the Objects themselves appear weak and faint, in Comparison of those that come from the Expressions. The Reason, probably may be, because in the Survey of any Object we have only so much of it painted on the Imagination, as comes in at the Eye but in its Description the Poet gives us a free View of it as he pleases, and discovers to us several Parts, that either we did not attend to, or that lay out of our Sight when we first beheld it. As we look on any Object, our Idea of it is, perhaps, made up of two or three simple Ideas but when the Poet represents it, he may either give us a more complex Idea of it, or only raise in us such Ideas as are most apt to affect the Imagination.

It may be here worth our while to Examine how it comes to pass that several Readers, who are all acquainted with the same Language, and know the Meaning of the Words they read, should never theless have a different Relish of the same Descriptions. We find one transported with a Passage, which another runs over with Coldness and Indifference, or finding the Representation extremely natural, where another can perceive no thing of Likeness and Conformity. This different Taste must proceed, either from the Perfectness of Imagination in one more than in another, or from the different Ideas that several Readers assign to the same Words. For, to have a true Relish, and form a right Judgment of a Description, a Man should be born with a good Imagination, and must have well weighed the Force and Energy, that lie in the several Words of a Language, so as to be able to distinguish which are most significant and expressive of their proper Ideas, and what additional Strength and Beauty they are capable of receiving from Conjunction with others. The Fancy must be warm to retain the Print of those Images it hath received from outward Objects and the Judgment discerning, to know what Expressions are most proper to cloath and adorn them to the best Advantage. A Man who is deficient in either of these Respects, tho' he may receive the general Notion of a Description, can never see distinctly all its particular Beauties. As a Person, with a weak Sight, may have the confused Prospect of a Place that lies before him, without entering into its several Parts, or discerning the Variety of its Colours, in their full Glory and Perfection.

WE may observe, that any single Circumstance of what we have formerly seen often rises up a whole Scene of Imagery, and awakens numberless Ideas that before slept in the Imagination such a particular Smell or Colour is able to fill the Mind or a sudden with the Picture of the Fields or Gardens where we first met with it, and to bring up into View all the Variety of Images that once attended it. Our Imagination takes the Hint, and leads us unexpectedly into Cities or Theatres, Plains or Meadows. We may further observe, when the Fancy thus reflects on the Scenes that have past in it formerly, those which were at first pleasant to behold appear more so upon Reflection and that the Memory heightens the Delightfulness of the Original. A Cartesian would account for both these Instances in the following Manner.

The Sett of Ideas, which we received from such a Prospect or Garden, having entered the Mind at the same time have a Sett of Forces belonging to them in the Brain, bordering very near upon one another which therefore, any one of these Ideas rises in the Imagination and consequently dispatches a flow of Animal Spirits to its proper Force, these Spirits, in the Violence of their Motion, run not only into the Force to which they were more particularly directed, but into several of those that lie about it. By this means they awaken other Ideas of the same Sett which immediately determine a new Dispatch of Spirit that in the same manner open other Neighbouring Forces till at last the whole Sett of them is blown up, and the whole Prospect or Garden flourishes in the Imagination. But because the Pleasure we received from these Places first surmounted, and overcame the little Disagreeableness we found in them, for this Reason there was at first a wider Passage worn in the Pleasure. Forces, and, on the contrary, so narrow a one in those which belonged to the disagreeable Ideas, that they were quickly stopt up, and rendered incapable of receiving any Animal Spirits, and

^a [that]

^b [a Thousand]

consequently of exciting any unpleasant Ideas in the Memory

It would be in vain to enquire, whether the Power of Imagining Things strongly proceeds from any greater Perfection in the Soul, or from any nicer Texture in the Brain of one Man than of another. But this is certain, that a noble Writer should be born with this Faculty in its full Strength and Vigour, so as to be able to receive lively Ideas from outward Objects, to retain them long, and to range them together, upon Occasion, in such Figures and Representations as are most likely to hit the Fancy of the Reader. A Poet should take as much Pains in forming his Imagination, as a Philosopher in cultivating his Understanding. He must gain a due Relish of the Works of Nature, and be thoroughly conversant in the various Scenery of a Country Life.

When he is stored with Country Images, if he would go beyond Pastoral, and the lower kinds of Poetry, he ought to acquaint himself with the Pomp and Magnificence of Courts. He should be very well versed in every thing that is noble and stately in the Productions of Art, whether it appear in Painting or Statuary, in the great Works of Architecture which are in their present Glory, or in the Ruins of those [which] flourished in former Ages.

Such Advantages as these help to open a Man's Thoughts, and to enlarge his Imagination, and will therefore have their Influence on all kinds of Writing, if the Author knows how to make right use of them. And among those of the learned Languages who excel in this Talent, the most perfect in their several Kinds, are perhaps Homer, Virgil, and Ovid. The first strikes the Imagination wonderfully with what is Great, the second with what is Beautiful, and the last with what is Strange. Reading the Iliad is like travelling through a Country uninhabited, where the Fancy is entertained with a thousand Savage Prospects of vast Deserts, wide uncultivated Marshes, huge Forests, mis-shapen Rocks and Precipices. On the contrary, the Aeneid is like a well ordered Garden, where it is impossible to find out any Part unadorned, or to cast our Eyes upon a single Spot, that does not produce some beautiful Plant or Flower. But when we are in the Metamorphoses, we are walking on enchanted Ground, and see nothing but Scenes of Magick lying round us.

Homer is in his Province, when he is describing a Battle or a Multitude, a Heroe or a God. Virgil is never better pleased, than when he is in his Elysium, or copying out an entertaining Picture. Homer's Epithets generally mark out what is Great, Virgil's what is Agreeable. Nothing can be more Magnificent than the Figure Jupiter makes in the first Iliad, nor more Charming than that of Venus in the first Aeneid.

*Dixit et averſus roſet cervice reſulſit Ambroſiaque comae divinum vertice odorem

Homer's Persons are most of them God like and Terrible. Virgil has scarce admitted any into his Poem, who are not Beautiful, and has taken particular Care to make his Heroe so.

Immenſe juvenſe Purpureum, et talos oculis afflavit honores

In a Word, Homer fills his Readers with Sublime Ideas, and, I believe, has raised the Imagination of all the good Poets that have come after him. I shall only instance Horace, who immediately takes Fire at the first Hint of any Passage in the Iliad or Odyssey, and always rises above himself, when he has Homer in his View. Virgil has drawn together, into his Aeneid, all the pleasing Scenes his Subject is capable of admitting, and in his Georgics has given us a Collection of the most delightful Landscapes that can be made out of Fields and Woods, Herds of Cattle, and Swarms of Bees.

Ovid, in his Metamorphoses, has shewn us how the Imagination may be affected by what is Strange. He describes a Miracle in every Story, and always gives us the Sight of some new Creature at the end of it. His Art consists chiefly in well-timing his Description, before the first Shape is quite worn off, and the new one perfectly finished, so that he every where entertains us with something we never saw before, and shews Monster after Monster, to the end of the Metamorphoses.

If I were to name a Poet that is a perfect Master in all these Arts of working on the Imagination, I think Milton may pass for one. And if his Paradise Lost falls short of the Aeneid or Iliad in this respect, it proceeds rather from the Fault of the Language in which it is written, than from any Defect of Genius in the Author. So Divine a Poem in English, is like a stately Palace built of Brick, where one may see Architecture in as great a Perfection as in one of Marble tho' the Materials are of a coarser Nature. But to consider it only as it regards our present Subject. What can be conceived greater than the Battle of Angels, the Majesty of Messiah the Stature and Behaviour of Satan and his Peers? What more beautiful than Pandemonium, Paradise, Heaven, Angels, Adam and Eve? What more strange, than the Creation of the World, the several Metamorphoses of the fallen Angels, and the surprising Adventures their Leader meets with in his Search after Paradise? No other Subject could have furnished a Poet with Scenes so proper to strike the Imagination, as no other Poet could have painted those Scenes in more strong and lively Colours. O

THE Pleasures of these Secondary Views of the Imagination, are of a wider and more universal Nature than those it has when joined with Sight for not only what is Great, Strange or Beautiful, but any Thing that is Disagreeable when looked upon, pleases us in an apt Description. Here, therefore, we must enquire after a new Principle of Pleasure, which is nothing else but the Action of the Mind, which compares the Ideas that arise from Words, with the Ideas that arise from the Objects themselves and why this Operation of the Mind is attended with so much Pleasure, we have before considered. For this Reason therefore, the Description of a Dungeon is pleasing to the Imagination, if the Image be represented to our Minds by suitable Expressions tho' perhaps, this may be more properly called the Pleasure of the Understanding than of the Imagination, because we are not so much delighted with the Image that is contained in the Description, as with the Aptness of the Description to excite the Image.

But if the Description of what is Little, Common, or Deformed, be acceptable to the Imagination, the Description of what is Great, Surprising or Beautiful, is much more so, because here we are not only delighted with comparing the Representation with the Original, but are highly pleased with the Original itself. Most Readers, I believe, are more charmed with Milton's Description of Paradise, than of Hell they are both, perhaps, equally perfect in their Kind, but in the one the Harms and Sulphur are not so refreshing to the Imagination, as the Beds of Flower and the Wilderness of Sweets in the other.

There is yet another Circumstance which recommends a Description more than all the rest, and that is if it represents to us such Objects as are apt to rouse a secret Lament in the Mind of the Reader, and to work, with Violence, upon his Passions. For, in this Case, we are at once warmed and enlightened, so that the Pleasure becomes more Universal, and is several ways qualified to entertain us. Thus in Painting, it is pleasant to look on the Picture of any Face, where the Resemblance is hit, but the Pleasure increases, if it be the Picture of a Face that is Beautiful, and is still greater, if the Beauty be softened with an Air of Melancholy or Sorrow. The two leading Passions, which the more serious Parts of Poetry endeavour to stir up in us, are Terror and Pity. And here, by the way, one would wonder how it comes to pass, that such Passions as are very unpleasant at all other times, are very agreeable when excited by proper Descriptions. It is not strange, that we should take Delight in such Passages as are apt to produce Hope, Joy, Admiration, Love, or the like Emotions in us, because they never rise in the Mind without an inward Pleasure which attends them. But how comes it to pass, that we should take delight in being terrfied or dejected by a Description, when we find so much Uneasiness in the Fear or Grief [which] we receive from any other Occasion?

If we consider, therefore, the Nature of this Pleasure, we shall find that it does not arise so properly from the Description of what is terrible as from the Reflection we make on our selves at the time of reading it. When we look on such hideous Objects we are not a little pleased to think we are in no Danger of them. We consider them at the same time, as Dreadful and Harmless so that the more frightful Appearance they make, the greater is the Pleasure we receive from the Sense of our own Safety. In short, we look upon the Terror of a Description, with the same Curiosity and Satisfaction that we survey a dead Monster.

It is for the same Reason that we are delighted with the reflecting upon Dangers that are past, or in looking on a Precipice at a distance, which would fill us with a different kind of Horror, if we saw it hanging over our Heads.

In the like manner, when we read of Torments, Wounds, Deaths, and the like dismal Accidents, our Pleasure does not flow so properly from the Grief which such melancholy Descriptions give us, as from the secret Compassion which we make between our selves and the Person [who] suffers. Such Representations teach us to set a just Value upon our own Condition, and make us prize our good Fortune which exempts us from the like Calamities. This is, however, such a kind of Pleasure as we are not capable of receiving, when we see a Person actually lying under the Tortures that we meet with in a Description, because in this case, the Object presses too close upon our Senses, and bears so hard upon us, that it does not give us Time or Leisure to reflect on our selves. Our Thoughts are so intent upon the Miseries of the Sufferer, that we cannot turn them upon our own Happiness. Whereas, on the contrary, we consider the Misfortunes we read in History or Poetry, either as past, or as fictitious, so that the Reflection upon our selves rises in us insensibly, and over beats the Sorrow we conceive for the Sufferings of the Afflicted.

But because the Mind of Man requires something more perfect in Matter, than what it finds there, and can never meet with any Sight in Nature which sufficiently answers its highest Ideas of Pleasurateness or, in other Words, because the Imagination can fancy to it self Things more Great, Strange, or Beautiful, than the Eye ever saw, and is still sensible of some Defect in what has been seen, on this account it is the part of a Poet to humour the Imagination in its own Notions, by mending and perfecting Nature where he describes a Reality, and by adding greater Beauties than are put together in Nature, where he describes a Fiction.

He is not obliged to attend her in the slow Advances which she makes from one Season to another, or to observe her Conduct, in the successive Production of Plants and Flowers. He may draw into his Description all the Beauties of the Spring and Autumn, and make the whole Year contribute something to render it the more agreeable. His Rose-trees, Wood-bines, and Jessamines may flower together, and his Beds be cover'd at the same time with Lillies, Violets, and Amarantus. His Soil is not restrained to any particular Sett of Plants, but is proper either for Oaks or Myrdes, and adapts itself to the Products of every Climate. Oranges may grow wild in it, Myrrh may be met with in every Hedge, and if he thinks it proper to have a Grove of Spices, he can quickly command Sun enough to raise it. If all this will not furnish out an agreeable Scene, he can make several new Species of Flowers, with richer Scents and higher Colours than any that grow in the Gardens of Nature. His Consorts of Birds may be as full and harmonious, and his Woods as thick and gloomy as he pleases. He is at no more Expence in a long Vista, than in a short one, and can as easily throw his Cascades from a Precipice of half a Mile high, as from one of twenty Yards. He has his Choice of the Winds, and can turn the Course of his Rivers in all the Variety of Meanders, that are most delightful to the Reader's Imagination. In a word, he has the modelling of Nature in his own Hands, and may give her what Charms he pleases, provided he does not reform her too much, and run into Absurdities, by endeavouring to excel.

I do not say with Mr Bayn in the Rehearsal, that Spirits must not be confined to speak Sense, but it is certain their Sense ought to be a little discoloured, that it may seem particular, and proper to the Person and the Condition of the Speaker.

These Descriptions raise a pleasing kind of Horror in the Mind of the Reader, and amuse his Imagination with the Strangeness and Novelty of the Persons who are represented in them. They bring up into our Memory the Stories we have heard in our Childhood, and favour those secret Terrors and Apprehensions to which the Mind of Man is naturally subject. We are pleased with surveying the different Habits and Behaviours of Foreign Countries, how much more must we be delighted and surprised when we are led, as it were, into a new Creation, and see the Persons and Manners of another Species? Men of cold Fancies, and Philosophical Dispositions, object to this kind of Poetry, that it has not Probability enough to affect the Imagination. But to this it may be answered, that we are sure, in general, there are many Intellectual Beings in the World besides our selves, and several Species of Spirits, who are subject to different Laws and Oeconomies from those of Mankind. When we see, therefore, any of these represented naturally, we cannot look upon the Representation as altogether impossible. Nay, many are prepossessed with such false Opinions, as dispose them to believe these particular Delusions. At least, we have all heard so many pleasing Relations in favour of them, that we do not care for seeing through the Falshood, and willingly give our selves up to so agreeable an Imposture.

The Ancients have not much of this Poetry among them, for indeed, almost the whole Substance of it owes its Original to the Darkness and Superstition of later Ages, when pious Frauds were made use of to amuse Mankind, and frighten them into a Sense of their Duty. Our Forefathers look'd upon Nature with more Reverence and Horror before the World was enlightened by Learning and Philosophy, and lov'd to astonish themselves with the Apprehensions of Witchcraft, Prodiges, Charms and Enchantments. There was not a Village in England that had not a Ghost in it, the Church yards were all haunted, every large Common had a Circle of Furies belonging to it, and there was scarce a Shepherd to be met with who had not seen a Spirit.

Among all the Poets of this Kind our English are much the best, by what I have yet seen, whether it be that we abound with more Stories of this Nature, or that the Genius of our Country is fitter for this sort of Poetry. For the English are naturally fanciful, and very often disposed by that Gloominess and Melancholy of Temper which is so frequent in our Nation, to many wild Notions and Visions, to which others are not so liable.

Among the English, Shakespear has incomparably excelled all others. That noble Extramentis gratissimus Error — Hor

THERE is a kind of Writing, wherein the Poet quite loses Sight of Nature, and entertains his Reader's Imagination with the Characters and Actions of such Persons as have many of them no Existence, but what he bestows on them. Such are Fairies, Witches, Magicians, Demons, and departed Spirits. This Mr Dryden calls the Fairy Way of Writing, which is, indeed, more difficult than any other that depends on the Poet's Fancy, because he has no Pattern to follow in it, and must work altogether out of his own Invention.

There is a very odd Turn of Thought required for this sort of Writing, and it is impossible for a Poet to succeed in it, who has not a particular Cast of Fancy, and an Imagination naturally fruitful and superstitious. Besides this, he ought to be very well versed in Legends and Fables, antiquated Romances, and the Traditions of Nurses and old Women, that he may fall in with our natural Prejudices, and humour those Notions which we have imbibed in our Infancy. For otherwise he will be apt to make his Fairies talk like People of his own Species, and not like other Setts of Beings, who converse with different Objects, and think in a different Manner from that of Mankind, vagance of Fancy which he had in so great Perfection, thoroughly qualified him to touch this weak superstitious Part of his Reader's Imagination and made him capable of succeeding, where he had nothing to support him besides the Strength of his own Genius. There is something so wild and yet so solemn in the Speeches of his Ghosts, Furies, Witches and the like Imaginary Persons, that we cannot forbear thinking them natural, tho' we have no rule by which to judge of them, and must confess, if there are such Beings in the World, it looks highly probable that they should talk and act as he has represented them.

There is another sort of imaginary Beings, that we sometimes meet with among the Poets, when the Author represents any Passion, Appetite, Virtue or Vice, under a visible Shape, and makes it a Person or an Actor in his Poem. Of this Nature are the Descriptions of Hunger and Envy in Ovid, of Fame in Virgil, and of Sin and Death in Milton. We find a whole Creation of the like Shadowy Persons in Spencer, who had an admirable Talent in Representations of this kind. I have discoursed of these Emblematical Persons in former Papers, and shall therefore only mention them in this Place. Thus we see how many Ways Poetry addresses it self to the Imagination, as it has not only the whole Circle of Nature for its Province, but makes new Worlds of its own, shews us Persons who are not to be found in Being, and represents even the Faculties of the Soul, with her several Virtues and Vices, in a sensible Shape and Character.

I shall, in my two following Papers, consider in general, how other kinds of Writing are qualified to please the Imagination, with which I intend to conclude this Essay. O

—Quocunque volunt mentem Auditoris agunto
Hor

AS the Writers in Poetry and Fiction borrow their several Materials from outward Objects, and join them together at their own Pleasure, there are others who are obliged to follow Nature more closely, and to take entire Scenes out of her. Such are Historians, natural Philosophers, Travellers, Geographers, and in a Word, all who describe visible Objects of a real Existence.

It is the most agreeable Talent of an Historian, to be able to draw up his Armies and fight his Battels in proper Expressions, to set before our Eyes the Divisions, Cabals, and Jealousies of great Men, and to lead us Step by Step into the several Actions and Events of his History. We love to see the Subject unfolding it self by just Degrees, and breaking upon us insensibly, that so we may be kept in a pleasing Suspense and have time given us to raise our Expectations, and to side with one of the Parties concerned in the Relation. I confess this shews more the Art than the Veracity of the Historian, but I am only to speak of him as he is qualified to please the Imagination. And in this respect Livy has, perhaps, excelled all who went before him, or have written since his Time. He describes every thing in so lively a Manner, that his whole History is an admirable Picture and touches on such proper Circumstances in every Story, that his Reader becomes a kind of Spectator, and feels in himself all the Variety of Passions which are correspondent to the several Parts of the Relation.

But among this Set of Writers there are none who more gratify and enlarge the Imagination, than the Authors of the new Philosophy, whether we consider their Theories of the Earth or Heavens, the Discoveries they have made by Glasses, or any other of their Contemplations on Nature. We are not a little pleased to find every green Leaf swarm with Millions of Animals, that at their largest Growth are not visible to the naked Eye. There is something very engaging to the Fancy, as well as to our Reason, in the Treasures of Metals, Minerals, Plants, and Meteors. But when we survey the whole Earth at once, and the several Planets that lie within its Neighbourhood, we are filled with a pleasing Astonishment, to see so many Worlds hanging one above another, and sliding round their Axes in such an amazing Pomp and Solemnity. If after this, we contemplate those wild Fields of Ether, that reach in Height as far as from Saturn to the first Stars, and run abroad almost to infinity, our Imagination finds its Capacity filled with so immense a Prospect, and puts it self upon the Stretch to comprehend it. But if we yet rise higher, and consider the first Stars as so many vast Oceans of Flame, that are each of them attended with a different Set of Planets, and still discover new Firmaments and new Lights that are sunk farther in those unfathomable Depths of Ether, so as not to be seen by the strongest of our Telescopes, we are lost in such a Labyrinth of Suns and Worlds, and confounded with the Immensity and Magnificence of Nature.

Nothing is more pleasant to the Fancy, than to enlarge it self by Degrees, in its Contemplation of the various Proportions (which¹) its several Objects bear to each other, when it compares the Body of Man to the Bulk of the whole Earth, the Earth to the Circle it describes round the Sun, that Circle to the Sphere of the first Stars, the sphere of the first Stars to the Circuit of the whole Creation, the whole Creation it self to the infinite Space that is every where diffused about it or when the Imagination works downward, and considers the Bulk of a human Body in respect of an Animal a hundred times less than a Mite, the particular Limbs of such an Animal, the different Springs (which²) actuate the Limbs, the Spirits which set these Springs a going, and the proportionable Minuteness of these several Parts, before they have arrived at their full Growth and Perfection. But if, after all this, we take the least Particle of these Animal Spirits, and consider its Capacity of being Wrought into a World, that shall contain within those narrow Dimensions a Heaven and Earth, Stars and

Planets, and every different Species of living Creatures, in the same Analogy and Proportion they bear to each other in our own Universe such a Speculation, by reason of its Nicety, appears ridiculous to those who have not turned their Thoughts that way, though at the same time it is founded on no less than the Evidence of a Demonstration. Nay, we might yet carry it farther, and discover in the smallest Particle of this little World a new and inexhausted Fund of Matter, capable of being spun out into another Universe.

I have dwelt the longer on this Subject, because I think it may shew us the proper Limits, as well as the Defectiveness of our Imagination, how it is confined to a very small Quantity of Space, and immediately stopt in its Operations, when it endeavours to take in any thing that is very great, or very little. Let a Man try to conceive the different Bulk of an Animal which is twenty, from another which is a hundred times less than a Mite, or to compare, in his Thoughts, a length of a thousand Diameters of the Earth, with that of a Million, and he will quickly find that he has no different Measures in his Mind, adjusted to such extraordinary Degrees of Grandeur or Minuteness. The Understanding, indeed, opens an infinite Space on every side of us, but the Imagination, after a few faint Efforts, is immediately at a stand, and finds herself swallowed up in the Immensity of the Void that surrounds it. Our Reason can pursue a Particle of Matter through an infinite Variety of Divisions, but the Fancy soon loses sight of it, and feels in it self a kind of Chasm, that wants to be filled with Matter of a more sensible Bulk. We can neither widen, nor contract the Faculty to the Dimensions of either Extreme. The Object is too big for our Capacity, when we would comprehend the Circumference of a World, and dwindle into nothing, when we endeavour after the Idea of an Atom.

It is possible this defect of Imagination may not be in the Soul it self, but as it acts in Conjunction with the Body. Perhaps there may not be room in the Brain for such a variety of Impressions, or the Animal Spirits may be incapable of figuring them in such a manner, as is necessary to excite so very large or very minute Ideas. However it be, we may well suppose that Beings of a higher Nature very much excel us in this respect, as it is probable the Soul of Man will be infinitely more perfect hereafter in this Faculty, as well as in all the rest: inasmuch that, perhaps, the Imagination will be able to keep Pace with the Understanding, and to form in it self distinct Ideas of all the different Modes and Quantities of Space. O

as are conversant in material Objects, but are often to be met with among the Polite Masters of Morality, Criticism, and other Speculations abstracted from Matter, who, tho' they do not directly treat of the visible Parts of Nature, often draw from them their Similitudes, Metaphors, and Allegories. By these Allusions a Truth in the Understanding is as it were reflected by the Imagination, we are able to see something like Colour and Shape in a Notion, and to discover a Scheme of Thoughts traced out upon Matter. And here the Mind receives a great deal of Satisfaction, and has two of its Faculties gratified at the same time, while the Fancy is busy in copying after the Understanding, and transcribing Ideas out of the Intellectual World into the Material.

The Great Art of a Writer shews it self in the Choice of pleasing Allusions, which are generally to be taken from the great or beautiful Works of Art or Nature, for though whatever is New or Uncommon is apt to delight the Imagination, the chief Design of an Allusion being to illustrate and explain the Passages of an Author, it should be always borrowed from what is more known and common, than the Passages which are to be explained.

Allegories, when well chosen, are like so many Tracks of Light in a Discourse, that make every thing about them clear and beautiful. A noble Metaphor, when it is placed to an Advantage, casts a kind of Glory round it, and darts a Lustre through a whole Sentence. These different Kinds of Allusion are but so many different Manners of Similitude, and, that they may please the Imagination, the Likeness ought to be very exact, or very agreeable, as we love to see a Picture where the Resemblance is just, or the Posture and Air graceful. But we often find eminent Writers very faulty in this respect: great Scholars are apt to fetch their Comparisons and Allusions from the Sciences in which they are most conversant, so that a Man may see the Compass of their Learning in a Treatise on the most indifferent Subject. I have read a Discourse upon Love, which none but a profound Chymist could understand, and have heard many a Sermon that should only have been preached before a Congregation of Cartesians. On the contrary, your Men of Business usually have recourse to such Instances as are too mean and familiar. They are for drawing the Reader into a Game of Chess or Tennis, or for leading him from Shop to Shop, in the Cant of particular Trades and Employments. It is certain, there may be found an infinite Variety of very agreeable Allusions in both these kinds, but for the generality, the most entertaining ones lie in the Worlds of Nature, which are obvious to all Capacities, and more delightful than what is to be found in Arts and Sciences.

It is this Talent of affecting the Imagination, that gives an Embellishment to good Sense, and makes one Man's Compositions more agreeable than another's. It sets off all Writings in general, but is the very Life and highest Perfection of Poetry. Where it shines in an Eminent Degree, it has preserved several Poems for many Ages, that have nothing else to recommend them, and where all the other Beauties are present, the Work appears dry and insipid, if this single one be wanting. It has something in it like Creation, It bestows a kind of Existence, and draws up to the Reader's View several Objects which are not to be found in Being. It makes Additions to Nature, and gives a greater Variety to God's Works. In a Word, it is able to beautify and adorn the most illustrious Scenes in the Universe, or to fill the Mind with more glorious Shows and Apparitions, than can be found in any Part of it.

We have now discovered the several Originals of those Pleasures that gratify the Fancy, and here, perhaps, it would not be very difficult to cast under their proper Heads those contrary Objects, which are apt to fill it with Distaste and Terror, for the Imagination is as liable to Pain as Pleasure. When the Brain is hurt by any Accident, or the Mind disordered by Dreams or Sickness, the Fancy is over-run with wild dismal Ideas, and terrified with a thousand hideous Monsters of its own forming,

Emendatur velut demens videt Agmina Pentæus, Et solem gemunt, et duplices se ostendere Phœbus

Aut Agamemnonis scents agitatus Oracles, Armata facibus matrem et serpentibus atris Cum videt, ultricesque sedent in limine Diræ Vir

There is not a Sight in Nature so mortifying as that of a Distracted Person, when his Imagination is troubled, and his whole Soul disordered and confused. Babylon in Ruins is not so melancholy a Spectacle. But to quit so disagreeable a Subject, I shall only consider, by way of Conclusion, what an infinite Advantage this Faculty gives in Almighty Being over the Soul of Man, and how great a measure of Happiness or Misery we are capable of receiving from the Imagination only.

We have already seen the Influence that one Man has over the Fancy of another, and with what Ease he conveys into it a Variety of Imagery: how great a Power than may we suppose lodged in him, who knows all the ways of affecting the Imagination who can infuse what Ideas he pleases, and fill those Ideas with Terror and Delight to what Degree he thinks fit? He can excite Images in the Mind, without the help of Words, and make Scenes rise up before us and seem present to the Eye without the Assistance of Bodies or Exterior Objects. He can transport the Imagination with such beautiful and glorious Visions, as cannot possibly enter into our present Conceptions, or haunt it with such ghastly Spectres and Apparitions, as would make us hope for Annihilation, and think Existence no better than a Curse. In short, he can so exquisitely ravish or torture the Soul through this single Faculty, as might suffice to make up the whole Heaven or Hell of any finite Being.

This Essay on the Pleasures of the Imagination having been published in separate Papers, I shall conclude it with a Table of the principal Contents in each Paper.

The CONTENTS

PAPER I

The Perfection of our Sight above our other Senses. The Pleasures of the Imagination arise originally from Sight. The Pleasures of the Imagination divided under two Heads. The Pleasures of the Imagination in some Respects equal to those of the Understanding. The Extent of the Pleasures of the Imagination. The Advantages a Man receives from a Relish of these Pleasures. In what Respect they are preferable to those of the Understanding.

PAPER II

Three Sources of all the Pleasures of the Imagination, in our Survey of outward Objects. How what is Great pleases the Imagination. How what is New pleases the Imagination. How what is Beautiful in our own Species, pleases the Imagination. How what is Beautiful in general pleases the Imagination. What other Accidental Causes may contribute to the heightening of these Pleasures.

PAPER III

Why the Necessary Cause of our being pleased with what is Great, New, or Beautiful, unknown. Why the Final Cause more known and more useful. The Final Cause of our being pleased with what is Great. The Final Cause of our being pleased with what is New. The Final Cause of our being pleased with what is Beautiful in our own Species. The Final Cause of our being pleased with what is Beautiful in general.

PAPER IV

The Works of Nature more pleasant to the Imagination than those of Art. The Works of Nature still more pleasant, the more they resemble those of Art. The Works of Art more pleasant, the more they resemble those of Nature. Our English Plantations and Gardens considered in the foregoing Light.

PAPER V

Of Architecture as it affects the Imagination. Greatness in Architecture relates either to the Bulk or to the Manner. Greatness of Bulk in the Ancient Oriental Buildings. The ancient Accounts of these Buildings confirmed, 1. From the Advantages for raising such Works, in the first Ages of the World and in the Eastern Climates. 2. From several of them which are still extant. Instances how Greatness of Manner affects the Imagination. A French Author's Observation on this Subject. Why Concave and Convex Figures give a Greatness of Manner to Works of Architecture. Every thing that pleases the Imagination in Architecture is either Great, Beautiful, or New.

PAPER VI

The Secondary Pleasures of the Imagination. The several Sources of these Pleasures (Statuary, Painting, Description and Musick) compared together. The Final Cause of our receiving Pleasure from these several Sources. Of Descriptions in particular The Power of Words over the Imagination Why one Reader more pleased with Descriptions than another

PAPER VII

How a whole Set of Ideas Hang together, &c A Natural Cause assigned for it How to perfect the Imagination of a Writer Who among the Ancient Poets had this Faculty in its greatest Perfection Homer excelled in Imagining what is Great, Virgil in Imagining what is Beautiful, Ovid in imagining what is New Our own Country-man Milton very perfect in all three respects

PAPER VIII

Why any thing that is unpleasant to behold, pleases the Imagination when well described Why the Imagination receives a more Exquisite Pleasure from the Description of what is Great, New, or Beautiful The Pleasure still heightened, if what is described raises Passion in the Mind Disagreeable Passions pleasing when raised by apt Descriptions Why Terror and Grief are pleasing to the Mind when excited by Descriptions A particular Advantage the Writers in Poetry and Fiction have to please the Imagination What Liberties are allowed them

PAPER IX

Of that kind of Poetry which Mr Dryden calls the Fairy Way of Writing How a Poet should be Qualified for it The Pleasures of the Imagination that arise from it In this respect why the Moderns excel the Ancients Why the English excel the Moderns Who the Best among the English. Of Emblematical Persons

I DO not know any thing which gives greater Disturbance to Conversation, than the false Notion some People have of Raillery It ought certainly to be the first Point to be aimed at in Society, to gain the good Will of those with whom you converse The Way to that, is to shew you are well inclined towards them What then can be more absurd, than to set up for being extremely sharp and biting, as the Term is, in your Expressions to your Familiars? A Man who has no good Quality but Courage, is in a very ill way towards making an agreeable Figure in the World, because that which he has superior to other People cannot be exerted, without raising himself an Enemy Your Gentleman of a Satyrical Vein is in the like Condition To say a Thing which perplexes the Heart of him you speak to, or brings Blushes into his Face, is a degree of Murder and it is, I think, an unpardonable Offence to shew a Man you do not care, whether he is pleased or displeased But won't you then take a Jest? Yes but pray let it be a Jest It is no Jest to put me, who am so unhappy as to have an utter Aversion to speaking to more than one Man at a time, under a Necessity to explain my self in much Company, and reducing me to Shame and Derision, except I perform what my Infirmary of Silence disables me to do

Callisthenes has great Wit accompanied with that Quality (without which a Man can have no Wit at all) a Sound Judgment This Gentleman ruins the best of any Man I know, for he forms his Ridicule upon a Circumstance which you are in your Heart not unwilling to grant him, to wit, that you are Guilty of an Excess in something which is in it self laudable He very well understands what you would be, and needs not fear your Anger for declaring you are a little too much that Thing The Generous will bear being reproached as Lavish, and the Valiant, Rash, without being provoked to Resentment against their Monitor What has been said to be a Mark of a good Writer, will fall in with the Character of a good Companion The good Writer makes his Reader better pleased with himself, and the agreeable Man makes his Friends enjoy themselves, rather than him, while he is in their Company Callisthenes does this with imitable Pleasantry He whispered a Friend the other Day, so as to be overheard by a young Officer, who gave Symptoms of Cocking up upon the Company, That Gentleman has very much of the Air of a General Officer The Youth immediately put on a Composed Behaviour, and behaved himself suitably to the Conceptions he believed the Company had of him It is to be allowed that Callisthenes will make a Man run into impertinent Relations, to his own Advantage, and express the Satisfaction he has in his own dear self till he is very ridiculous, but in this case the Man is made a Fool by his own Consent, and not exposed as such whether he will or no I take it therefore that to make Raillery agreeable, a Man must either not know he is rallied, or think never the worse of himself if he sees he is

Acetis is of a quite contrary Genius, and is more generally admired than Callisthenes, but not with Justice Acetis has no regard to the Modesty or Weakness of the Person he rallies, but if his Quality or Humility gives him any Superiority to the Man he would fall upon, he has no Mercy in making the Onset He can be pleased to see his best Friend out of Countenance, while the Laugh is loud in his own Applause His Railery always puts the Company into little Divisions and separate Interests, while that of Callisthenes cements it, and makes every Man not only better pleased with himself, but also with all the rest in the Conversation

To rally well, it is absolutely necessary that Kindness must run thro' all you say, and you must ever preserve the Character of a Friend to support your Pretensions to be free with a Man Acetius ought to be banished human Society, because he raises his Mirth upon giving Pain to the Person upon whom he is pleasant Nothing but the Malevolence, which is too general towards those who excell, could make his Company tolerated, but they with whom he converses, are sure to see some Man sacrificed where ever he is admitted, and all the Credit he has for Wit is owing to the Gratification it gives to other Men's Ill-nature

Mimulus has a Wit that conciliates a Man's Love at the same time that it is exerted against his Faults. He has an Art of keeping the Person he rallies in Countenance, by insinuating that he himself is guilty of the same Imperfection Thus he does with so much Address, that he seems rather to bewail himself, than fall upon his Friend

It is really monstrous to see how unaccountably it prevails among Men, to take the Liberty of displeasing each other One would think sometimes that the Contention is, who shall be most disagreeable, Allusions to past Follies, Hints which revive what a Man has a Mind to forget for ever, and deserves that all the rest of the World should, are commonly brought forth even in Company of Men of Distinction They do not thrust with the Skill of Fencers, but cut up with the Barbarity of Butchers It is, methinks, below the Character of Men of Humanity and Good-manners, to be capable of Mirth while there is any one of the Company in Pain and Disorder They who have the true Taste of Conversation enjoy themselves in a Communication of each other's Excellencies, and not in a Triumph over their Imperfections Fortius would have been reckoned a Wit, if there had never been a Fool in the World He wants not Fools to be a Beauty, but has that natural Pleasure in observing Perfection in others, that his own Faults are overlooked out of Gratitude by all his Acquaintance

After these several Characters of Men who succeed or fail in Railery, it may not be amiss to reflect a little further what one takes to be the most agreeable Kind of it and that to me appears when the Satyr is directed against Vice, with an Air of Contempt of the Fault, but no Ill-will to the Criminal Mr Congreves Doris is a Master piece in this Kind It is the Character of a Woman utterly abandoned but her Impudence by the finest Piece of Railery is made only Gen-erosity

*Peculiar this sort is her Way, Whether by Nature taught,
I shall not undertake to say,
Or by experience beght.*

*For who e'er Night obtain'd her Grace,
She can next Day disown,
And stare upon the strange Man's Face,
As one she ne'er had known,*

*So well she can the Truth disguise, Such artful Wonder frame,
The Lover or distrusts his Eyes,
Or thinks 'twas all a Dream*

*Some censure this as lewd or low,
Who are to Bounty blind,
For to forget what we bestow, Bespeaks a noble Mind*

I LOOK upon my self as a Kind of Guard-dun to the Fair, and am always watchful to observe any thing which concerns their Interest The present Paper shall be employed in the Service of a very fine young Woman and the Admonitions I give her, may not be useless to the rest of the Sex Gloriana shall be the Name of the Heroine in To-day's Entertainment and when I have told you that she is rich, witty, young and beautiful, you will believe she does not want Admirers She has had since she came to Town about twenty five of those Lovers, who make their Addresses by way of Jouture and Settlement These come and go, with great Indifference on both Sides, and as beauteous as she is, a Line in a Deed has had Exception enough against it to outweigh the Lustre of her Eyes, the Readiness of her Understanding, and the Merit of her general Character But among the Crowd of such cool Adorers, she has two who are very assiduous in their Attendance There is something so extraordinary and useful in their Manner of Application, that I think it but common Justice to alarm her in it. I have done it in the following Letter

MADAM,

I have for some time taken Notice of two Gentlemen who attend you in all publick Places, both of whom have also easie Access to you at your own House But the Matter is adjusted between them, and Damon, who so passionately addresses you, has no Design upon you but Strephon, who seems to be indifferent to you, is the Man, who is, as they have settled it, to have you The Plot was laid over a Bottle of Wine, and Strephon, when he first thought of you, proposed to Damon to be his Rival The manner of his breaking of it to him I was so placed at a Tavern, that I could not avoid hearing Damon, said he, with a deep Sigh, I have long languished for that Miracle of Beauty Gloriana, and if you will be very steadfastly my Rival, I shall certainly obtain her Do not, continued he, be offended at this Overture for I go upon the Knowledge of the Temper of the Woman, rather than any Vanity that I should profit by in Opposition of your Pretensions to those of your humble Servant. Gloriana has

'very good Sense, & quick Relish of the Satisfaction of Life and will not give her self, as the Crowd of Women do, to the Arms of a Man to whom she is indifferent. As she is a sensible Woman Expressions of Rapture and Adoration will not move her neither but he that has her must be the Object of her Desire, not her Pity. The Way to this End I take to be, that a Man's general Conduct should be agreeable without dressing in particular to the Woman he loves. Now, Sir, if you will be so kind as to sigh and die for Gloriana, I will carry it with great Respect towards her, but seem void of any thoughts as a Lover. By this Means I shall be in the most amiable Light of which I am capable. I shall be received with Freedom, you with Reserve. Damon, who has himself no Designs of Marriage at all, easily fell into the Scheme and you may observe, that where-ever you're Damon appears also. You see he carries on an unaffected Exactness in his Dress and Manner, and strives always to be the very Contrary of Strephon. They have already succeeded so far, that your Eyes are ever in Search of Strephon and turn themselves of Course from Damon. They meet and compare Notes upon your Carriage and the Letter which was brought to you the other Day, was a Contrivance to remark your Resentment. When you saw the Billet subscribed Damon, and turned away with a scornful Air, and cried Impertinence! you gave Hopes to him that chums you, without mortifying him that languishes for you.

'What I am concerned for, Madam, is, that in the disposal of your Heart, you should know what you are doing, and examine it before it is lost. Strephon contradicts you in Discourse with the Civility of one who has a Value for you, but gives up nothing like one that loves you. This seeming Unconcern gives this Behaviour the advantage of Sincerity, and insensibly obtains your good Opinion, by appearing disinterested in the purchase of it. If you watch these Correspondents hereafter, you will find that Strephon makes his Visit of Civility immediately after Damon has tired you with one of Love. Though you are very discreet, you will find it no easy matter to escape the Toils so well laid, as when one is to be disagreeable in Passion, the other to be pleasing without it. All the Turns of your Temper are carefully watched, and their quick and faithful Intelligence gives your Lovers irresistible Advantage. You will please, Madam, to be upon your guard, and take all the necessary Precautions against one who is amiable to you before you know he is enamoured.

I am,

Madam,

Your most Obedient Servant

Strephon makes great Progress in this Lady's good Grace, for most Women being actuated by some little Spirit of Pride and Contridiction, he has the good effects of both those Motives by this covert Way of Courtship. He received a Message Yesterday from Damon, in the following Words, superscribed With Speed

'All goes well she is very angry at me, and 'I dare say hates me in earnest. It is a good time to Visit.

Yours

The Comparison of Strephon's Gayety to Damon's Languishment, strikes her Imagination with a Prospect of very agreeable Hours with such a Man as the former, and Abhorrence of the insipid Prospect with one like the latter. To know when a Lady is displeased with another, is to know the best time of advancing yourself. This method of two Persons playing into each others Hand is so dangerous, that I cannot tell how a Woman could be able to withstand such a Siege. The Condition of Gloriana, I am afraid, is irretrievable, for Strephon has had so many Opportunities of pleasing without suspicion, that all which is left for her to do is to bring him, now she is advised, to an Explanation of his Passion, and beginning again, if she can conquer the kind Sentiments she has already conceived for him. When one shews himself a Creature to be avoided, the other proper to be fled to for Succour, they have the whole Woman between them, and can occasionally rebound her Love and Hatred from one to the other, in such a manner as to keep her at a distance from all the rest of the World, and cast Lots for the Conquest.

NB I am a wary oiler Secrets which concern the Empire of Love, but I consider that while I alarm my Women, I instruct my Men. T

Est Ulubris, animus si te non deficit — Hor

Mr SPECTATOR, London, June 24.
'A MAN who has it in his Power to chuse his own Company, would certainly be much to blame should he not, to the best of his Judgment, take such as are of a Temper most suitable to his own and where that Choice is wanting, or where a Man is mistaken in his Choice, and yet under a Necessity of continuing in the same Company, it will certainly be to his Interest to carry himself as easily as possible.

'In this I am sensible I do but repeat what has been said a thousand times at which however I think no Body has any Title to take Exception, but they who never failed to put this in Practice. — Not to use any longer Preface, this being the Season of the Year in which great Numbers of all sorts of People retire from this Place of Business and Pleasure to Country Solitude, I think it not improper to advise them to take with them as great a Stock of Good-humour as they can, for this a Country-Life is described as the most pleasant of all others, and though it may in Truth be so, yet it is so only to those who know how to enjoy Leisure and Retirement.

'As for those who can't live without the constant helps of Business or Company let them consider, that in the Country there is no Exchange there are no Play houses no variety of Coffee-houses, nor many of those other Amuse-

'ments which serve here as so many Reliefs from the repeated Occurrences in their own Families, but that there the greatest Part of their Time must be spent within themselves, and consequently it behoves them to consider how agreeable it will be to them before they leave this dear Town

I remember, Mr SPECTATOR, we were very well entertained last Year, with the Advices you gave us from Sir ROGER'S Country Seat which I the rather mention, because 'tis almost impossible not to live pleasantly, where the Master of a Family is such a one as you there describe your Friend, who cannot therefore (I mean as to his domestick Character) be too often recommended to the Imitation of others. How amiable is that Affability and Benevolence with which he treats his Neighbours and every one, even the meanness of his own Family! And yet how seldom imitated? Instead of which we commonly meet with ill-natured Expostulations, Noise, and Chidings—And this I hinted, because the Humour and Disposition of the Herd, is what chiefly influences all the other Parts of a Family

An Agreement and kind Correspondence between Friends and Acquaintance, is the greatest Pleasure of Life. This is an undoubted Truth, and yet any Man who judges from the Practice of the World, will be almost persuaded to believe the contrary: for how can we suppose People should be so industrious to make themselves uneasy? What can engage them to entertain and foment Jealousies of one another upon every the least Occasion? Yet so it is, there are People who (as it should seem) delight in being troublesome and vexatious, who (as Islyspeaks) Mira sunt alacritate ad litigandum, Huc a certain Cheerfulness in wrangling. And thus it happens, that there are very few Families in which there are not Feuds and Animosities, tho' 'tis every one's Interest, there more particularly, to avoid 'em, because there (as I would willingly hope) no one gives another Uneasiness, without feeling some share of it—But I am gone beyond what I designed, and had almost forgot what I chiefly proposed which was, barely to tell you, how hardly we who pass most of our Time in Town dispense with a long Vacation in the Country, how uneasy we grow to our selves, and to one another when our Conversation is confined, inasmuch that by Michaelmas 'tis odds but we come to downright squabbling, and make as free with one another to our Faces, as we do with the rest of the World behind their Backs. After I have told you this I am to desire that you would now and then give us a Lesson of Good humour, a Family Piece, which, since we are all very fond of you, I hope may have some Influence upon us—

After these plain Observations give me leave to give you a Hint of what a Set of Company of my Acquaintance, who are now gone into the Country, and have the Use of an absent Nobleman's Seat, have settled among themselves, to avoid the Inconveniences above mentioned. They are a Collection of ten or twelve, of the same good Inclination towards each other, but of very different Talents and Inclinations. I from hence they hope, that the Variety of their Tempers will only create Variety of Pleasures. But as there always will arise, among the same People, either for want of Diversity of Objects, or the like Causes, a certain Satiety, which may grow into ill Humour or Discontent, there is a large Wing of the House which they design to employ in the Nature of an Infirmary. Whoever says a peevish thing, or acts any thing which betrays a Sowness or Indisposition to Company, is immediately to be conveyed to his Chambers in the Infirmary from whence he is not to be relieved, till by his Manner of Submission, and the Sentiments expressed in his Petition for that Purpose, he appears to the Majority of the Company to be again fit for Society. You are to understand, that all ill-natured Words or unwise Gestures are sufficient Cause for Banishment speaking impatiently to Servants, making a Man repeat what he says, or any thing that betrays Inattention or Dishumour, are also criminal without Reprieve. But it is provided, that whoever observes the ill-natured Fit coming upon himself, and voluntarily retires, shall be received at his return from the Infirmary with the highest Marks of Esteem. By these and other wholesome Methods it is expected that if they cannot cure one another, yet at least they have taken Care that the ill Humour of one shall not be troublesome to the rest of the Company. There are many other Rules which the Society have established for the Preservation of their Ease and Tranquility, the Effects of which, with the Incidents that arise among them, shall be communicated to you from Time to Time for the publick Good, by,

SIR,

Your most humble Servant,

Frigora mitescunt Lephyris, Ver proterit Aestas Interitura, simulPomifer Autumnus fruges effuderit, et mox bruma recurrit uersus—HOR

Mr SPECTATOR,

THESE is hardly any thing gives me a more sensible Delight, than the Enjoyment of a cool still Evening after the Unpleasantness of a sultry Day. Such a one I passed not long ago, which made me rejoice when the Hour was come for the Sun to set, that I might enjoy the Refreshment of the Evening in my Garden which then afforded me the pleasantest Hours I pass in the whole Year and twenty. I immediately rose from my Couch, and went down into it. You descend at first by twelve Stone Steps into a large Square divided into four Grass plots, in each of which is a Statue of white Marble. This is separated from a large Parterre by a low Wall, and from thence, thro' a Pair of Iron Gates you are led into a long broad Walk of the finest turf, set on each Side the tall Yew, and on either Hand bordered by a Canal, which on the Right

'divides the Walk from a Wilderness parted into Variety of Allies and Arbours, and on the Left from a kind of Amphitheatre, which is the Receptacle of a great Number of Oranges and Myrtles. The Moon shone bright, and seemed then most agreeably to supply the Place of the Sun, obliging me with as much Light as was necessary to discover a thousand pleasing Objects, and at the same time divested of all Power of Heat. The Reflection of it in the Water, the Fanning of the Wind rustling on the Leaves, the Singing of the Thrush and Nightingale, and the Coolness of the Walks, all conspired to make me lay aside all displeasing Thoughts, and brought me into such a Tranquility of Mind, as is I believe the next Happiness to that of hereafter. In this sweet Retirement I naturally fell into the Repetition of some Lines out of a Poem of Milton's, which he entitles Il Penseroso, the Ideas of which were exquisitely suited to my present Windings of Thought.

*Sweet Bird! that shun'st the Noise of Folly, Most musical! most melancholy!
Thee Chantress, oft the Woods among,
I woo to hear thy Evening Song
And missing thee, I walk unseen
On the dry smooth-shaven Green,
To behold the wandring Moon, Riding near her highest Noon,
Like one that hath been led astray, Thro' the Heaven's wide pathless Way
And oft, as if her Head she bow'd, Stooping thro' a fleecy Cloud*

*Then let some strange mysterious Dream Wave with his Wings in airy Stream, Of lively Portraiture displaid, Softly on my Lymphs laid,
And as I wake, sweet Musick breathe Above, about, or underneath, Sent by Spirits to Mortals Good, Or th' unseen Genius of the Wood*

'I reflected then upon the sweet Vicissitudes of Night and Day, on the charming Disposition of the Seasons, and their Return again in a perpetual Circle: and oh! said I, that I could from these my declining Years return again to my first Spring of Youth and Vigour: but that, alas! is impossible. All that remains within my Power, is to soften the Inconveniences I feel, with an easy contented Mind, and the Enjoyment of such Delights as this Solitude affords me. In this Thought I sate me down on a Bank of Flowers and dropt into a Slumber, which whether it were the Effect of Fumes and Vapours, or my present Thoughts, I know not, but methought the Genius of the Garden stood before me, and introduced into the Walk where I lay this Drama and different Scenes of the Revolution of the Year, which whilst I then saw, even in my Dream, I resolved to write down, and send to the SPECTATOR.

'The first Person whom I saw advancing towards me was a Youth of a most beautiful Air and Shape: tho' he seemed not yet arrived at that exact Proportion and Symmetry of Parts which a little more time would have given him, but however, there was such a Bloom in his Countenance, such Satisfaction and Joy, that I thought it the most desirable Form that I had ever seen. He was clothed in a flowing Mantle of green Silk, interwoven with Flowers. He had a Chippet of Roses on his Head, and a Narcissus in his Hand, Primroses and Violets sprang up under his Feet, and all Nature was cheerd at his Approach. Flora was on one Hand and Vernus on the other in a Robe of changeable Silk. After this I was surpris'd to see the Moon-beams reflected with a sudden Glare from Armour, and to see a Man completely armed advancing with his Sword drawn. I was soon informed by the Genius it was Mars, who had long usurp'd a Place among the Attendants of the Spring. He made Way for a softer Appearance, it was Venus, without any Ornament but her own Beauties, not so much as her own Cestus, with which she had compass'd a Globe, which she held in her right Hand, and in her left she had a Sceptre of Gold. After her followed the Graces with their Arms intwined within one another, their Girdles were loosed, and they moved to the Sound of soft Musick, striking the Ground alternately with their Feet. Then came up the three Months which belong to this Season. As March advanced towards me, there was methought in his Look a lowering Roughness, which ill befitted a Month which was ranked in so soft a Season: but as he came forwards his Features became insensibly more mild and gentle. He smooth'd his Brow, and looked with so sweet a Countenance that I could not but lament his Departure, though he made way for April. He appeared in the greatest Quietude imaginable, and had a thousand Pleasures to attend him. His Look was frequently clouded, but immediately return'd to its first Composure, and remained fixed in a Smile. Then came May attended by Cupid with his Bow strung, and in a Posture to let fly an Arrow. As he pass'd by methought I heard a confused Noise of soft Complaints, gentle Ecstasies, and tender Sighs of Lovers, Vows of Constancy, and as many Complaining of Perfidiousness: all which the Winds wafted away as soon as they had reach'd my Hearing. After these I saw a Man advance in the full Prime and Vigour of his Age, his Complexion was sanguine and ruddy, his Hair black, and fell down in beautiful Ringlets not beneath his Shoulders, a Mantle of Hair colour'd Silk hung loosely upon him. He advanced with a hasty Step after the Spring, and sought out the Shade and cool Fountains which plaid in the Garden. He was particularly well pleased when a Troop of Zephyrs fanned him with their Wings. He had two Companions who walked on each Side that made him appear the most agreeable, the one was Aurora with Fingers of Roses, and her Feet dewy, attired in grey. The other was Vesper in a Robe of Azure beset with Drops of Gold, whose Breath he caught whilst it pass'd over a Bundle of Honey Suckles and Tuberoses which he held in his Hand. Pan and Ceres followed them with four Reapers, who danced a Morrice to the Sound of Oaten Pipes and Cymbals. Then came the Attendant Months

'June retained still some small Likeness of the 'Spring, but the other two seemed to step with a less vigorous Tread, especially 'August, who seem'd almost to faint whilst for half the Steps he took the Dog-Star levelled his Rays full at his Head. They passed on and made Way for a Person that seemed to bend a little under the Weight of Years, his Beard and Hair, which were full grown, were composed of an equal Number of black and grey, he wore a Robe which he had girt round him of a yellowish Cast, not unlike the Colour of fallen Leaves, which he walked upon. I thought he hardly made Amends for expelling the foregoing Scene by the large Quantity of Fruits which he bore in his Hands. 'Plenty walked by his Side with an healthy fresh Countenance, pouring out from an Horn all the various Product of the Year. 'Pomona followed with a Glass of Cyder in her Hand, with 'Bacchus in a Chariot drawn by Tygers, accompanied by a whole Troop of Satyrs, Fauns, and Sylvans. 'September, who came next, seem'd in his Looks to promise a new 'Spring, and wore the Livery of those Months. The succeeding Month was all soiled with the Juice of Grapes, as if he had just come from the Wine-Press. 'November, though he was in this Division, yet, by the many Stops he made seem'd rather inclined to the 'Winter, which followed close at his Heels. He advanced in the Shape of an old Man in the Extremity of Age. The Hair he had was so very white it seem'd a real Snow. His Eyes were red and piercing, and his Beard hung with a great Quantity of Icicles. He was wrapt up in Furs, but yet so pinched with Excess of Cold that his Limbs were all contracted and his Body bent to the Ground, so that he could not have supported himself had it not been for 'Comus the God of Revels, and 'Necessity the Mother of Fate, who sustained him on each side. The Shape and Mantle of 'Comus was one of the things that most surprized me as he advanced towards me his Countenance seemed the most desirable I had ever seen. On the fore Part of his Mantle was pictured Joy, Delight and Satisfaction, with a thousand Emblems of Merriment, and Jests with Faces looking two Ways at once. But as he passed from me I was amazed at a Shape so little correspondent to his Face. His Head was bald, and all the rest of his Limbs appeared old and deformed. On the hinder Part of his Mantle was represented Murder with dishevelled Hair and a Dagger all bloody, Anger in a Robe of Scarlet, and Suspicion squinting with both Eyes. But above all the most conspicuous was the Battel of the 'Lapithæ and the '*Centaur*s. I detested so hideous a Shape, and turned my Eyes upon 'Saturn, who was stealing away behind him with a Scythe in one Hand, and an Hour glass in t'other unobserved. Behind 'Necessity was 'Vesta the Goddess of Fire with a Lamp which was perpetually supplied with Oil and whose Flame was eternal. She cheered the rugged Brow of 'Necessity, and warmed her so far as almost to make her assume the Features and Likeness of 'Choice. 'December, 'January, and 'Febrary passed on after the rest all in Furs. There was little Distinction to be made amongst them, and they were only more or less displeasing as they discovered more or less Haste towards the grateful Return of 'Spring. Z

Quid non mortalia Pectora cogis Auri sacra fames Virg

A VERY agreeable Friend of mine, the other Day, carrying me in his Coach into the Country to Dinner, fell into Discourse concerning the Care of Parents due to their Children and the Piety of Children towards their Parents. He was reflecting upon the Succession of particular Virtues and Qualities there might be preserved from one Generation to another, if these Regards were reciprocally held in Veneration. But as he never fails to mix an Air of Mirth and good Humour with his good Sense and Reasoning, he entered into the following Relation.

I will not be confident in what Century, or under what Reign it happened, that this Want of mutual Confidence and right Understanding between Father and Son was fatal to the Family of the 'Valentines in Germany. 'Basilius Valentine was a Person who had arrived at the utmost Perfection in the Hermetick Art, and initiated his Son 'Alexandrinus in the same Mysteries. But as you know they are not to be attained but by the Painful, the Pious, the Chaste, and Pure of Heart, 'Basilius did not open to him, because of his Youth, and the Deviations too natural to it, the greatest Secrets of which he was Master, as well knowing that the Operation would fail in the Hands of a Man so liable to Errors in Life as 'Alexandrinus. But believing, from a certain Indisposition of Mind as well as Body, his Disolution was drawing nigh, he called 'Alexandrinus to him, and as he lay on a Couch, over against which his Son was seated, and prepared by sending out Servants one after another, and Admonition to examine that no one over-heard them, he revealed the most important of his Secrets with the Solemnity and Language of an Adept. My Son, said he, many have been the Watchings, long the Lucubrations, constant the Labours of thy Father, not only to gain a great and plentiful Estate to his Posterity, but also to take Care that he should have no Posterity. Be not amazed, my Child. I do not mean that thou shalt be taken from me, but that I will never leave thee, and consequently cannot be said to have Posterity. Be hold, my dearest 'Alexandrinus the Effect of what was propagated in nine Months. We are not to contradict Nature but to follow and to help her just as long as an Infant is in the Womb of its Parent, so long are these Medicines of Revivication in preparing. Observe this small Phial and this little Gallipot, in this an Unguent, in the other a Liquor. In these, my child, are collected such Powers, as shall revive the Springs of Life when they are yet but just ceased, and give new Strength, new Spirits, and, in a Word, wholly restore all the Organs and Senses of the human Body to as great a Duration, as it had before enjoyed from its Birth to the Day of the Application of these my Medicines. But, my beloved Son, Care must be taken to apply them within ten Hours after the Breath is out of the Body, while yet the Clay is warm with its late Life, and yet capable of Resuscitation. I find my Frame grown crasie with perpetual Toil and Meditation, and I conjure you, as soon as I am dead, to anoint me with this Unguent, and when you see me begin to move, pour into my Lips this inestimable Liquor, else the Force of the Ointment will be ineffectual. By this Means you will give me Life as I have you, and we will from that Hour mutually lay aside the Authority of having bestowed Life on each other, but live as Brethren, and prepare new Medicines against such another Period of Time as will demand another Application of the same Restoratives. In a few Days after these wonderful Ingredients were delivered to Alexandrinus, Basilus departed this Life. But such was the pious Sorrow of the Son at the Loss of so excellent a Father, and the first Transports of Grief had so wholly disabled him from all manner of Business, that he never thought of the Medicines till the Time to which his Father had limited their Efficacy was expired. To tell the Truth, Alexandrinus was a Man of Wit and Pleasure, and considered his Father had lived out his natural Time, his Life was long and uniform, suitable to the Regularity of it, but that he himself, poor Sinner, wanted a new Life, to repent of a very bad one hitherto, and in the Examination of his Heart, resolved to go on as he did with this natural Being of his, but repent very faithfully and spend very piously the Life to which he should be restored by Application of these Rarities, when Time should come, to his own Person.

It has been observed, that Providence frequently punishes the Self-love of Men who would do immoderately for their own Offspring, with Children very much below their Characters and Qualifications, inasmuch that they only transmit their Names to be born by those who give daily Proofs of the Vanity of the Labour and Ambition of their Progenitors.

It happened thus in the Family of Basilus, for Alexandrinus began to enjoy his ample Fortune in all the Extremities of Household Expence, Furniture, and insolent Equipage, and thus he pursued till the Day of his own Departure began, as he grew sensible, to approach. As Basilus was punished with a Son very unlike him, Alexandrinus was visited with one of his own Disposition. It is natural that all Men should be suspicious, and Alexandrinus, besides that Jealousie, had Proofs of the vitious Disposition of his Son Renatus, for that was his Name.

Alexandrinus, as I observed, having very good Reasons for thinking it unsafe to trust the real Secret of his Phial and Gally, put to my Man living, projected to make sure Work, and hope for his Success depending from the Avarice, not the Bounty of his Benefactor.

With this Thought he called Renatus to his Bed-side, and bespoke him in the most pathetick

Gesture and Accent. As much, my Son, as you have been addicted to Vanity and Pleasure, as I also have been before you, you nor I could escape the Fame, or the good Effects of the profound Knowledge of our Progenitor, the Renowned Basilus. His Symbol is very well known in the Philosophick World, and I shall never forget the venerable Air of his Countenance, when he let me into the profound Mysteries of the Smargadine Table of Hermes. It is true, said he, and far removed from all Colour of Deceit, That which is Inferior is like that which is Superior, by which are acquired and perfected all the Miracles of a certain Work. The Father is the Sun, the Mother the Moon, the Wind is the Womb, the Earth is the Nurse of it, and Mother of all Perfection. All this must be received with Modesty and Wisdom. The Chymical People carry in all their Jargon a whimsical sort of Piety, which is ordinary with great Lovers of Money, and is no more but deceiving themselves, that their Regularity and Strictness of Manners for the Ends of this World, has some Affinity to the Innocence of Heart which must recommend them to the next. Renatus wondered to hear his Father talk so like an Adept, and with such a Mixture of Piety, while Alexandrinus observing his Attention fixed, proceeded in his Phial, Child, and this little Earthen Pot will add to thy Estate so much, as to make thee the richest Man in the German Empire. I am going to my Long Home, but shall not return to common Dust. Then he resumed a Countenance of Alacrity, and told him, That if within an Hour after his Death he anointed his whole Body, and poured down his Throat that Liquor which he had from old Basilus, the Corps would be converted into pure Gold. I will not pretend to express to you the unfeigned Tendernesses that passed between these two extraordinary Persons, but if the Father recommended the Care of his Remains with Vehemence and Affection, the Son was not behind hand in professing that he would not cut the least Bit off him, but upon the utmost Extremity, or to provide for his younger Brothers and Sisters.

Well, Alexandrinus died, and the Heir of his Body (as our Term is) could not forbear in the Wantonnesses of his Heart, to measure the Length and Breadth of his beloved Father, and cast up the ensuing Value of him before he proceeded to Operation. When he knew the immense Reward of his Pains, he began the Work. But lo! when he had anointed the Corps all over, and began to apply the Liquor, the Body stirred, and Renatus, in a Fright, broke the Phial.²

Quantum a rerum turpitudine abes, tantum Te a verborum libertate sejungas—Jull.

IT is a certain Sign of an ill Heart to be inclined to Defamation. They who are harmless and innocent, can have no Gratification that way, but it ever arises from a Neglect of what is laudable in a Man's self, and an Impatience of seeing it in another. Else why should Virtue provoke? Why should Beauty displease in such a Degree, that a Man given to Scandal never lets the Mention of either pass by him without offering something to the Diminution of it? A Lady the other Day at a Visit being attacked somewhat rudely by one, whose own Character has been very roughly treated, answered a great deal of Heat and Intemperance very calmly, Good Madam spare me, who am none of your Match, I speak ill of no Body, and it is a new Thing to me to be spoken ill of. Little Minds think Fame consists in the Number of Votes they have on their Side among the Multitude, whereas it is really the inseparable Follower of good and worthy Actions. I am as natural a Follower of Merit, as a Shadow is of a Body. It is true, when Crowds press upon you, this Shadow cannot be seen, but when they separate from around you, it will again appear. The Lazy, the Idle, and the Forward, are the Persons who are most pleased with the little Tales which pass about the Town to the Disadvantage of the rest of the World. Were it not for the Pleasure of speaking ill, there are Numbers of People who are too lazy to go out of their own Houses, and too ill natur'd to open their Lips in Conversation. It was not a little diverting the other Day to observe a Lady reading a Post-Letter, and at these Words, After all her Aurs, he has heard some Story or other, and the Match is broke off, give Orders in the midst of her Reading, Put to the Horses. That young Woman of Merit has missed an advantageous Settlement, was News not to be delayed, lest some Body else should have given her malicious Acquaintance that Satisfaction before her. The Unwillingness to receive good Tidings is a Quality as inseparable from a Scandal-Bearer, as the Readiness to divulge bad. But, alas, how wretchedly low and contemptible is that State of Mind, that cannot be pleased but by what is the Subject of Lamentation. This Temper has ever been in the highest Degree odious to gallant Spirits. The Persian Soldier, who was heard reviling Alexander the Great, was well admonished by his Officer, Sir, you are paid to fight against Alexander, and not to rail at him.

Client from general Scandal, says every handsomely, and with much Reason, There are many who have particular Engagements to the Prosecutor. There are many who are known to have it will to him for whom I appear, there are many who are naturally addicted to Defamation, and envious of any Good to any Man, who may have contributed to spread Reports of this kind. For nothing is so swift as Scandal, nothing is more easily sent abroad, nothing received with more Welcome, nothing diffuses it self so universally. I shall not dispute, that if any Report to our Disadvantage has any Ground for it, you would overlook or extenuate it. But if there be any thing advanced without a Person who can say whence he had it, or which is attested by one who forgot who told him it, or who had it from one of so little Consideration that he did not then think it worth his Notice, all such Testimonies as these, I know, you will think too slight to have any Credit against the Innocence and Honour of your Fellow-Citizen. When an ill Report is traced, it very often wishes among such as the Orator has here recited. And how despicable a Censure must that be, who is in Pun for what passes among so frivolous a People? There is a Town in Warwickshire of good Note, and formerly pretty famous for much Animosity and Dissention, the chief Families of which have now turned all their Whispers, Backbitings, Envy, and private Malices into Mirth and Entertainment, by means of a peevish old Gentlewoman, known by the Title of the Lady Bluemantle. This Heroine had for many Years together out-done the whole Sisterhood of Gossips, in Invention, quick Utterance, and unprovoked Malice. This good Body is of a lasting Constitution, though extremely decayed in her Eyes, and decrepid in her Feet. The two Circumstances of being always at Home from her Lameness, and very attentive from her Blindness, make her Lodgings the Receptacle of all that passes in Town, Good or Bad: but for the latter, she seems to have the better Memory. There is another Thing to be noted of her, which is, That as it is usual with old People, she has a livelier Memory of Things which passed when she was very young, than of late Years. Add to all this, that she does not only not love any Body, but she hates every Body. The Statue in Rome does not serve to vent Malice half so well, as this old Lady does to disappoint it. She does not know the Author of any thing that is told her, but can readily repeat the Matter it self, therefore, though she exposes all the whole Town, she offends no one Body in it. She is so exquisitely restless and peevish, that she quarrels with all about her, and sometimes in a Frenzy will instantly change her Habitation. To indulge this Humour, she is led about the Grounds belonging to the same House she is in, and the Persons to whom she is to remove, being in the Plot, are ready to receive her at her own Chamber again. At stated Times, the Gentlewoman at whose House she supposes she is at the Time, is sent for to quarrel with, according to her common Custom. When they have a Mind to drive the Jest, she is immediately urged to that Degree, that she will board in a Family with which she has never yet been, and away she will go this the Curru Triumphalis Antimoni, mentioned in a former note. His name was familiar through several books in French, especially L'Asoté des Philosophes, avec les 12 Clefs de Philosophie (Paris, 1660), and a Testament de Basile Valentine (London, 1671).

Land have been purchased by a constant Attendance within a Walk of thirty Foot. If it could also be noted in the Equipage of those who are ascended from the Successful Trade of their Ancestors into Figure and Equipage, such Accounts would quicken Industry in the Pursuit of such Acquisitions and discountenance Luxury in the Enjoyment of them.

To diversify these kinds of Informations, the Industry of the Female World is not to be unobserved. She to whose Household Virtues it is owing that Men do Honour to her Husband should be recorded with Veneration, she who had wasted his Labours, with Infamy. When we are come into Domestick Life in this manner, to awaken Caution and Attendance to the main Point, it would not be amiss to give now and then a Touch of Tragedy, and describe (the) most dreadful of all human Conditions, the Case of Bankruptcy. Low Plenty, Credit, Cheerfulness, full Hopes, and easy Possessions, are in an Instant turned into Penury, Faint Aspects, Diffidence, Sorrow and Misery: how the Man, who with an open Hand the Day before could administer to the Extremities of others, is shunned to day by the Friend of his Bosom. It would be useful to shew how just this is on the Neglect, how lamentable on the Industrious. A Paper written by a Merchant, might give this Island a true Sense of the Worth and Importance of his Character. It might be visible from what he could say, that no Soldier entering a Breach adventures more for Honour, than the Trader does for Wealth to his Country. In both Cases the Adventurers have their own Advantage, but I know no Cases wherein every Body else is a Sharer in the Success.

It is objected by Readers of History, that the Battles in those Narrations are scarce ever to be understood. This Misfortune is to be ascribed to the Ignorance of Historians in the Methods of drawing up, changing the Forms of a Battle, and the Enemy retreating, from, as well as approaching to the Charge. But in the Discourses from the Correspondents, whom I now invite, the Danger will be of another kind, and it is necessary to caution them only against using Terms of Art and describing Things that are familiar to them in Words unknown to their Readers. I promise my self a great Harvest of new Circumstances, Persons, and Things from this Proposal, and a World, which many think they are well acquainted with discovered is wholly new. This Sort of Intelligence will give a lively Image of the Chain and mutual Dependence of humane Society, take off impertinent Prejudices, enlarge the Minds of those, whose Views are confined to their own Circumstances, and, in short, if the knowing in several Arts, Professions, and Trades will exert themselves, it cannot but produce a new Field of Diversion, an Instruction more agreeable than has yet appeared.

Populumque falsis dedocet uti Vocibus

Mr SPECTATOR,
SINCE I gave an Account of an agreeable Set of Company which were gone down into the Country, I have received Advice from thence, that the Institution of an Infirmary for those who should be out of Humour, has had very good Effects. My Letters mention particular Circumstances of two or three Persons who had the good Sense to retire of their own Accord, and notified that they were withdrawn, with the Reasons of it, to the Company, in their respective Memorials.

The Memorial of Mrs Mary Drury, Spinster,

Humbly Sheweth,
That conscious of her own want of Merit, accompanied with a Vanity of being admired, she had gone into a stile of her own accord.

She is sensible, that a vain Person is the most insufferable Creature living in a well bred Assembly.

That she desired, before she appeared in public again, she might have Assurance, that tho she might be thought handsome, there might not more Address or Compliment be paid to her, than to the rest of the Company.

That she conceived it a kind of Superiority, that one Person should take upon him to command another.

Lastly, That she went into the Infirmary, to avoid a particular Person who took upon him to profess an Admiration of her.

She therefore prayed, that to applaud out of due place, might be declar'd an Offence, and punished in the same Manner with Detraction, in that the latter did but report Persons defective, and the former made them so.

All which is submitted, &c

There appeared a Delicacy and Sincerity in this Memorial very uncommon, but my Friend informs me, that the Allegations of it were groundless, inasmuch that this Declaration of an Aversion to being praised, was understood to be no other than a secret Trap to purchase it, for which Person it lies still on the Table unanswered.

The humble Memorial of the Lady Lydia Loller,

Sheweth,

That the Lady Lydia is a Woman of Quality, married to a private Gentleman.

That she finds her self neither well nor ill.

That her Husband is a Clown.

That Lady Lydia cannot see Company.

That she desires the Infirmary may be her Apartment during her stay in the Country.

That they would please to make merry with their Equals.

That Mr Loller might stay with them if he thought fit.

'earnest Who can behold in this World, but 'bravely withstood the Temptations of the Devil 'Want amongst his Friends? It were endless to 'mention all the Varieties of Wretchedness, and 'the numberless Poor, that not only singly, but in 'Companies implore your Charity Spectacles
'of this Nature every where occur and it is un'accountable, if it amongst the many lamentable
'Cries that infect this Town, your Comptroller-

'ing — those of the Needy and Afflicted I 'can't but think he would it merely out of good

'ment, than upbraid his Countrymen with Inhu'manity; however, let not Charity be sacrificed
'to Popularity, and if his Ears were deaf to their

'Persons There are, I know, many Impostors
'among them Lameless and Blind are cer'tainly very often acted but can those that have 'their Sight and Limbs, employ their better than 'in knowing whether they are counterfeit or 'not? I know not which of the two misapprehes his 'Senses most he who pretends himself blind to

'ble Object without pitying it But in order to 'remove such Impediments, I wish Mr SPECTA-'TOR, you would give us a Discourse upon Beg'gars, that we may not pass by true Objects of 'Charity, or give to Impostors I looked out of 'my Window the other Morning earlier than or'dinary, and saw a blind Beggar, in his usual

'Pot of Ale I will not mention the Distresses,
'Distortions and Convulsions which many of them
'practise to gain an Alms but sure I am, they 'ought to be taken Care of in this Condition,
'either by the Parole or the Magistrate They
'it seems, relieve their Pains according to their 'Talents There is the Voice of an old Woman 'never begins to beg till nine in the Evening, and 'then she is destitute of Lodging, turned out for 'want of Rent, and has the same ill Fortune every 'Night in the Year You should employ an 'Officer to hear the Distress of each Beggar that 'is constant at a particular Place, who is ever in 'the same Tone, and succeeds because his Audi'ence is continually changing tho' he does not 'alter his Lamentation If we have nothing else
'for our Money, let us have more Invention to be 'cheated with All which is submitted to your 'Spectatorial Vigilance and I am,

SIR,

Your most humble Servant

SIR,

'I was last Sunday highly transported at our 'Parish-Church, the Gentleman in the Pulpit
'pleaded movingly in Behalf of the poor Children,
'and they for themselves much more forcibly by 'singing an Hymn, And I had the Happiness to 'be a Contributor to this little religious Institution 'of Innocents, and am sure I never disposed of 'Money more to my Satisfaction and Advantage

'The several Joy I find in my self, and the Good'will I bear to Mankind, make me heartily wish
'the pious Works may be encouraged, that the 'present Promoters may reap the Delight and 'Posterity the Benefit of them But whilst we 'are building this beautiful Edifice, let not the old
'Knaves remain in View to sully the Prospect
'Whilst we are cultivating and improving it is

'helpless Creatures be shamefully neglected
'The Crowds of Poor, or pretended Poor, in every 'Place are a great Reproach to us, and eclipse
'the Glory of all other Charity It is the utmost
'Reproach to Society, that there should be a poor 'Man unrelieved or a poor Rogue unpunished
'I hope you will think no Part of Human Life 'out of your Consideration, but will, at your 'Leisure, give us the History of Plenty and Want

MR SPECTATOR

'I beg you would be pleased to take Notice of 'a very great Indecency, which is extremely com'mon, though, I think, never yet under your 'Censure It is, Sir, the strange Freedom some 'ill bred married People take in Company The 'unseasonable Fondness of some Husbands and 'the ill timed Tenderness of some Wives They 'talk and act, as if Modesty was only fit for Maids
'and Patchelors, and that too before both I was 'once, Mr SPECTATOR, where the Fault I speak 'of was so very flagrant, that (being, you must 'know, a very brash Fellow, and several young 'Ladies in the Room) I protest I was quite out of 'Coast to enquire Lucia, it seems, was breeding
'and she did nothing but entertain the Company
'with a Discourse upon the Difficulty of Reckon'ing to a Day, and said she knew those who were 'certain to an Hour then fell a laughing at a 'silly unexperienced Creature, who was a Month
'above her time Upon her Husband's coming 'in, she put several Questions to him which he 'not caring to resolve, Well, cries Lucia, I shall 'have 'em all at Night — But lest I should 'seem guilty of the very Fault I write against, I 'shall only intreat Mr SPECTATOR to correct such 'Misdemeanors

Mr SPECTATOR,

I am now entering into my One and Twentieth Year, and do not know that I had one Day's thorough Satisfaction since I came to Years of my Reflection, till the Time they say others lose their Liberty, the Day of my Marriage I am Son to a Gentleman of a very great Estate, who resolv'd to keep me out of the Vices of the Age, and in order to it never let me see any Thing that he thought could give me the least Pleasure At ten Years old I was put to a Grammar-School, where my Master received Orders every Post to use me very severely, and have no regard to my having a great Estate At fifteen I was removed to the University, where I liv'd, out of my Father's great Discretion, in scandalous Poverty and Want, till I was big enough to be married, and I was sent for to see the Lady who sends you the Underwritten When we were put together, we both considered that we could not be worse than we were in taking one another, out of a Desire of Liberty entered into Wedlock My Father says I am now a Man, and may speak to him like another Gentleman

I am, SIR,

Your most humble Servant,

Mr SPEC

I grew tall and wild at my Mother's, who is a gay Widow, and did not care for shewing me 'till about two Years and a half ago at which time my Guardian Uncle sent me to a Boarding-School, with Orders to contradict me in nothing, for I had been misused enough already I had not been there above a Month, when being in the Kitchen, I saw some Oatmeal on the Dresser, I put two or three Corns in my Mouth, liked it, stole a Handful, went into my Chamber, chewed it, and for two Months after never failed taking a Toll of every Penny worth of Oatmeal that came into the House But one Day playing with a Tobacco pipe between my Teeth it happened to break in my Mouth, and the spitting out the Pieces left such a delicious Roughness on my Tongue, that I could not be satisfied 'till I had cramped up the remaining Part of the Pipe I forsook the Oatmeal, and stuck to the Pipes three Months, in which Time I had dispensed with thirty seven foul Pipes, all to the Boles They belonged to an old Gentleman, Father to my Governess — He lock'd up the clean ones

I left off eating of Pipes, and fell to licking of Chalk I was soon tired of this, I then nibbled all the red Wax of our last Ball-Tickets, and three Weeks after the black Wax from the Burying-Tickets of the old Gentleman Two Months after this I liv'd upon Thunder-bolts, a certain long, round bluish Stone, which I found among the Gravel in our Garden I was wonderfully delighted with this, but Thunder-bolts growing scarce, I fasten'd Tooth and Nail upon our Garden-Wall, which I stuck to almost a Twelve-month, and had in that time peeled and devoured half a Foot towards our Neighbour's Yard I now thought my self the happiest Creature in the World, and I believe in my Conscience, I had eaten quite through, had I had it in my Chamber, but now I became lazy, and unwilling to stir, and was obliged to seek Food never Home I then took a strange Hankering to Coals, I fell to scratching 'em, and had already consumed, I am certain, as much as would have dressed my Wedding Dinner, when my Uncle came for me Home He was in the Parlour with my Governess when I was called down I went in, fell on my Knees, for he made me call him Father and when I expected the Blessing I asked, the good Gentleman, in a Surprise, turns himself to my Governess, and asks, Whether this (pointing to me) was his Daughter? This (added he) is the very Picture of Death My Child was a plump-faced, hale, fresh-coloured Girl but this looks as if she was half starved, a mere Skeleton My Governess, who is really a good Woman, assured my Father I had wanted for nothing, and withal told him I was continually eating some Irish or other, and that I was almost eaten up with the Green sickness, her Orders being never to cross me But this magnified but little with my Father, who presently, in a kind of Pett, prying for my Board, took me home with him I had not been long at home, but one Sunday at Church (I shall never forget it) I saw a young neighbouring Gentleman that pleased me hugely, I liked him of all Men I ever saw in my life, and began to wish I could be as pleasing to him The very next Day he came, with his Father, a visiting to our House We were left alone together, with Directions on both Sides to be in Love with one another, and in three Weeks time we were married I regained my former Health and Complexion, and am now as happy as the Day is long Now, Mr SPEC, I desire you would find out some Name for these craving Damselfs, whether dignified or distinguished under some or all of the following Denominations, (to wit) Trash eaters, Oatmeal chievers, Pipe chompers, Chalk lickers, Wax-nibblers, Coal Scratchers, Wall-peelers, or Gravel-diggers And, good Sir, do your utmost endeavour to prevent (by exposing) this unaccountable Folly, so prevailing among the young ones of our Sex, who may not meet with such sudden good Luck as,

Mr SPECTATOR, Oxford, July 14

ACCORDING to a late Invitation in one of your Papers to every Man who pleases to write, I have sent you the following short Dissertation against the Vice of being prejudiced

Your most humble Servant

'Man is a sociable Creature, and a Lover of Glory, whence it is that when several Persons are united in the same Society, they are studious to lessen the Reputation of others, in order to raise their own. The Wise are content to guide the Springs in Silence, and rejoice in Secret at their regular Progress. To prate and triumph is the Part allotted to the Trifling and Superficial. The Geese were providentially ordained to save the Capital. Hence it is, that the Invention of Marks and Devices to distinguish Parties, is owing to the Beaux and Belles of this Island. Hats moulded into different Cocks and Pinches, have long bid mutual Defiance, Patches have been set against Patches in Brittel-army Stocks have risen or fallen in Proportion to Head-Dresses and Peace or War been expected, as the White or the Red Hood hath prevailed. These are the Standard Reversers in our contending Armies, the Dwarfs and Squires who carry the Impresses of the Grants or Knights, not born to fight themselves, but to prepare the Way for the ensuing Combat.

'It is Matter of Wonder to reflect how far Men of weak Understanding and strong Fancy are hurried by their Prejudices, even to the believing that the whole Body of the adverse Party are a Band of Villains and Demons. Foreigners complain, that the English are the proudest Nation under Heaven. Perhaps they too have their Share but be that as it will, general Charges against Bodies of Men is the Fault I am writing against. It must be own'd, to our Shame, that our common People, and most who have not travell'd, have an irrational Contempt for the Language, Dress, Customs, and even the Shape and Minds of other Nations. Some Men otherwise of Sense, have wonder'd that a great Genius should spring out of Ireland, and think you mad in affirming, that fine Odes have been written in Lapland.

'This Spirit of Rivrship, which heretofore reigned in the Two Universities, is extinct and almost over betwixt College and College. In Parishes and Schools the Hurst of Glory still obtains. At the Seasons of Football and Cock-fighting, these little Republics reassume their national Hatred to each other. My Tenant in the Country is verily perswaded, that the Parish of the Enemy hath not one honest Man in it.

'I always hated Styrers against Women, and Styrers against Men. I am apt to suspect a Stranger who laughs at the Religion of the Faculty My Splice rises at a dull Rogue, who is severe upon Mayors and Aldermen and was never better pleas'd than with a Piece of Jus 'tice executed upon the Body of a Temple, who was very arch upon Parsons.

'The Necessities of Mankind require various Employments and whoever excels in his Province is worthy of Praise. All Men are not educated after the same Manner, nor have all the same Talents. Those who are deficient deserve our Compassion, and have a Title to our Assistance. All cannot be bred in the same Place but in all Places there arise, at different Times, such Persons as do Honour to their Society, which may raise Envy in little Souls, but are admired and cherished by generous Spirits.

'It is certainly a great Happiness to be educated in Societies of great and eminent Men. Their Instructions and Examples are of extraordinary Advantage. It is highly proper to instill such a Reverence of the governing Persons, and Concern for the Honour of the Place, as may spur the growing Members to worthy Pursuits and honest Emulation. But to swell young Minds with vain Thoughts of the Dignity of their own Brotherhood, by debasing and villifying all others, doth them a real Injury. By this means I have found that their Efforts have become languid and their Prattle irksome, as thinking it sufficient Praise that they are Children of so illustrious and ample a Family. I should think it a surer as well as more generous Method, to set before the Eyes of Youth such Persons as have made a noble Progress in Fraternities less talk'd of which seems tacitly to reproach their Sloth, who looll so heavily in the Seats of mighty Improvement. Active Spirits hereby would enlarge their Notions, whereas by a servile Imitation of one, or perhaps two, admired Men in their own Body, they can only gain a secondary and derivative kind of Fame. These Copiers of Men, like those of Authors or Painters, run into Affectations of some Oddness, which perhaps was not disagreeable in the Original, but sits ungracefully on the narrow-sould Transcriber.

'By such early Corrections of Vanity, while Boys are growing into Men, they will gradually learn not to censure superficially but imbibe those Principles of general Kindness and Humanity, which alone can make them easy to themselves, and beloved by others.

'Reflections of this nature have expunged all Prejudices out of my Heart, insomuch that, tho' I am a firm Protestant, I hope to see the Pope and Cardinals without violent Emotions and tho' I am naturally grave, I expect to meet good Company at Paris.

I am, SIR,

THE Moral World, as consisting of Males and Females, is of a mixt Nature, and filled with several Customs, Fashions and Ceremonies, which would have no place in it, were there but One Sex. Had our Species no Females in it, Men would be quite different Creatures from what they are at present: their Endeavours to please the opposite Sex, polishes and refines them out of those Manners which are most Natural to them, and often sets them upon modelling themselves, not according to the Plans which they approve in their own Opinions, but according to those Plans which they think are most agreeable to the Female World. In a Word Man would not only be an unhappy, but a rude unfinished Creature, were he conversant with none but those of his

As this mutual Regard between the two Sexes tends to the Improvement of each of them, we may observe that Men are apt to degenerate into rough and brutal Natures, who live as if there were no such things as Women in the World: as on the contrary, Women, who have an Indifference or Aversion for their Counter parts in human Nature, are generally Sower and Unruly, Sluttish and Censorious.

I am led into this Train of Thoughts by a little Manuscript which is lately fallen into my Hands, and which I shall communicate to the Reader, as I have done some other curious Pieces of the same Nature, without troubling him with any Enquiries about the Author of it. It contains a summary Account of two different States which bordered upon one another. The one was a Commonwealth of Amazons, or Women without Men: the other was a Republick of Males that had not a Woman in their whole Community. As these two States bordered upon one another, it was their way, it seems, to meet upon their Frontiers at a certain Season of the Year, where those among the Men who had not made their Choice in any former Meeting, associated themselves with particular Women, whom they were afterwards obliged to look upon as their Wives in every one of these yearly Rencontres. The Children that sprung from this Alliance, if Males, were sent to their respective Fathers, if Females, continued with their Mothers. By means of this Anniversary Carnival, which lasted about a Week, the Commonwealths were recruited from time to time, and supplied with their respective Subjects.

These two States were engaged together in a perpetual League, Offensive and Defensive, so that if any Foreign Potentate offered to attack either of them, both the Sexes fell upon him at once, and quickly brought him to Reason. It was remarkable that for many Ages this Agreement continued inviolable between the two States, notwithstanding as was said before, they were Husbands and Wives: but this will not appear so wonderful, if we consider that they did not live together above a Week in a Year.

In the Account which my Author gives of the Male Republick, there were several Customs very remarkable. The Men never shaved their Heads or pared their Nails above once in a Twelvemonth, which was probably about the time of the great annual Meeting upon their frontiers. I find the Name of a Minister of State in one Part of their History, who was fined for appearing too frequently in clean Linnen, and for a certain great General who was turned out of his Post for Dissimulation, it having been proved upon him by several credible Witnesses, that he shed his Face every Morning. If any Member of the Commonwealth had a soft Voice, a smooth Tongue, or a supple Behaviour he was banished out of the Commonwealth of Females, where he was treated as a Slave dressed in Petticoats, and set a Spinning. They had no Rules of Honour among them but such as denoted some Bodily strength or Perfection, as such an one the Tail, appeared Gay or Pretty. The Women observing that the Men took delight in looking upon them, when they were adorned with such Trappings and Guzaws, set their Heads at Work to find out new Inventions, and to outshine one another in all Councils of War or the like solemn Meetings. On the other hand, the Men observing how the Womens Hearts were set upon Finery, began to Embellish themselves and look as agreeably as they could in the Eyes of their Associates. In short, after a few Years, conversing together, the Women had learnt to Smile, and the Men to Ogle, the Women grew Soft, and the Men Lively.

When they had thus insensibly formed one another, upon the finishing of the War, which concluded with an entire Conquest of their common Enemy, the Colonels in one Army Married the Colonels in the other, the Captains in the same Manner took the Captains to their Wives. The whole Body of common Soldiers were matched, after the Example of their Leaders. By this means the two Republicks incorporated with one another, and became the most Flourishing and Polite Government in the Part of the World which they Inhabited. C

*Nec duo sunt at forma duplex, nec femina dici Nec fuer ut possunt, neutrumque et utrumque

MOST of the Papers I give the Publick are written on Subjects that never vary, but are for ever fixt and immutable. Of this kind are all my more serious Essays and Discourses, but there is another sort of Speculations, which I consider as Occasional Papers, that take their Rise from the Folly, Extravagance, and Caprice of the present Age. For I look upon myself as one set to watch the Manner, and Behaviour of my Countrymen and Contemporaries, and to mark down every absurd Fashion, ridiculous Custom, or affected Form of Speech that makes its Appearance in the World, during the Course of these my Speculations. The Petticoat no sooner begun to swell, but I observed its Motions. The Party patches had not time to muster themselves before I detected them. I had Intelligence of the Coloured Hood the very first time it appeared in a Publick Assembly. I might here mention several other the like Contingent Subjects, upon which I have bestowed distinct Papers. By this Means I have so effectually quashed those Irregularities which give Occasion to 'em, that I am afraid Posterity will scarce have a sufficient Idea of them, to relish those Discourses which were in no little Vogue at the time when they were written. They will be apt to think that the Fashions and Customs I attacked were some Fantastick Conceits of my own, and that their Great Grandmothers could not be so whimsical as I have represented them. For this Reason, when I think on the Figure my several Volumes of Speculations will make about a Hundred Years hence I consider them as so many Pieces of old Plate, where the Weight will be regarded, but the Fashion lost.

Among the several Female Extravagancies I have already taken Notice of, there is one which still keeps its Ground. I mean that of the Ladies, who dress themselves in a Hat and Leather, a Riding coat and a Purring, or at least tie up their Hair in a Bag or Ribband, in imitation of the smart Part of the opposite Sex. As in my Yesterday's Paper I gave an Account of the Mixture of two Sexes in one Commonwealth, I shall here take notice of this Mixture of two Sexes in one Person. I have already shewn my Dislike of this Immodest Custom more than once, but in Contempt of every thing I have hitherto said, I am informed that the Highways about this great City are still very much infested with these Female Cavaliers.

I remember when I was at my Friend Sir ROGER DE COVERLY's about this time twelve month, an Equestrian Lady of this Order appeared upon the Plains which lay at a distance from his House. I was at that time walking in the Fields with my old Friend, and as his Tenants run out on every side to see so strange a Sight, Sir ROGER asked one of them who came by us what it was? To which the Country Fellow reply'd, 'Tis a Gentlewoman, saving your Worship's Presence, in a Coat and Hat. This produced a great deal of Mirth at the Knight's House, where we had a Story at the same time of another of his Tenants, who meeting this Gentleman like Lady, on the High way, was asked by her whether that was Coverly's Hall, the Honest Man seeing only the Male Part of the Querrist, reply'd, Yes, Sir, but upon the second Question, whether Sir ROGER DE COVERLY was a married Man, having dropped his Eye upon the Petticoat, he changed his Note into No, Madam.

Had one of these Hermaphrodites appeared in Juvenal's Days, with what an Indignation should we have seen her described by that excellent Satyrist. He would have represented her in a Riding Habit, as a greater Monster than the Centaur. He would have called for Sacrifices or Purifying Waters, to expiate the Appearance of such a Prodigy. He would have invoked the Shades of Portia or Lucretia, to see into what the Roman Ladies had transformed themselves.

For my own part, I am for treating the Sex with greater Tenderness, and have all along made use of the most gentle Methods to bring them off from my little Extravagance into which they are sometimes unwarily fallen. I think it however absolutely necessary to keep up the Partition between the two Sexes, and to take Notice of the smallest Encroachments which the one makes upon the other. I hope therefore that I shall not hear any more Complaints on this Subject. I am sure my She-Disciples who peruse these my daily Lectures, have profited but little by them, if they are capable of giving into such an Amphibious Dress. This I should not have mentioned had not I lately met one of these my Female Readers in Hyde Park, who looked upon me with a masculine Assurance, and cocked her Hat full in my Face.

For my part, I have one general Key to the Behaviour of the Fair Sex. When I see them singular in any Part of their Dress, I conclude it is not without some Evil Intention, and therefore question not but the Design of this strange Fashion is to smite more effectually their Male Beholders. Now to let them fight in this Particular, I would I saw have them contend with themselves whether we are not more likely to be struck by a Figure entirely Female, than with such an one as we may see every Day in our Churches. Or, if they please, let them reflect upon their own Hearts, and think how they would be affected should they meet a Man in Horseback, in his Breeches and Jack Boots, and in the same time dressed up in a Corset and a Nightgale.

I must observe that it is Fashion was first of all brought to us from France, a Country which has infected all the Nations of Europe with Vanity. I speak not this in derogation of a whole People, having more than once found fault with those general Reflections which strike at King, Gods, or Commonwealths in the Course. A piece of Cruelty, which an ingenious Writer of our own compares to that of Caligula, who wished the Roman People had all but one Neck that he might behead them at a Blow. I shall therefore only remark that the Loveliness and Assurance are in a peculiar manner the Qualifications of the French Nation, the same Habits and Customs will no give the same Offence to that People which they produce among those of our own Country. Modesty is our distinguishing Character, in Vanity it theirs. And when this our Natural Virtue appears in that Female Beauty, for which our British Ladies are celebrated above all others in the Universe, it makes up the most amiable Object that the Eye of Man can possibly behold. BRING a Person of insatiable Curiosity, I could not forbear going on Wednesday last to a Place of no small Renown for the Gallantry of the lower Order of Britons namely to the Bear Garden at Hockley in the Hole where for a whitish brown Paper put into my Hands in the Street, informed me) there was to be a Trial of Skill to be exhibited between two Masters of the Noble Science of Defence, at two of the Clock precisely. I was not a little charmd with the Solemnity of the Challenge, which ran thus

I James Miller, Sergeant, lately come from the Frontiers of Portugal Master of the noble Science of Defence hearing in most Places where I have been of the great Fame of Timothy Buck of London, Master of the said Science, do in this manner meet me, and exercise at the several Weapons following, viz

Back Sword	Sir's Falchion,
Sword and Dagger,	Case of 1 alchons,
Sword and Buckler,	Quarter Staff

* See note on p 32

If the generous Ardour in James Miller to dispute the Reputation of Timothy Buck, had something resembling the old Heroes of Romance, Timothy Buck returned Answer in the same Paper with the like Spirit, adding a little Indignation at being challenged and seeming to condescend to fight James Miller, not in regard to Miller himself, but in that as the Time went out, he had fought Paries of Coventry. The Acceptance of the Combat ran in these Words

I Timothy Buck of Clare Market, Master of the Noble Science of Defence bearing he did fight for Paries of Coventry, will not fail (God Will) to meet this fair Lady at the Time and Place appointed, desiring a clear Stage and no Interuption

Virtu Regina

I shall no here look back on the Spectacles of the Greeks and Romans of this kind, but must believe that Custom took its rise from the Ages of France. I learnt from those who loved one Woman so well that they hated all Men and Women else from those who would fight you, whether you were or were not of their Mind from those who demanded the Combat of the Contemperate both for admiring their Mistress, or discomfiting her. I cannot therefore but lament, that the terrible Part of the ancient Fight is preserved, when the amorous Side of it is forgotten. We have retained the Liberty, but lost the Gallantry of the old Combatants. I could wish, methinks, these Gentlemen had consulted me in the Promulgation of the Conflict. I was obliged by a fair young Maid whom I understood to be called Elizabeth Preston, Daughter of the Keeper of the Garden, with a Glass of Water, whom I imagined might have been, for Form's sake, the general Representative of the Lady sought for, and from her Beauty the proper Amaillis on these Occasions. It would have run better in the Challenge, I James Miller, Sergeant, who have travelled Paries abroad, and came last from the Frontiers of Portugal for the Love of Elizabeth Preston, do assert, That the said Elizabeth is the Fairest of Women. Then the Answer I Timothy Buck, who have stay'd in Great Britain during all the War in Foreign Parts, for the Sake of Susanna Page, do deny That Elizabeth Preston is so fair as the said Susanna Page. Let Susanna Page look on and I desire of James Miller no Favour.

I he would give the Battel quite another Turn,

* John Sparkes of Coventry has this piece of history upon his tombstone. To the memory of Mr John Sparkes, a native of this city, he was a man of a mild disposition, a gladiator by profession, who, after having fought 350 battles in the principal parts of Europe with honour and applause at length quitted the stage, sheathed his sword, and, with Christian resignation, submitted to the grand victor in the 50th year of his age. Anno salutis humane, 1733

Sergeant James Miller afterwards became a captain, and fought in Scotland under the Duke of Cumberland in 1745

'to make Lovers where-ever they appear, but they must make Rivals at the same time Were you to see Gatty walk the Park at high Mall, you would expect those who followed her and those who met her could immediately draw their Swords for her I hope, Sir, you will provide for the future, that Women may stick to their Faces for doing any future Mischief and not allow any but direct Traders in Beauty to expose more than the fore Part of the Neck, unless you please to allow this After Game to those who are very defective in the Charms of the Countenance I can say, to my Sorrow, the present Practice is very unfair, when to look back is Death, and it may be said of our Beauties, as a great Poet did of Bullets,

IT is a very common Expression, That such a one is very good-natur'd, but very passionate. The Expression indeed is very good-natur'd, to allow passionate People so much Quarter But I think a passionate Man deserves the least Indulgence Imaginable It is said, it is soon over that is, all the Mischief he does is quickly dispatch'd, which, I think, is no great Recommendation to Favour I have known one of these good-natur'd passionate Men say in a mix'd Company even to his own Wife or Child, such Things is the most inveterate Enemy of his Family would not have spoke, even in Imagination It is certain that quick Sensibility is inseparable from a ready Understanding but why should not that good Understanding call to itself all its Force on such Occasions, to master that sudden Inclination to Anger One of the greatest Souls now in the World^a is the most subject by Nature to Anger, and yet so famous from a Conquest of himself this Way, that he is the known Example when you talk of Temper and Command of a Man's Self To contain the Spirit of Anger, is the worthiest Discipline we can put our selves to When a Man has made any Progress this way, a frivolous Fellow in a Passion, is to him as contemptible as a froward Child It ought to be the Study of every Man, for his own Quiet and Peace When he stands combustible and ready to flame upon every thing that touches him Life is as unwise to himself as it is to all about him Synecroplus leads, of all Men living, the most ridiculous Life he is ever offending, and begging Pardon If his Master enters the Room without what he sent for, That Blood-head, begins he—*Gentlemen, I ask your Pardon, but Servants now a days—*The wrong Plates are laid, they are thrown into the Middle of the Room, his Wife stands by in Pain for him, which he sees in her Face, and answers as if he had heard all she was thinking Wh, what the Devil! Why don't you take Care to give Orders in these things? His Friends sit down to a tasteless Plenty of every thing, every Minute expecting new Insults from his impudent Passions In a Word, to eat with, or visit Synecroplus, is no other than going to see him exercise his Family, exercise their Patience, and his own Anger

It is monstrous that the Shame and Confusion in which this good natur'd angry Man must needs behold his Friends while he thus lays about him, does not give him so much Reflection as to create an Amendment This is the most scandalous Abuse of Reason imaginable all the harmless Part of him is no more than that of a Bull Dog, they are tame no longer than they are not offended One of these good natur'd angry Men shall, in an Instant, assemble together so many Allusions to secret Circumstances, as are enough to dissolve the Peace of all the Families and Friends he is acquainted with, in a Quarter of an Hour, and yet the next Moment be the best-natur'd Man in the whole World If you would see Passion in its Purity, without Mixture of Reason, behold it represented in a mad Hero, drawn by a mad Poet. Nat Lee makes his Alexander say thus

*Away, begon, and give a Whirlwind Room, Or I will blow you up like Dust! Avaunt, Madness but meanly represents my Toil

Tempest
My Brain is burst, Debate and Reason quench'd,
The Storm is up, and my hot bleeding Heart

Every passionate Fellow in Town talks half the Day with a little Consistency, and threatens Things as much out of his Power

The next disagreeable Person to the outrageous Gentleman, is one of a much lower Order of Anger, and he is what we commonly call a peevish Fellow A peevish Fellow is one who has some Reason in himself for being out of Humour, or has a natural Incapacity for Delight, and therefore disturbs all who are happier than himself with Pishes and Pshaw's, or other well-bred Interjections, at every thing that is sad or done in his Presence There should be Physick mixed in the Food of all which these Fellows eat in good Company This Degree of Anger passes, forsooth, for a Delicacy of Judgment, that would admit of being easily pleas'd but none above the Character of wearing a peevish Man's Irrery, ought to bear with his ill Manner All Things among Men of Sense and Condition should pass the Censure, and have the Protection, of the Eyes of Reason

No Man ought to be tolerated in an habitual Humour, Whim, or Particularity of Behaviour, by any who do not writ upon him for Bread Next to the peevish Fellow is the Snarler This Gentleman deals mightily in what we call the Irony, and as those sort of People exert themselves most against those below them, you see their Humour best, in their Talk to their Servants That is so like you, You are a fine Fellow, Thou art the quickest Head-piece, and the like One would think the Hectoring, the Storming, the Sullen, and all the different Species and Subordinations of the Angry should be cured, by knowing they live only as pardoned Men, and how pitiful is the Condition of being only suffered! But I am interrupted by the pleasantest Scene of Anger and the Disappointment of it that I have ever known, which happened while I was yet Writing, and I overheard as I sat in the Back-room at a French Book-seller's There came into the Shop a very learned Man with an erect Solemn Air, and tho' a Person of great Parts makes against himself The Composure of a faulty Man, and the whimsical Perplexity of him that was justly angry, is perfectly New After turning over many Volumes, said the Seller to the Buyer, Sir, you know I have long asked you to send me back the first Volume of French Sermons I formerly lent you, Sir, said the Chapman, I have often looked for it but cannot find it, It is certainly lost, and I know not to whom I lent it, it is so many Years ago then, Sir, here is the other Volume, I'll send you home that, and please to pay for both My Friend, reply'd he, canst thou be so Senseless as not to know that one Volume is as imperfect in my Library as in your Shop? Yes, Sir, but it is you have lost the first Volume and to be short I will be Paid Sir, answered the Chapman, you are a young Man, your Book is lost, and learn by this little Loss to bear much greater Adversities, which you must expect to meet with Yes, Sir, I'll bear when I must, but I have not lost now, for I say you have it and shall pay me Friend, you grow Warm, I tell you the Book is lost, and I foresee in the Course even of a prosperous Life, that you will meet Afflictions to make you Mad, if you cannot bear this Trifle Sir, there is in this Case no need of bearing, for you have the Book I say, Sir, I have not the Book But your Persuasion will not let you hear enough to be informed that I have it not Learn Resignation of your self to the Distresses of this Life Nay do not fret and fume, it is my Duty to tell you that you are of an impatient Spirit, and an impatient Spirit is never without Woe Was ever any thing like this? Yes, Sir, there have been many things like this The Loss is but a Trifle, but your Temper is Wanton, and incapable of the least Pain therefore let me advise you, be patient, the Book is lost, but do not you for that Reason lose your self

Hi narrata ferunt alio mensuraque ficti Crescit, et auditis aliquid novus adjunt auctor
Ovid

OVID describes the Palace of Fame as situated in the very Center of the Universe, and perforated with so many Windows and Arches as gave her the Sight of every thing that was done in the Heavens, in the Earth, and in the Sea The Structure of it was contrived in so admirable a manner, that it Echo'd every Word which was spoken in the whole Compass of Nature, so that the Palace, says the Poet, was always filled with a confused Hubbub of low dying Sounds, the Voices being almost spent and worn out before they arrived at this General Rendezvous of Speeches and Whispers

I consider Courts with the same Regard to the Governments which they suprintend, as Ovid's Palace of Fame with regard to the Universe The Eyes of a watchful Minister run through the whole People There is scarce a Murmur or Complaint that does not reach his Ears They have New-gatherers and Intelligencers distributed into their several Walks and Quarters, who bring in their respective Quotrs, and make them acquainted with the Discourse and Conversation of the whole Kingdom or Common wealth where they are employ'd The wisest of Kings, alluding to these invisible and unsuspected Spies who are planted by Kings and Rulers over their Fellow Citizens, as well as to those Voluntary Informers that are buzzing about the Ears of a great Man, and making their Court by such secret Methods of Intelligence, has given us a very prudent Caution *Curse not the King, no not in thy Thought, and Curse not the Rich in thy Bed-chamber For a Bird of the Air shall carry the Voice, and that which hath Wings shall tell the matter*²

As it is absolutely necessary for Rulers to make use of other Peoples Eyes and Ears, they should take particular Care to do it in such a manner, that it may not bear too hard on the Person whose Life and Conversation are enquired into A Man who is capable of so infamous a Calling as that of a Spy, is not very much to be relied upon He can have no great Lies of Honour, or Checks of Conscience, to restrain him in those covert Evidences, where the Person accused has no Opportunity of vindicating himself He will be more industrious to carry that which is grateful, than that which is true There will be no Occasion for him, if he does not hear and see things worth Discovery, so that he naturally inflames every Word and Circumstance, aggravates what is faulty, perverts what is good, and misrepresents what is indifferent Nor is it to be doubted but that such ignominious Wretches let their private Passions into these their clandestine Informations, and often wreck their particular Spite or Malice against the Person whom they are set to watch It is a pleasant

Scene enough, which an Italian Author describes between a Spy, and a Cardinal who employed him. The Cardinal is represented as minuting down every thing that is told him. The Spy begins with a low Voice, Such an one, the Advocate, whispered to one of his Friends, within my Hearing, that your Eminence was a very great Poultron and after having given his Patron Time to take it down, adds that another called him a Mercenary Rascal in a publick Conversation. The Cardinal replies Very well, and bids him go on. The Spy proceeds, and loads him with Reports of the same Nature, till the Cardinal rises in great Wrath, calls him an impudent Scoundrel, and kicks him out of the Room.

It is observed of great and heroick Minds, that they have not only shewn a particular Disregard to those unmerited Reproaches which have been cast upon 'em, but have been altogether free from that Impertinent Curiosity of enquiring after them, or the poor Revenge of resenting them. The Histories of Alexander and Cæsar are full of this kind of Instances. Vulgar Souls are of a quite contrary Character. Dionysius, the Tyrant of Sicily, had a Dungeon which was a very curious Piece of Architecture, and of which, as I am informed, there are still to be seen some Remains in that Island. It was called Dionysius's Ear, and built with several little Windings and Labyrinths in the form of a real Ear. The Structure of it made it a kind of whispering Place, but such a one as gathered the Voice of him who spoke into a Funnel, which was placed at the very Top of it. The Tyrant used to lodge all his State-Criminals, or those whom he supposed to be engaged together in any Evil Designs upon him, in this Dungeon. He had at the same time an Apartment over it, where he used to apply himself to the Funnel, and by that Means over hear every thing that was whispered in [the] Dungeon. I believe one may venture to affirm, that a Cæsar or an Alexander would rather have died by the Treason, than have used such disingenuous Means for the detecting of it.

A Man, who in ordinary Life is very Inquisitive after every thing which is spoken ill of him, passes his Time but very indifferently. He is wounded by every Arrow that is shot at him, and puts it in the Power of every insignificant Enemy to disquiet him. Nay, he will suffer from what has been said of him, when it is forgotten by those who said or heard it. For this Reason I could never bear one of those officious Friends, that would be telling every malicious Report every idle Censure that [passed²] upon me. The Tongue of Man is so petulant, and his Thoughts so variable, that one should not lay too great a Stress upon any present Speeches and Opinions. Praise and Obloquy proceed very frequently out of the same Mouth upon the same Person, and upon the same Occas on. A generous Enemy will sometimes bestow Commendations, as the dearest Friend cannot sometimes refrain from speaking ill. The Man who is indifferent in either of these Respects, gives his Opinion at random, and prizes or disapproves as he finds himself in Humour

I shall conclude this Essay with Part of a Character, which is finely drawn by the Earl of Clarendon, in the first Book of his History, and which gives us the lively Picture of a great Man teazing himself with an absurd Curiosity.

'He had not that Application and Submission, and Reverence for the Queen as might have been expected from his Wisdom and Breeding and often crossed her Pretences and Desires with more Rudeness than was natural to him. Yet he was impertinently solicitous to know what her Majesty said of him in private, and what Resentments she had towards him. And when by some Confidants, who had their Ends upon him from those Offices, he was informed of some bitter Expressions fallen from her Majesty, he was so exceedingly afflicted and tormented with the Sense of it, that sometimes by passionate Complaints and Representations to the King, sometimes by more dutiful Addresses and Expostulations with the Queen, in bewailing his Misfortune he frequently exposed himself, and left his Condition worse than it was before, and the Eclaircissement commonly ended in the Discovery of the Persons from whom he had received his most secret Intelligence.' Vivere si recte nescis, discede peritus—HOR

I HAVE already given my Reader an Account of a Sett of merry Fellows, who are passing their Summer together in the Country, being provided of a great House, where there is not only a convenient Apartment for every particular Person but a large Infirmary for the Reception of such of them as are any way indisposed, or out of Humour. Having lately received a Letter from the Secretary of this Society, by Order of the whole Fraternity, which acquaints me with their Behaviour during the last Week, I shall here make a Present of it to the Publick.

MR SPECTATOR,

'We are glad to find that you approve the Establishment which we have here made for the retrieving of good Manners and agreeable Conversation and shall use our best Endeavours so to improve our selves in this our Summer Retirement, that we may next Winter serve as Patterns to the Town. But to the end that this our Institution may be no less Advantageous to the Publick than to our selves, we shall communicate to you one Week of our Proceedings, desiring you at the same time, if you see any thing faulty in them, to favour us with your Admonitions. For you must know, Sir, that it has been proposed among us to chuse you for our Visitor, to which I must further add, that one of the College having declared last Week, he did not like the Spectator of the Day, and not being able to assign any just Reasons for such his bears to so infinitely Wise and Good a Being, is a firm Reliance on him for the Blessings and Conveniences of Life, and an habitual Trust in him for Deliverance out of all such Dangers and Difficulties as may befall us.

The Man, who always lives in this Disposition of Mind, has not the same dark and melancholy Views of Human Nature, as he who considers himself abstractedly from this Relation to the Supreme Being. At the same time that he reflects upon his own Weakness and Imperfection, he comforts himself with the Contemplation of those Divine Attributes, which are employed for his Safety and his Welfare. He finds his Want of Foresight made up by the Omniscience of him who is his Support. He is not sensible of his own want of Strength, when he knows that his Helper is Almighty. In short, the Person who has a firm trust on the Supreme Being is Powerful in his Power, Wise by his Wisdom, Happy by his Happiness. He reaps the Benefit of every Divine Attribute, and loses his own Insufficiency in the Fullness of Infinite Perfection.

To make our Lives more easy to us, we are commanded to put our Trust in him, who is thus able to relieve and succour us: the Divine Goodness having made such a Reliance a Duty, notwithstanding we should have been miserable had it been forbidden us.

Among several Motives, which might be made use of to recommend this Duty to us, I shall only take notice of those that follow.

The first and strongest is, that we are promised, He will not fail those who put their Trust in him.

But without considering the Supernatural Blessing which accompanies this Duty, we may observe that it has a natural Tendency to its own Reward, or in other Words, that this firm Trust and Confidence in the great Disposer of all Things, contributes very much to the getting clear of any Affliction, or to the bearing it manfully. A Person who believes he has his Succour at hand, and that he acts in the sight of his Friend, often excites himself beyond his Abilities, and does Wonders that are not to be matched by one who is not animated with such a Confidence of Success. I could produce Instances from History, of Generals, who out of a Belief that they were under the Protection of some invisible Assistant, did not only encourage their Soldiers to do their utmost, but have acted themselves beyond what they would have done, had they not been inspired by such a Belief. I might in the same manner shew how such a Trust in the Assistance of an Almighty Being, naturally produces Patience, Hope, Cheerfulness, and all other Dispositions of Mind that alleviate those Calamities which we are not able to remove.

The Practice of this Virtue administers great Comfort to the Mind of Man in Times of Poverty and Affliction, but most of all in the Hour of Death. When the Soul is hovering in the last Moments of its [Separation,] when it is just entering on another State of Existence, to converse with Scenes, and Objects, and Companions that are altogether new, what can support her under such Tremblings of Thought, such Fear, such Anxiety, such Apprehensions, but the casting of all her Cares upon him who first gave her Being, who has conducted her through one Stage of it, and will be always with her to Guide and Comfort her in her [Progress] through Eternity?

David has very beautifully represented this steady Reliance on God Almighty in his twenty third Psalm, which is a kind of Pastoral Hymn, and filled with those Allusions which are usual in that kind of Writing. As the Poetry is very exquisite, I shall present my Reader with the following Translation of it.²

*The Lord my Pasture shall prepare,
And feed me with a Shepherd's Care.
His Presence shall my Wants supply,
And guard me with a watchful Eye,
My Noon day Walks he shall attend,
And all my Mid-night Hours defend*

II

*When in the sultry Gleebe I faint, Or on the thirsty Mountain pant,
To fertile Vales, and dewy Meads My weary wand'ring Steps he leads,
How here peaceful Reverses, soft and slow, Amid the verdant Landship flow*

III

*I ho! in the Paths of Death I tread, With gloomy Horrors overspread,
My steadfast Heart shall fear no Ill,
For thou, O Lord, art with me still,
Thy friendly Crook shall give me Aid,
And guide me through the dreadful Shade*

IV

*Tho' in a bare and rugged Way, Through desous lonely Wilds I stray, Thy Bounty shall my Pains beguile,
The barren Wilderness shall smile,
With sudden Greens and Herbage crown'd,
And Streams shall murmur all around* C.

I DO not know whether I enough explained my self to the World, when I invited all Men to be assistant to me in this my Work of Speculation: for I have not yet acquainted my Readers, that besides the Letters and valuable Hints I have from Time to Time received from my Correspondents, I have by me several curious and extraordinary Papers sent with a Design (as no one will doubt when they are published) that they might be printed entire, and without any Alteration, by way of Spectator. I must acknowledge also, that I my self being the first Projector of the Paper, thought I had a Right to make them my own, by dressing them in my own Style, by leaving it what we did not appear like mine, and by adding whatever might be proper to adapt the n to the Character and Genus of my Paper, with which it was almost impossible there could exactly correspond it being certain that hardly two Men in this State, and therefore so many Men as many Spectators I read, I must own my Weakness for Liberty is such, that if I consulted that only, I might be as far as I wish to be, as at most to wish that no one could write a Spectator for besides myself nor can I deny, but upon the first Perusal of this Paper, I felt some secret Inclination as if I will to write the Spectator who wrote them. This was the first reason I had upon the first reading them, but upon a later consideration for the sake of I perceived it as an Undertaking if I wrote it all, I perceived I had done a great deal for my country, as well as I could to my own Use. I thought I had utterly disarmed them from ever writing me a Spectator for I found my self moved by a Passion very different from that of being severely touched with any the softest and most gentle of all Passions, when I reflected that a great Disappointment the Neglect of those Papers must needs have been to the Writers who import only to read, then appear in Print, and who, no doubt, triumphed to themselves in the Hope of having a Share with me in the Approbation of the Publick. A Pleasure so great, that none but those who have experienced it can have a Sense of it. In this Manner of viewing these Papers, I really found I had not done them Justice, there being something so extremely unusual and peculiarly good in some of them that I will appeal to the World whether it was possible to alter a Word in them without doing them a manifest Hurt and Violence, and whether they can ever appear richly, and as they ought, but in their own native Dress and Colours. And therefore I think I should not only wrong them but deprive the World of a considerable Satisfaction, should I any longer delay the making them publick.

After I have published a few of these Spectators, I doubt not but I shall find the Success of them to equal, if not surpass, that of the best of my own. An Author should take all Methods to humble himself in the Opinion he has of his own Performances. When these Papers appear to the World, I doubt not but they will be followed by many others and I shall not repine, though I myself shall have left me but very few Days to appear in Publick. But preferring the general Well and Advantage to any Consideration of my self, I am resolved for the future to publish any Spectator that deserves it, entire and without any Alteration, returning the World (if there can be Need of it) that it is none of mine, and if the Authors think fit to subscribe their Names, I will add them.

I think the best way of promoting this generous and useful Design, will be by giving out Subjects or Themes of all kinds whatsoever, on which (with a Preamble of the extraordinary Benefit and Advantage that may accrue thereby to the Publick) I will invite all manner of Persons, whether Scholars, Citizens, Courtiers, Gentlemen of the Town or Country, and all Beaux, Rakes, Smart, Prudes, Coquets, Houewives, and all Sorts of Wits, whether Male or Female, and how ever distinguished, whether they be True Wits, Whole or Half Wits, or whether Arch, Dry, Natural, Acquisitive, Genuine, or Depraved Wits, and Persons of all sorts of Tempers and Complexions, whether the severe, the Delightful, the Imprint, the Agreeable, the Thoughtful, the Free, or the Crotchety, the Serious or the Gay, the Jovial or the Melancholy, the witty or the Lame, the Cold, the Sanguine or the San, and of what Manners or Disposition is soever, whether the Ambitious or the Humble minded, the Proud or the Modest, the Proud or the Base minded, the Good or the Ill natured, the Public spirited or the Selfish, and under what Fortune or Circumstances soever, whether the Contented or the Miserable, the Happy or the Unfortunate, the Rich or the Poor, whether exalted through Want of Money, or Deprived of more Health, or Sickly, Married or Single may, whether tall or Short, Fat or Lean, and of what Trade, Occupation, Profession, Station, Country, Faction, Party, Persuasion, Quality, Age or Condition soever, I have ever made Thinking a Part of their Business or Diversions and have nothing worthy to impart on these Subjects to the World, according to their several and respective Talents or Geniuses, and as the Subject given out suits their Temper, Humours, or Circumstances, or may be made profitable to the Publick by their particular Knowledge or Experience in the Matter proposed, to do their utmost on them by such a Time to the End they may receive the inexpressible and irresistible Pleasure of seeing their Essay allowed of and relished by the rest of Mankind.

I will not prepossess the Reader with too great Expectation of the extraordinary Advantages which must redound to the Publick by these Essays, when the different Thoughts and Observations of all Sorts of Persons, according to their Qualities, Age, Sex, Education, Professions, Humours, Manners and Conditions, shall be set out by themselves in the clearest and most genuine Light and as they themselves would wish to have them appear to the World.

The Thesis proposed for the present Exercise of the Academies to write Spectators is Modesty, in which Subject all Persons are desired to send in their Thoughts within Ten Days after the Date hereof.

Camilla to the SPECTATOR

Mr SPECTATOR, Venice, July 10, N S
I ACKNOWLEDGE extremely all that you do not reckon conspicuous Persons of your Nation are within your Cognizance, tho' out of the Dominions of Great Britain. I little thought in the green Years of my Life, that I should ever call it an Happiness to be out of dear England, but as I grew to Woman, I found myself less acceptable in Proportion to the Increase 'of my Merit. Their Ears in Italy are so differently formed from the Make of yours in England, that I never come upon the Stage, but a general Satisfaction appears in every Countenance of the whole People. When I dwell upon a Note I behold all the Men accompanying me with Heads inclining and falling of their Persons on one Side, and dying away with me. The Women too do Justice to my Merit, and no ill-natur'd worthless Creature cries, The vain Thing, when I am rapt up in the Performance of my Part, and sensibly touched with the Effect my Voice has upon all who hear me. I live here distinguished as one whom Nature has been liberal to in a graceful Person, an exalted Mien, and Heavenly Voice. These Particularities in this strange Country, are Arguments for Respect and Generosity to her who is possessed of them. The Italians see a thousand Beauties I am sensible I have no Pretence to, and abundantly make up to me the Injustice I received in my own Country, of disallowing me what I really had. The Humour of Hissing, which you have among you, I do not know any thing of and their Applauses are uttered in Sighs, and bearing a Part at the Cadences of Voice with the Persons who are performing. I am often put in Mind of those complaisant Lines of my own Countryman, when he is calling all his Faculties together to hear Arabella,

*Let all be hush'd, each softest Motion cease, Be every loud tumultuous Thought at Peace,
And every ruder Gasp of Breath
Be calm, as in the Arms of Death.
And thou, most fickle, most uneasy Part,
Thou restless Wanderer, my Heart,
Be still, gently, ah! gently leave, Thou busy, idle Thing, to leave Stir not a Pulse and let my Blood, That turbule it, in ruly Flood,
Be softly staid,
Let me be all but my Attention dead*

'The whole City of Venice is as still when I am singing, as this Polite Hearer was to Mrs Hunt. But when they break that Silence did you know the Pleasure I am in, when every Man utters his Applause, by calling me aloud the Dear Creat ure, the Angel, the Venus, What Attitude she moves with!—Hush, she sings again! We have no boisterous Wits who dare disturb an Audience, and break the publick Peace merely to shew they dare. Mr SPECTATOR, I write this to you thus in Haste, to tell you I am so very much at ease here, that I know nothing but Joy, and I will not return, but leave you in England to hiss all Merit of your own Grov th off the Stage. I know, Sir, you were always my Admirer, and therefore I am yours,

'P S I am ten times better dressed than ever I was in England

Mr SPECTATOR,

'The Project in yours of the 11th Instant, of furthering the Correspondence and Knowledge of that considerable Part of Mankind, the Trading World, cannot but be highly commendable. Good Lectures to young Traders may have very good Effects on their Conduct but beware you propagate no false Notions of Trade let none of your Correspondents impose on the World, by putting forth base Methods in a good Light, and glazing them over with improper Terms. I would have no Means of Profit set for Copies to others, but such as are laudable in themselves. Let not Noise be called Industry, nor Impudence Courage. Let not good Fortune be imposed on the World for good Management, nor Poverty be called Folly, impute not always Bankruptcy to Extravagance, nor an Estate to Foresight, Niggardiness is not good Husbandry, nor Generosity Profusion.

Honestus is a well meaning and judicious Trader, hath substantial Goods, and trades with his own Stock. husbands his Money to the best Advantage, without taking all Advantages of the Necessities of his Workmen, or grinding the Face of the Poor. Fortunatus is stocked with Ignorance, and consequently with Self Opinion. The Quality of his Goods cannot but be suitable to that of his Judgment. Honestus pleases discerning People, and keeps their Custom by good Usage makes modest Profit by modest Means, to the decent Support of his Family. Whilst Fortunatus blustering always, pushes on, promising much, and performing little, with Obsequiousness offensive to People of Sense, strikes at all, catches much the greater Part, raises a considerable Fortune by Imposition on others, to the Discouragement and Ruin of those who trade in the same Way.

I give here but loose Hints, and beg you to be very circumspect in the Province you have now undertaken. If you perform it successfully, it will be a very great Good, for nothing is more wanting, than that Mechanick Industry were set forth with the Freedom and Greatness of Mind which ought always to accompany a Man of a liberal Education.

² The Stamp Act was to take effect from the first of August Censorship of the press began in the Church soon after the invention of printing The ecclesiastical superintendence introduced in 1479 and 1496 was more completely established by a bull of Leo X in 1515, which required Bishops and Inquisitors to examine all books before printing, and suppress heretical opinions The Church of Rome still adheres to the Index Librorum Prohibitorum begun by the Council of Trent in 1546 and there is an Index Expurgatorius for works partly prohibited, or to be read after expurgation In accordance with this principle, the licensing of English books had been in the power of the Archbishop of Canterbury and his delegates before the decree of the Star Chamber in 1637, which ordered that all books of Divinity, Physic, Philosophy, and Poetry should be licensed either by the Archbishop of Canterbury or by the Bishop of London personally or through their appointed substitutes The object of this decree was to limit the reprint of old books of divinity, &c Thus Foxe's Book of Martyrs was denied a license In 1640 Sir Edward Dering complained to Parliament that 'the most learned labours of our ancient and best divines done me the Honour to be dull upon me in Reflections of this Nature, but notwithstanding my Name has been sometimes traduced by this contemptible Tribe of Men, I have hitherto avoided all Animadversions upon 'em. The Truth of it is, I am afraid of making them appear considerable by taking Notice of them, for they are like those imperceptible Insects which are discover'd by the Microscope, and cannot be made the Subject of Observation without being magnified.

Having mentioned those few who have shewn themselves the Enemies of this Paper, I should be very ungrateful to the Publick, did not I at the same time testify my Gratitude to those who are its Friends, in which Number I may reckon many of the most distinguished Persons of all Conditions, Parties and Professions in the Isle of Great-Britain. I am not so vain as to think this Approbation is so much due to the Performance as to the Design. There is, and ever will be, Justice enough in the World, to afford Patronage and Protection for those who endeavour to advance Truth and Virtue, without regard to the Passions and Prejudices of any particular Cause or Faction. If I have any other Merit in me, it is that I have new-pointed all the Batteries of Ridicule. They have been generally planted against Persons who have appeared Serious rather than Absurd, or at best, have aimed rather at what is Unfashionable than what is Vicious. For my own part, I have endeavoured to make nothing Ridiculous that is not in some measure Criminal. I have set up the Immortal Man as the Object of Derision. In short, if I have not formed a new Weapon against Vice and Irreligion, I have at least shewn how that Weapon may be put to a right Use, which has so often fought the Battels of Impiety and Profaneness. Quid deceat, quid non quid Virtus, quid seruat
Error—Hor

SINCE two or three Writers of Comedy who are now living have taken their Farewell of the Stage, those who succeed them finding themselves incapable of rising up to their Wit, Humour and good Sense, have only imitated them in some of those loose unguarded Strokes, in which they complied with the corrupt Taste of the more Vicious Part of their Audience. When Persons of a low Genius attempt this kind of Writing, they know no difference between being Merry and being Fwd. It is with an Eye to some of these degenerate Compositions that I have written the following Discourse.

Were our English Stage but half so virtuous as that of the Greeks or Romans, we should quickly see the Influence of it in the Behaviour of all the Politer Part of Mankind. It would not be fashionable to ridicule Religion, or its Professors; the Man of Pleasure would not be the compleat Gentleman; Vanity would be out of Countenance, and every Quality which is Ornamental to Human Nature, would meet with that Esteem which is due to it.

If the English Stage were under the same Regulations the Athenian was formerly, it would have the same Effect that had, in recommending the Religion, the Government, and Publick Worship of its Country. Were our Plays subject to proper Inspections and Limitations, we might not only pass away several of our vacant Hours in the highest Entertainments, but should always rise from them wiser and better than we sat down to them.

It is one of the most unaccountable things in our Age, that the Lewdness of our Theatre should be so much complained of, so well exposed, and so little redressed. It is to be hoped, that some time or other we may be at leisure to restrain the Licentiousness of the Theatre, and make it contribute its Assistance to the Advancement of Morality, and to the Reformation of the Age. As Matters stand at present, Multitudes are shut out from this noble Diversion, by reason of those Abuses and Corruptions that accompany it. A Father is often afraid that his Daughter should be run'd by those Entertainments, which were invented for the Accomplishment and Refining of Human Nature. The Athenian and Roman Plays were written with such a Regard to Morality, that Socrates use to frequent the one, and Cicero the other.

It happened once indeed, that Cato dropped into the Roman Theatre, when the Floralia were to be represented, and as in that Performance, which was a kind of Religious Ceremony, there were several indecent Parts to be acted, the People refused to see them whilst Cato was present. Martial on this Hint made the following Epigram, which we must suppose was applied to some grave Friend of his, that had been accidentally present at some such Entertainment.

*Nosces jocosa dulce cum sacrum Floræ, Festosque lusus, et licentiam vulgi, Cur in Theatrum Cato severo venisti?
An ideo tantum veneras, ut exires?*

*Why dost thou come, great Censor of the Age,
To see the loose Divisions of the Stage?
With awful Countenance and Brow severe,
What is the Name of Goodness dost thou here?
See the mixt Crowd! how Giddy, Lewd and Vain!*

Didst thou come in but to go out again?

An Accident of this Nature might happen once in an Age among the Greeks or Romans, but they were too wise and good to let the constant Nightly Entertainment be of such a Nature, that People of the most Sense and Virtue could not be at it. Whatever Vices are represented upon the Stage, they ought to be so marked and branded by the Poet, as not to appear either credible or amiable in the Person who is truned with them. But if we look into the English Comedies above mentioned, we would think they were formed upon a quite contrary Maxum, and that this Rule, tho' it held good upon the Heathen Stage, was not to be regarded in Christian Theatres. There is another Rule likewise, which was observed by Authors of Antiquity, and which these modern than with those things which at first created a Disgust in it. He gives particular Instances of Claret, Coffee, and other Liquors, which the palate seldom approves upon the first Taste but when it has once got a Relish of them, generally returns it for Life. The Mind is constituted after the same manner, and after having habituated her self to any particular Exercise or Employment, not only loses her first Aversion towards it, but conceives a certain Fondness and Affection for it. I have heard one of the greatest Geniuses this Age has produced,¹ who had been trained up in all the polite Studies of Antiquity assure me, upon his being obliged to search into several Rolls and Records, that notwithstanding such an Employment was at first very dry and irksome to him, he at last took an incredible Pleasure in it, and preferred it even to the reading of Virgil or Cicero. The Reader will observe, that I have not here considered Custom as it makes things easy, but as it renders them delightful and though others have often made the same Reflections, it is possible they may not have drawn those Uses from it, with which I intend to fill the remaining Part of this Paper.

If we consider attentively this Property of Human Nature, it may instruct us in very fine Moralities. In the first place, I would have no Man discouraged with that kind of Life or Series of Action, in which the Choice of others, or his own Necessities, may have engaged him. It may perhaps be very disagreeable to him at first but Use and Application will certainly render it not only less painful, but pleasing and satisfactory.

In the second place I would recommend to every one that admirable Precept which *Pythagoras*² is said to have given to his Disciples, and which that Philosopher must have drawn from the Observation I have enlarged upon. Optimum vitæ genus eligito, nam consuetudo facit jucundissimum. Pitch upon that Course of Life which is the most Excellent, and Custom will render it the most Delightful. Men, whose Circumstances will permit them to chuse their own Way of Life, are inexcusable if they do not pursue that which their Judgment tells them is the most laudable. The Voice of Reason is more to be regarded than the Bent of any present Inclination, since by the Rule above mentioned, Inclination will at length come over to Reason, though we can never force Reason to comply with Inclination.

In the third place, this Observation may teach the most sensual and irreligious Man, to overlook those Hardships and Difficulties which are apt to discourage him from the Prosecution of a Virtuous Life. The Gods, said Hesiod,³ have placed Labour before Virtue, the Way to her is at first rough and difficult, but grows more smooth and easier the further you advance in it. The Man who proceeds in it, with Steadiness and Resolution, will in a little time find that her Ways are Ways of Pleasantness, and that all her Paths are Peace.

To enforce this Consideration, we may further observe that the Practice of Religion will not only be attended with that Pleasure, which naturally accompanies those Actions to which we are habituated, but with those Supernumerary Joys of Heart, that rise from the Consciousness of such a Pleasure, from the Satisfaction of acting up to the Dictates of Reason, and from the Prospect of an happy Immortality.

In the fourth place, we may learn from this Observation which we have made on the Mind of Man, to take particular Care when we are once settled in a regular Course of Life, how we too frequently indulge our selves in any of the most innocent Diversions and Amusements, since the Mind may insensibly fall off from the Relish of virtuous Actions, and, by degrees, exchange that Pleasure which it takes in the Performance of its Duty, for Delights of a much more inferior and unprofitable Nature.

The last Use which I shall make of this remarkable Property in Human Nature, of being delighted with those Actions to which it is accustomed, is to shew how absolutely necessary it is for us to gain Habits of Virtue in this Life, if we would enjoy the Pleasures of the next. The State of Bliss we call Heaven will not be capable of affecting those Minds, which are not thus qualified for it. We must, in this World, gain a Relish of Truth and Virtue, if we would be able to taste that Knowledge and Perfection, which are to make us happy in the next. The Seeds of those spiritual Joys and Raptures, which are to rise up and flourish in the Soul to all Eternity, must be planted in her, during this her present State of Probation. In short, Heaven is not to be looked upon only as the Reward, but as the natural Effect of a religious Life.

On the other hand, those evil Spirits, who, by long Custom, have contracted in the Body Habits of Lust and Sensuality, Malice and Revenge, an Aversion to every thing that is good, just or laudable, are naturally seasoned and prepared for Pain and Misery. Their Torments have already taken root in them, they cannot be happy when divested of the Body, unless we may suppose, that Providence will, in a manner, create them anew, and work a Miracle in the Rectification of their Faculties. They may, indeed, taste a kind of malignant Pleasure in those Actions to which they are accustomed, whilst in this Life but when they are removed from all those Objects which are here apt to gratify them, they will naturally become their own Tormentors, and cherish in themselves those painful Habits of Mind, which are called, [in⁴] Scripture Phrase, the Worm which never dies. This Notion of Heaven and Hell is so very conformable to the Light of Nature, that it was discovered by several of the most exalted Heathens. It has been finely improved by many Eminent Divines of the last Age, as in particular by Arch-Bishop Tillotson and Dr Sherlock, but there is none who has raised such noble Speculations upon it as Dr Scott, in the First Book of his Christian Life, which is one of the finest and most rational Schemes of Divinity, that is written in our Language or in any other. That Excellent Author has shown how every particular Custom and Habit of Virtue will in its own Nature, produce the Pleasure, or a State of Happiness, in him who shall hereafter practise it. As on the contrary, how every Custom or Habit of Vice will be the natural Hell of him in whom it subsists. C

Faciis hoc aliqui quindeque audebis — Juv

THE first Steps towards Ill are very carefully to be avoided, for Men unreasonably go on when they are once entered, and do not keep up a lively Abhorrence of the least Unworthiness. There is a certain frivolous Falseness that People indulge themselves in, which ought to be had in greater Detestation than it commonly meets with. What I mean is a Neglect of Promises made on small and indifferent Occasions, such as Parties of Pleasure, Entertainments and sometimes Meetings out of Curiosity in Men of like Faculties to be in each other's Company. There are many Cases to which one may resign this light Indolence. Jack Sipples never keeps the Hour he has appointed to come to a Friend's to Dinner but he is an insignificant Fellow who does it out of Vanity. He could never, he knows, make any Figure in Company, but by giving a little Disturbance at his Entry, and therefore takes Care to drop in when he thinks you are just seated. He takes his Place after having discomposed every body and desires there may be no Ceremony, then does he begin to call himself the saddest Fellow, in any pointing to many Places as he was invited to elsewhere. It is the Tops of Vanity to name Houses of better Cheer, and to acquaint you that he chose yours out of ten Dinners which he was obliged to be at that Day. The last Time I had the Fortune to eat with him he was imagining how very fat he should have been had he eaten all he had ever been invited to. But it is impertinent to dwell upon the Manners of such a Wretch as obliges all whom he disappoints, though his Circumstances constrain them to be civil to him. But there are those that every one would be glad to see, who fall into the same detestable Habit. It is a merciless thing, that any one can be at Ease, and suppose a Set of People who have a Kindness for him, at that Moment waiting out of Respect to him, and refusing to taste their Food or Conversation with the utmost Impatience. One of these Promisers some times shall make his Excuses for not coming at all, so late that half the Company have only to lament, that they have neglected the last Moment to neglect him whom they find a Trifler. They immediately repent of the Value they had for him, and such Repentment repeated, makes Company never depend upon his Promises any more, so that he often comes at the Middle of a Meal, where he is secretly slighted by the Persons with whom he eats, and cursed by the Servants whose Dinner is delayed by his prolonging their Master's Entertainment. It is wonderful, that Men guilty this Way, could never have observed, that the waiting Time, the sitting together, and waiting a little before Dinner, is the most awkwardly passed way of any Part in the four and twenty Hours. If they did think at all, they would reflect upon their Guilt in lengthening such a Suspension of agreeable Life. The constant of ending this Way has in a Degree an Effect upon the Honesty of his Mind who is guilty of it, as common Swearing is a kind of habitual Perjury. It makes the Soul unresponsive to what is Oath is even while it utters it at the Lips. Phocion beholding a wordy Orator while he was making a magnificent Speech to the People full of vain Promises, Methinks, said he, I am no observing my Eyes upon a Cypress Tree, it has all the Pomp and beauty in agreeable in its branches, Leaves, and Height, but alas it bears no Fruit.

Though the Expectation which is raised by impertinent Promisers is thus barren, their Confidence even after Failures is so great, that they substitute by still promising on. I have therefore discoursed of the insignificant Frier, the Porter, and the Castle Builder, and treated them as no ill-deceiving Men, (tho they are to be placed among the frivolously false ones) but Persons who fall into that Way purely to recommend themselves by their Vivacities, but indeed I cannot let heedless Promisers, though in the most minute Circumstances, pass with so slight a Censure. If a Man should take a Resolution to pay only Sums above in hundred Pounds, and yet contract with different People Debts of five and ten how long can we suppose he will keep his Credit? This Man will as long support his good Name in Business, as he will in Conversation, who without Difficulty makes Assignations which he is indifferent whether he keeps or not.

I am the more severe upon this Vice, because I have been so unfortunate as to be a very great Criminal myself. Sir ANDREW FAFSIORT, and all other my Friends who are scrupulous to Promises of the merriest Consideration imaginable from an Habit of Virtue that way, have often upbraided me with it. I take Shame upon myself for this Crime, and more particularly for the greatest I ever committed of the Sort, that when as agreeable a Company of Gentlemen and Ladies as ever were got together, and I forsooth, Mr SPECTATOR, to be of the Party with Women of Merit, like a Booby as I was, mistook the time of Meeting, and came the Night following. I wish every Fool who is negligent in this Kind, may have as great a Loss as I had in this, for the same Company will never meet more, but are dispersed into various Parts of the World, and I am left under the Compunction that I deserve, in so many different Places to be called a Trifler.

* John Scott, a young tradesman of Chippendale Wilts, prevailed on his friends to send him to Oxford, and became D.D. in 1683. He was minister of St. Thomas's, Southwark Rector of St. Giles in the Fields, Prebendary of St. Paul's, Canon of Windsor, and refused a Bishopric. He was a strong opponent of the Catholics, and his "Christian Life," in folio, and 5 vols 8vo, became very popular. He died in 1694.

This Fault is sometimes to be accounted for, when desirable People are fearful of appearing precious and reserved by Denials; but they will find the Apprehension of that Imputation will betray them into a childish Impotence of Mind, and make them promise all who are so kind to ask it of them. This leads such soft Creatures into the Misfortune of seeming to return Overtures of Good-will with Ingratitude. The first Steps in the Breach of a Man's Integrity are much more important than Men are aware of. The Man who scruples breaking his Word in little Things would not suffer in his own Conscience so great Pain for Failures of Consequence, as he who thinks every little Offence against Truth and Justice a Disparagement. We should not make any thing we our selves disapprove habitual to us, if we would be sure of our Integrity.

I remember a Falshood of the trivial Sort, tho' not in relation to Assignations, that exposed a Man to a very uneasy Adventure. Will Trap and Jack Stint were Chamber fellows in the Inner-Temple about 25 Years ago. They one Night sat in the Pit together at a Comedy, where they both observed and liked the same young Woman in the Boxes. Their Kindness for her entered both Hearts deeper than they imagined. Stint had a good Faculty at writing Letters of Love, and made his Address privately that way, while Trap proceeded in the ordinary Course, by Money and her Waiting-Maid. The Lady gave them both Encouragement, receiving Trap into the utmost Favour, and answering at the same time Stint's Letters, and giving him appointments at third Places. Trap began to suspect the Epistolary Correspondence of his Friend, and discovered also that Stint opened all his Letters which came to their common Lodgings, in order to form his own Assignations. After much Anxiety and Restlessness, Trap came to a Resolution, which he thought would break off their Commerce with one another without any hazardous Explanation. He therefore writ a Letter in a feigned Hand to Mr Trap at his Chambers in the Temple. Stint, according to Custom, seized and opened it, and was not a little surpris'd to find the Inside directed to himself, when, with great Perturbation of Spirit, he read as follows.

Mr Stint,

'You have gained a slight Satisfaction at the Expence of doing a very heinous Crime. At the Price of a faithful Friend you have obtained an inconstant Mistress. I rejoice in this Expedient I have thought of to break my Mind to you, and tell you, You are a base Fellow, by a Means which does not expose you to the Affront except you deserve it. I know, Sir, as criminal as you are, you have still Shame enough to avenge yourself against the Hardiness of any one that should publicly tell you of it. I therefore, who have received so many secret Hurts from you, shall take Satisfaction with Safety to myself. I call you Base, and you must bear

'it, or acknowledge it, I triumph over you that you cannot come at me nor do I think it dishonourable to come in Armour to assault him, who was in Ambuscade when he wounded me. What need more be said to convince you of being guilty of the basest Practice imaginable, than that it is such as has made you liable to be treated after this Manner, while you your self cannot in your own Conscience but allow the Justice of the Upbraidings of

Your Injur'd Friend,
Ralph Trap

—Tibi scriptus, Matrona, libellus—Mart

WHEN I reflect upon my Labours for the Publick, I cannot but observe, that Part of the Species, of which I profess myself a Friend and Guardian, is sometimes treated with Severity, that is, there are in my Writings many Descriptions given of all Persons, and not yet any direct Encomium made of those who are good. When I am convinced of this Error, I could not but immediately call to Mind several of the Fair Sex of my Acquaintance, whose Characters deserve to be transmitted to Posterity in Writings which will long outlive mine. But I do not think that a Reason why I should not give them their Place in my Diurnal as long as it will last. For the Service therefore of my Female Readers, I shall single out some Characters of Maids, Wives and Widows, which deserve the Imitation of the Sex. She who shall lead this small illustrious Number of Heroines shall be the amiable Fidela.

Before I enter upon the particular Parts of her Character it is necessary to Preface, that she is the only Child of a decrepid Father, whose Life is bound up in hers. This Gentleman has used Fidela from her Cradle with all the Tenderness imaginable, and has view'd her growing Perfections with the Partiality of a Parent, that soon thought her accomplished above the Children of all other Men, but never thought she was come to the utmost Improvement of which she herself was capable. This Fondness has had very happy Effects upon his own Happiness, for she reads, she dances, she sings, uses her Spinnet and Lute to the utmost Perfection. And the Lady's Use of all these Excellencies, is to divert the old Man in his ease Chair, when he is out of the Pangs of a Chronical Distemper. Fidela is now in the twenty third Year of her Age, but the Application of many Lovers, her vigorous time of Life, her quick Sense of all that is truly gallant and elegant in the Enjoyment of a plentiful Fortune, are not able to draw her from the Side of her good old Father. Certain it is, that there is no kind of Affection so pure and angelick as that of a Father to a Daughter. He beholds her both with, and without Regard to her Sex. In Love to our Wives there is Desire, to our Sons there is Ambition, but in that to our Daughters, there is something which there are no Words to express. Her Life is designed wholly Domestick, and she is so ready a Friend and Companion, that every thing, that passes about a Man, is accompanied with the Idea of her Presence. Her Sex also is naturally so much exposed to Hazard, both as to Fortune and Innocence, that there is, perhaps, a new Cause of Fondness arising from that Consideration also. None but Fathers can have a true Sense of those sort of Pleasures and Sensations, but my Familiarity with the Father of Fidelia makes me let drop the Words which I have heard him speak, and observe upon his Tenderness towards her.

Fidelia on her Part, as I was going to say, as accomplished as she is, with all her Beauty, Wit, Air and Mien, employs her whole Time in Care and Attendance upon her Father. How have I been charmed to see one of the most beautiful Women her Age has produced on her Knees helping on an old Man's Slipper! Her filial Regard to him is what she makes her Diversion, her business, and her Glory. When she was asked by a Friend of her deceased Mother to admit of the Courtship of her Son, she answered that she had a great Respect and Gratitude to her for the Overture in Behalf of one so near to her, but that during her Father's Life, she would admit into her Heart no Value for any thing that should interfere with her Endeavour to make his Remains of Life as happy and easy as could be expected in his Circumstances. The Lady admonished her of the Prime of Life with a Smile which Fidelia answered with a Complaisance that always attends unassigned Virtue. *It is true, Madam, it is to his service I am content to be satisfied; but I expect in the Course of a year of Honour, when he is tendered to us, but I find so much Satisfaction in the Reflection, how much I shall be a good Star's Pain, - I see I shall fare differently upon my Assiduity about him, that I shall exclude the love of the Girl's favours of Passion for the solid Reflections of Duty. I know of no other way; my Wife would be allowed, and what I feel more fear I know not whether I, a Wife, should be willing to be as officious as I am at present about my Friend. The happy Father has her Declaration that she will not marry during his Life, and the Pleasure of seeing that Resolution not in vain to her. Were one to paint filial Affection in its utmost Beauty, he could not have a more lively Idea of it than in beholding Fidelia serving her Father at his Hours of Rising, Meals, and Rest.*

When the general Crowd of Female Youth are consulting their Glasses, preparing for Balls, Assemblies, or Plays for a young Lady who could be regarded among the foremost in those Places, either for her Person, Wit, Fortune, or Conversation, and yet condemn all these Entertainments, to sweeten the heavy Hours of a decreed Parent, is a Resignation truly heroic. Fidelia performs the Duty of a Nurse with all the Beauty of a Bride, nor does she neglect her Person, because of her Attendance on him, when he is too ill to receive Company, to whom she may make an Appearance.

Fidelia, who gives him up her Youth, does not think it any great Sacrifice to add to it the Spoiling of her Dress. Her Care and Exactness in her Habit, convince her Father of the Alacrity of her Mind, and she has of all Women the best Foundation for affecting the Praise of a seeming Negligence. What adds to the Entertainment of the good old Man is, that Fidelia, where Men and Fortune cannot be overlooked by Epistolary Lovers, reads over the Accounts of her Conquests, plays on her Spinnet the gayest Airs, (and while she is doing so, you would think her fond only for Gallantry) to intimate to him the Pleasures she desires for his Satisfaction.

Those who think themselves the Patterns of good Breeding and Gallantry, would be astonished to hear that in those Intervals when the old Gentleman is at ease, and can bear Company, there are in his House in the most regular Order, Assemblies of People of the highest Merit, where there is Conversation without Mention of the Truities of the Absurd, Intolerance between Men and Women with a Passion and the highest Subjects of Morality treated of as natural and accidental Discoveries. All which is owing to the Genius of Fidelia, who at once makes her Father's Way to another World easier, and her self capable of being in Honour to his Name in this.

MR SPECTATOR

'Twas the other Day at the Dear-Garden, in hopes to have seen your short Piece but not being so fortunate, I must tell you by way of Letter, that there is a Mystery among the Gladiators which has escaped your Spectatorial Penetration. For being in a Box at an Assembly, near that renowned Seat of Honour above-mentioned, I over-heard two Masters of the Science agreeing to quarrel on the next Opportunity. This was to happen in the Company of a Set of the Fraternity of Bred-Hilts, who were to meet that Evening. When this was settled, one asked the other, Will you give Cuts or receive? the other answered, Receive. It was replied, Are you a passionate Man? No provided you cut no more nor no deeper than we agree. I thought it my Duty to acquaint you with this, that the People may not pay their Money for Fighting and be cheated.

MR SPECTATOR,

ALL Men through different Paths, make at the same common thing, Money, and it is to her we owe the Politician, the Merchant and the Lawyer may be free with you, I believe to that also we are beholden for our Spectator. I am apt to think, that could we look into our own Hearts, we should see Money engraved in them in more lively and moving Characters than Self Preservation for who can reflect upon the Merchant hoisting Sail in a doubtful Pursuit of her, and all Manland sacrificing

'their Quiet to her, but must perceive that the Characters of Self-Preservation (which were doubtless originally the brightest) are sullied, if not wholly defaced, and that those of Money (which at first was only a double as a Means to Security) are of late so brightened, that the Characters of Self-Preservation, like a less Light set by a greater, are become almost imperceptible. Thus has Money got the upper Hand of what all Mankind formerly thought most dear, viz. Security and I wish I could say she had here put a Stop to her Victories but, this common Homesty fell a Sacrifice to her. This is the Way Scholastic Men talk of the greatest Good in the World but I, a Tradesman, shall give you another Account of this Matter in the plain Narrative of my own Life. I think it proper, in the first Place, to acquaint my Readers, that since my setting out in the World, which was in the Year 1660, I never wanted Money having begun with an indifferent good Stock in the Tobacco-Trade, to which I was bred and by the continual Successes, it has pleased Providence to bless my Endeavours with, am at last arrived at what they call a Plumb. To uphold my Discourse in the Manner of your Wits or Philosophers, by speaking fine things, or drawing Inferences, as they pretend, from the Nature of the Subject, I recount it vain having never found any thing in the Writings of such Men, that did not favour more of the Invention of the Brain, or what is styled Speculation, than of sound Judgment or profitable Observation. I will readily grant indeed, that there is what the Wits call Natural in their Fall which is the utmost those curious Authors can assume to themselves, and is indeed all they endeavour at, for they are but lamentable Leeches. And, what, I pray, is Natural? That which is pleasing and easy. And what are Pleasing and Easy? Forsooth, a new Thought or Conceit dressed up in smooth quaint Language to make you smile and wag your Head, as being what you never imagined before, and yet wonder why you had not, meer frothy Amusements! fit only for Boys or silly Women to be caught with.

'It is not my present Intention to instruct my Readers in the Methods of acquiring Riches that may be the Work of another Essay, but to exhibit the real and solid Advantages I have found by them in my long and manifold Experience nor yet all the Advantages of so worthy and valuable a Blessing, (for who does not know or imagine the Comforts of being warm or living at Ease? And that Power and Preheminence are their inseparable Attendants?) But only to instance the great Supports they afford us under the severest Calamities and Misfortunes, to shew that the Love of them is a special Antidote against Immorality and Vice, and that the same does likewise naturally dispose Men to Actions of Piety and Devotion. All which I can make out by my own Experience, who think my self no ways particular from the rest of Mankind, nor better nor worse by Nature than generally other Men are.

'In the Year 1665, when the Sickness was, I lost by it my Wife and two Children, which were all my Stock. Probably I might have had more, considering I was married between 4 and 5 Years but finding her to be a teeming Woman, I was careful, as having then little above a Brace of thousand Pounds, to carry on my Trade and must run a Family with. I loved them as usually Men do their Wives and Children, and therefore could not resist the first Impulses of Nature on so rousing a Loss, but I quickly roused my self, and found Means to alleviate, and at last conquer my Affliction, by reflecting how that she and her Children having been no great Expence to me, the best Part of her Fortune was still left, that my Charge being reduced to my self, a Journeyman, and a Maid I might live far cheaper than before, and that being now a childless Widower, I might perhaps marry a no less deserving Woman, and with a much better Fortune than she brought, which was but 800! And to convince my Readers that such Considerations as these were proper and apt to produce such an Effect, I remember it was the constant Observation at that deplorable Time, when so many Hundreds were swept away, that the Rich ever bore the Loss of their Families and Relations far better than the Poor, the latter having little or nothing before hand, and living from Hand to Mouth, placed the whole Comfort and Satisfaction of their Lives in their Wives and Children, and were therefore inconsolable.

'The following Year happened the Fire at which Time, by good Providence, it was my Fortune to have converted the greatest Part of my Effects into ready Money, on the Prospect of an extraordinary Advantage which I was preparing to lay Hold on. This Calamity was very terrible and astonishing, the Fury of the Flames being such, that whole Streets, at several distant Places, were destroyed at one and the same Time, so that (as it is well known) almost all our Citizens were burnt out of what they had. But what did I then do? I did not stand gazing on the Ruins of our noble Metropolis. I did not shake my Head, wring my Hands, sigh, and shed Tears. I consider'd with my self what could this avail. I fell a plodding what Advantages might be made of the ready Cash I had, and immediately bethought my self what wonderful Penny-worths might be bought of the Goods, that were saved out of the Fire. In short, with about 2000l. and a little Credit, I bought as much Tobacco as rus'd my Estate to the Value of 10000l. I then looked on the Ashes of our City, and the Misery of its late Inhabitants, as an Effect of the just Wrath and Indignation of Heaven towards a sinful and perverse People.

'After this I married again, and that Wife dying, I took another, but both proved to be idle Baggages the first gave me a great deal of Plague and Vexation by her Extravagancies, and I became one of the Bywords of the City. I knew it would be to no manner of Purpose to go about to curb the Fancies and Inclinations of Women, which fly out the more for being restrained but what I could I did. I watched her narrowly, and by good Luck found her in the from Anonymous Authors, who have made it their Merit to convey to us so great a Charity in secret. There are few Works of Genius that come out at first with the Author's Name. The Writer generally makes a Tryal of them in the World before he owns them; and, I believe, very few, who are capable of Writing, would set Pen to Paper, if they knew, before-hand, that they must not publish their Productions but on such Conditions. For my own part, I must declare, the Papers I present the Publick are like Fairy Favourites which shall last no longer than while the Author is concerned.

That which makes it particularly difficult to restrain these Sons of Calumny and Defamation is, that all Sides are equally guilty of it, and that every dirty Scribler is countenanced by great Names, whose Interests he propagates by such vile and infamous Methods. I have never yet heard of a Ministry, who have inflicted an exemplary Punishment on an Author that has supported their Cause with Falschood and Scandl, and treated, in a most cruel manner, the names of those who have been looked upon as their Rivals and Antagonists. Would a Government set an everlasting Mark of their Displeasure upon one of those infamous Writers, who makes his Court to them by tearing to Pieces the Reputation of a Computator, we should quickly see an End put to this Race of Vermin, that are a Scandl to Government, and a Reproach to Human Nature. Such a Proceeding would make a Minister of State shine in History, and would fill all Mankind with a just Abhorrence of Persons who should treat him unworthily, and employ against him those Arms which he scorned to make use of against his Enemies.

I cannot think that any one will be so unjust as to imagine, what I have here said is spoken with a Respect to any Party or Faction. Every one who has in him the Sentiments either of a Christian or a Gentleman, cannot but be highly offended at this wicked and ungenerous Practice, which is so much in use among us at present, that it is become a kind of National Crime, and distinguishes us from all the Governments that lie about us. I cannot but look upon the finest Strokes of Satyr which are aimed at particular Persons, and which are supported even with the Appearances of Truth, to be the Marks of an evil Mind, and highly Criminal in themselves. Infamy, like other Punishments, is under the Direction and Distribution of the Magistrate, and not of any private Person. Accordingly we learn from a Fragment of Cicero, that tho' there were very few Capital Punishments in the twelve Tables, a Libel or Lampoon which took away the good Name of another, was to be punished by Death. But this is far from being our Case. Our Satyr is nothing but Ribldry, and Billinggate Scurrility passes for Wit; and he who can call Names in the greatest Variety of Phrases, is looked upon to have the shrewdest Pen. By this Means the Honour of Families is ruined, the highest Posts and greatest Titles are rendered cheap and vile in the Sight of the People, the noblest Virtues, and most exalted Parts, exposed to the Contempt of the Vicious and the Ignorant. Should a Foreigner who knows nothing of our private Factions, or one who is to act his Part in the World when our present Heats and Animosities are forgot, should, I say, such an one form to himself a Notion of the greatest Men of all Sides in the British Nation, who are now living, from the Characters which are given them in some or other of those abominable Writings which are daily Published among us, what a Nation of Monsters must we appear!

As this cruel Practice tends to the utter Subversion of all Truth and Humanity among us, it deserves the utmost Detestation and Discouragement of all who have either the Love of their Country, or the Honour of their Religion at Heart. I would therefore earnestly recommend it to the Consideration of those who deal in these pernicious Arts of Writing, and of those who take Pleasure in the Reading of them. As for the first, I have spoken of them in former Papers, and have not stuck to rank them with the Murderer and Assassin. Every honest Man sets as high a Value upon a good Name, as upon Life itself and I cannot but think that those who privily assault the one, would destroy the other, might they do it with the same Secrecy and Impunity.

As for Persons who take Pleasure in the reading and dispersing of such detestable Libels, I am afraid they fall very little short of the Guilt of the first Composers. By a Law of the Emperors Valentinian and Valens, it was made Death for any Person not only to write a Libel, but if he met with one by chance, not to tear or burn it. But because I would not be thought singular in my Opinion of this Matter, I shall conclude my Paper with the Words of Monsieur Bayle, who was a Man of great Freedom of Thought, as well as of exquisite Learning and Judgment.

'I cannot imagine, that a Man who disperses a Libel is less desirous of doing Mischief than the Author himself. But what shall we say of the Pleasure which a Man takes in the reading of a Defamatory Libel? Is it not an heinous Sin in the Sight of God? We must distinguish in this Point. This Pleasure is either an agreeable Sensation we are afflicted with, when we meet with a witty Thought which is well expressed, or it is a Joy which we conceive from the Dishonour of the Person who is defamed. I will say nothing to the first of these Cases, for perhaps some would think that my Morality is not severe enough, if I should affirm that a Man is not Master of those agreeable Sensations, any more than of those occasioned by Sugar or Honey, when they touch his Tongue; but as to the second, every one will own that Pleasure to be a heinous Sin. The Pleasure in the first Case is of no Continuance: it prevents our Reason and Reflection, and may be immediately followed by a secret Grief, to see our Neighbour's Honour blasted. If it does not cease immediately, it is a Sign that we are not displeased with the Ill nature of the Satyrist, but are glad to see him defame his Enemy by all kinds of Stories; and then we deserve the Punishment to which the Writer of the Libel is subject. I shall here add the Words of a Modern Author St Gregory upon excommunicating those Writers who had dishonoured Castorius, does not except those who read their Works, because, says he,

'if Calumnies have always been the delight of the Hearers, and a gratification of those Persons who have no other Advantage over honest Men, is not he who takes Pleasure in reading them as guilty as he who composed them? It is an uncontested Maxim that they who approve an Action would certainly do it if they could: that is, if some Reason of Self-love did not hinder them. There is no difference, says Cicero, between advising a Crime, and approving it when committed. The Roman Law confirmed this Maxim, having subjected the Approvers and Authors of this Evil to the same Penalty. We may therefore conclude, that those who are pleased with reading Defamatory Labels, so far as to approve the Authors and Dispersers of them, are as guilty as if they had composed them: for if they do not write such Libels themselves, it is because they have not the Talent of Writing, or because they will run no hazard. The Author produces other Authorities to confirm his Judgment in this particular. C

Est natura Homini in Novitatis avida
Plin. apud Lall

THURF is no Humour in my Countrymen, which I am more inclined to wonder at, than their general Thirst after News. There are about half a Dozen Ingenious Men, who live very plentifully upon this Curiosity of their Fellow-Subjects. They all of them receive the same Advices from abroad and very often in the same Words, but their Way of Cooling it is so different, that there is no Citizen, who has an Eye to the publick Good that can leave the Coffee house with Peace of Mind before he has given every one of them a Reading. These several Dishes of News are so very agreeable to the Palate of my Countrymen, that they are not only pleased with them when they are served up hot, but when they are again set cold before them, by those penetrating Politicians, who oblige the Publick with their Reflections and Observations upon every piece of Intelligence that is sent us from abroad. The Text is given us by one set of Writers, and the Comment by another.

But notwithstanding we have the same Tale told us in so many different papers, and if occasion requires in so many Articles of the same Paper notwithstanding a Secrecy of Foreign Posts we hear the same Story repeated, by different Advices from Paris, Brussels, the Hague, and from every great Town in Europe, notwithstanding the Multitude of Annotations, Explanations, Reflections, and various Readings which it passes through, our Time lies heavy on our Hands till the Arrival of a fresh Mail. We long to receive further particulars, to hear what will be the next Step, or what will be the Consequences of that which has been already taken. A Westerly

Wind keeps the whole Town in Suspence, and puts a Stop to Conversation.

This general Curiosity has been roused and inflamed by our late Wars, and, if rightly directed, might be of good Use to a Person who has such a Thirst awakened in him. Why should not a Man, who takes Delight in reading every thing that is new, apply himself to History, Travels, and other Writings of the same kind, where he will find perpetual Fuel for his Curiosity, and meet with much more Pleasure and Improvement, than in these Papers of the Week? An honest Tradesman, who languishes a whole Summer in Expectation of a Bittell, and perhaps is balked at last, may here meet with half a dozen in a Day. He may read the News of a whole Campaign, in less time than he now bestows upon the Products of any single Post. Fights, Conquests and Revolutions lie thick together. The Reader's Curiosity is roused and satisfied every Moment, and his Passions disappointed or gratified, without being detained in a State of uncertainty from Day to Day, or lying at the Mercy of Ser [and] Wind. In short, the Mind is not here kept in a perpetual Gripe after Knowledge, nor punished with that Eternal Thirst, which is the Portion of all our modern News mongers and Coffee house Politicians.

All Matters of Fact which a Man did not know before, are News to him: and I do not see how any Haberdasher in Chenyside is more concerned in the present Quarrel of the Cantons, than he was in that of the League. At least, I believe every one will allow me, it is of more Importance to an English man to know the History of his Ancestors, than that of his Contemporaries who live upon the Banks of the Danube or the Borysthenes. As for those who are of another Mind, I shall recommend to them the following Letter, from a Projector, who is willing to turn a Penny by this remarkable Curiosity of his Countrymen.

MR SPECTATOR

'You must have observed, that Men who frequent Coffee houses, and delight in News, are pleased with every thing that is Matter of Fact, so it be what they have not heard before. A Victory, or a Defeat, are equally agreeable to them. The shutting of a Cardinal's Mouth pleases them one Post, and the opening of it another. They are glad to hear the French Court is removed to Martin, and are afterwards as much delighted with its Return to Versailles. They read the Advertisements with the same Curiosity as the Articles of publick News, and are as pleased to hear of a Pye bird Horse that is strayed out of a Field near Islington, as of a whole Troop that has been engaged in any Foreign Adventure. In short, they have a Relish for every thing that is News, let the matter of it be what it will, or to speak more properly, they are Men of a Voracious Appetite, but no Taste. Now, Sir, since the great Fountain of News, I mean the War, is very near being dried up, and since these Gentlemen have contracted such an insatiable Thirst after it, I have taken

* Dissertation upon Defamatory Labels § 17

* [or]

'their Case and my own into Consideration, and have thought of a Project which may turn to the Advantage of us both I have I thoughts of publishing a daily Paper, which shall comprehend in it all the most remarkable Occurrences in every little Town, Village and Hamlet, that lye within ten Miles of London, or in other Words, within the Verge of the Penny-Post I have pitched upon this Scene of Intelligence for two Reasons, first, because the Carriage of Letters will be very cheap, and secondly, because I may receive them every Day By this means my Readers will have their News fresh and fresh, and many worthy Citizens who cannot Sleep with any Satisfaction at present, for want of being informed how the World goes, may go to Bed contentedly, it being my Design to put out my Paper every Night at nine a Clock precisely I have already established Correspondences in these several Places and received very good Intelligence

'By my last Advices from Knights-bridge I hear that a Horse was clipped into the Pound on the third Instant, and that he was not released when the Letters came away

'We are informed from Panbridge, that a dozen Weddings were lately celebrated in the Mother Church of that Place, but are referred to their next Letters for the Names of the Parties concerned

'Letters from Brompton advise That the Widow Blyen had received several Visits from John Mildeu, which affords great matter of Speculation in those Parts

'By a Fisherman which lately touched at Hammer-smith, there is Advice from Putney, that a certain Person well known in that Place, is like to lose his Election for Church-warden but this being Boat news, we cannot give entire Credit to it

'Letters from Paddington bring little more, than that William Soueah, the Sow gelder, passed through that Place the 5th Instant

'They advise from Fulham, that things remained there in the same State they were They had Intelligence, just as the Letters came away, of a Tub of excellent Ale just set abroad at Parsons Green, but this wanted Confirmation

'I have here, Sir, given you a Specimen of he News with which I intend to entertain the Town, and which, when drawn up regularly in the Form of a News Paper, will, I doubt not, be very acceptable to many of those Publick-spirited Readers, who take more delight in acquainting themselves with other Peoples Business than their own I hope a Paper of this kind, which lets us know what is done near home, may be more useful to us, than those which are filled with Advices from Zug and Bei der, and make some amends for that Dearth of Intelligence, which we may justly apprehend from times of Peace If I find that you receive this Project favourably, I will shortly trouble you with one or two more, and in the mean time am, most worthy Sir, with all due Respect,

Your most Obedient,
and most Humble Servant

THERE is not a more pleasing Exercise of the Mind than Gratitude It is accompanied with such an inward Satisfaction, that the Duty is sufficiently rewarded by the Performance It is not like the Practice of many other Virtues, difficult and painful, but attended with so much Pleasure, that were there no positive Command which enjoind it, nor any Recompence laid up for it hereafter, a generous Mind would indulge in it, for the natural Gratification that accompanies it.

If Gratitude is due from Man to Man, how much more from Man to his Maker? The Supreme Being does not only confer upon us those Bounties which proceed more immediately from his Hand, but even those Benefits which are conveyed to us by others Every Blessing we enjoy, by what Means soever it may be derived upon us, is the Gift of him who is the great Author of Good, and Father of Mercies

If Gratitude, when exerted towards one another, naturally produces a very pleasing Sensation in the Mind of a Grateful Man it exalts the Soul into Rapture, when it is employed on this great Object of Gratitude on this Beneficent Being who has given us every thing we already possess, and from whom we expect every thing we yet hope for

Most of the Works of the Pagan Poets were either direct Hymns to their Deities, or tended indirectly to the Celebration of their respective Attributes and Perfections Those who are acquainted with the Works of the Greek and Latin Poets which are still extant, will upon Reflection find this Observation so true, that I shall not enlarge upon it One would wonder that more of our Christian Poets have not turned their Thoughts this way, especially if we consider, that our Idea of the Supreme Being is not only infinitely more Great and Noble than what could possibly enter into the Heart of an Heathen, but filled with every thing that can raise the Imagination, and give an Opportunity for the sublimest Thoughts and Conceptions

Plutarch tells of a Heathen who was singing an Hymn to Diana, in which he celebrated her for her Delight in Human Sacrifices, and other Instances of Cruelty and Revenge upon which a Poet who was present at this piece of Devotion, and seems to have had a truer Idea of the Divine Nature, told the Votary, by way of Reproof, that in recompence for his Hymn, he heartily wished he might have a Daughter of the same Temper with the Goddess he celebrated It was indeed impossible to write the Praises of one of those false Deities, according to the Pagan Creed, without a mixture of Impertinence and Absurdity

The Jews, who before the Times of Christianity were the only People that had this Knowledge of the true God, have set the Christian World an Example how they ought to employ this Divine

Talent of which I am speaking As that Nation produced Men of great Genius, without considering them as inspired Writers, they have transmitted to us many Hymns and Divine Odes, which excel those that are delivered down to us by the ancient Greeks and Romans in the Poetry, as much as in the Subject to which it was consecrated. Thus I think might easily be shewn, if there were occasion for it.

I have already communicated to the Publick some Pieces of Divine Poetry, and as they have met with a very favourable Reception, I shall from time to time publish any Work of the same nature which has not yet appeared in Print, and may be acceptable to my Readers.

When all thy Mercies, O my God,
My rising Soul confess, Transported with the Love I feel, I rest In Wonder, Love, and Praise

II

O how shall Words with equal Warmth
The Gratitude declare That glows within my ravish'd Heart?
But 'twill e'er be read if there

This Power does my Life sustain'd,
And all my Wants redress,
When in the silent Night I lay,
And I am giv'g up the Breast

To all my weak Complaints and Cries, Thy Mercy let 'em hear,
Ere yet my feeble Thoughts had learnt
To join themselves in Prayer

Unnumber'd Comforts to my Soul
Thy tender Care bestow'd, Before my infant Heart conceiv'd From whom those Comforts flow'd

When in the slippery Paths of Youth With heedless Steps I ran, Thou art unseen to me and me safe
And led me up to Man

Sine me, Vacuum tempus ne quod detur mihi Laboris — Per Hera

It is an inexpressible Pleasure to know a little of the World, and be of no Character or Significance in it. To be ever unconcerned, and ever looking on new Objects with an endless Curiosity, is a Delight known only to those who are turned for Speculation. Nay, they who enjoy it must value things only as they are the Objects of Speculation, without deriving any worldly Advantage to themselves from them, but just as they are what contribute to their Amusement, or the Improvement of the Mind. I lay one Night last Week at Richmond, and being restless, not out of Dissatisfaction, but a certain busie Inclination one sometimes has, I rose at Four in the Morning, and took Boat for London, with a Resolution to row by Boat and Coach for the next four and twenty Hours, till the many different Objects I must needs meet with should tire my Imagination, and give me an Inclination to a Repose more profound than I was at that Time capable of. I beg People's Pardon for an odd Humour I am guilty of, and was often that Day, which is saluting any Person whom I like, whether I know him or not. This is a Particularity would be tolerated in me, if they considered that the greatest Pleasure I know I receive at my Eyes, and that I am obliged to an agreeable Person for coming abroad into my View, as another is for a Visit of Conversation at their own Houses.

The Hours of the Day and Night are taken up in the Cities of London and Westminster by People as different from each other as those who are born in different Centuries. Men of Six a Clock give way to those of Nine. They of Nine to the Generation of Twelve, and they of Twelve disappear, and make Room for the fashionable World, who have made two a Clock the Noon of the Day.

When we first put off from Shore, we soon fell in with a Fleet of Gardeners bound for the several Market-Ports of London, and it was the most pleasing Scene imaginable to see the Cheerfulness with which those industrious People ply'd their Way to a certain Sale of their Goods. The Banks on each Side are as well peopled, and beautified with as agreeable Plantations, as any Spot on the Earth but the Thames itself, loaded with the Product of each Shore, added very much to the Landship. It was very easy to observe by their Sailing, and the Countenances of the ruddy Virgins, who were Supercargoes, the Parts of the Town to which they were bound. There was an Air in the Purveyors for Covent Garden, who frequently converse with Morning Rates, very unlike the seemingly Sobriety of those bound for Sticks Market.

Nothing remarkable happened in our Voyage but I landed with Ten Sail of Apricock Boats at Strand Bridge, after having put in at Nine Elms, and taken in Melons consigned by Mr Cuffe of that Place, to Sarah Sewell and Company, at their Stall in Covent Garden. We arrived at Strand Bridge at Six of the Clock, and were unloading when the Hackney Coachmen of the foregoing Night took their leave of each other at the Dark House, to go to Bed before the Day was too far spent, Chimney Sweepers pass'd by us as we made up to the Market, and some Rallery happen'd between one of the Frunt Wenches and those black Men, about the Devil and Eve, with Allusion to their several Professions. I could not believe any Place more entertaining than Covent Garden, where I strolled from one Frunt Shop to another, with Crowds of agreeable young Women around me who were purchasing Fruit for their respective Families. It was almost eight of the Clock before I could leave that Variety of Objects. I took Coach and followed a Young Lady, who tripp'd into another just before me, attended by her Maid. I saw immediately she was of the Family of the Vauntloves. There are a set of these who of all Things affect the Play of Blindman's Buff, and leading Men into Love for they know not whom, who are fled they know not where. This sort of Woman is usually a janty Slattern she hangs on her Cloaths, plays her Head, varies her Posture, and changes Place incessantly, and all with an Appearance of striving at the same time to hide her self, and yet give you to understand she is in Humour to laugh at you. You must have often seen the Coachmen make Signs with their Fingers as they drive by each other, to intimate how much they have got that Day. They can carry on that Language to give Intelligence where they are driving. In an instant my Coachman took the Wink to pursue, and the Lady's Driver gave the Hint that he was going through Long-Acre towards St. James's. While he whipped up James-Street, we drove for Kings-Street, to give the Pass at St. Martin's Lane. The Coachmen took care to meet jostle, and threaten each other for Wry, and be entangled at the End of Newport-Street and Long-Acre. The Fright, you must believe, brought down the Lady's Coach Door, and obliged her, with her Mask off, to enquire into the Bustle, when she sees the Man she would avoid. The Tackle of the Coach Window is so bad she cannot draw it up again, and she drives on sometimes wholly discovered, and sometimes half escaped, according to the Accident of Carriages in her Way. One of these Ladies keeps her Seat in a Hackney-Coach as well as the best Rider does on a managed Horse. The laced Shoof of her left Foot, with a careless Gesture, just appearing on the opposite Cushion, held her both firm, and in a proper Attitude to receive the next Jolt.

As she was an excellent Coach Woman, many were the Glances at each other which we had for an Hour and an Half in all Parts of the Town by the Skill of our Drivers till at last my Lady, was conveniently lost with Notice from her Coachman to ours to make off, and he should hear where she went. This Chase was now at an End, and the Fellow who drove her came to us, and discovered that he was ordered to come again in an Hour, for that she was a Silk Worm. I was surprized with this Phrase, but found it was a Cant among the Hackney Fraternity for their best Customers, Women who ramble twice or thrice a Week from Shop to Shop, to turn over all the Goods in Town without buying any thing. The Silk worms are, it seems, indulged by the Tradesmen for tho' they never buy, they are ever talking of new Silks, Laces and Ribbands, and serve the Owners in getting them Customers as their common Dunners do in making them pay.

The Day of People of Fashion began now to Break, and Carts and Hacks were mingled with Equipages of Show and Vanity when I resolv'd to walk out of Cheapness but my unhappy Curiosity is such, that I find it always my Interest to take Coach, for some odd Adventure among Beggars, Billad-Singers, or the like, detains and throws me into Expence. It happen'd so immediately for at the Corner of Warwick Street, as I was listening to a new Billad, a ragged Rascal, a Beggar who knew me, came up to me, and began to turn the Eyes of the good Company upon me, by telling me he was extrem Poor, and should die in the Street for want of Drink, except I immediately would have the Charity to give him Six pence to go into the next Ale house and save his Life. He urg'd, with a melancholy Face, that all his Family had died of Thirst. All the Mob have Humour, and two or three began to take the Jest by which Mr Sturdy carried his Point, and let me sneak off to a Coach. As I drove along, it was a pleasing Reflection to see the World so prettily chequered since I left Richmond, and the Scene still filling with Children of a new Hour. This Satisfaction increased as I moved towards the City and gay Signs, well disposed Streets, magnificent publick Structures, and wealthy Shops, adorned with contented Faces, made the Joy still rising till we came into the Centre of the City, and Centre of the World of Trade, the Exchange of London. As other men in the Crowds about me were pleas'd with their Hopes and Bargains, I found my Account in observing them in Attention to their several Interests. I, indeed, looked upon my self as the richest Man that wall'd the Leicester that Day for my Benevolence made me share the Gains of every Bargain that was made. It was not the least of my distractions in my Survey, to go up six or seven and price the Shirts of agreeable Lenity in abundance of pretty Hands busy in the Fold of Ribbands, and the utmost Eagerness of incredible Prices in the sale of Patches Pins and Wires, on each side the Counters was an Amusement in which I should never have indulged my self had not the dear Creature called to me to ask what I wanted when I could not answer, only That's all. I went to one of the Windows which opened to the Area below, where all the several Voices lost their Direction and I rose up in a confused Humming which crept in me a Reflection that could not come into the Mind of any but of one a little too cautious for I said to my self, with a kind of Pain in Thought, How many are all the Hurry of this World's business? In these or no much weaker Thoughts, I had left to live, lost my Place at the Chop House, where every Man accers him, to the natural Lustfulness or Silence of our Nations sits in a public Room a Mass of Proth or Chop of Vest in dumb Silence as if they had no presence to speak to each other on the foot of being Men, except they were of each others Acquaintance.

I went afterwards to Barbours and saw People who had am- I with me at the five penny Ordinar just before, give half for the Value of large Estates and could not but behold with great Pleasure, Property lodged in and transferred in a Moment from such as would never be Wiser of half as much as is seen in them and given from them every Day they live. But before Five in the Afternoon I left the City, came to my common scene of Covent Garden and passed the Evening at Stills in attending the Discourses of several Sets of People, who relieved each other within my Hearing on the Subjects of Carthage, Dice, Love, Learning and Politics. The last Subject kept me till I heard the Streets in the Possession of the Bell man, who had now the World to himself, and cry'd, First Two of Clock. This rous'd me from my Seat and I went to my Lodging led by a Light, whom I put into the Discourse of his private Oeconomy, and made him give me an Account of the Charge Hazard, Profit and Loss of a Family that depended upon a Link, with a Design to end my trivial Day with the Generosity of Six pence, in stead of a third Part of that Sum. When I came to my Chambers I writ down these Minutes but it was not a Loss what Instruction I should propose to my Readers from the Enumeration of so many insignificant Matters and Occurrences and I thought it of great Use, if they could learn with me to keep their Minds open to Gratification, and ready to receive it from any thing it meets with. This one Circumstance will make every Face you see give you the Satisfaction you now take in holding that of a Friend will make every Object a pleasing one will make all the Good which ar-rises to any Man, an Increase of Happiness to your self

*I am Asis Mature More a Clog
Grata Carpentis Thyra per inuenerit Plus in*

THE following Letters I receive in them Reflection is which will seem of Importance both to the Learned World and to Domestic Life. There is in the first an Allusion so well carried on, that it cannot but be very pleasing to have a Taste of great Wit and the other Billets may have their Use in common Life.

Mr SPECTATOR

As I walked to other Day in a fine Garden, and observed the great Variety of Improvements in Plants and Flowers beyond what the otherwise would have been, I was naturally led into a Reflection upon the Advantages of Education or Moral Culture how many good Qualities in the Mind are lost, for want of the due Care in nursing and skilfully bringing them, how many Virtues are choked, by the Multitude of Weeds which are suffered to grow among them, how excellent Parts are often starved and useless, by being planted in a wrong Soil and how very seldom do these moral Seeds produce the noble Fruit which might be expected from them, by a Neglect of proper Manuring necessary Pruning in an untimely Manner and of our tender Inclinations and first Spring of Life. These obvious Speculations made me at length conclude, that there is a sort of vegetable Principle in the Mind of every Man when he comes into the World. In Infants the Seeds lie buried and undiscovered till after a while they sprout forth in a kind of rational Leaves, which are Herbs and in due Season the Flowers begin to appear in Variety of beautiful Colours, and all the gay Pictures of youthful Fancy and Imagination at first the young knits and is formed, which is green, perhaps first, and some unpleasant to the Taste, and not fit to be gathered till ripened by due Care and Application it discovers itself in all the noble Productions of Philosophy, Mathematics close Reasoning, and humane Argumentation. And these I raise when they arrive at a just Maturity and are of a good Kind, afford the most vigorous Nourishment to the Minds of Men. I reflected further on the intellectual Leaves beforementioned, and found almost as great a Variety among them as in the vegetable World. I could easily observe the smooth shining Italian Leaves the rimbly Green the Aspen always in Motion the Greek and Latin Evergreens the Spanish Myrtle, the English Oak, the Scotch Hawthistle, the Irish Shrub, the French Geranium and Dandelion Holly, the Polish and American Nettle besides a vast Number of Poticks imported from Asia, Africa, and

'America I saw several barren Plants, which bore only Leaves, without any Hopes of Flower or Fruit. The Leaves of some were fragrant and well shaped, of others ill-scented and irregular. I wonder'd at a Set of old whimsical Botanists, who spent their whole Lives in the Contemplation of some withered Egyptian, Coptick, Armenian, or Chinese Leaves, while others made it their Business to collect in voluminous Herbals all the several Leaves of some one Tree. The Flowers afforded a most diverting Entertainment, in a wonderful Variety of Figures, Colours and Scents, however, most of them withered soon, or at best are but Animals. Some profess'd Iorists make them their constant Study and Employment, and despise all Fruit, and now and then a few fanciful People spend all their Time in the Cultivation of a single Tulip, or a Carnation. But the most agreeable Amusement seems to be the well chusing, mixing, and binding together these Flowers, in pleasing Noses to present to Ladies. The Scent of Italian Flowers is observed like their other Perfume, to be too strong, and to hurt the Brain: that of the French with glaring, grudy Colours, yet faint and luguid, German and Northern Flowers have little or no Smell, or sometimes an unpleasant one. The Antients had a Secret to give a lasting Beauty, Colour, and Sweetness to some of their choice Flowers, which flourish to this Day, and which few of the Moderns can effect. These are becoming enough and agreeable in their Season, and do often handsomely adorn an Entertainment, but an Over fondness of them seems to be a Disense. It rarely happens to find a Plant vigorous enough, to have like an Orange-Tree) at once beautiful shining Leaves, fragrant Flowers, and delicious nourishing Fruit.

SIR, Yours, &c

Dear SPEC,

August 6, 1712

'You have given us in your Spectator of Saturday last, a very excellent Discourse upon the Force of Custom, and its wonderful Efficacy in making every thing pleasant to us. I cannot deny but that I received above Two penny worth of Instruction from your Paper, and in the general was very well pleased with it, but I am, without a Compliment, sincerely troubled that I cannot exactly be of your Opinion, That it makes every thing pleasing to us. In short, I have the Honour to be yoked to a young Lady, who is, in plain English, for her Standing, a very eminent Scold. She began to break her Mind very freely both to me and to her Servants about two Months after our Nuptials: and tho' I have been accustomed to this Humour of hers this three Years, yet, I do not know what's the Matter with me, but I am no more delighted with it than I was at the very first. I have advised with her Relations about her, and they all tell me that her Mother and her Grandmother before her were both taken much after the same manner so that since it runs in the Blood, I have but small Hopes of her Recovery. I should be glad to have a little of your Advice in this Matter. I would not willingly trouble you to contrive how it may be a Pleasure to me if you

'will but put me in a Way that I may bear it with Indifference, I shall rest satisfied

Dear SPEC,

Your very humble Servant

P S 'I must do the poor Girl the Justice to let you know, that this Match was none of her own chusing, (or indeed of mine either) in Consideration of which I avoid giving her the least Provocation, and indeed we live better together than usually Folks do who hated one another when they were first joined. To evade the Sin against Parents, or at least to extenuate it, my Dear muls at my Father and Mother, and I curse hers for making the Match

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I like the Theme you lately gave out extremely, and should be as glad to handle it as any Man living. But I find myself no better qualified to write about Money, than about my Wife: for, to tell you a Secret which I desire may go no further, I am Master of neither of those Subjects

Yours,

Pill Garlick

Aug 8, 1712

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I desire you would print this in Ital cl, so as it may be generally taken Notice of. It is designed only to admonish all Persons, who speak either at the Bar, Pulpit, or any publick Assembly whatsoever, how they discover their Ignorance in the Use of Similes. There are in the Pulpit it self, as well as other Places, such gross Abuses in this Kind, that I give thus Warning to all I know, I shall bring them for the Future before your Spectatorial Authority. On Sunday last, one, who shall be nameless, reproving several of his Congregation for standing at Prayers, was pleased to say, One would think, like the Elephant, you had no Knees. Now I myself saw an Elephant in Bartholomew's Fair kneel down to take on his Back the ingenious Mr William Penkethman

OTWAY, in his Tragedy of Venice preserv'd, has described the Misery of a Man, whose Effects are in the Hands of the Law, with great Spirit. The Bitterness of being the Scorn and Laughter of base Minds, the Anguish of being insulted by Men hardened beyond the Sense of Shame or Pity, and the Injury of a Man's Fortune being wrsted, under Pretence of Justice, are excellently aggravated in the following Speech of *Pierre to Jaffier*¹

'turned to make up the Coldness and Indifference that is used towards me. All good and generous Men will have an Eye of Kindness for me for my own Sake, and the rest of the World will regard me for yours. There is an happy Constellation in Riches, as well as a destructive one in Poverty, the Rich can make rich without parting with any of their Store, and the Conversation of the Poor makes Men poor though they borrow nothing of them. How this is to be accounted for I know not? but Men's Estimation follows us according to the Company we keep. If you are what you were to me, you can go a great Way towards my Recovery, if you are not, my good Fortune, if ever it returns, will return by slower Approaches.

I am SIR,

Your Affectionate Friend,
and Humble Servant

This was answered with a Condescension that did not, by long impertinent Professions of kindness, insult his Distress, but was as follows.

Dear Tom,

"I am very glad to hear that you have Heart enough to begin the World a second Time. I am sure you do not think your numerous Family at all diminished (in the Gifts of Nature for which I have ever so much admired them) by what has so lately happened to you. I shall not only counterbalance your Affairs with my Appearance for you, but shall accommodate you with a considerable Sum at common Interest for three Years. You know I could make more of it but I have so great a Love for you that I can waive Opportunities of Gain to help you. For I do not care whether they say of me after I am dead, that I had an hundred or fifty thousand Pounds more than I wanted when I was living.

—Multa et præclara nuntantis—Hor

I SHALL this Day lay before my Reader a Letter, written by the same Hand with that of last Friday, which contained Proposals for a Printed News paper, that should take in the whole Circle of the Penny Post.

SIR,

The kind Reception you gave my last Friday's Letter, in which I broached my Project of a News-Paper, encourages me to lay before you two or three more for, you must know, Sir, that I look upon you to be the Louisa of the learned World, and cannot think any Scheme practicable or rational before you have approved of it, tho' all the Money we raise by it is on our own Funds, and for our private Use.

I have often thought that a News Letter of Whispers, written every Post, and sent about the Kingdom, after the same Manner as that of Mr Dyer, Mr Darwles, or any other Epistolary Historian, might be highly gratifying to the Publick, as well as beneficial to the Author. By Whispers I mean those Pieces of News which are communicated as Secrets, and which bring a double Pleasure to the Hearer first, as they are private History, and in the next places they have always in them a Dash of Scandal. These are the two chief Qualifications in an Article of News, [which] I recommend it, in a more than ordinary Manner, to the Lard of the Curious Sickness of Persons in high Posts, Twilight Visits paid and received by Ministers of State, clandestine Courtships and Murrings, Secret Amours, Losses at Play, Applications for Places with their respective Successors or Repulses, are the Materials in which I chiefly intend to deal. I have two Persons, that are each of them the Representative of a Species, who are to furnish me with those Whispers which I intend to convey to my Correspondents. The first of these is Peter Hush, descended from the ancient Family of the Hushes. The other is the old Lady Blast, who has a very numerous Tribe of Daughters in the two great Cities of London and Westminster. Peter Hush has a whispering Hole in most of the great Coffee houses about Town. If you are alone with him in a wide Room, he carries you up into a Corner of it, and speaks in your Ear. I have seen Peter seat himself in a Company of seven or eight Persons, whom he never saw before in his Life, and after having looked about to see there was no one that overheard him, has communicated to them in a low Voice, and under the Seal of Secrecy, the Death of a great Man in the Country, who was perhaps a Fox hunting the very Moment this Account was given of him. If upon your entering into a Coffee-house you see a Circle of Heads bending over the Table, and lying close by one another, it is ten to one but my Friend Peter is among them. I have known Peter publishing the Whispers of the Day by eight a Clock in the Morning at Garraways, by twelve at Will's, and before two at the Synagogue. When Peter has thus effectually launched a Secret, I have been very well pleased to hear People whispering it to one another at second Hand, and spreading it about as their own for you must know, Sir, the great Incentive to Whispering is the Ambition which every one has of being thought in the Secret, and being looked upon as a Man who has Access to greater People than one would imagine. After having given you this Account of Peter Hush I proceed to that virtuous Lady, the old Lady Blast, who is to communicate to me the private Transactions of the Crimp Table, with all the Arcana of the Fur Sex. The Lady Blast, you must understand, has such a particular Malignity in her Whisper, that it blights like an Easterly Wind, and withers every Reputation that it breathes upon. She has a particular Knack at making private Weddings, and last Winter married above five Women of Quality to their Footmen. Her Whisper can make an innocent young Woman big with Child, or fill an heartful young Fellow with Distempers that are not to be named. She can turn a Visit into an Intrigue, and a distant Salute into an Assignment.

² [giving]

She can beggar the Wealthy, and degrade the Noble. In short, she can whisper Men Bise or Foolish, Jealous or Ill-natured, or, if Occasion requires, can tell you the Ships of their Great Grandmothers, and intrude the Memory of honest Councilmen that have been in their Graves above these hundred Years. By these and the like Help I question not but I shall furnish out a very handsome News-Letter. If you approve my Project, I shall begin to whisper by the very next Post and question not but every one of my Customers will be very well pleased with me, when he considers that every Piece of News I send him is a Word in his Ear, and lets him into a Secret.

Having given you a Sketch of this Project, I shall, in the next Place, submit to you another for a Monthly Pamphlet, which I shall likewise submit to your Spectatorial Wisdom. I need not tell you, Sir, that there are several Authors in France, Germany, and Holland, as well as in our own Country, who publish every Month, what they call An Account of the Works of the Learned, in which they give us an Abstract of all such Books as are printed in any Part of Europe. Now, Sir, it is my Design to publish every Month, A Select of the Works of the Unlearned. Several late Productions is of my own Country men, who many of them make a very eminent Figure in the Illustrious World. I encourage me in this Undertaking. I may in this Work possibly make a Review of several Pieces which have appeared in the Foreign Accounts above mentioned, tho' they ought not to have been taken Notice of in Works which bear such a Title. I may, likewise, take into Consideration such Pieces as appear, from time to time under the Names of those Gentle men who Compliment one another, in Public Assemblies, by the Title of the Learned Gentle men. Our Party Authors will also afford me a great Variety of Subjects, not to mention Editors, Commentators and others, who are often Men of no Learning, or, what is as bad, of no Knowledge. I shall not enlarge upon this Hint, but if you think any thing can be made of it, I shall set about it with all the Pains and Application that so useful a Work deserves.

I am ever,

C. Most Worthy Sir, &c

[Αἰδώς οὐκ ἀγαθή — Hes]
—Pudor malus — Hor

I COULD not Smile at the Account that was Yesterday given me of a modest young Gentle man, who being invited to an Entertainment, thought he was not used to drink, had not the Confidence to refuse his Glass in his Turn, when on a sudden he grew so flustered that he took all the Talk of the Table into his own Hands, abused every one of the Company, and flung a Bottle at the Gentle man's Head who treated him. This has given me Occasion to reflect upon the ill Effects of a vicious Modesty, and to remember the Saying of Brutus, as it is quoted by Plutarch, that the Person has had but an ill Education, who has not been taught to deny any thing. This false kind of Modesty has, perhaps, betrayed both Sexes into as many Vices as the most abandoned Impudence, and is the more inexcusable to Reason, because it sets to justify others rather than it self, and is punished with a kind of Remorse, not only like other vicious Habits when the Crime is over, but even at the very time that it is committed.

Nothing is more amiable than true Modesty, and nothing is more contemptible than the false. The one guards Virtue, the other betrays it. True Modesty is ashamed to do any thing, that is repugnant to the Rules of right Reason. False Modesty is ashamed to do any thing, that is opposite to the Humour of the Company. True Modesty avoids every thing that is criminal, false Modesty every thing that is unbecomable. The latter is only a general undetermined Instinct, the former is that Instinct, limited and circumscribed by the Rules of Prudence and Religion.

We may conclude that Modesty to be false and vicious, which engages a Man to do any thing that is ill or indiscreet, or which restrains him from doing any thing that is of a contrary Nature. How many Men, in the common Concerns of Life, lend Sums of Money which they are not able to spare, are bound for Persons whom they have but little Friendship for, give Recommendationary Characters of Men whom they are not acquainted with, bestow Places on those whom they do not esteem, live in such a Manner as they themselves do not approve, and all this merely because they have not the Confidence to resist Solicitation, Importunity or Example?

Nor does this false Modesty expose us only to such Actions as are indiscreet but very often to such as are highly criminal. When [Xenophanes] was called timorous, because he would not venture his Money in a Game at Dice. I confess, said he, that I am exceeding timorous, for I dare not do any ill thing. On the contrary, a Man of vicious Modesty complies with every thing, and is only fearful of doing what may look singular in the Company where he is engaged. He falls in with the Torrent, and lets himself go to every Action or Discourse, however unjustifiable in it self, so it be in Vogue among the present Party. This, tho' one of the most common, is one of the most ridiculous Dispositions in Human Nature, that Men should not be ashamed of speaking or acting in a dissolute or irrational Manner, but that one who is in their Company should be ashamed of governing himself by the Principles of Reason and Virtue.

In the second place we are to consider false Modesty, as it restrains a Man from doing what is good and laudable. My Reader's own Thoughts will suggest to him many Instances and Examples under this Head. I shall only dwell upon one Reflection, which I cannot make without a Secret Concern. We have in England a particular Rashness in every thing that regards Religion. A well bred Man is obliged to conceal any Serious Sentiment of this Nature, and very often to appear a greater Libertine than he is, that he may keep himself in Countenance among the Men of Mode Our Excess of Modesty marks us shamed in all the Exercises of Piety and Devotion This Humour prevails upon us duly, inasmuch, that many well bred Tables, the Master of the House is so very Modest a Man, that he has not the Confidence to sit Grace at his own Table A Custom which is not only practised by all the Nations about us, but was never omitted by the Heathens themselves English Gentlemen who travel into Roman Catholic Countries, are not a little surprized to meet with People of the best Quality kneeling in their Churches, and engaged in their private Devotions, tho' it be not at the Hours of Publick Worship An Officer of the Army, or a Man of Wit and Pleasure in those Countries, would be afraid of passing not only for an irreligious, but an ill bred Man, should he be seen to go to Bed, or sit down at Table, without offering up his Devotions on such Occasions The same Show of Religion appears in all the Foreign Reformed Churches, and enters so much into their Ordinary Conversation, that an Englishman is apt to term them Hypocritical and Prig

This little Appearance of a Religious Deportment in our Nation, may proceed in some measure from that Modesty which is natural to us, but the great occasion of it is certainly this Those Swarms of Sectaries that overrun the Nation in the time of the great Rebellion, carried their Hypocrisy so high, that they had converted our whole Language into a Jargon of Enthusiasm inasmuch that upon the Restoration Men thought they could not recede too far from the Behaviour and Practice of those Persons, who had made Religion a Cloak to so many Villanies This led them into the other Extream, every Appearance of Devotion was looked upon as Puntannical, and falling into the Hands of the Ridiculers who flourished in that Reign, and attacked every thing that was Serious it has ever since been out of Countenance among us By this means we are gradually fallen into that Vicious Modesty which has in some measure worn out from among us the Appearance of Christianity in Ordinary Life and Conversation, and which distinguishes us from all [our Neighbours¹]

Hypocrisy cannot indeed be too much detested, but at the same time is to be preferred to open Impiety They are both equally destructive to the Person who is possessed with them, but in regard to others, Hypocrisy is not so pernicious as bare-faced Irreligion The due Mean to be observed is to be sincerely Virtuous, and at the same time to let the World see we are so I do not know a more dreadful Menace in the Holy Writings, than that which is pronounced against those who have this perverted Modesty, to be ashamed before Men in a Particular of such unspeakable Importance C-

RELIGION may be considered under two General Heads The first comprehends what we are to believe the other what we are to practise By those things which we are to believe, I mean whatever is revealed to us in the Holy Writings, and which we could not have obtained the Knowledge of by the Light of Nature by the things which we are to practise, I mean all those Duties to which we are directed by Reason or Natural Religion The first of these I shall distinguish by the Name of Faith, the Second by that of Morality

If we look into the more Serious Part of Mankind, we find many who lay so great a Stress upon Faith, that they neglect Morality, and many who build so much upon Morality, that they do not pay a due Regard to Faith The perfect Man should be defective in neither of these Particulars, as will be very evident to those who consider the Benefits which arise from each of them, and which I shall make the Subject of this Day's Paper

Notwithstanding this general Division of Christian Duty into Morality and Faith, and that they have both their peculiar Excellencies, the first has the Pre-eminence in several Respects

First, Because the greatest Part of Morality (as I have stated the Notion of it,) is of a fixt Eternal Nature, and will endure when Faith shall fail, and be lost in Conviction

Secondly, Because a Person may be qualified to do greater Good to Mankind, and become more beneficial to the World, by Morality, without Faith, than by Faith without Morality

Thirdly, Because Morality gives a greater Perfection to human Nature, by quieting the Mind, moderating the Passions, and advancing the Happiness of every Man in his private Capacity

Fourthly, Because the Rule of Morality is much more certain than that of Faith, all the Civilized Nations of the World agreeing in the great Points of Morality, as much as they differ in those of Faith

Fifthly, Because Infidelity is not of so malignant a Nature as Immorality, or to put the same Reason in another Light, because it is generally owned, there may be Salvation for a virtuous Infidel, (particularly in the Case of Invincible Ignorance) but none for a vicious Believer

Sixthly, Because Faith seems to draw its principle, if not all its Excellency, from the Influence it has upon Morality, as we shall see more at large, if we consider wherein consists the Excellency of Faith, or the Belief of Revealed Religion, and this I think is,

First, In explaining and carrying to greater Heights, several Points of Morality

Secondly, In furnishing new and stronger Motives to enforce the Practice of Morality

Thirdly, In giving us more amiable Ideas of the Supreme Being, more endearing Notions of one another, and a truer State of our selves, both in regard to the Grandeur and Vileness of our Natures

Fourthly, By shewing us the Blackness and Deformity of Vice, which in the Christian System is so very great, that he who is possessed of all Perfection and the Sovereign Judge of it is represented by several of our Divines as hating Sin to the same Degree that he loves the Sacred Person who was made the Propitiation of it

Fifthly, In being the ordinary and prescribed Method of making Morality effectual to Salvation

I have only touched on these several Heads, which every one who is conversant in Discontents of this Nature will easily enlarge upon in his own Thoughts, and draw Conclusion from them which may be useful to him in the Conduct of his Life. One I am sure is so obvious, that he cannot miss it, namely that a Man cannot be perfect in his Scheme of Morality, who does not strengthen and support it with that of the Christian Faith

Besides this I shall lay down two or three other Maxims which I think we may deduce from what has been said.

First, That we should be particularly cautious of making any thing an Article of Faith, which does not contribute to the Confirmation or Improvement of Morality

Secondly, That no Article of Faith can be true and authentick, which weakens or subverts the practical part of Religion, or what I have hitherto called Morality

Thirdly, That the greatest Friend of Morality, or Natural Religion, cannot possibly apprehend any Danger from embracing Christianity, as it is preserved pure and uncorrupt in the Doctrines of our National Church

There is likewise another Maxim which I think may be drawn from the foregoing Considerations, which is this, that we should, in all dubious Points consider any ill Consequences that may arise from them, supposing they should be true, before we give up our Assent to them.

For example, In that disputable Point of Prosecuting Men for Conscience Sake, besides the embittering their Minds with Hatred, Indignation, and all the Vehemence of Resentment and enjoining them to profess what they do not believe we cut them off from the Pleasures and Advantages of Society, afflict their Bodies distress their Fortunes, hurt their Reputations, ruin their Families, make their Lives painful, or put an End to them. Sure when I see such dreadful Consequences rising from a Principle, I would be fully convinced of the Truth of it, as of a Mathematical Demonstration, before I would venture to act upon it, or make it a part of my Religion

In this Case the Injury done our Neighbour is plain and evident, the Principle that puts us upon doing it, of a dubious and disputable Nature. Morality seems highly violated by the one, and whether or no a Zeal for what a Man thinks the true System of Faith may justify it, is very uncertain. I cannot but think if our Religion produce Charity as well as Zeal, it will not be for shewing it self by such cruel Instances. But, to conclude with the Words of an excellent

OUR defects and Follies are too often unknown to us, they are so far from being known to us, that they pass for Demonstrations of our Worth. This makes us easy in the midst of them, fond to shew them, fond to improve in them, and to be esteemed for them. Then it is that a thousand unaccountable Concoits, gay Inventions, and extravagant Actions must afford us Pleasures, and display us to others in the Colours which we ourselves take a fancy to glory in. And indeed there is something so amusing for the time in this State of Vanity and ill grounded Satisfaction, that even the wisest World has chosen an exalted Word to describe its enchantments, and called it the Paradise of Fools

Perhaps the latter part of this Reflection may seem a false Thought to some, and bear another Turn than what I have given. But it is at present none of my Business to look after it, who am going to confess that I have been lately amongst them in a Vision

Methought I was transported to a Hill,

¹ Probably Tillotson. The thought is expanded in part of his sermon on the Example of Jesus in doing good. It appears in another form in his sermon for the 5th of November, 1698, where he applies to our religious hatreds the saying that the richest and noblest wines make the sharpest vinegar again in another form in his sermon at the Yorkshire Feast

² Thomas Parnell, the writer of this allegory, was the son of a commonwealthsman, who at the Restoration ceased to live on his hereditary lands at Conleston in Cheshire, and bought an estate in Ireland. Born in 1679 at Dublin, where he became a M.A. of Trinity College, in 1700 he was ordained after taking his degree, and in 1705 became Archdeacon of Clogher. At the same time he took a wife, who died in 1711. Parnell had been an associate of the chief Whig writers, had taste as a poet, and found pleasure in writing for the papers of the time. When the Whigs went out of power in Queen Anne's reign Parnell connected himself with the Tories. On the warm recommendation of Swift he obtained a prebend in 1713, and in May, 1716 a vicarage in the diocese of Dublin, worth £400 a year. He died in July, 1717, aged 38. Inheriting his father's estates in Cheshire and Ireland, Parnell was not in need of Wanting vigour and passion, he was neither formidable nor bitter as a political opponent, and in 1712 his old friends, Steele and Addison, were glad of a paper from him though, with Swift, he had gone over to the other side in politics.

green, flowery, and of an easie Ascent Upon the broad Top of it resided squint eyed Error, and popular Opinion with many Herds, two that dealt in Sorcery, and were famous for bewitching People with the Love of themselves To these repaired a Multitude from every Side by two different Paths which lead towards each of them Some who had the most assuming Air, went directly of themselves to Error, without expecting a Conductor, others of a softer Nature went first to popular Opinion, from whence as she influenced and engaged them with their own Praises, she delivered them over to his Government.

When we had ascended to an open Part of the Summit where Opinion rode, we found her entertaining several who had arrived before us Her Voice was pleasing she breathed Odours as she spoke She seemed to have a tongue for every one, every one thought he heard of something that was valuable in himself, and expected a Paradise, which she promised as the Reward of his Merit Thus were we drawn to follow her, till she should bring us where it was to be bestowed And it was observable, that all the Way we went, the Company was either praising themselves for their Qualifications, or one another for those Qualifications which they took to be conspicuous in their own Characters, or dispraising others for wanting theirs, or vying in the Degrees of them.

At last we approached a Bow, at the Entrance of which Error was seated The Trees were thick-woven, and the Place where he sat artfully contrived to darken him a little He was disguised in a whitish Robe, which he had put on, that he might appear to us with a nearer Resemblance to Truth And as she has a Light whereby she manifests the Beauties of Nature to the Eyes of her Adorers, so he had provided himself with a magical Wind, that he might do something in Imitation of it, and please with Delusions Thus he lifted solemnly, and muttering to himself, bid the Glories which he kept under Enchantment to appear before us Immediately we cast our Eyes on that part of the Sky to which he pointed, and observed a thin blue Prospect, which cleared as Mountains in a Summer Morning when the Mists go off, and the Palace of Vanity appeared to Sight.

The Foundation hardly seemed a Foundation, but a Set of curling Clouds, which it stood upon by magical Contrivance The Way by which we ascended was painted like a Rainbow, and as we went the Brace that played about us bewitched the Senses The Walls were gilded all for Show, the lowest Set of Pillars were of the slight fine Corinthian Order, and the Top of the Building being rounded, bore so far the Resemblance of a Bubble.

At the Gate the Travellers neither met with a Porter, nor waited till one should appear every one thought his Merits a sufficient Passport, and pressed forward In the Hall we met with several Phantoms, that rovd amongst us, and rang'd the Company according to their Sentiments There was decreasing Honour, that had nothing to shew in but an old Coat of his Ancestors Achievements There was Ostentation, that made himself his own constant Subject, and Gallantry strutting upon his Tiptoes At the upper End of the Hall stood a Throne, whose Canopy glitter'd with all the Riches that Gravity could contrive to lavish on it and between the gilded Arms sat Vanity, deck'd in the Peacock's Feathers, and acknowledged for another Venus by her Votaries The Boy who stood beside her for a Cupid, and who made the World to bow before her, was called Self-Conceit His Eyes had every now and then a Cast inwards to the Neglect of all Objects about him, and the Arms which he made use of for Conquest, were borrowed from those against whom he had a Design The Arrow which he shot at the Soldier, was fledge'd from his own Plum of Feathers the Dart he directed against the Man of Wit, was winged from the Quills he writ with, and that which he sent against those who presumed upon their Riches, was headed with Gold out of their Treasures He made Nets for Statesmen from their own Contrivances he took Fire from the Eyes of Ladies, with which he melted their Hearts, and Lightning from the Tongues of the Lloquent, to enflame them with their own Glories At the Foot of the Throne sat three false Graces Flattery with a Shell of Punt Afflictation with a Mirror to practice it, and Fashion ever changing the Posture of her Cloaths These applied themselves to secure the Conquests which Self-Conceit had gotten, and hid each of them their particular Politics Flattery gave new Colours, and Complexions to all Things Afflictation new Aurs and Apparences, which, as she said, were not vulgar, and Fashion both concealed some home Defects, and added some foreign external Beauties.

As I was reflecting upon what I saw, I heard a Voice in the Crowd, bemoaning the Condition of Mankind, which is thus mingled by the Breath of Opinion, deluded by Error, fired by Self-Conceit, and given up to be trained in all the Courses of Vanity, till Scorn or Poverty come upon us These Expressions were no sooner heard about, but I immediately saw a general Disorder, till at last there was a Parting in one Place, and a grave old Man, decent and resolute, was led forward to be punished for the Words he had uttered He appeared inclined to have spoken in his own Defence, but I could not observe that any one was willing to hear him Vanity cast a scornful Smile at him Self-Conceit was angry, Flattery, who knew him for Plain dealing, put on a Vizard, and turned away Afflictation tossed her Iron, made Mouths, and called him Envy or Slander, and Fashion would have it, that at least he must be Ill-Manners Thus slighted and despised by all, he was driven out for abusing People of Merit and Figure And I heard it finally resolved, that he should be used no better wherever they met with him hereafter.

I had already seen the Meaning of most part of that Warning which he had given, and was considering how the latter Words should be fulfilled, when a mighty Noise was heard without, and the Door was blacked by a numerous Train of Harpies crowding in upon us Folly and Broken Credit were seen in the House before they entered Trouble, Shame, Infamy, Scorn and

'Psalm appears to me an admirable Ode and I began to turn it into our Language. As I was describing the Journey of Israel from Egypt, and added the Divine Presence amongst them, I perceived a Beauty in the Psalm which was entirely new to me, and which I was going to lose and that is that the Poet utterly conceals the Presence of God in the Beginning of it, and rather lets a Possessive Pronoun go without a Substantive, than he will so much as mention any thing of Divinity there Judah was his Sanctuary, and Israel his Dominion or Kingdom. The Reason now seen is evident, and this Conduct necessary. For if God had appeared before, there could be no wonder why the Mountains should leap and the Sea retire therefore that this Convulsion of Nature may be brought in with due Surprise, his Name is not mentioned till afterward, and then with a very agreeable Turn of Thought God is introduced at once in all his Majesty. This is what I have attempted to imitate in a Translation without Paraphrase, and to preserve what I could of the Spirit of the sacred Author.

'If the following Essay be not too incorrigible, bestow upon it a few Brightnings from your Genius, that I may learn how to write better, or to write no more.

Your daily Admirer, and humble Servant, &c.

¹ This Letter and the version of the 114th Psalm are by Dr Isaac Watts, who was at this time 38 years old, broken down by an attack of illness, and taking rest and change with his friend Sir Thomas Abney, at Theobalds. Isaac Watts, the son of a Nonconformist schoolmaster at Southampton, had injured his health by excessive study. After acting for a time as tutor to the son of Sir John Hartopp, he preached his first sermon in 1698, and three years later became pastor of the Nonconformist congregation in Mark Lane. By this office he abided, and with Sir Thomas Abney also he abided his visit to Theobalds, in 1712, being, on all sides, so agreeable that he stayed there for the remaining 36 years of his life. There he wrote his Divine and Moral Songs for children, his Hymns, and his metrical version of the Psalms. But his Horæ Lyricæ, published in 1709, had already attracted much attention when he contributed this Psalm to the Spectator. In the Preface to that collection of 'Poems chiefly of the Lyric kind, in Three Books, sacred, I to Devotion and Piety II To Virtue, Honour, and Friendship III To the Memory of the Dead,' he had argued that Poetry, whose original is divine, had been desecrated to the vilest purpose, enticed unthinking youth to sin, and fallen into discredit among some weaker Christians. 'They submit indeed to use it in divine psalmody, but they love the "driest translation of the Psalms best." Watts bade them look into their Bibles and observe the boldness of its poetic imagery, rejected the dictum of Boileau, that

MR SPECTATOR,

'There are those who take the Advantage of your putting in Half penny Value upon your self above the rest of our daily Writers to define you in publick Conversation, and strive to make you unpopular upon the Account of this said Half penny. But if I were you, I would insist upon that small Acknowledgment for the superior Merit of yours, as being a Work of Invention. Give me Leave therefore to do you Justice, and say in your Behalf what you cannot say your self, which is, that your Writings have made Learning a more necessary Part of good Breeding than it was before you appeared. That Modesty is become fashionable, and Impudence stands in need of some Wit, since you have put them both in their proper Lights. Prophaneness, Lewdness, and Debauchery are not now Qualifications, and a Man may be a very fine Gentleman, tho' he is neither a keeper nor an Infidel.

'I would have you tell the Town the Story of the Syllable, if they deny giving you Two Pence. Let them know, that those sacred Papers were readers, is, as his title indicates, not the business of his life. And if I seized those hours of leisure, wherein my soul was in a more sprightly frame, to entertain them or myself with a divine or moral song, I hope I shall find an easy pardon.' Watts died in 1748, aged 74.

There are so many of us who will give you your own Price, that you may acquaint your Non Conformist Reader, That they shall not have it except they come in within such a Day, under Three pence. I don't know, but you might bring in the Dante Obolum Belusario with a good Grace. The Widlins come in Clusters to two or three Coffee houses which have left you off, and I hope you will make us, who fine to your Wit, merry with their Characters who stand out against it.

PEOPLE are not aware of the very great Force which Pleasantry in Company has upon all those with whom a Man of that Talent converses. His Faults are generally overlooked by all his Acquaintance, and a certain Carelessness that constantly attends all his Actions, carries him on with greater Success, than Diligence and Assiduity does others who have no Share of this Endowment. Dacanthus breaks his Word upon all Occasions both trivial and important and when he is sufficiently ruled at for that abominable Quality, they who talk of him end with, After all he is a very pleasant Fellow. Dacanthus is an ill natured Husband, and yet the very Women end their Freedom of Discourse upon this Subject. But after all he is a very pleasant Company. Dacanthus is neither in point of Honour, Civility, good Breeding, or good Nature unexceptionable and yet all is answered, For he is a very pleasant Fellow. When this Quality is conspicuous in a Man who has, to accompany it, mild and virtuous Sentiments, there cannot certainly be any thing which can give so pleasing Gratification as the Gaiety of such a Person but when it is alone, and serves only to gild a Crowd of all Qualities there is no Man so much to be avoided as your pleasant Fellow. A very pleasant Fellow shall turn your good Name to a Jest, make your Character contemptible, debase your Wife or Daughter, and yet be received by the rest of the World with Welcome where ever he appears. It is very ordinary with those of this Character to be attentive only to their own Sat-actions, and have very little Bowels for the Concerns or Sorrows of other Men. nay, they are capable of purchasing their own Pleasures at the Expence of giving Pain to others. But they who do not consider this sort of Men thus carefully, are irresistibly exposed to his Insinuations. The Author of the following Letter carries the Matter so high, as to impute that the Liberties of England have been at the Mercy of a Prince merely as he was of this pleasant Character.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'There is no one Passion which all Mankind so naturally give into as Pride, nor any other Passion which appears in such different Disguises. It is to be found in all Ranks and all Complexions. Is it not a Question, whether it does more Harm or Good in the World? And if there be not such a Thing as what we may call a virtuous and laudable Pride?

'It is this Passion alone, when misapplied, that lays us so open to I flatterers and he who can agreeably condescend to soothe our Humour or Temper, finds always in open Avenue to our Soul, especially if the flatterer happen to be our Superior.

'One might give many Instances of this in a late English Monarch, under the title of, The Gayeties of King Charles II. This Prince was by Nature extremely familiar, of very easy Access, and much delighted to see and be seen, and this happy Temper, which in the highest Degree gratified his Peoples Vanity, did him more service with his loving Subjects than all his other Virtues, tho' it must be confessed he had many. He delighted, tho' a mighty King, to give and take a Jest, as they say and a Prince of this fortunate Disposition, who were inclined to make an ill Use of his Power, may have any thing of his People, be it never so much to their Prejudice. But this good King made generally a very innocent Use, as to the Publick, of this engaging Temper, for, 'tis well known, he pursued Pleasure more than Ambition. He seemed to glory in being the first Man at Cock-matches, Horse races, Balls and Plays. he appeared highly delighted on those Occasions, and never failed to warm and gladden the Heart of every Spectator. He more than once dined with his good Citizens of London on their Lord-Mayors Days, and did so the Year that Sir Robert I was Mayor. Sir Robert was a very loyal Man, and, if you will allow the Expression, very fond of his Sovereign but what with the Joy he felt at Heart for the Honour done him by his Prince, and thro' the Warmth he was in with continual toasting Healths to the Royal Family, his Lordship grew a little fond of his Majesty, and entered into a Familiarity not altogether so successful in so publick a Place. The King understood very well how to extricate himself on all kinds of Difficulties, and with an Hint to the Company to avoid Ceremony, stole off and made towards his Coach, which stood ready for him in Guild Hall Yard. But the Mayor liked his Company so well, and was grown so intimate, that he pursued him hastily, and catching him fast by the Hand, cried out

'Written in jest, but 'The Famous Spanish Blacking for Gentlemen's Shoes,' and 'The famous Bavarian Red Liquor which gives such a delightful blushing colour to the cheeks,' had long been advertised in the Spectator.

with a vehement Oath and Accent, Sir, You shall stay and take t'other Bottle The airy Monarch looked kindly at him over his Shoulder, and with a Smile and graceful Air, (for I saw him at the Time, and do now) repeated this Line of the old Song

He that's drunk is as great as a King

'and immediately [turned'] back and complied with his Landlord

'I give you this Story, Mr SPECTATOR, because, as I said, I saw the Passage and I assure you it's very true, and yet no common one, and when I tell you the Sequel, you will say I have yet a better Reason for't This very Major afterwards erected a Statue of his merry Monarch in Sticks Maslet,² and did the Crown many and great Services, and it was owing to this Humour of the King, that his Family had so great a Fortune shut up in the Exchequer of their ple is ant Sovereign The many good-natured Con descensions of this Prince are vulgarly known and it is excellently said of him by a great Hand which writ his Character, *That he was not a King a Quarter of an Hour together in his whole Reign*³ He would receive Visits even from Fools and half Mad men, and at Times I have met with People who have Boxed, fought at Back-sword, and taken Poison before King Charles II In a Word, he was so pleasant a Man, that no one could be sorrowful under his Government I have made him capable of brisling, with the greatest Ease imaginable, all Suggestions of Jealousie, and the People could not entertain Notions of any thing terrible in him, whom they saw every day agreeable Thus Scrap of the familiar Part of that Prince's History, I thought fit to send you, in compliance to the Request you lately made to your Correspondents

I am, SIR,

Your most humble Servant

I WAS lately entertaining my self with comparing Homer's Ballance, in which Jupiter is represented as weighing the Fates of Hector and Achilles, with a Passage of Virgil, wherein that Deity is introduced as weighing the Fates of Turnus and Æneas I then considered how the same way of thinking prevailed in the Eastern Parts of the World, as in those noble Passages of Scripture, wherein we are told, that the great King of Babylon the Day before his Death, had been weighed in the Ballance, and been found wanting In other Places of the Holy Writings, the Almighty is described as weighing the Mountains in Scales, making the Weight for the Winds, knowing the Brillings of the Clouds, and in others, as weighing the Actions of Men, and trying their Calamities together in a Ballance Milton, as I have observed in a former Paper, had an Eye to several of these foregoing Instances, in that beautiful Description¹ wherein he represents the Arch Angel and the Evil Spirit as addressing themselves for the Combat, but parted by the Ballance which appeared in the Heavens and weighed the Consequences of such a Battle

*Th' Eternal to prevent such horrid fray Hung forth in Heav'n his golden Scales, yet seen Betwixt Astrea and the Scorpion Sign, Wherein all things created first he weigh'd,
The pendulous round Earth with balland' Air
In counterpoise, now ponders all events, Batfels and Realms, in these he puts two weights*

*The sequel each of parting and of fight,
The latter quick up flew, and light the Beam Which Gabriel spying, thus bespake the Fiend*

Satan, I know thy Strength, and thou know'st mine,

Neither our own, but giv'n, w't at folly then To boast what Arms can do, since thine no more Than Heav'n's permits, nor mine, though doubled now

*To trauple thee as mine For proof look up,
And read thy Lot in yon celestial Sign, Where thou art weigh'd, and shewn how light, how weak,*

*If thou resist The Fiend look'd up, and knew His mounted Scale aloft, nor more, but fled Murr'ring, and with him fled the Shades of These several amusing Thoughts having taken Possession of my Mind some time before I went to sleep, and mingling themselves with my ordinary Ideas raised in my Imagination a very odd kind of Vision. I was methought, replac'd in my Study, and seated in my elbow Chair, where I had indulg'd the foregoing Speculations, with my Lamp burning by me, as usual. Whilst I was here meditating on several Subjects of Morality, and considering the Nature of my Virtues and Vices, as Materials for those Discourses with which I daily entertain the Publick. I saw, methought, a Pair of Golden Scales, hanging by a Chain of the same Metal over the Table that stood before me. When on a sudden there were great Heaps of Weights thrown down on each side of them. I found upon examining these Weights they shew'd the Value of every thing, that is in Esteem among Men. I made an Essay of them, by putting the Weight of Wisdom in one Scale, and that of Riches in another, upon which the latter, to shew its comparative Lightness, immediately flew up and left the Beam.

But, before I proceed, I must inform my Reader, that these Weights did not exert their Natural Gravity, till they were laid in the Golden Balance, inasmuch that I could not guess which was light or heavy, whilst I held them in my Hand. This I found by several Instances: for upon my laying a Weight in one of the Scales, which was inscribed by the Word Fortune, tho' I threw it out of Time, Prosperity, Affliction, Wealth, Poverty, Interest, Success, with many other Weights, which in my Hand seem'd very ponderous, they were not able to sur the opposite Balance, nor could they have prevail'd though assisted with the Weight of the Sun, the Stars and the Earth.

Upon emptying the Scales, I had several Titles and Honours, with Pomps, Triumphs, and many Weights of the like Nature, in one of them and seem'd a little glittering Weight lay by me. I threw it accidentally into the other Scale, when, to my great Surprise, it prov'd so exact a Counterpoise, that it kept the Balance in an Equilibrium. This little glittering Weight was inscribed upon the Edges of it with the Word Virtue. I found there were several other Weights which were equally Heavy, and exact Counterpoises to one, and here's of them I tried, as Justice and Poverty, Riches and Content with some others.

I then were likewise several Weights that were of the same Figure, and seem'd to Correspond with each other, but were entirely different when thrown into the Scales: as Religion and Hypocrisy, Prudence and Learning, Wit and Vivacity, Superstition and Devotion, Gravity and Wisdom, with many others.

I observ'd one particular Weight lettered on both sides, and upon applying my self to the Reading of it, I found on one side written, In the Dialect of Men, and underneath it, CALAMITIES; on the other side was written, In the Language of the Gods, and underneath, BLESSINGS. I found the Intrinsic value of this Weight to be much greater than I imagin'd, for it overpowered Health, Wealth, Good Fortune, and many other Weights, which were much more ponderous in my Hand than the other.

There is a Saying among the Scotch, that an Ounce of Mother is worth a Pound of Clergy. I was sensible of the Truth of this Saying, when I saw the Difference between the Weight of Natural Parts, and that of Learning. The Observation which I made upon these two Weights open'd to me a new Field of Discoveries, for notwithstanding the Weight of Natural Parts was much heavier than that of Learning, I observ'd that it weigh'd in hundred times heavier than it did before, when I put Learning into the same Scale with it. I made the same Observation upon Wit and Morality, for notwithstanding the latter out weigh'd the former separately, it receiv'd a thousand times more addition of Weight from its Conjunction with the former, than what it had by it self. This odd Phenomenon shew'd it self, in other Particulars, as in Wit and Judgment, Philosophy and Religion, Justice and Humanity, Faith and Charity, Depth of Sense and Perseverance of Style, with innumerable a huc Particulars too long to be mentioned in this Paper.

As a Dream seldom fails of dashing Seriousness with Impertinence, Mirth with Gravity, methought I made several other Experiments of a more ludicrous Nature, by one of which I found that an English Octavo was very often heavier than a French Folio: and by another, that an old Greek or Latin Author weigh'd down a whole Library of Moderns. Seeing one of my Spectators lay by me, I laid it into one of the Scales, and hung a two penny Piece into the other. The Reader will not enquire into the Event, if he remembers the first Trial which I have recorded in this Paper. I afterwards threw both the Scales into the Balance, but as it is not for my Interest to disoblige either of them, I shall desire to be excus'd from telling the Result of this Experiment. Having an Opportunity of this Nature in my Hands, I could not forbear throwing into one Scale the Principles of a Liberty, and into the other those of a Whig: but as I have all along declar'd this to be a Neutral Paper, I shall likewise desire to be silent under this Head also, though upon examining one of the Weights, I saw the Word FEAR Engraven on it in Capital Letters.

I made many other Experiments, and though I have not Room for them all in this Day's Speculation, I may perhaps reserve them for another. I shall only add, that upon my making I was sorry to find my Golden Scales finish'd, but resolv'd for the future to learn this Lesson from them, not to despise or value any Things for their Appearance, but to regulate my Esteem and Passions towards them according to their real and intrinsic Value.

I AM wonderfully pleas'd when I meet with any Passage in an old Greek or Latin Author, that is not blown upon, and which I have never me with in a Quotation Of this kind is a beautiful Saying in Proverbs Vice is covered by Wealth, and Virtue by Poverty, or to give it in the Verbal Translation, Among Men there are some who have their Vices concealed by Wealth, and others who have their Virtues concealed by Poverty. Every Man's Observation will supply him with Instances of Rich Men, who have several Faults and Defects that are overlooked, if not entirely hidden, by means of their Riches. And, I think, we cannot find a more Natural Description of a Poor Man, whose Merits are lost in his Poverty, than that in the Words of the Wise Man *There was a little City, and a few Men within it, and there came a great King against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it. Now there was found in it a poor Wise Man, and he by his Wisdom, delivered the City, yet no Man remembered that same poor Man. Then said I, Wisdom is better than Strength: nevertheless, the poor Man's Wisdom is despised, and his Words are not heard*¹.

The middle Condition seems to be the most advantageously situated for the gaining of Wisdom. Poverty turns our Thoughts too much upon the supplying of our Wants, and Riches upon enjoying our Superfluities. And, as Covley has said in another Verse, It is hard for a Man to keep a steady Eye upon Truth, who is at ways in a Battel or a Triumph.

If we regard Poverty and Wealth, as they are apt to produce Virtues or Vices in the Mind of Man, one may observe, that there is a Set of each of these growing out of Poverty, quite different from that which rises out of Wealth. Humility and Patience, Industry and Temperance, are very often the good Qualities of a poor Man. Humanity and Good-nature, Magnanimity and a Sense of Honour, are as often the Qualifications of the Rich. On the contrary, Poverty is apt to betray a Man into Lavi, Riches into Arrogance. Poverty is too often attended with Fraud, vicious Compliance, Repining, Murnur and Discontent. Riches expose a Man to Pride and Luxury, a foolish Elation of Heart, and too great a Fondness for the present World. In short, the middle Condition is most eligible to the Man who would improve himself in Virtue. As I have before shewn, it is the most advantageous for the gaining of Knowledge. It was upon this Consideration that Agar founded his Prayer, which for the Wisdom of it is recorded in Holy Writ. *I would things have I requir'd of thee, deny me them not before I die. Remove far from me Vanity and Lies, give me neither Poverty, nor Riches, feed me with Food convenient for me. Lest I be full and deny thee, and say, who is the Lord? or lest I be poor and steal, and take the name of my God in vain*².

I shall fill the remaining Part of my Paper with a very pretty Allegory, which is wrought into a Play³ by Aristophanes the Greek Comedist. It seems originally designed as a Satyr upon the Rich, though, in some Parts of it, 'tis like the foregoing Discourse, a kind of Comparison between Wealth and Poverty.

Chremylus, who was an old and a good Man, and withal exceeding Poor, being desirous to leave some Riches to his Son, consults the Oracle of Apollo upon the Subject. The Oracle bid him follow the first Man he should see upon his going out of the Temple. The Person he chanc'd to see was to Apperance an old sordid blind Man, but upon his following him from Place to Place, he at last found by his own Confession, that he was Plutus the God of Riches, and that he was just come out of the House of a Miser. Plutus further told him, that when he was a Boy, he used to declare, that as soon as he came to Age he would distribute Wealth to none but virtuous and just Men, upon which Jupiter, considering the pernicious Consequences of such a Revolution, took his Sight away from him, and left him to strol about the World in the Blind Condition wherein Chremylus beheld him. With much ado Chremylus prevailed upon him to go to his House, where he met an old Woman in a tattered Raiment, who had been his Guest for many Years, and whose Name was Poerty. The old Woman refusing to turn out so easily as he would have her, he threatened to banish her not only from his own House, but out of all Greece if she made any more Words upon the Matter. Poerty on this Occasion pleads her Cause very notably, and represents to her old Landlord, that should she be driven out of the Country, all their Trades, Arts and Sciences would be driven out with her; and that if every one was Rich, they would never be supplied with those Pomps, Ornaments and Conveniences of Life which made Riches desirable. She likewise represented to him the several Advantages which she bestowed upon her Votaries, in regard to their Shire, their Health, and their Activity, by preserving them from Gouts, Dropsies, Unwieldiness, and Intemperance. But whatever she had to say for her self, she was at last forced to troop off. Chremylus immediately considered how he might restore Plutus to his Sight, and in order to it conveyed him to the Temple of Esculapius, who was famous for Cures and Miracles of this Nature. By this means the Duty recovered his Eyes, and begun to make a right use of them, by enriching every one that was distinguished by Piety towards the Gods, and Justice towards Men⁴ and at the same time by taking away his Gifts from the Impious, and Undeserving. This produces several merry Incidents, till in the last Act Mercury descends with great Compliments from the Gods, that since the Good Men were grown Rich they had received no Sacrifices, which is confirmed by a Priest of Jupiter, who enters with a Remonstrance, that since this late Innovation he was reduced to a starving Condition, and could not live upon his Office. Chremylus, who in the beginning of the Play was Religious in his Poverty, concludes it with a Proposal which was relished by all the Good Men who were now grown rich as well as himself, that they should carry Plutus in a Solemn Procession to the Temple, and Install him in the Place of HAVING endeavour'd in my last Saturday's Paper to show the great Excellency of Truth, I here consider what are the proper Means of strengthening and confirming it in the Mind of Man. Those who delight in reading Books of Controversie, which are written on both sides of the Question in Points of Truth, do very seldom arrive at a fixed and settled Habit of it. They are one Day entirely convinced of its important Truths, and the next meet with something that shakes and disturbs them. The Doubt [which] was laid to rest again, and shows it self in new Difficulties, and that generally for this Reason, because the Mind which is perpetually tost in Controversies and Disputes, is apt to forget the Reasons which had once set it at rest, and to be disquieted with any former Perplexity, when it appears in a new Shape, or is started by a different Hand. As nothing is more laudible than an Enquiry after Truth, so nothing is more irrational than to pass away our whole Lives, without determining our selves one way or other in those Points which are of the last Importance to us. There are indeed many things from which we may withhold our Assent but in Cases by which we are to regulate our Lives, it is the greatest Absurdity to be wavering and unsettled, without closing with that Side which appears the most safe and [the] most probable. The first Rule therefore which I shall lay down is this, that when by Reading or Discourse we find our selves thoroughly convinced of the Truth of any Article, and of the Reasonableness of our Belief in it, we should never after suffer our selves to call it into question. We may perhaps forget the Arguments which occasioned our Conviction, but we ought to remember the Strength they had with us, and therefore still to retain the Conviction which they once produced. This is no more than what we do in every common Art or Science, nor is it possible to act otherwise, considering the Weakness and Limitation of our Intellectual Faculties. It was thus, that Latimer, one of the glorious Army of Martyrs who introduced the Reformation in England, behaved himself in that great Conference which was managed between the most learned among the Protestants and Papists in the Reign of Queen Mary. This venerable old Man knowing how his Abilities were impaired by Age, and that it was impossible for him to recollect all those Reasons which had directed him in the Choice of his Religion, left his Companions who were in the full Possession of their Parts and Learning, to buffet and confound their Antagonists by the Force of Reason. As for himself he only resorted to his Advantages the Articles in which he firmly believed, and in the Profession of which he was determined to die. It is in this manner that the Mathematician proceeds upon the Propositions which he has once demonstrated and though the Demonstration may have slipped out of his Memory, he builds upon the Truth, because he knows it was demonstrated. This Rule is absolutely necessary for weaker Minds and in some measure for Men of the greatest Abilities but to these last I would propose, in the second place, that they should lay up in their Memories, and always keep by them in a readiness, those Arguments which appear to them of the greatest Strength, and which cannot be got over by all the Doubts and Cavils of Infidelity.

But, in the third place, there is nothing which strengthens Truth more than Morality. Faith and Morality naturally produce each other. A Man is quickly convinced of the Truth of Religion, who finds it is not against his Interest that it should be true. The Pleasure he receives at Present, and the Happiness which he promises himself from it hereafter, will both dispose him very powerfully to give Credit to it, according to the ordinary Observation that we are easy to believe what we wish. It is very certain, that a Man of sound Reason cannot forbear closing with Religion upon an impartial Examination of it, but at the same time it is as certain that Truth is kept alive in us, and gathers Strength from Practice more than from Speculation.

There is still another Method which is more Persuasive than any of the former, and that is an habitual Adoration of the Supreme Being, as well in constant Acts of mental Worship, as in outward Forms. The devout Man does not only believe but feel: there is a Deity. He has actual Sensations of Him his Experience concurs with his Reason he sees him more and more in all his Intercourses with him, and even in this Life almost loses his Faith in Conviction.

The last Method which I shall mention for the giving Life to a Man's Faith, is frequent Retirement from the World, accompanied with religious Meditation. When a Man thinks of any thing in the Darkness of the Night, whatever deep Impressions it may make in his Mind they are apt to vanish as soon as the Day breaks about him. The Light and Noise of the Day, which are perpetually solacing his Senses and calling off his Attention, wear out of his Mind the Thoughts that imprinted themselves in it, with so much Strength, during the Silence and Darkness of the Night. A Man finds the same Difference as to himself in a Crowd and in a Solitude the Mind is stunned and dazzled amidst that Variety of Objects which press upon her in a great City. She cannot apply herself to the Consideration of these Things which are of the utmost Concern to her. The Cares or Pleasures of the World strike in with every Thought, and a Multitude of vicious Examples [give ¹] a kind of Justification [to ²] our Folly. In our Retirements every thing disposes us to be serious. In Courts and Cities we are entertained with the Works of Men in the Country with those of God. One is the Province of Art, the other of Nature. Faith and Devotion naturally grow in the Mind of every reasonable Man, who sees the Impressions of Divine Power and Wisdom in every Object on which he casts his Eye. The Supreme Being has made the best Arguments for his own Existence, in the Formation of the Heavens and the Earth, and these are Arguments which a Man of Sense cannot forbear attending to, who is out of the Noise and Hurry of Human Affairs. Aristotle says, that should a Man live under Ground, and there converse with Works of Art and Mechanism, and should afterwards be brought up into the open Day, and see the several Glories of the Heaven and Earth, he would immediately pronounce them the Works of such a Being as we define God to be. The Psalmist has very beautiful Strokes of Poetry to this Purpose, in that exalted Strain, *The Heavens declare the Glory of God. And the Firmament showeth his handy work. One Day telleth another. And one Night certifieth another. There is neither Speech nor Language. But their Voices are heard among them. Their Sound is gone out into all Lands. And their Words into the Ends of the World*³. As such a bold and sublime manner of Thinking furnishes very noble Matter for an Ode, the Reader may see it wrought into the following one ⁴.

I

*The Spacious Firmament on high,
With all the blue Ethereal Sky,
And spangled Heav'ns, a shining Frame Their great Original proclaim Th' unwearied Sun, from Day to Day, Does his Creator's Power display,
And publishes to every Land
The Work of an Almighty Hand*

II

*Soon as the Evening Shades prevail,
The Moon takes up the wondrous Tale,
And nightly to the listening Earth Repeats the Story of her Birth Whilst all the Stars that round her burn,
And all the Planets in their turn, Confirm the Tidings as they rowl,
And spread the Truth from Pole to Pole*

III

*What though, in solemn Silence, all Move round the dark terrestrial Ball?
What tho' nor real Voice nor Sound Amid their radiant Orbs be found?
In Reason's Ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious Voice,
For ever singing, as they sing,
'The Hand that made us is Divine'* C

—Vera incessu patuit Dea—Virg

WHEN Æneas, the Hero of Virgil, is lost in the Wood, and a perfect Stranger in the Place on which he is landed, he is accosted by a Lady in an Habit for the Chase. She enquires of him, Whether he has seen pass by that Way any young Woman dressed as she was? Whether she were following the Sport in the Wood, or any other Way employed, according to the Custom of Huntresses? The Hero answers with the Respect due to the beautiful Appearance she made, tells her, He saw no such Person as she enquired for, but intimates, that he knows her to be of the Deities, and desires she would conduct a Stranger Her Form from her first Appearance manifested she was more than mortal, but tho' she was certainly a Goddess, the Poet does not make her known to be the Goddess of Beauty, till she moved. All the Charms of an agreeable Person are then in their highest Exertion, every Limb and Feature appears with its respective Grace. It is from this Observation, that I cannot help being so passionate an Admirer as I am of good Dancing. As all Art is an Imitation of Nature, this is an Imitation of Nature in its highest Excellence, and at a Time when she is most agreeable. The Business of Dancing is to display beauty, and for that Reason all Distortions and Mimickries, as such, are what raise Aversion instead of Pleasure. But Things that are in themselves excellent, are ever attended with Imposture and false Imitation. Thus, as in Poetry there are laborious Fools who write Anagrams and Acrosticks, there are Pretenders in Dancing, who think merely to do what others cannot, is to excel. Such Creatures should be rewarded like him who had acquired a Knack of throwing a Grain of Corn through the Eye of a Needle, with a Bushel to keep his Hand in Use. The [Dancers?] on our Stages are very faulty in this Kind and what they mean by writhing themselves into such Postures, as it would be a Pain for any of the Spectators to stand in, and yet hope to please those Spectators, is unintelligible. Mr. Pruce has a Genius, if he were encouraged, would prompt them to better things. In all the Dances he invents, you see he keeps close to the Characters he represents. He does not hope to please by making his Performers move in a manner in which no one else ever did, but by Motions proper to the Characters he represents. He gives to Clowns and Lubrards clumsy Graces, that is, he makes them Practise what they would think Graces. And I have seen Dances of his, which might give Hints that would be useful to a Comick Writer. These Performances have pleas'd the Taste of such as have not Reflection enough to know their Excellence, because they are in Nature, and the distorted Motions of others have offended those who could not form Reasons to themselves for

Delight It may possibly be proved, that Vice is in itself destructive of Pleasure, and Virtue in itself conducive to it. If the Delights of a free Fortune were under proper Regulations, this Truth would not want much Argument to support it, but it would be obvious to every Man, that there is a strict Affinity between all Things that are truly laudable and beautiful, from the highest Sentiment of the Soul, to the most indifferent Gesture of the Body. 1

THE Love of Praise is a Passion deeply fixed in the Mind of every extraordinary Person, and those who are most affected with it, seem most to partake of that Parable of the Divinity which distinguishes Mankind from the Inferior Creation. The Supreme Being it self is most pleased with Praise and Thanksgiving the other Part of our Duty is but an Acknowledgment of our Faults, whilst this is the immediate Adoration of his Perfections. 'Twas an excellent Observation, That we then only despise Commendation when we cease to deserve it and we have still extant two Orations of Tully and Plin, spoken to the greatest and best Princes of all the Roman Emperors, who, no doubt, heard with the greatest Satisfaction, what even the most disinterested Persons, and it so large a Distance of Time, cannot read without Admiration. Cæsar thought his Life consisted in the Breath of Praise when he professed he had lived long enough for himself when he had for his Glory others have sacrificed themselves for a Name which was not to begin till they were dead, giving away themselves to purchase a Sound which was not to commence till they were out of hearing. But by Merit and superior Excellencies not only to gain, but, whilst living, to enjoy a great and universal Reputation, is the last Degree of Happiness which we can hope for here. Bad Characters are dispersed abroad with Profusion, I hope for example Sake, and (as Punishments are designed by the Civil Power) more for the deterring the Innocent, than the chastising the Guilty. The Good are less frequent, whether it be that there are indeed fewer Originals of this Kind to copy after, or that, thro' the Malignity of our Nature, we rather delight in the Ridicule than the Virtues we find in others. However, it is but just, as well as pleasing, even for Variety, sometimes to give the World a Representation of the bright Side of humane Nature, as well as the dark and gloomy. The Desire of Imitation may, perhaps, be a greater Incentive to the Practice of what is good, than the Aversion we may conceive at what is blameable. The one immediately directs you what you should do, whilst the other only shows you what you should avoid. And I cannot at present do this with more Satisfaction, than by endeavouring to do some Justice to the Character of Mencius.²

It would far exceed my present Design, to give a particular Description of Mencius thro' all the Parts of his excellent Life. I shall now only draw him in his Retirement, and pass over in Silence the various Arts, the courtly Manners, and the undesigning Honesty by which he attained the Honours he has enjoyed, and which now give a Dignity and Veneration to the Case he does enjoy. 'Tis here that he looks back with Pleasure on the Waves and Billows thro' which he has steered to so far an Haven. He is now intent upon the Practice of every Virtue, which a great Knowledge and Use of Mankind has discovered to be the most useful to them. Thus in his private domestic Employments he is no less glorious than in his publick, for 'tis in Reality a more difficult Task to be conspicuous in a sedentary inactive Life, than in one that is spent in Hurry and Business. Persons engaged in the latter, like Bodies violently agitated, from the Swiftness of their Motion have a Brightness added to them, which often vanishes when they are at Rest. but if it then still remain, it must be the Seeds of intrinsic Worth that thus shine out without any foreign Aid or Assistance.

His Liberality in another might almost bear the Name of Profusion. he seems to think it laudable even in the Excess, like that River which most enriches when it overflows. Bu. Martinus has too perfect a Taste of the Pleasure of doing good, ever to let it be out of his Power and for that Reason he will have a just Oeconomy, and a splendid Frugality at home, the Fountain from whence those Streams should flow which he disperses abroad. He looks with Disdain on those who propose their Death as the Time when they are to begin their Munificence. he will both see and enjoy (which he then does in the highest Degree) what he bestows himself. he will be the living Executor of his own Bounty, whilst they who have the Happiness to be within his Care and Patronage at once, pray for the Continuation of his Life, and their own good Fortune. No one is out of the reach of his Obligations. he knows how, by proper and becoming Methods, to raise himself to a Level with those of the highest Rank, and his good Nature is a sufficient Warrant against the Want of those who are so unhappy as to be in the very lowest. One may say of him, as Pindar bids his Muse say of Theron ¹

¹ Julius Cæsar and Trajan. Cicero most flattered Cæsar in the speech pro Marcello, but the memorable speech of his before Cæsar was that for Ligarius, who had borne arms against the new master of Rome in the African campaign. Cæsar had said 'Why might we not as well once more hear a speech from Cicero?' There is no doubt that Ligarius is a brave man and an enemy. Yet the effect of the speech was that Cæsar was stirred with emotion, changed colour, and in reference to the battle of Pharsalia, 'he was,' says Plutarch, 'so affected that his body trembled and some of the papers he held dropped from his hands, and thus he was overpowered, and acquitted Ligarius.' Of Pliny the younger there remains a fulsome Panegyric upon Trajan.

*Swear, that Theron sure has sworn,
No one near him should be Poor Swear, that none e'er had such a graceful
Art,
For he's Free Gifts as freely to impart,
With an unvarnished Hand, and an unbounded Heart*

Never did Atticus succeed better in gaining the universal Love and Esteem of all Men, nor steer with more Success betwixt the Extrems of two contending Parties. 'Tis his peculiar Happiness, that while he espouses neither with an intemperate Zeal, he is not only admired, but, what is a more rare and unusual Felicity, he is beloved and caressed by both and I never yet saw any Person of whatsoever Age or Sex, but was immediately struck with the Merit of Manlius. There are many who are acceptable to some particular Persons, whilst the rest of Mankind look upon them with Coldness and Indifference, but he is the first whose entire good Fortune it is ever to please and to be pleased where ever he comes to be admired, and where ever he is absent to be lamented. His Merit fires like the Pictures of Raphael, which are either seen with Admiration by all, or at least no one dare own he has no Taste for a Composition which has received so universal an Applause. Envy and Malice find it against their Interest to indulge Slander and Obloquy. 'Tis as hard for an Enemy to detract from as for a Friend to add to his Praise. An Attempt upon his Reputation is a sure lessening of one's own, and there is but one Way to injure him, which is to refuse him his just Commendations, and be obstinately silent.

It is below him to catch the Sight with any Care of Dress: his outward Garb is but the Emblem of his Mind; it is genteel, plain, and unaffected: he knows that Gold and Embroidery can add nothing to the Opinion which all have of his Merit, and that he gives a Lustre to the plainest Dress, whilst 'tis impossible the richest should communicate any to him. He is still the principal Figure in the Room. He first engages your Eye, as if there were some Point of Light which shone stronger upon him than on any other Person.

He puts me in mind of a Story of the famous Bussy d'Amboise,² who at an Assembly at Court, where every one appeared with the utmost Magnificence, relying upon his own superior Behaviour, instead of adorning himself like the rest, put on that Day a plain Suit of Cloaths, and dressed all his Servants in the most costly gay Habits he could procure. The Event was, that the Eyes of the whole Court were fixed upon him, all the rest looked like his Attendants, whilst he alone had the Air of a Person of Quality and Distinction.

Like Aristippus, whatever Shape or Condition he appears in, it still suits free, and ease upon him, but in some Part of his Character, 'tis true, he differs from him for as he is altogether equal to the Largeness of his present Circumstances, the Rectitude of his Judgment has so far corrected the Inclinations of his Ambition, that he will not trouble himself with either the Desires or Pursuits of any thing beyond his present Enjoyments.

A thousand obliging Things flow from him upon every Occasion, and they are always so just and natural, that it is impossible to think he was at the least Pains to look for them. One would think it were the Demon of good Thoughts that discovered to him those Treasures, which he must have blinded others from seeing, they lay so directly in their Way. Nothing can equal the Pleasure is taken in hearing him speak, but the Satisfaction one receives in the Civility and Attention he pays to the Discourse of others. His Looks are a silent Commendation of what is good and praise worthy, and a secret Reproof to what is licentious and extravagant. He knows how to appear free and open without Danger of Intrusion, and to be cautious without seeming reserved. The Gravity of his Conversation is always enlivened with his Wit and Humour, and the Guety of it is tempered with something that is instructive, as well as barely agreeable. Thus with him you are sure not to be merry at the Expence of your Reason, nor serious with the Loss of your good Humour, but, by a happy mixture in his Temper, they either go together, or perpetually succeed each other. In fine, his whole Behaviour is equally distant from Constraint and Negligence, and he commands your Respect, whilst he gains your Heart.

There is in his whole Carriage such an engaging Softness, that one cannot persuade one's self he is ever actuated by those rougher Passions, which, where ever they find Place, seldom fail of shewing themselves in the outward Demour of the Persons they belong to. But his Constitution is a just Temperature between Indolence on one hand and Violence on the other. He is mild and gentle, where ever his Affairs will give him Leave to follow his own Inclinations, but yet never failing to exert himself with Vigour and Resolution in the Service of his Prince, his Country, or his Friend.

² Bussy d'Amboise had become famous in England through a tragedy by George Chapman, often presented in the time of James I, and revived after the Restoration. In 1691 Chapman's play was produced with some changes by Thomas D'Urfey. The man himself killed a relation in the massacre of St Bartholomew, to get a title, and was trapped and killed by the Comte de Montsoreau, whose wife he went to seduce.

Erat Homo ingeniosus, acutus, acer, et qui plurimum et salis haberet et fellis, nec candoris minus — Plin Epist

MY Paper is in a kind a Letter of News, but it regards rather what passes in the World of Conversation than that of Business. I am very sorry that I have at present a Circumstance before me, which is of very great Importance to all who have a Relish for Gayety, Wit, Mirth, or Humour. I mean the Death of poor Dick Lastcourt. I have been obliged to him for so in my Hours of Jollity, that it is but a small Recompence, tho' all I can give him, to pass a Moment or two in Sadness for the Loss of so agreeable a Man. Poor Lastcourt! the last Time I saw him we were plotting, to show the Town his great Capacity for acting, in its full Light, by introducing him as dictating to a Set of young Players, in what manner to speak this Sentiment, and utter to her Passion—He had so exquisite a Discerning of what was defective in any Object before him, that in an Instant he could show you the ridiculous Side of what would pass for beautiful and just even to Men of no ill Judgment, before he had pointed at the Fault. He was no less skilful in the Knowledge of Beauty; and, I dare say, there is no one who knew him well but can repeat more well turned Compliments, as well as smart Repartees, of Mr Lastcourt's, than of any other Man in England. This was easily to be observed in his inimitable Faculty of telling a Story in which he would throw in natural and unexpected Incidents to make his Court to one Part, and rally the other Part of the Company. Then he would vary the Usage he gave them according as he saw them bear kind or sharp Language. He had the Knack to raise up a perverse Temper, and mortify an impudently gay one, with the most agreeable Skill imaginable. There are a thousand things which crowd into my Memory, which will be too much concerned to tell on about him. Hamlet holding up the Skull which the Grave-digger threw to him, with an Account that it was the Head of the King's Jester, falls into very pleasing Reflections, and cries out to his Companion,

Alas, poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio, a Fellow of a finite Jest, of a most excellent I fancy he hath born me on his back a thousand times And how abhorred my Imagination is now my Gorge rises at it Here he dig those Lips that I have kiss'd I know it of a vest When he's in Gibes now, your Gambols, ye or Songs, your lashes of Merriment, that were wont to sit the Table on a Roar No one now to mock your own Feigns quite Chop-fallen Now get you to my Lady's Chamber, and tell her, let her paint an Inch thick, to this Favour she must condescend Make her laugh at it

It is an Insolence natural to the Wealthy, to asfix, as much as in them lies, the Character of a Man to his Circumstances. Thus it is ordinary with them to praise faintly the good Qualities of those below them, and say, It is very extraordinary in such a Man as he is, or the like, when they are forced to acknowledge the Value of him whose I ownness upbraid their Exaltation. It is to this Humour only, that it is to be ascribed, that a quick Wit in Conversation, a nice Judgment upon any Emergency, that could arise, and a most blameless inoffensive Behaviour, could not raise this Man above being received only upon the Foot of contribution to Mirth and Diversion. But he was as easy under that Condition, as a Man of so excellent Talents was enviable, and since they would have it that to divert was his Business, I did it with all the seeming Affinity imaginable, tho' it stung him to the Heart that it was his Business. Men of sense who could raise a delicate ease, were well satisfied to let him lead the Way in Conversation, and play after his own Manner, but those who provoked him to Mimicry, found he had the Indignation to let it be at their Expense who called for it, and he would shew the Point of conceited Jealousy follows as just to the Company, at their own Request in Revenge for mortifying him from him, a Conclusion to put on the Character of a Jester.

What was particularly excellent in this memorable Comparison, was that in the Account he gave of Persons and Sentiments he did not only hit the Likeness of their Ideas, in the Manner of the Description, but he would in his Narration fall in with the very Way of thinking, and thus when he recounted Passages which a Man of the best Wit is concerned as well as such whom were represented often of the lowest Kind of Understanding. It is certainly as great an Instance of Self-love to a Weakness, to be impatient of being mimick'd, as it may, can be imagined. There were none but the Vain, the Formid, the Proud or those who were incapable of mending their Faults, that regarded him as to others he was in the highest Degree pleasing, and I do not know any Satisfaction of any indifferer. I had ever trusted so much, as having got over the Impudence of seeing myself in the Air he could put me when I have displeased him. It is indeed to his exquisite Taste in this way, more than any Philosophy I could read on the Subject, that my Person is very little of my Care, and it is indifferer to me what is said of my Shape, my Air, my Manner, my Speech, or my Address. It is to poor Lastcourt. I chiefly owe that I am arrived at the Happiness of thinking nothing, a Diminution to me, but what argues a Deprivation of my Will.

It has as much surprized me as any thing in Nature, to have it frequently said that he was not a good Player. But that must be owing to a Partiality for former Actors in the Parts in which he succeeded them, and judging by Comparison of what was I had before, rather than by the Nature of the Thing. When a Man of his Wit and Sensitiveness could put on an utter Absence of common Sense in his Face as he did in the Character of Luftwick in the Northern Lass, and an Air of insipid Cunning, and Vainness in the Character of Po-mad in the Temerous Husband, it is folly to dispute his Capacity and Success, as he was an Actor.

Poor Lastcourt! let the Vain and Proud be at Rest, thou wilt no more disturb their Admiration of their dear selves, and thou art no longer to drudge in raising the Mirth of Stupids, who know nothing of thy Merit, for thy Maintenance.

It is natural for the Generality of Mankind to run into Reflections upon our Mortality, when Disturbers of the World are laid at Rest, but to take no Notice when they who can please and divert are pulled from us. But for my Part, I cannot but think the Loss of such Talents as the Man of whom I am speaking was Master of, a more melancholy Instance of Mortality, than the Dissolution of Persons of never so high Characters in the World, whose Distensions were that they were noisy and mischievous.

But I must grow more succinct, and as a SPECTATOR, give an Account of this extraordinary Man, who, in his Way, never had an Equal in any Age before him, or in that wherein he lived. I speak of him as a Companion, and a Man qualified for Conversation. His Fortune exposed him to an Obsequiousness towards the worst Sort of Company, but his excellent Qualities rendered him capable of making the best Figure in the most refined. I have been present with him among Men of the most delicate Taste a whole Night, and have known him (for he saw it was desired) keep the Discourse to himself the most Part of it, and maintain his good Humour with a Countenance in a Language so delightful, without Offence to any Person or Thing upon Earth, still preserving the Distance his Circumstances obliged him to. I say, I have seen him do all this in such a charming manner, that I am sure none of those I hint at will read this, without giving him some Sorrow for their abundant Mirth, and one Gush of Tears for so many Bursts of Laughter. I wish it were any Honour to the pleasant Creature's Memory, that my Eyes are too much suffused to let me go on——] T

It is a felicity his Friends may rejoice in, that he had his Senses, and used them as he ought to do, in his last Moments. It is remarkable that his Judgment was in its calm Perfection to the utmost Article, for when his Wife out of her fondness, desired she might send for a certain illiterate Humourist (whom he had accompanied in a thousand mirthful Moments, and whose Insolence makes Fools think he assumes from conscious Merit) he answered, 'Do what you please, but he won't come near me.' Let poor Eastcourt's Negligence about this Message convince the unwary of a triumphant Empiric's Ignorance and Inhumanity. [This passage, omitted from the reprint, expresses Steele's anger at the neglect of Eastcourt in his last hours by Dr John Radcliffe, one of the chief physicians of the time, who as a rough-spoken humourist made many enemies, and was condemned as an empiric by many of his professional brethren. When called, in 1699, to attend King William, who asked his opinion on his swollen ankles, he said, 'I would not have your Majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms.' His maxim for making a fortune was to use all men ill, but Merd, it has been observed made more money by the opposite method. Not very long after this bitter censure of Radcliffe for neglect of Eastcourt, attempts were made to censure him

Detrahete aliquid alteri, et hominem hominis incommodo suum augere commodum, magis est contra naturam, quam mors, quam paupertas, quam dolor, quam cætera quæ possunt aut corpori accidere, a rebus externis —Tull

I AM persuaded there are few Men of generous Principles, who would seek after great Places, were it not rather to have an Opportunity in their Hands of obliging their particular Friends, or those whom they look upon as Men of Worth, than to procure Wealth and Honour for themselves. To an honest Mind the best Perquisites of a Place are the Advantages it gives a Man of doing Good.

Those who are under the great Officers of State, and are the Instruments by which they act, have more frequent Opportunities for the Exercise of Compassion, and Benevolence, than their Superiors themselves. These Men know every little Case that is to come before the Great Man, and if they are possessed with honest Minds, will consider Poverty as a Recommendation in the Person who applies himself to them, and make the Justice of his Cause the most powerful Solicitor in his Behalf. A Man of this Temper, when he is in a Post of Business, becomes a Blessing to the Publick. He patronizes the Orphan and the Widow, assists the Friendless, and guides the Ignorant. He does not reject the Person's Pretensions, who does not know how to explain them, or refuse doing a good Office for a Man because he cannot pay the Fee of it. In short, tho' he regulates himself in all his Proceedings by Justice and Equity, he finds a thousand Occasions for all the Good natured Offices of Generosity and Compassion.

A Man is unfit for such a Place of Trust, who is of a sower untractable Nature, or has any other Passion that makes him unaverse to those who approach him. Roughness of Temper is apt to discountenance the Timorous or Modest. The proud Man discourages those from approaching him, who are of a mean Condition, and who most want his Assistance. The impatient Man will not give himself time to be informed of the Matter that lies before him. An Officer with one or more of these unbecoming Qualities, is sometimes looked upon as a proper Person to keep off Impertinence and formally in the House of Commons for refusal to attend in the last illness of Queen Anne, although requested to do so by the Privy Council. He denied that he had been asked to attend. He died himself three months after the Queen (in 1714, aged 64), his last days embittered by the public odium following the charge of disrespect to his dying sovereign. He died unmarried, and left the greater part of his money to beneficent uses, among them the erection of an infirmary and of the Radcliffe Library in Oxford.

² [Opportunities of exercising his]

Solicitation from his Superior but this is a kind of Merit, that can never atone for the Injustice which may very often arise from it.

There are two other vicious Qualities which render a Man very unfit for such a Place of Trust. The first of these is a Dilatory Temper, which commits innumerable Cruelties without Design. The Maxim which several have laid down for a Man's Conduct in ordinary Life should be inviolable with a Man in Office, never to think of doing that To-morrow which may be done To-day. A Man who defers doing what ought to be done, is guilty of Injustice so long as he defers it. The Dispatch of a good Office is very often as beneficial to the Solicitor as the good Office itself. In short, if a Man compared the Inconveniences which another suffers by his Delays, with the trifling Motives and Advantages which he himself may reap by such a Delay, he would never be guilty of a Fault which very often does an irreparable Prejudice to the Person who depends upon him, and which might be remedied with little Trouble to himself.

But in the last Place, there is no Man so improper to be employed in Business, as he who is in any degree capable of Corruption. And such an one is the Man, who, upon any Pretence whatsoever, receives more than what is the stated and unquestioned Fee of his Office. Gratifications, Tokens of Thankfulness, Dispatch Money, and the like specious Terms are the Pretences under which Corruption very frequently shelters itself. An honest Man will however look on all these Methods as unjustifiable, and will enjoy himself better in a moderate Fortune that is gained with Honour and Reputation, than in an overgrown Estate that is cankered with the Acquisitions of Rapine and Exaction. Were all our Offices discharged with such an inflexible Integrity, we should not see Men in all Ages, who grow up to exorbitant Wealth with the Abilities which are to be met with in an ordinary Mechanick. I cannot but think that such a Corruption proceeds chiefly from Mens employing the first that offer themselves, or those who have the Character of shrewd worldly Men, instead of searching out such as have had a liberal Education, and have been truned up in the Studies of Knowledge and Virtue.

It has been observed, that Men of Learning who take to Business, discharge it generally with greater Honesty than Men of the World. The chief Reason for it I take to be as follows. A Man that has spent his Youth in Reading, has been used to find Virtue extolled, and Vice stigmatized. A Man that has past his Time in the World, has often seen Vice triumphant, and Virtue discountenanced. Extortion, Rapine and Injustice, which are branded with Infamy in Books, often give a Man a Figure in the World, while several Qualities which are celebrated in Authors, as Generosity, Ingenuity and Good-Nature, impoverish and ruin him. This cannot but have a proportionable Effect on Men, whose Tempers and Principles are equally Good and Vicious.

There would be at least this Advantage in employing Men of Learning and Parts in Business, that their Prosperity would set more gracefully on them, and that we should not see many worthless Persons shot up into the greatest Figures of Life. C

Turpe est difficile habere rugas, Et stultus est labor ineptiarum —MART

I HAVE been very often disappointed of late Years, when upon examining the new Edition of a Classick Author, I have found above half the Volume taken up with various Readings. When I have expected to meet with a learned Note upon a doubtful Passage in a Latin Poet, I have only been informed, that such or such Ancient Manuscripts for an et write an ac, or of some other notable Discovery of the like Importance. Indeed, when a different Reading gives us a different Sense, or a new Elegance in an Author, the Editor does very well in taking Notice of it, but when he only entertains us with the several ways of spelling the same Word, and gathers together the various Blunders and Mistakes of twenty or thirty different Transcribers, they only take up the Time of the learned Reader, and puzzle the Minds of the Ignorant. I have often fancied with my self how enraged an old Latin Author would be, should he see the several Absurdities in Sense and Grammar, which are imputed to him by some or other of these various Readings. In one he speaks Non-sense, in another, makes use of a Word that was never heard of. And indeed there is scarce a Solecism in Writing which the best Author is not guilty of, if we may be at Liberty to read him in the Words of some Manuscript, which the laborious Editor has thought fit to examine in the Prosecution of his Work.

I question not but the Indies and pretty Fellows will be very curious to understand what it is that I have been hitherto talking of. I shall therefore give them a Notion of this Practice, by endeavouring to write after the manner of several Persons who make an eminent Figure in the Republick of Letters. To this end we will suppose that the following [Song¹] is an old Ode which I present to the Publick in a new Edition, with the several various Readings which I find of it in former Editions, and in Ancient Manuscripts. Those who cannot relish the various Readings, will perhaps find their Account in the Song, which never before appeared in Print.

*My Love was fickle once and changing, Nor e'er would settle in my Heart, From Beauty still to Beauty ranging,
In ev'ry Face I found a Dart*

¹ [Song, which by the way is a beautiful Descant upon a single Thought, like the Compositions of the best Ancient Iyrick Poets, I say we will suppose this Song]

'Twas first a charming Shape enslav'd me, An Eye then gave the fatal Stroke
'Till by her Wit Cornutus said me,
And all my former Fetters broke

But now a long and lasting Anguish For Belvidera I endure, Hourly I sigh and hourly Languish, Nor hope to find the wonted Cure

For here the false unconstant Lover, After a thousand Beauties shorn, Does new surprising Charms discover,
And finds Variety in One

Various Readings

Stanza the First, Verse the First And changing] The and in some Manuscripts is written thus, &c, but that in the Cotton Library writes it in three distinct Letters

Verse the Second, Nor e'er would] Aldus reads it ever would, but as this would hurt the Metre, we have restored it to its genuine Reading, by observing that Synæresis which had been neglected by ignorant Transcribers Ibid In my Heart] Scaliger, and others, on my Heart

Verse the Fourth, I found a Dart] The Vatican Manuscript for I reads it, but this must have been the Hallucination of the Transcriber, who probably mistook the Dash of the I for a T

Stanza the Second, Verse the Second The fatal Stroke] Scoppius, Salmasius and many others, for the read a, but I have stuck to the usual Reading

Verse the Third, Till by her Wit] Some Manuscripts have it his Wit, others your, others their Wit But as I find Cornutus to be the Name of a Woman in other Authors, I cannot doubt but it should be her

Stanza the third, Verse the First A long and lasting Anguish] The German Manuscript reads a lasting Passio t, but the Rhyme will not admit it

Verse the Second For Belvidera I endure] I did not all the Manuscripts reclaim, I should change Belvidera into Pel-idera Pel-ius being used by several of the Ancient Comic Writers for a Looking glass, by which means the Etymology of the Word is very visible, and Pel-idera will signify a Lady who often looks in her Glass as indeed she had very good reason, if she had all those Beauties which our Poet here ascribes to her

Verse the Third Hourly I sigh and hourly languish] Some for the Word hourly read daily, and others nightly, the last has great Authorities of its side

Verse the Fourth The wonted Cure] The Elder Stevens reads wanted Cure

Stanza the Fourth, Verse the Second After a thousand Beauties] In several Copies we meet with a Hundred Beauties by the usual Error of the Transcribers, who probably omitted a Cypher, and had not Taste enough to know that the Word Thousand was ten Times a greater Compliment to the Poet's Mistress than an Hundred

Verse the Fourth And finds Variety in one] I Most of the Ancient Manuscripts have it in two

Indeed so many of them concur in this last reading, that I am very much in doubt whether it ought not to take place There are but two Reasons which incline me to the Reading as I have published it First, because the Rhyme, and, Secondly, because the Sense is preserved by it. It might likewise proceed from the Oscitancy of Transcribers who, to dispatch their Work the sooner, use to write all Numbers in Cypher, and setting the Figure 1 following by a little Dash of the Pen, as is customary in old Manuscripts, they perhaps mistook the Dash for a second Figure, and by casting up both together composed out of them the Figure 2 But this I shall leave to the Learned, without determining any thing in a Matter of so great Uncertainty C

Ἐν ἐλπίσιν χρεὶ τοὺς σοφούς ἔχειν βίον Εὐταπίδ

THE Time present seldom affords sufficient Employment to the Mind of Man Objects of Pain or Pleasure, Love or Admiration, do not lie thick enough together in Life to keep the Soul in constant Action and supply an immediate Exercise to its Faculties In order, therefore, to remedy this Defect, that the Mind may not want Business, but always have Materials for thinking, she is endowed with certain Powers, that can recall what is passed, and anticipate what is to come

That wonderful Faculty, which we call the Memory, is perpetually looking back, when we have nothing present to entertain us It is like those Repositories in several Animals, that are filled with Stores of their former Food, on which they may ruminate when their present Pasture fails

As the Memory relieves the Mind in her vacant Moments, and prevents any Chasms of Thought by Ideas of what is past, we have other Faculties that agitate and employ her upon what is to come These are the Passions of Hope and Fear

By these two Passions we reach forward into Futurity, and bring up to our present Thoughts Objects that lie hid in the remotest Depths of Time We suffer Misery, and enjoy Happiness, before they are in Being we can set the Sun and Stars forward, or lose sight of them by wandering into those retired Parts of Eternity, when the Heavens and Earth shall be no more

By the way, who can imagine that the Existence of a Creature is to be circumscribed by Time, whose Thoughts are not? But I shall, in this Paper, confine myself to that particular Passion which goes by the Name of Hope

Our Actual Enjoyments are so few and transient, that Man would be a very miserable Being, were he not endowed with this Passion, which gives him a Taste of those good Things that may possibly come into his Possession We should hope for every thing that is good, says the old Poet Linus, because there is nothing which may not le hoped for, and nothing but what the Gods are able to give us." Hope quickens all the still parts of Life, and keeps the Mind awake in her most Reins and Inolent Hours. It gives habitual Serenity and good Humour. It is a kind of Vital Heat in the Soul, that cheer and gladdens her, when she does not attend to it. It rises from ease, and Labour pleasant.

Beside these several Advantages which rise from Hope, there is another which is none of the least, and that is, it gives it facility in procuring us from sitting too high a value of present Enjoyments. The saying of Cæsar is very well known. When he had given away all his Estate in Gracities among his Friends, one of them said that he had left for himself to which that great Man replied, Hope. His Natural Magnanimity had led him from prizeing what he was certainly possessed of, and turned all his Thoughts upon something more valuable than he had in View. I question not but every Reader will draw a Moral from this Story, and apply it to himself without my Direction.

The old Story of Pardus's Box (which many of the Learned believe was formed among the Heathens upon the Tradition of the Fall of Man) shows us how deplorable a State they thought the present Life without Hope. To set for the utmost Condition of Misery they tell us that our Torch her, according to the Pagan Hecatology, had a fire which presented him by Pardus. Upon his lifting up the Lid of it, saw the Table, there flew out all the Calumnies and Disreputations incident to Men, from which, till that time, they had been altogether exempt. Hope who had been enclosed in the Cup with a much bad Company, instead of flying off with the rest, stuck so close to the Lid of it that it was shut down upon her.

I shall make but two Reflections upon what I have hitherto said. First, that no kind of Life is so happy as that which is full of Hope, especially when the Hope is well grounded, and when the Object of it is of an exalted kind, and in its Nature proper to make the Person happy who enjoys it. This Proposition must be very evident to those who consider how few are the present Enjoyments of the most happy Man, and how insufficient to give him an entire Satisfaction and Acquiescence in them.

My next Observation is this, that a Religious Life is that which most abounds in a well grounded Hope, and such an one as is fixed on Objects that are capable of making us entirely happy. This Hope in a Religious Man, is much more sure and certain than the Hope of any Temporal Blessing, as it is strengthened not only by Reason, but by Faith. It has at the same time its End perpetually fixed on that State, which implies in the very Notion of it the most full and the most complete Happiness.

I have before shown how the Influence of Hope in general sweetens Life, and makes our present Condition supportable if not pleasant, but a Religious Hope has still greater Advantages. It does not only bear up the Mind under her Sufferings, but makes her rejoice in them, as they may be the Instruments of procuring her the great and ultimate End of all her Hope.

Reasonable Hope has likewise this Advantage above any other kind of Hope, that it is able to revive the cherish Man, and to fill his Mind not only with secret Comfort and Refreshment, but sometimes with Rapture and Trance. He triumphs in his Atoms while the Soul springs forth and with Delight to the great Object which she has always had in view, and leaves the Body with in Expectation of being reunited to her in glorious and joyful Resurrection.

I shall conclude this Essay with those emphatical Expressions of lively Hope, which the Psalmist in de use of in the midst of those Dangers and Persecutions which surrounded him, for the following Passage had its present and personal, as well as its future and prophetic Sense. I have set the Lord always before me, because he is at my right Hand, I shall not be moved. Therefore my Heart is glad, and my Glory rejoiceth in my Lord. I shall not be moved in Hope. For thou wilt not leave my Soul in Hell, neither wilt thou suffer to be Holy One to be corrupted. Therefore will I praise thee, O Lord, in thy Presence is fullness of Joy, at thy right Hand there are Pleasures for ever. C

RECEIVED some time ago a Proposal, which I had a Preface to it, wherein the Author discourses at large of the innumerable Objects of Charity in this World, and admonishes the Rich, who were afflicted with any Discommodities of Body, particularly to regard the Poor in the same Species of Affliction, and to relieve their Indigence to them, since it is impossible to assist all who are presented to them. The Proposer had been relieved from a Malady in his Eye, by an Operation performed by Sir William Acland, and being a Man of Condition, had taken a Resolution to maintain three poor blind Men during their Lives, in Gratitude for that great Blessing. This Misfortune is so very great and unfrequent that one would think, an Establishment for all the Poor under it might be easily accomplished, with the Addition of a very few others to those Wealthy who are in the same Calamity. However, the I thought of the Proposer arose from a very good Motive, and the preclining of our selves out, as called to particular Acts of Beneficence, would be a pretty Cement of Society and Virtue. It is the ordinary Foundation for Mens holding a Commerce with each other, and becoming familiar, that they agree in the same sort of Pleasure and sure it may also be some Reason for Amity, that they are under one common Distress. If all the Rich who are lame in the Gout, from a Life of Ease, Pleasure, and Luxury would help those few who have it without a previous Life of Pleasure sure, and add a few of such laborious Men, who are become lame from unhappy Blows, Falls, or other Accidents of Age or Sickness. I say, would such gouty Persons administer to the Necessities of Men disabled like themselves, the Consciousness of such a Behaviour would be the best Julep, Cordial, and Anodine in the feverish, faint and tormenting Vicissitudes of that miserable Distemper. The same may be said of all other, both bodily and intellectual Luits. These Classes of Charity would certainly bring down Blessings upon an Age and People, and if Men were not purged with the Love of this World, against all Sense of the Commerce which ought to be among them, it would not be an unreasonable Bill for a poor Man in the Agony of Pain, regretted by Want and Poverty, to draw upon a sick Alderman after this Form

SIR,
Your humble Servant,
Lazarus Hopeful

The Readers own Imagination will suggest to him the Reasonableness of such Correspondences and diversify them into a thousand Forms, but I shall close this as I began upon the Subject of Blindness. The following Letter seems to be written by a Man of Learning, who is returned to his Study after a Suspence of an Ability to do so. The Beneficent he reports himself to have received, may well claim the handsomest Locomium he can give the Operator

Mr SPECTATOR,

'Ruminating lately on your admirable Discourse on the Pleasures of the Imagination, I began to consider to which of our Senses we are obliged for the greatest and most important Share of those Pleasures, and I soon concluded that it was to the Sight. That is the Sovereign of the Senses, and Mother of all the Arts and Sciences, that have refined the Rudeness of the uncultivated Mind to a Politeness that distinguishes the fine Spirits from the barbarous Golt of the great Vulgar and the small. The Sight is the obliging Beneficentress, that bestows on us the most transporting Sensations that we have from the various and wonderful Products of Nature. To the Sight we owe the amazing Discoveries of the Height, Magnitude, and Motion of the Planets, their several Revolutions about their common Centre of Light, Heat, and Motion the Sun. The Sight travels yet farther to the fixed Stars and furnishes the Understanding with solid Reasons to prove, that each of them is a Sun moving on its own Axis in the Centre of its own Vortex or Turbillion, and performing the same Offices to its dependent Planets, that our glorious Sun does to this. But the Enquiries of the Sight will not be stopped here, but

'make their Progress through the immense Expanse to the Milky Way, and there divide the blended Fires of the Galaxy into infinite and different Worlds, made up of distinct Suns, and their peculiar Equipages of Planets, till unable to pursue this Track any farther, it deposes the Imagination to go on to new Discoveries, till it fill the unbounded Space with endless Worlds.

The Sight informs the Statuarys Chisel with Power to give Breath to lifeless Brass and Marble, and the Painter's Pencil to swell the flat Canvas with moving Figures actuated by imaginary Souls. Musick indeed may plead another Original, since Inbal, by the distinct Falls of his Hammer on the Anvil, discovered by the Ear the first rude Musick that pleas'd the Antediluvian Fathers, but then the Sight has not only redress'd those wilder Sounds into artful Order and Harmony, but conveys that Harmony to the most distant Parts of the World without the Help of Sound. To the Sight we owe not only all the Discoveries of Philosophy, but all the Divine Imagery of Poetry that transports the intelligent Reader of Homer, Milton, and Vergil.

As the Sight has polished the World, so does it supply us with the most grateful and lasting Pleasure. Let Love, let Friendship, paternal Affection, filial Piety, and conjugal Duty, declare the Joys the Sight bestows on a Meeting after Absence. But it would be endless to enumerate all the Pleasures and Advantages of Sight, every one that has it, every Hour he makes use of it, finds them, feels them, enjoys them.

Thus as our greatest Pleasures and Knowledge are derived from the Sight, so has Providence been more curious in the Formation of its Seat, the Eye, than of the Organs of the other Senses. That stupendous Machine is compos'd in a wonderful Manner of Muscles, Membranes, and Humours. Its Motions are admirably directed by the Muscles, the Perspicuity of the Humours transmit the Rays of Light, the Rays are regularly refracted by their Figure, the black Lining of the Sclerotes effectually prevents their being confounded by Reflection. It is wonderful indeed to consider how many Objects the Eye is fitted to take in at once, and successively in an Instant, and at the same time to make a Judgment of their Position, Figure, or Colour. It witches against our Dan-ers, guides our Steps, and lets in all the visible Objects, whose Beauty and Variety instruct and delight.

The Pleasures and Advantages of Sight being so great, the Loss must be very grievous of which Milton, from Experience, gives the most sensible Idea, both in the third Book of his Paradise Lost, and in his Sampson Agonistes.

To Light in the former

—*Thou I revisit safe,
And feel thy sovereign vital Lamp, but thou Revisit'st not these Eyes, that rove in vain
To find thy piercing Ray, but find no Dawn.*

And a little after,
Seasons return, but not to me returns Day, or the sweet Approach of E'en and Morn,

*Or Sight of vernal Bloom, or Summer's Rose, Or Flocks or Herds, or human Face divine,
But Cloud instead, and ever during Dark Surround me From the cheerful Ways of Men Cut off, and for the Book of Knowledge fair, Presented with an universal Blank
Of Nature's Works, to me expung'd and raz'd, And Wisdom at one Entrance quite shut out*

Again, in Sampson Agonistes

—But Chief of all,
O Loss of Sight! of thee I most complain, Blind among Enemies! O worse than Chains, Dungeon, or Beggary, or decrepid Age!
Light, the prime Work of God, to me extinct,
And all her various Objects of Delight Annul'd

—Still as a Fool,
In Power of others, never in my own, Scarce half I seem to live, dead more than Half
O dark! dark! dark! amid the Blaze of Noon Irrecoverably dark, total Eclipse, Without all Hopes of Day!

'The Enjoyment of Sight then being so great 'a Blessing, and the Loss of it so terrible an Evil,
'how excellent and valuable is the Skill of that
'Artist which can restore the former, and redress
'the latter? My frequent Perusal of the Ad'vertisements in the publick News Papers (gen'erally the most agreeable Entertainment they 'afford) has presented me with many and various 'Benefits of this kind done to my Countrymen by
'that skilful Artist Dr Grant, Her Majesty's
'Oculist Extraordinary, whose happy Hand has 'brought and restored to Sight several Hundreds
'in less than Four Years Many have received 'Sight by his Means, who came blind from their 'Mother's Womb, as in the famous Instance of 'Jones of Newington I my self have been 'cured by him of a Weakness in my Eyes next to 'Blindness, and am ready to believe any thing 'that is reported of his Ability this way, and 'know that many, who could not purchase his 'Assistance with Money, have enjoy'd it from his 'Charity But a List of Particulars would swell
'my Letter beyond its Bounds, what I have said
'being sufficient to comfort those who are in the 'like Distress, since they may conceive Hopes of 'being no longer miserable in this Kind, while 'there is yet alive so able an Oculist as Dr Grant

To the SPECTATOR

SIR,

I AM now in the Country, and employ most of my Time in reading, or thinking upon what I have read Your paper comes constantly down to me, and it affects me so much, that I find my Thoughts run into your Way, and I recommend to you a Subject upon which you have not yet touched, and that is the Satisfaction some Men seem to take in their Imperfections, I think one may call it glorying in their Insufficiency, a certain great Author is of Opinion it is the contrary to Envy, tho' perhaps it may proceed from it Nothing is so common, as to hear Men of this Sort, speaking of themselves, add to their own Merit (as they think) by imputing it in prising themselves for their Defects, freely allowing they commit some few frivolous Errors, in order to be esteemed persons of uncommon Talents and great Qualifications They are generally professing an injudicious Neglect of Dancing, Fencing and Riding, as also an unjust Contempt for Travelling and the Modern Languages as for their Part (say they) they never valued or troubled their Head about them This panegyric Satyr on themselves certainly is worthy of your Animad-version I have known one of these Gentlemen think himself obliged to forget the Day of an Appointment, and sometimes even that you spoke to him, and when you see 'em, they hope you'll pardon 'em, for they have the worst Memory in the World One of 'em started up another Day in some Confusion, and said, Now I think on't, I'm to meet Mr Mortmain the Attorney about some Business, but whether it is to-Day or to Morrow, futh, I can't tell Now to my certain Knowledge he knew his Time to a Moment, and was there accordingly These forgetful Persons have, to heighten their Crime, generally the best Memories of any People, as I have found out by their remembering sometimes through Inadvertency Two or three of 'em that I know can say most of our modern Tragedies by Heart I asked a Gentleman the other Day that is famous for a Good Carver, (at which Acquisition he is out of Countenance, in ignoring it may detract from some of his more essential Qualifications) to help me to something that was near him but he excused himself, and blushing told me, Of all things he could never carve in his Life, though it can be proved upon him, that he cuts up, disjoints, and uncases with incomparable Dexterity I would not be understood as if I thought it laudable for a Man of Quality and Fortune to rival the Acquisitions of Artificers, and endeavour to excel in little handy Qualities, No, I argue only against being ashamed at what is really Pruseworthy As these Pretences to Ingenuity shew themselves several Ways, you'll often see a Man of this Temper ashamed to be clean, and setting up for and of having had Opportunities of Exerting them in the most Conspicuous Manner.

The Great Part You had, as Brish Embassador, in Procuring and Cultivating the Advantageous Commerce between the Courts of England and Portugal, has purchased you the lasting Esteem of all who understand the Interest of either Nation.

Those Personal Excellencies which are overrated by the ordinary World, and too much neglected by Wise Men, You have supplied with the justest Skill and Judgment. The most graceful Address in Horsemanship, in the Use of the Sword, and in Dining, has been employed by You in lower Arts, and as they have occasionally served to recover, or introduce the Talents of a skilful Minister.

But your Abilities have not appeared only in one Nation. When it was your Province to Act as Her Majesty's Minister at the Court of Spain, at that time encamped, You accompanied that Gallant Prince thro' all the Vicissitudes of his Fortune and shared, by His Side, the Dangers of that Glorious Day in which He recovered His Capital. As far as it regards Personal Qualities, You attained, in that one Hour, the highest Military Reputation. The Behaviour of our Minister in the Action, and the good Offices done the Vanquished in the Name of the Queen of England, were both the Conqueror and the Captive the most lively Examples of the Courage and Generosity of the Nation He represented.

Your Friends and Companions in your Absence frequently talk these things of You and You cannot hide from us, by the most discreet Silence in any Thing which regards Yourself at the first Entertainment we have at your Table, your easy Condescension in little Incidents of Mirth and Diversion and general Complacency of Manners, are far from being the greatest Obligations we have to You. I do assure You there is not one of your Friends has a Greater Sense of your Merit in general, and of the Favours You every Day do us, than,

MR SPECTATOR,
BEING of the Number of those that have lately retired from the Center of Business and Pleasure, my Unbusiness in the Country, where I am, arises rather from the Society than the Solitude of it. To be obliged to receive and return Visits from and to a Circle of Neighbours, who through Diversity of Age or Inclinations, can neither be entertaining or serviceable to us, is a vile Loss of Time, and a Slavery from which a Man should deliver himself, if possible. For why must I lose the remaining part of my Life because they have thrown away the former Part of theirs? It is to me an insupportable Affliction to be tormented with the Narrations of a Set of People, who are warm in their Expressions of the quick Relish of that Pleasure which their Dogs and Horses have a more delicate Taste of. I do also in my Heart detest and abhor that damnable Doctrine and Position of the Necessity of a bumper, though to one's own Lust, for though we pretended that these deep Politicians are used only to inspire Gravity, they certainly drown that Charfulness which would survive a moderate Circulation. If at these Meetings it were left to every Stranger either to fill his Glass according to his own Inclination, or to make his Retreat when he finds he has been sufficiently obeyed to that of others, these Entertainments would be governed with more good Sense, and consequently with more good Breeding than at present they are. Indeed where any of the Guests are known to inebriate their Time or Pleasure by their Gluttony, proper Exhortations might be used to these to push their Fortunes in this sort of Reputation but where it is entirely arbitrary as to a moderate Stranger, this Drunkenness may be said to be allowed with the same Necessity, as if I had been tendered in the Hall for that purpose, with this aggravating Circumstance, that it distresses the Entertainer. One is in the same degree as it relieves his Horses.

To attend without Importance an Account of five hundred Gates, double Ditches and Price pipes, and to survey the Orator with despatch, is to me extremely difficult, but absolutely necessary, to be upon tolerable Terms with him. But then the occasional Bursts, cut into Latitudes, is of all other Accomplishments the most requisite. I confess at present I have no other command of these Convulsions, as is necessary to be good Company, therefore I beg you would publish this Letter and let me be known all at once for a queer Fellow and avoided. It is monstrous to me that we, who are given to Reading and calm Conversation should ever be visited by these Rarities. But they think they themselves, as Neighbours may come into our Rooms with the same Right, that they and their Dogs hunt in our Grounds.

Your Institution of Clubs I have always admired, in which you constantly endeavour the Union of the metaphoric ally Defunct, that is such as are neither serviceable to the Busy nor Enterprising part of Mankind, nor entertaining to the Retired and Speculative. There should certainly therefore in each County be established a Club of the Persons whose Conversations I have described, who for their own private, as also the publick Improvement, should exclude, and be excluded all other Society. Their Attire should be the same with their Huntsmen, and none should be admitted into this green Conversation-Piece, except he had been

'Mother's side related to me, to visit Mr Campbell, the dumb Man, for they told me that that was chiefly what brought them to Town, having heard Wonders of him in Essex I, who always wanted Faith in Matters of that kind, was not easily prevailed on to go, but lest they should take it ill, I went with them, when to my surprise, Mr Campbell related all their past Life, (in short, had he not been prevented, such a Discovery would have come out, as would have ruined the next design of their coming to Town, viz buying Wedding Cloaths) Our Names—though he never heard of us before—and we endeavoured to conceal—were as familiar to him as to our selves. To be sure, Mr SPECTATOR, he is a very learned and wise Man. Being impatient to know my Fortune, having paid my respects in a Family—Jacobus, he told me (after his manner) among several other things, that in a Year and nine Months I should fall ill of a new Fever, be given over by my Physicians, but should with much difficulty recover. That the first time I took the Air afterwards, I should be address'd to by a young Gentleman of a plentiful Fortune, good Sense, and a generous Spirit. Mr SPECTATOR, he is the purest Man in the World, for all he said is come to pass, and I am the happiest She in Kent. I have been in quest of Mr Campbell these three Months, and cannot find him out. Now hearing you are a dumb Man too, I thought you might correspond, and be able to tell me something, for I think myself highly oblig'd to make his Fortune, as he has mine. 'Tis very possible your Worship, who has Spies all over this Town, can inform me how to send to him. If you can, I beseech you be as speedy as possible, and you will highly oblige

Ordered, That the Inspector I employ about Wonders, enquire at the Golden-Lion, opposite to the Half Moon Tavern in Drury Lane, into the Merit of this Silent Sage, and report accordingly.

Nature Hipparchus was going to marry a common Woman, but being resolved to do nothing without the Advice of his Friend Philander, he consulted him upon the Occasion. Philander told him his Mind freely, and represented his Mistress to him in such strong Colours, that the next Morning he received a Challenge for his Puns, and before Twelve a Clock was run through the Body by the Man who had asked his Advice. Celia was more prudent on the like occasion, she desired Leonilla to give her Opinion freely upon a young Fellow who made his Addresses to her. Leonilla, to oblige her, told her with great Frankness, that she looked upon him as one of the most worthless——Celia, foreseeing what a Character she was to expect, begged her not to go on, for that she had been privately married to him above a Fortnight. The truth of it is, a Woman seldom asks Advice before she has bought her Wedding-Cloaths. When she has made her own Choice, for Form's sake she sends a Compt d'elire to her Friends.

If we look into the secret Springs and Motives that set People at work in these Occasions, and put them upon asking Advice, which they never intend to take, I look upon it to be none of the least, that they are incapable of keeping a Secret which is so very pleasing to them. A Girl longs to tell her Confidant, that she hopes to be married in a little time, and, in order to talk of the pretty Fellow that dwells so much in her Thoughts, asks her very gravely, what she would advise her to do in a case of so much Difficulty. Why else should Melissa, who had not a Thousand Pound in the World, go into every Quarter of the Town to ask her Acquaintance whether they would advise her to take Tom Townly, that made his Addresses to her with an Estate of Five Thousand a Year? 'Tis very pleasant on this occasion, to hear the Lady propose her Doubts, and to see the Puns she is at to get over them.

I must not here omit a Practice that is in use among the vulgar Part of our own Sex, who will often ask a Friend's Advice, in relation to a Fortune whom they are never likely to come at. WILL HOVERCOMB, who is now on the Verge of Threescore, took me aside not long since, and asked me in his most serious Look, whether I would advise him to marry my Lady Betty Single, who, by the way, is one of the greatest Fortunes about Town. I star'd him full in the Face upon so strange a Question, upon which he immediately gave me an Inventory of her Jewels and Estate, adding, that he was resolved to do nothing in a matter of such Consequence without my Approbation. Finding he would have an Answer, I told him, if he could get the Lady's Consent, he had mine. This is about the Tenth Match which, to my knowledge, WILL has consulted his Friends upon, without ever opening his Mind to the Party herself.

I have been engaged in this Subject by the following Letter, which comes to me from some notable young Female Scribe, who, by the Contents of it, seems to have carried Matters so far, that she is ripe for asking Advice. But as I would not lose her Good-Will, nor forfeit the Reputation which I have with her for Wisdom, I shall only

IT is an old Observation, which has been made of Politicians who would rather ingratiate themselves with their Sovereign, than promote his real Service, that they accommodate their Counsels to his Inclinations, and advise him to such Actions only as his Heart is naturally set upon. The Privy Counsellor of one in Love must observe the same Conduct, unless he would forfeit the Friendship of the Person who desires his Advice. I have known several odd Cases of this communicate the Letter to the Publick, without returning any Answer to it.

MR SPECTATOR,

'Now, Sir, the thing is this Mr Shafely is the prettiest Gentleman about Town. He is very tall, but not too tall neither. He dances like a Angel. His Mouth is made I don't know how, but 'tis the prettiest that I ever saw in my Life. He is always laughing, for he has an infinite deal of Wit. If you did but see how he rolls his 'Stockings' He has a thousand pretty Fancies, and I am sure, if you saw him, you would like him. He is a very good Scholar, and can talk. Latin is fast as English. I wish you could but see him dance. Now you must understand poor Mr Shafely has no Estate but how can he help that, you know. And yet my Friends are so unreasonable as to be always teasing me about him, because he has no Estate but I am sure he has that that is better than an Estate, for he is a Good natured Ingenious Modest, Civil, Tall, Well bred, Handsome Man, and I am obliged to him for his Civilities ever since I saw him. I forgot to tell you that he has black Eyes and looks upon me now and then as if he had tears in them. And yet my Friends are so unreasonable, that they would have me be uncivil to him. I have a good Portion which they cannot hinder me of, and I shall be fourteen on the 29th Day of August next, and am therefore willing to settle in the World as soon as I can, and so is Mr Shafely. But every body I advise with here is poor Mr Shafely's enemy. I desire therefore you will give me your Advice, for I know you are a wise Man, and if you advise me well, I am resolved to follow it. I heartily wish you could see him dance, and am,

AMONG my Daily-Papers which I bestow on the Publick, there are some which are written with Regularity and Method, and others that run out into the Wildness of those Compositions which go by the Names of Essays. As for the first, I have the whole Scheme of the Discourse in my Mind before I set Pen to Paper. In the other kind of Writing, it is sufficient that I have several Thoughts on a Subject, without troubling myself to range them in such order, that they may seem to grow out of one another, and be disposed under the proper Heads. Seneca and Moliere are Patterns for Writing in this first kind as Tully and Aristotle excel in the other. When I read an Author of Genius who writes without Method I fancy myself in a Wood that abounds with a great many noble Objects, rising among one another in the greatest Confusion and Disorder. When I read a methodical Discourse, I am in a regular Plantation, and can place my self in its several Centres, so as to take a view of all the Lanes and Walks that are struck from them. You may ramble in the one a whole Day together, and every Moment discover something or other that is new to you but when you have done, you will have but a confused imperfect Notion of the Place. In the other, your Eye commands the whole Prospect, and gives you such an Idea of it, as is not easily worn out of the Memory.

Irregularity and want of Method are only supportable in Men of great Learning or Genius, who are often too full to be exact, and therefore chuse to throw down their Pearls in Heaps before the Reader, rather than be at the Pains of stringing them.

Method is of advantage to a Work, both in respect to the Writer and the Reader. In regard to the first, it is a great help to his Invention. When a Man has plann'd his Discourse, he finds a great many Thoughts rising out of every Head, that do not offer themselves upon the general Survey of a Subject. His Thoughts are at the same time more intelligible, and better discover their Drift and Meaning, when they are placed in their proper Lights, and follow one another in a regular Series, than when they are thrown together without Order and Connexion. There is always an Obscurity in Confusion, and the same Sentence that would have enlightened the Reader in one part of a Discourse, perplexes him in another. For the same reason likewise every Thought in a methodical Discourse shews itself self in its greatest Beauty, as the several Figures in a piece of Painting receive new Grace from their Disposition in the Picture. The Advantages of a Reader from a methodical Discourse, are correspondent with those of the Writer. He comprehends every thing easily, takes it in with Pleasure, and retains it long.

Method is not less requisite in ordinary Conversation than in Writing, provided a Man would talk to make himself understood. I, who hear a thousand Coffee house Debates every Day, am very sensible of this want of Method in the Thoughts of my honest Countrymen. There is not one Dispute in ten which is managed in those Schools of Politics, where, after the three first Sentences, the Question is not entirely lost. Our Disputants put me in mind of the Cuttle Fish, that when he is unable to extricate himself, blackens all the Water about him till he becomes invisible. The Man who does not know how to methodize his Thoughts, has always, to borrow a Phrase from the Dispensary, a barren Superfluity of Words, the Fruit is lost amidst the Exuberance of Leaves.

Tom Puzzle is one of the most Eminent Immethodical Disputants of any that has fallen under my Observation. Tom has read enough to make him very Impertinent his Knowledge is sufficient to raise Doubts, but not to clear them. It is pity that he has so much Learning, or that he has not a great deal more. With these Qualifications Tom sets up for a Free thinker, finds a great many things to blame in the Constitution of his Country, and gives shrewd Intimations that he does not believe another World. In short, Puzzle is an Atheist as much as his Parts will give him leave. He has got about half a dozen common place Topics, into which he never fails to turn the Conversation, whatever is the Occasion of it. I sh^d the matter in debate be about Downy or Denain, it is ten to one but half his Discourse runs upon the Unreasonableness of Bigottry and Priest craft. This makes Mr Puzzle the Admiration of all those who have less Sense than himself and the Contempt of those who have more. There is none in town whom Tom dreads so much as my Friend Will Dry Will, who is acquainted with Tom's Logic, when he finds him running off the Question, cuts him short with a What then? We allow all this to be true, but what is it to our present Purpose? I have known Tom eloquent half an hour together, and triumphing, as he thought, in the Superiority of the Argument, when he has been non plus'd on a sudden by Mr Dry's desiring him to tell the Company what it was that he endeavour'd to prove. In short, Dry is a Man of a clear methodical Head, but few Words, and gains the same Advantage over Puzzle, that a small Body of regular Troops would gain over a numberless undisciplined Militia. C walks with me, he is surprized to see several large Spots of Ground cover'd with ten thousand different Colours, and has often singled out Flowers that he might have met with under a common Hedge, in a Field, or in a Meadow, as some of the greatest Beauties of the Place. The only Method I observe in this Particular, is to range in the same Quarter the Products of the same Season, that they may make their Appearance together, and compose a Picture of the greatest Variety. There is the same Irregularity in my Plantations, which run into as great a Wildness as their Natures will permit. I raise in none that do not naturally rejoice in the Soil and are pleas'd when I am walking in a Labyrinth of my own raising, not to know whether the next Tree I shall meet with is an Apple or an Oak, an Elm or a Pear-tree. My Kitchen has likewise its particular Quarters assigned it for besides the wholesome Luxury which that Place abounds with, I have always thought a Kitchen Garden a more pleasant Sight than the finest Orangerie, or artificial Greenhouse. I love to see everything in its Perfection, and am more pleas'd to survey my Rows of Coleworts and Cabbages with a thousand nameless Pot-herbs, springing up in their full Fragrancy and Verdure, than to see the tender Plants of Foreign Countries kept alive by artificial Heats, or withering in an Air and Soil that are not adapted to them. I must not omit that there is a Fountain rising in the upper part of my Garden, which forms a little winding Rill, and administers to the Pleasure as well as the Plenty of the Place. I have so conducted it, that it visits most of my Plantations and have taken particular Care to let it run in the same manner as it would do in an open field so that it generally passes through Banks of Violets and Primroses, Plots of Willow, or other Plants, that seem to be of its own producing. There is another Circumstance in which I am very particular, or, as my Neighbours call me, very whimsical. As my Garden invites into it all the Birds of the Country, by offering them the Convenience of Springs and Shades, Solitude and Shelter, I do not suffer any one to destroy their Nests in the Spring, or drive them from their usual Haunts in Fruit-time. I value my Garden more for being full of Blackbirds than Cherries, and very frankly give them Fruit for their Songs. By this means I have always the Musick of the Season in its Perfection, and am highly delighted to see the Jay or the Thrush hopping about my Walks, and shooting before my Eye across the several little Glades and Alleys that I pass thro'. I think there are as many kinds of Gardening as of Poetry. Your Makers of Parterres and Flower Gardens, are Epigrammatists and Sonneteers in this Art. Contrivers of Bowers and Grotto's, Treillages and Cascades, are Romance Writers. Wise and London are our heroic Poets and if, as a Critick, I may single out any Passage of their Works to commend, I shall take notice of that Part in the upper Garden at Kensington, which was at first nothing but a Gravel-Pit. It must have been a fine Genius for Gardening that could have thought of forming such an unsightly Hollow into so beautiful an Area, and to have hit the Eye with

² It is sud of Colon in the second Canto,

A barren Superfluity of Words

SIR,

HAVING lately read your Essay on the Pleasures of the Imagination, I was so taken with your Thoughts upon some of our English Gardens, that I cannot forbear troubling you with a Letter upon that Subject. I am one, you must know, who am looked upon as an Humourist in Gardening. I have several Acres about my House, which I call my Garden, and which a skilful Gardener would not know what to call. It is a Confusion of Kitchen and Parterre, Orchard and Flower-Garden, which lie so mixt and interwoven with one another that if a Foreigner who had seen nothing of our Country should be convey'd into my Garden at his first landing, he would look upon it as a natural Wilderness, and one of the uncultivated Parts of our Country. My Flowers grow up in several Parts of the Garden in the greatest Luxuriance and Profusion. I am so far from being fond of any particular one, by reason of its Rarity, that if I meet with any one in a Field which pleases me, I give it a place in my Garden. By this means, when a Stranger so uncommon and agreeable a Scene is that which it is now wrought into. To give this particular Spot of Ground the greater Effect, they have made a very pleasing Contrast for as on one side of the Walk you see this hollow Basin, with its several little Plantations lying so conveniently under the Eye of the Beholder, on the other side of it there appears a seeming Mount, made up of Trees rising one higher than another in proportion as they approach the Center. A Spectator who has not heard this Account of it, would think this Circular Mount was not only a real one, but that it had been actually scooped out of that hollow Space which I have before mention'd. I never yet met with any one who had walked in this Garden, who was not struck with that Part of it which I have here mention'd. As for my self, you will find, by the Account which I have already given you that my Compositions in Gardening are altogether after the Pindarick Manner, and run into the beautiful Wildness of Nature, without affecting the nicer Elegancies of Art. What I am now going to mention, will, perhaps, deserve your Attention more than any thing I have yet said. I find that in the Discourse which I spoke of at the Beginning of my Letter, you are against filling an English Garden with Ever Greens; and indeed I am so far of your Opinion, that I can by no means think the Verdure of an Ever Green comparable to that which shoots out annually, and clothes our Trees in the Summer Season. But I have often wonder'd that those who are like my self, and love to live in Gardens, have never thought of contriving a Winter Garden, which would consist of such Trees only as never cast their Leaves. We have very often little Sentences of Sunshine and fair Weather in the most uncomfortable Parts of the Year, and have frequently several Days in November and January that are as agreeable as any in the finest Months. At such times, therefore, I think there could not be a greater Pleasure, than to walk in such a Winter Garden as I have proposed. In the Summer Season the whole Country blooms, and is a kind of Garden, for which reason we are not so sensible of those Beauties that at this time may be every where met with; but when Nature is in her Desolation, and presents us with nothing but bleak and barren Prospects, there is some thing unspeakably cheerful in a Spot of Ground which is covered with Trees that smile amidst all the Rigours of Winter, and give us a View of the most gay Season in the midst of that which is the most acrid and melancholy. I have so far indulged my self in this Thought, that I have set apart a whole Acre of Ground for the executing of it. The Laurel, the Hornbeam, and the Holly with many other Trees and Plants of the same nature, grow so thick in it that you cannot imagine a more lively Scene. The glowing Redness of the Berries with which they are hung at this time, vies with the Verdure of their Leaves, and are apt to inspire the Heart of the Beholder with that eternal Delight which you have somewhere taken notice of in your former paper. It is very pleasant at the same time, to see the several kinds of Birds retiring into this little Green Spot, and enjoying themselves among the Branches and I ollege, when my great Garden, which I have before mention'd to you, does not afford a single Leaf for their Shelter.

You must know, Sir that I look upon the Pleasure which we take in a Garden, as one of the most innocent Delights in Human Life. A Garden is the Habitation of our first Parents before the Fall. It is naturally apt to fill the Mind with Calmness and Tranquility, and to lay all its turbulent Passions at rest. It gives us a great insight into the Contrivance and Wisdom of Providence, and suggests innumerable Subjects for Meditation. I cannot but think the very Complacency and Satisfaction which a Man takes in these Works of Nature, to be a laudable, if not a virtuous Habit of Mind. For all which Reasons I hope you will pardon the Length of my present Letter.

Que n' est se Arbitrium est, et Jus et Norma

MR SPECTATOR,

I happened lately, that a Friend of mine, who I had many things to buy for his Family, would oblige me to walk with him to the Shops. He was very nice in his way, and fond of having every thing shewn, which at first made me very uneasy; but as his Humour still continu'd, the things which I had been staring at along with him, began to fill my Head, and led me into a Set of amusing Thoughts concerning them.

I fancied it must be very surprising to any one who enters into a detail of Fashions, to consider how far the Vanity of Mankind has led it self out in Dress, what a prodigious number of People it maintains, and what a Circulation of Money it occasions. Providence in this Case makes use of the Folly which we will not give up and it becomes instrumental to the Support of those who are willing to labour. Hence it is that Fringe-Makers, Lace Men, Rich Women, and a number of other Trades, which would be useless in a simple State of Nature, draw their Subsistence, tho' it is seldom seen that such as these are extremely rich, because their original Iust of being, founded upon Vanity, keeps them poor by the light Inconstancy of its Nature. The Variableness of Fashion turns the Stream of Business which flows from it now into one Channel, and anon into another so that different Sets of People sink or flourish in their turns by it.

I am from the Shops we retir'd to the Tavern, where I found my Friend express so much satisfaction for the Bargains he had made, that my moral Reflections, (if I had told them) might have pass'd for a Reproof so I chose rather to fall in with him, and let the Discourse run upon the use of Fashions.

Here we remembered how much Man is govern'd by his Senses, how lively he is struck by the Objects which appear to him in an agreeable manner, how much Clothes contribute to make us agreeable Objects, and how much we owe it to our selves that we should appear so

We considered Man as belonging to Societies, Societies as form'd of different Ranks, and different Ranks distinguished by Habits, that all proper Duty or Respect might attend their Appearance

We took notice of several Advantages which are met with in the Occurrences of Conversation. How the bashful Man has been sometimes so ruin'd, as to express himself with an Air of Freedom, when he imagines that his Habit introduces him to Company with a becoming Manner. And again, how a Fool in fine Clothes shall be suddenly heard with Attention, till he has betray'd himself, whereas a Man of Sense appearing with a Dress of Negligence, shall be but coldly received, till he be proved by Time, and established in a Character. Such things as these we cou'd recollect to have happen'd to our Knowledge so very often, that we concluded the Author had his Reasons, who advises his Son to go in Dress rather above his Fortune than under it

At last the Subject seem'd so considerable, that it was proposed to have a Repository built for Fashions as there are Chambers for Medals and other Rarities. The Building may be shap'd as that which stands among the Pyramids, in the Form of a Woman's Head. This may be ruin'd upon Pillars, whose Ornaments shall bear a just relation to the Design. Thus there may be an Imitation of Fringe carv'd in the Base, a sort of Appearance of Lace in the Frieze, and a Representation of curling Locks, with Boxes of Ribbon sloping over them, may fill up the Work of the Cornish. The Inside may be divided into two Apartments appropriated to each Sex. The Apartments may be fill'd with Shelves, on which Boxes are to stand as regularly as Books in a Library. These are to have Folding-Doors, which being open'd you are to behold a Baby dressed out in some Fashion which has flourish'd, and standing upon a Pedestal, where the time of its Reign is mark'd down. For its further Regulation, let it be order'd, that every one who invents a Fashion shall bring in his Box, whose Front he may at pleasure have either work'd or painted with some amorous or gay Device, that, like Books with gilded Leaves and Covers, it may the sooner draw the Eyes of the Beholders. And to the end that these may be preserv'd with all due Care, let there be a Keeper appointed, who shall be a Gentleman qualify'd with a competent Knowledge in Clothes, so that by this means the Place will be a comfortable Support for some Beau who has spent his Estate in dressing.

The Reasons offer'd by which we expected to gain the Approbation of the Publick, were as follows

First, That every one who is considerable enough to be a Mode, and has any Imperfection of Nature or Chance, which it is possible to hide by the Advantage of Clothes, may, by coming to this Repository, be furnish'd her self, and furnish all who are under the same Misfortune, with the most agreeable Manner of concealing it, and that on the other side, every one who has any

Beauty in Face or Shape, may also be furnish'd with the most agreeable Manner of shewing it

Secondly, That whereas some of our young Gentlemen who travel, give us great reason to suspect that they only go abroad to make or improve a Fancy for Dress, a Project of this nature may be a means to keep them at home, which is in effect the keeping of so much Money in the Kingdom. And perhaps the Balance of Fashion in Europe, which now leans upon the side of France, may be so alter'd for the future, that it may become as common with Frenchmen to come to England for their finishing Stroke of Breeding, as it has been for Englishmen to go to France for it

Thirdly, Whereas several great Scholars, who might have been otherwise useful to the World, have spent their time in studying to describe the Dresses of the Ancients from dark Hints, which they are run to interpret and support with much Learning, it will from henceforth happen, that they shall be freed from the Trouble, and the World from useless Volumes. This Project will be a Registry, to which Posterity may have recourse, for the clearing such obscure Passages, as tend that way in Authors, and therefore we shall not for the future submit our selves to the Learning of Etymology, which might persuade the Age to come, that the Farthingal was worn for Cheriopness, or the Furbeloe for Warmth

Fourthly, Whereas they who are old themselves, have often a way of railing at the Extravagance of Youth, and the whole Age in which their Children live, it is hoped that this ill Humour will be much suppress'd, when we can have recourse to the Fashions of their Times, produce them in our Vindication, and be able to shew that it might have been as expensive in Queen Elizabeth's time only to wash and quill a Ruff, as it is now to buy Cravats or Neck-Handkerchiefs.

We desire also to have it taken Notice of, That because we would shew a particular respect to Foreigners, which may induce them to perfect their Breeding here in a Knowledge which is very proper for pretty Gentlemen, we have conceived the Motto for the House in the Learned Language. There is to be a Picture over the Door, with a Looking Glass and a Dressing-Chair in the Middle of it. Then on one side are to be seen, above one another, Pitch-Boxes, Pin-Cushions, and little Bottles, on the other, Powder Bags, Puffs, Combs and Brushes, beyond these, Swords with fine Knots, whose Points are hidden, and Fans almost closed, with the Handles downward, are to stand out intermingled from the Sides till they meet at the Top, and form a Semicycle over the rest of the Figures. Beneath all, the Writing is to run in this pretty sounding Manner

*Adeste, O quotquot sunt, Veneres, Gratia, Cupidines.*¹

¹ 'All ye Venuses, Graces, and Cupids, attend See prepared to your hands

Darts, torches, and brands Your weapons here choose, and your empire extend'

Et ovis adsunt in promptu Jaces, Vincula, Spicula, Hunc elagate, sum te, &c.

I am, Sir,
Your most humble Servant,
A B

The Proposal of my Correspondent I cannot but look upon as an ingenious Method of placing Persons (whose Parts make them ambitious to exert themselves in frivolous things) in a Rank by themselves. In order to this, I would propose, That there be a Board of Directors of the Fashionable Society, and because it is a Matter of too much Weight for a private Man to determine alone I should be highly obliged to my Correspondent, if they would give in Lists of Persons qualified for this Trust. If the chief Collections of the Conversations of which Pleasures are carried on by Persons, each of whom has his little number of Followers and Admirers would name from among themselves two or three to be inserted, they should be put up with great Faithfulness. Old Heavens are to be presented in the first place but as that Sect with relation to Dress is almost extinct, it will, I fear, be absolutely necessary, to take in all Time Servers, properly so deemed that is, such as, without any Conviction of Conscience or View of Interest, chunge with the World, and that merely from a Fear of being out of Fashion. Such also, who from a Necessity of Temper, and too much Obsequiousness, are vicious against their Will, and follow Leaders whom they do not approve, for Want of Courage to go their own Way, are capable Persons for this Superintendency. Those who are loth to grow old, or would do any thing contrary to the Course and Order of things, out of Fondness to be in Fashion, are proper Candidates. To conclude, those who are in Fashion without apparent Merit, must be supposed to have latent Qualities, which would appear in a Post of Direction and therefore are to be regarded in forming these Lists. Any who shall be pleased, according to these or what further Qualifications may occur to himself, to send a List, is desired to do it within fourteen days after this Date.

N B The Place of the Physician to this Society, according to the last mentioned Qualification, is already engaged.

MANY are the Epistles I every day receive from Husbands, who complain of Vanity, Pride, but above all Ill nature, in their Wives. I cannot tell how it is, but I think I see in all their Letters that the Cause of their Uneasiness is in themselves and indeed I have hardly ever observed the married Condition unhappy, but from want of Judgment or Temper in the Man. The truth is, we generally make Love in a Style, and with Sentiments very unfit for ordinary Life.

They are half Theatrical, half Romantick. By this Means we raise our Imaginations to what is not to be expected in human Life, and because we did not beforehand think of the Creature we were enamoured of as subject to Dishumour, Aze, Sickness, Impatience or Sulkiness, but altogether considered her as the Object of Joy, human Nature it self is often imputed to her as her particular Imperfection or Defect.

I take it to be a Rule proper to be observed in all Occurrences of Life, but more especially in the domestick or matrimonial Part of it, to preserve always a Disposition to be pleased. This cannot be supported but by considering things in their right light, and as Nature has form'd them, and not as our own Fancies or Appetites would have them. He then who took a young Lady to his Bed, with no other Consideration than the Expectation of Scenes of Delirance, and thought of her (as I said before) only as she was to administer to the Gratification of Desire as that Desire flags, will, without her I trust, think her Charms and her Merit abated. From hence must follow Indifference, Dislike, Peevishness, and Rage. But the Man who brings his Reason to support his Passion, and beholds what he loves as liable to all the Calumnies of human Life both in Body and Mind, and even at the best what must bring upon him new Cares and new Relations, such a Lover, I say, will form himself accordingly, and adapt his Mind to the Nature of his Circumstances. This latter Person will be prepared to be a Father, a Friend, an Advocate, a Steward for People yet unborn, and has proper Affections ready for every Incident in the Marriage State. Such a Man can hear the Cries of Children with Pity instead of Anger and when they run over his Head, he is not disturb'd at their Noise but is glad of their Mirth and Health. Tom Crustly has told me, that he thinks it doubles his Attention to the most intricate Affair he is about, to hear his Children, for whom all his Cares are applied, make a Noise in the next Room. On the other side Will Sparkish cannot put on his Periwig, or adjust his Cravat at the Glass, for the Noise of those damned Nurses and [scurrying] Brats and then ends with a gallant Reflection upon the Comforts of Matrimony, runs out of the Hearing and drives to the Chocolate house.

According as the Husband is dispos'd in himself, every Circumstance of his Life is to give him Torment or Pleasure. When the Affection is well-placed, and supported by the Considerations of Duty, Honour and Friendship, which are in the highest Degree engaged in this Alliance, there can nothing rise in the common Course of Life, or from the Blows or Favour of Fortune, in which a Man will not find Matters of some Delight unknown to a single Condition.

He who sincerely loves his Wife and Family, and studies to improve that Affection in himself, conceives Pleasure from the most indifferent things, while the married Man, who has not bid adieu to the Fashions and false Gallantries of the Town, is perplexed with every thing around him. In both these Cases Men cannot, indeed, make a siller Figure, than in repeating such Pleasures and Puns to the rest of the World but I speak of them only, as they sit upon those who are involved in them. As I visit all sorts of People, I cannot indeed but smile, when the good Lady tells her Husband what extraordinary things the Child spoke since he went out. No longer than yesterday I was prevail'd with to go home with a fond Husband and his Wife told him, that his Son, of his own head, when the Clock in the Parlour struck two, and Pappa would come home to Dinner presently. While the Father has him in a rapture in his Arms, and is drowning him with kisses, the Wife tells me he is but just four Years old. Then they both struggle for him, and bring him up to me, and repeat his Observations of two a Clock. I was called upon, by Look upon the Child, and then at me, to say something, and I told the Father, that this Remark of the Infant of his coming home, and joining the time with it, was a certain Indication that he would be a great Historian and Chronologer. They are neither of them I look yet received my Commendation with great Acknowledgment of my Presence. I fired very well at Dinner, and heard many other notable Sayings of their Heir, which would have given very little Entertainment to one less turned to Reflection than I was. But it was a pleasing Speculation to remark on the Happiness of a Life, in which things of no Moment give Occasion of Hope, Self-Satisfaction, and Triumph. On the other Hand, I have known an ill natur'd Coxcomb, who was hardly improv'd in any thing but Bulk, for want of this Disposition, silence the whole Family, as a Set of silly Women and Children, for recounting things which were really above his own Capacity.

When I say all this, I cannot deny but there are perverses. Jades that fall to Mens Lots with whom it requires more than common Proficiency in Philosophy to be able to live. When these are joined to Men of warm Spirits, without Temper or Learning, they are frequently corrected with Stripes but one of our famous Lawyers is of Opinion, that this ought to be used sparingly. As I remember, those are his very Words¹ but as it is proper to draw some spiritual Use out of all Afflictions, I should rather recommend to those who are visit'd with Women of Spirit, to form themselves for the World by Patience at home. Socrates, who is by all Accounts the undoubted Head of the Sect of the Hen peck'd, own'd and acknowledged that he ow'd great part of his Virtue to the Exercise which his useful Wife constantly gave it. There are several good Instructions may be drawn from his wise Answers to People of less Fortitude than himself on her Subject. A Friend, with Indignation asked how so good a Man could live with so violent a Creature? He observ'd to him, That they who learn to keep a good Seat on horseback, mount the least manageable they can get, and when they have *master'd them, they are sure never to be discompos'd on the Backs of Steeds less restrain'd.*² At several times, to different Persons, on the same Subject, he has said, My dear Friend, you are beholden to Xantippe, that I bear so well your flying out in a Dispute. To another, My Hen Jack's very much, but she brings me Children. They that live in a trading Street, are not disturbed at the Passage of Carts. I would have, if possible, a wise Man be contented with his Lot, even with a Shrew for tho' he cannot make her better, he may, you see, make himself better by her means.

But instead of pursuing my Design of Displaying Conjugal Love in its natural Beauties, and Attractions, I am got into Tales to the disadvantage of that State of Life. I must say, therefore, that I am verily persuaded that whatever is delightful in human Life, is to be enjoy'd in greater Perfection in the marry'd, than in the single Condition. He that has this Passion in Perfection, in Occasions of Joy can say to himself, besides his own Satisfaction, How happy will this make my Wife and Children? Upon Occurrences of Distress or Danger can comfort himself, But, all this while my Wife and Children are safe. There is something in it that doubles Satisfaction, because others participate them, and dispels Afflictions, because others are exempt from them. All who are marry'd without this Relish of their Circumstance, are in either a tasteless Indolence and Negligence, which is hardly to be attain'd, or else live in the hourly Repetition of sharp Answers, eager Upbraidings, and distracting Reproaches. In a word the married State, with and without the Affection suitable to it, is the completest Image of Heaven and Hell we are capable of receiving in this Life.

*Responsare cupidinibus, contemnere honores,

THE other Day looking over those old Manuscripts, of which I have formerly given some Account, and which relate to the Character of the mighty Pharamond of France and the close Friendship between him and his Friend Eucrate,² I found, among the Letters which had been in the custody of the latter, an Epistle from a Country Gentleman to Pharamond, wherein he excuses himself from coming to Court. The Gentleman, it seems, was contented with his Condition, had formerly been in the King's Service, but at the writing the following Letter, had, from Leisure and Reflection, quite another Sense of things than that which he had in the more active Part of his Life.

Monsieur Chezluy to Pharamond

Dread Sir,

'I have from your own Hand (enclosed under

'the Cover of Mr Eugene of your Majesty's 'Bed Chamber) a Letter which invites me to 'Court. I understand this great Honour to be 'done me out of Respect and Inclination to me,
'rather than he, and to your own Service. For 'which Reason I beg Leave to lay before your 'Majesty my Reasons for declining to depart 'from Home, and will not doubt but, as your 'Majesty in desiring, my Attendance was to make 'me in happier Man, when you think that will 'not be effected by my Remove, you will permit 'me to stay where I am. Those who live in 'Ambition to appear in Courts, have ever an 'Opinion that their Persons or their Talents are 'sufficiently fortified for the Service or Ornament
'of that Place, or else are hurried by downright 'Desire of Gain, or what they call Honour, or 'take upon themselves whatever the Generosity 'of their Master can give them Opportunities to 'grasp at. But your Goodness shall not be thus 'imposed upon by me. I will therefore confess to 'you, that frequent Solitude, and long Conversation
'with such who know no Arts which polish
'Life, have made me the plainest Creature in your 'Dominions. Those less Capacious of moving 'with a good Grace, bearing a ready Affability to 'all around me, and acting with ease before 'many, have quite left me. I am come to that,
'with regard to my Person that I consider it only 'as a Machine I am obliged to take Care of, in 'order to enjoy my Soil in its Fecundities with 'Alacrity, well remembering that this Habitation
'on Clay will in a few years be a merrier
'Piece of Earth than any Utensil about my 'House. When this is, as it really is, the most 'fruitful Reflection I have, you will easily ima'gine how all I should become a Drawing Room.
'Add to this, What shall a Man without Desires
'do about the generous Pharamond? Mon'sieur Fernand has hinted to me that you have 'thoughts of distinguishing me with Titles. As 'for my self, in the Temper of my present Mind,
'Appellations of Honour would but embarrass 'Discourse and new Behaviour towards me
'perplex me in every Habit of Life. I am 'also to acknowledge to you, that my Children of 'whom your Majesty condescended to enquire,
'are all of them men both in their Persons and 'Genius. The Estate my eldest Son is Heir to,
'is more than he can enjoy with a good Grace.
'My Self-love will not carry me so far, as to im'pose upon Mankind the Advancement of Per'sons (merely for their being related to me) into 'high Distinctions, who ought for their own
'Sakes, as well as that of the Publick, to reflect 'Obscurity. I wish, my generous Prince, as it is 'in your power to give Honours and Offices, it 'were also to give Talents suitable to them.
'Were it so, the noble Pharamond would re'ward the Zeal of my Youth with Abilities to do
'him Service in my Age.

'Those who receipt of Favour without Merit,
'support themselves in it at the Expence of your 'Majesty. Give me Leave to tell you, Sir, this is 'the Reason that we in the Country hear so often 'repeated the Word Prerogative. That Part of 'your Law which is reserved in your self for the 'readier Service and Good of the Publick, slight

'Men are eternally buzzing in our Ears to cover 'their own follies and Misarranges. It would 'be an Addition to the high Favour you have 'done me, if you would let Eugene send me 'word how often, and in what Cases you allow a 'Constable to insist upon the Prerogative. From 'the highest to the lowest Officer in your Domini'ons, something, of their own Carridge they would 'exempt from Examination under the Shelter of 'the Word Prerogative. I would fain, most 'noble Pharamond, see one of your Officers as'sert your Prerogative by good and gracious Ac'tions. When is it used to help the Afflicted, to 'rescue the Innocent, to comfort the Stranger?
'Uncommon Method, apparently undertaken to 'attract worthy Lads, would never make Power
'invidious. You see, Sir I tell to you with the 'Freedom your noble Nature approves, in all 'whom you admit to your Conversation.

'But, to return to your Majesty's Letter, I 'humbly conceive, that all Distinctions are useful 'to Men only as they are to act in Publick, and 'it would be a romantic Madness, for a Man to 'be a Lord in his Closet. Nothing can be hon'ourable to a Man apart from the World, but the 'Reflection upon worthy Actions, and he that 'places Honour in a Consciousness of Well doing,
'will have but little Relish for any outward Hom-
'age that is paid him, since what gives him dis'tinction to himself, cannot come within the Ob'servation of his Beholders. Thus all the Words 'of Lordship, Honour, and Grace, are only Repre'sentations to a Man that the King has order'd him
'to be called so, but no Evidence that there is 'any thing in himself that would give the Man 'who applies to him those Ideas, without the 'Creation of his Master.

'I have most noble Pharamond, all Honours
'and all Titles in your own Approbation, I tri'umph in them as they are your Gift, I refuse 'them as they are to give me the Observation of 'others. Indulge me, my Noble Master, in this 'Charity of Renown, let me know my self in the 'Favour of Pharamond, and look down upon
'the Applause of the People.

I am in all Duty and Loyalty, Your Majesty's most obedient Subject and Servant,
Jean Chezley

SIR,

'I need not tell you with what Disadvantages
'Men of low Fortunes and great Modesty come 'into the World, what wrong Measures their 'Diffidence of themselves, and Fear of offending,
'often obliges them to take, and what a Pity it is 'that their greatest Virtues and Qualities, that 'should soonest recommend them, are the main
'Obstacle in the way of their Perseverance.

'This, Sir, is my Case. I was bred at a Country-
'School, where I learned Latin and Greek. The 'Misfortunes of my Family forced me up to Town,
'where a Profession of the polite sort has pro'tected me against Infirmity and Want. I am now
'Clerk to a Lawyer, and, in times of Vacancy
'and Recess from Business, have made my self 'Master of Italian and French, and tho' the 'Progress I have made in my Business has gain'd

'me Reputation enough for one of my standing,
'yet my Mind suggests to me every day, that it is not upon that Foundation I am to build my Fortune

'The Person I have my present Dependence upon, has it in his Nature, as well as in his Power, to advance me, by recommending me to 'a Gentleman that is going beyond Sea in a publick Employment I know the printing this Letter 'would point me out to those I want Confidence
'to speak to, and I hope it is not in your Power
'to refuse making any Body happy

I¹ is [something²] pleasant enough to consider the different Notions, which different Persons have of the same thing If Men of low Condition very often set a Value on Things, which are not prized by those who are in an higher Station of Life, there are many things these esteem which are in no Value among Persons of an inferior Rank Common People are, in particular, very much astonished when they hear of those solemn Contests and Debates, which are made among the Great upon the Punctilio's of a publick Ceremony, and wonder to hear that any Business of Consequence should be retarded by those little Circumstances, which they represent to themselves as trifling and insignificant I am mightily pleased with a Porter's Decision in one of Mr Sautler's Plays,³ which is founded upon that fine Distress of a Virtuous Woman's marrying a second Husband, while her first was yet living The first Husband, who was suppos'd to have been dead, returning to his House after a long Absence, raises a noble Perplexity for the Tragick Part of the Play In the mean while, the Nurse and the Porter conferring upon the Difficulties that would ensue in such a Case, honest Sampson thinks the matter may be easily decided, and solves it very judiciously, by the old Proverb, that if his first Master be still living, The Man must have his Mare again There is nothing in my time which has so much surprized and confounded the greatest part of my honest Countrymen, as the present Controversy between Count Rechteren and Monsieur Ménager, which employs the wise Heads of so many Nations, and holds all the Affairs of Europe in suspense.⁴

the Princes of Anhalt, of Holstein, Nassau Secken, and 2500 men, under the eyes of Prince Eugene, who was stopp'd at the bridge of Prouy on his given, he should take it Ménager replied, in writing, that although this was but an affair between lackeys, he was far from approving ill behaviour in his servants towards other servants, particularly towards servants of Count Rechteren, and he was ready to send to the Count those lackeys whom he had seen misbehaving, or even those whom his other servants should point out as guilty of the offensive conduct Rechteren, when the answer arrived, was gone to the Hague, and it was forwarded to his colleague, M Moermann Upon his return to Utrecht, Rechteren sent his secretary again to Ménager, with the complaint as before, and received the answer as before He admitted that he had not himself seen the grimaces and insulting gestures, but he ought, he said, to be at liberty to send his servants into Ménager's house for the detection of the offenders A few days afterwards Ménager and Rechteren were on the chief promenade of Utrecht, with others who were Plenipotentiaries of the United Provinces, and after exchange of civilities, Rechteren said that he was still awaiting satisfaction Ménager replied as before, and said that his lackeys all denied the charge against them Ménager refused also to allow the accusers of his servants to come into his house and be their judges Rechteren said he would have justice yet upon master and men He was invested with a sovereign power as well as Ménager He was not a man to take insults He spoke some words in Dutch to his attendants, and presently Ménager's lackeys came with complaint that the lackeys of Rechteren tripped them up behind, threw them upon their faces, and threatened them with knives Rechteren told the French Plenipotentiary that he would pay them for doing that, and discharge them if they did not do it Rechteren's colleagues did what they could to cover or excuse his folly, and begged that the matter might not appear in a despatch to France or be represented to the States-

WHEN I have published my single Paper that fills in with the Popular Taste, and pleases more than ordinary, it always brings me in a great return of Letters. My Tuesday's Discourse, wherein I gave several Admonitions to the Fraternity of the Henpeck'd, has already produced me very many Correspondents. The Reason I cannot guess at, unless it be that such a Discourse is of general Use, and every married Man's Money. An honest Tradesman, who dates his Letter from Chenyside, sends me Thanks in the name of a Club, who, he tells me, meet as often as their Wives will give them leave, and stay together till they are sent for home. He informs me, that my Paper has administered great Consolation to their whole Club, and desires me to give some further Account of Socrates, and to acquaint them in whose Reign he lived, whether he was a Citizen or a Courtier, whether he buried Xanthippe, with many other particulars. I or that by his sayings he appears to have been a very Wise Man and a good Christian. Another, who writes himself Benjamin in Bamboo, tells me, that being coupled with a Shrew, he had endeavoured to tame her by such lawful means as those which I mentioned in my last Tuesday's Paper, and that in his Wrath he had often gone further than Bracton allows in those cases, but that for the future he was resolved to bear it like a Man of Temper and Learning, and consider her only as one who lives in his House to teach him Philosophy. Tom Daphnoid says, that he agrees with me in that whole Discourse, excepting only the last Sentence, where I affirm the married State to be either in Heaven or an Hell. Tom has been at the charge of a Penny upon this occasion, to tell me, that by his Experience it is neither one nor the other, but rather that middle land of State, commonly known by the Name of Purgatory.

The four Sex have likewise obliged me with their Reflections upon the same Discourse. A Lady, who calls herself Lutepe, and seems a Woman of Letters, asks me whether I am for establishing the Salick Law in every Family, and why it is not fit that a Woman who has Discretion and Learning should sit at the Helm, when the Husband is weak and illiterate? Another of a quite contrary Character, subscribes herself Xanthippe, and tells me, that she follows the Example of her Name-sake for being married to a Bookish Man, who has no Knowledge of the World, she is forced to take their Affairs into her own Hands, and to spirit him up now and then, that he may not grow musty, and unfit for Conversation.

After this Abridgment of some Letters which are come to my hands upon this Occasion, I shall publish one of them at large.

MR SPECTATOR,

'You have given us a lively Picture of that kind of Husband who comes under the Denomination of the Henpeck'd but I do not remember that you have ever touched upon one that is of the quite different Character, and who, in several Places of England, goes by the Name of a Cot-Queen. I have the Misfortune to be joined for Life with one of this Character, who in reality is more a Woman than [I am¹] He was bred up under the Tuition of a tender Mother, till she had made him as good a Housewife as her self. He could preserve Apricots, and make Gellies, before he had been two Years out of the Nursery. He was never suffered to go abroad, for fear of catching Cold, when he should have been hunting down a Buck, he was by his Mother's Side learning how to Stewen it, or put it in Crust, and was making Paper Boats with his Sisters, at an Age when other young Gentlemen are crossing the Seas, or travelling into Foreign Countries. He has the whitest Hand that you ever saw in your Life, and raises Pasta better than any Woman in England. These Qualifications make him a sad Husband. He is perpetually in the Kitchen, and has a thousand Squabbles with the Cook-maid. He is better acquainted with the Milk-Score, than his Steward's Accounts. I fret to Death when I hear him find fault with a Dish that is not dressed to his liking, and instructing his Friends that dine with him in the best Place for a Walnut, or Sauce for an Hunch of Venison. With all this, he is a very good natured Husband, and never fell out with me in his Life but once, upon the over-roasting of a Dish of Wild-Fowl. At the same time I must own I would rather he was a Man of a rough Temper, that would treat me harshly sometimes than of such an effeminate busy Nature in a Province that does not belong to him. Since you have given us the Character of a Wife who wears the Breeches, pray say something of a Husband that wears the Petticoat. Why should not a Female Character be as ridiculous in a Man, as a Male Character in one of our Sex?

I am, &c

WE cannot be guilty of a greater Act of Uncharitableness, than to interpret the Afflictions which befall our Neighbours, as Punishments and Judgments. It aggravates the Evil to him who suffers, when he looks upon himself as the Mark of Divine Vengeance, and abates the Compassion of those towards him, who regard him in so dreadful a Light. This Humour of turning every Misfortune into a Judgment, proceeds from wrong Notions of Religion, which, in its own nature, produces Good will towards Men, and puts the mildest Construction upon every Accident that befalls them. In this case, therefore, it is not Religion that sours a Man's Temper, but it ings. How many Accidents have pass'd for Misfortunes, which have turn'd to the Welfare and Prosperity of the Persons in whose Lot they have fallen? How many Disappointments have, in their Consequences, sav'd a man from Ruin? If we could look into the Effects of every thing, we might be allowed to pronounce boldly upon Blessings and Judgments, but for a Man to give his Opinion of what he sees but in part, and in its Beginnings, is an unjustifiable Piece of Rashness and Folly. The Story of Baton and Clitobus, which was in great Reputation among the Heathens, (for we see it quoted by all the ancient Authors, both Greek and Latin, who have written upon the Immortality of the Soul,) may teach us a Caution in this Matter. These two Brothers, being the Sons of a Lady who was Priestess to Juno, drew their Mother's Chariot to the Temple at the time of a great Solemnity, the Persons being absent who by their Office were to have drawn her Chariot on that Occasion. The Mother was so transported with this Instance of filial Duty, that she petition'd her Goddess to bestow upon them the greatest Gift that could be given to Men upon which they were both cast into a deep Sleep, and the next Morning found dead in the Temple. This was such an Event, as would have been construed into a Judgment, had it happen'd to the two Brothers after an Act of Disobedience, and would doubtless have been represented as such by any Ancient Historian who had given us an Account of it. MR SPECTATOR,

OF all the young Fellows who are in their Progress thro' any Profession, none seem to have so good a Title to the Protection of the Men of Eminence in it as the modest Man not so much because his Modesty is a certain Indication of his Merit, as because 'tis a certain Obstacle to the producing of it. Now, as of all Professions this Virtue is thought to be more particularly unnecessary in that of the Law than in any other, I shall only apply my self to the Relief of such who follow this Profession with this Disadvantage. What aggravates the matter is, that those Persons who, the better to prepare themselves for this Study, have made some Progress in others, have, by adding themselves to Letters, encreased their natural Modesty, and consequently heighten'd the Obstruction to this sort of Preferment so that every one of these may emphatically be said to be such a one as laboureth and taketh pains, and is still the more behind. It may be a Matter worth discussing then, Why that which made a Youth so amiable to the Ancients, should make him appear so ridiculous to the Moderns? and Why in our days there should be Neglect, and even Oppression of young Beginners, instead of that Protection which was the Pride of theirs? In the Profession spoken of, 'tis obvious to every one whose Attendance is required at Westminster-Hall, with what Difficulty a Youth of any Modesty has been permitted to make an Observation, that could in no wise detract from the Merit of his Elders, and is absolutely necessary for the advancing his own. I have often seen one of these not only molested in his Utterance of something very pertinent, but even plunder'd of his Question, and by a strong Sergeant shoulder'd out of his Rank, which he has recover'd with much Difficulty and Confusion. Now as great part of the Business of this Profession might be dispatched by one that perhaps

—Adest virtutis deserti Messale, nec scit quantum Cansellus Aulus,
Hor

so I can't conceive the Injustice done to the Publick, if the Men of Reputation in this Calling would introduce such of the young ones into Business, whose Application to this Study will let them into the Secrets of it, as much as their Modesty will hinder them from the Practice. I say, it would be laying an everlasting Obligation upon a young Man, to be introduc'd at first only as a Mute, till by this Countenance, and a Resolution to support the good Opinion conceiv'd of him in his Betters, his Complexion shall be so well settled that the Litigious of this Island may be secure of his obstreperous Aid. If I might be indulg'd to speak in the Style of a Lawyer, I would say, That any one about thirty years of Age, might make a common Motion to the Court with as much Elegance and Propriety as the most aged Advocates in the Hall.

I can't advance the Merit of Modesty by any Argument of my own so powerfully, as by enquiring into the Sentiments the greatest among the Ancients of different Ages entertain'd upon this Virtue. If we go back to the Days of Solomon, we shall find Favour a necessary Consequence to a shame-fac'd Man. Pliny, the greatest Lawyer and most Elegant Writer of the Age he liv'd in, in several of his Epistles is very solicitous in recommending to the Publick some young Men of his own Profession, and very often undertakes to become an Advocate, upon condition that some one of these his Favourites might be joind with him, in order to produce the Merit of such, whose Modesty otherwise would have suppress'd it. It may seem very marvellous to a saucy Modern, that Mullum sanguinis, multum circumdant multum sollicitudinis in ore, to have the Face first full of Blood, then the Countenance dash'd with Modesty, and then the whole Aspect as of one dying with Fear, when a Man begins to speak, should be esteem'd by Pliny the necessary Qualifications of a fine Speaker. Shakespeare also has express'd

The citation is from a charming letter in which Pliny (Bl. v. letter 17) tells Spurinna the pleasure he had just receiv'd from a recitation by a noble youth in the house of Calpurnius Piso, and how, when it was over, he gave the youth many kisses

'says, It is as Sport to a Fool to do himself,
'and that he might the more emphatically express
'the calamitous Circumstances of him who falls
'under the displeasure of this wanton Person, the 'same Author adds further That a Store is 'heavy, and the Sand weighty, but a Fool's
'Wrath is heavier than them both It is im'possible to suppress my own Illustration upon
'this Matter, which is, That is the Man of Sa'gacity bestirs himself to distress his Enemy by 'Methods probable and reducible to Reason so 'the same Reason will fortify his Enemy to elude
'these his regular Efforts but your Fool projects,
'acts, and concludes with such notable Incon'sistence, that no regular Course of Thought can 'evade or counterplot his prodigious Machinations
'My Frontispiece, I believe, may be extended to 'imply, That several of our Misfortunes arise 'from Things, as well as Persons, that seem of 'very little consequence Into what tragical Ex-
'travagancies does Shakespeare hurry Othello
'upon the loss of an Handkerchief only? and what 'Barbarities does Desdemona suffer from a slight 'Inadvertency in regard to this fatal Lisle? If 'the Schemes of all enterprising Spirits were to be 'carefully examined, some intervening Acci'dent, not considerable enough to occasion any 'Debate upon, or give em any apprehension of 'all Consequence from it, will be found to be the 'occasion of their all Success rather than any 'Error in Points of Moment and Difficulty, which 'naturally engaged their maturest Deliberations
'If you go to the Levee of any great Man, you 'will observe him exceeding gracious to several 'very insignificant Fellows and this upon the 'Maxim, That the Neglect of any Person must 'arise from the mean Opinion you have of his 'Capacity to do you any Service or Prejudice
'and that this calling his Sufficiency in question,
'must give him Inclination and where this is,
'there never wants Strength or Opportunity to 'annoy you There is no body so weak of In'vention, that can't aggravate or make some little 'Stories to vilify his Enemy and there are very 'few but have good Inclinations to hear em, and 'as infinite Pleasure to the Majority of Mankind
'to level a Person superior to his Neighbour
'Besides, in all matter of Controversy, that Party 'which has the greatest Abilities labours under 'this Prejudice, that he will certainly be sup'posed, upon Account of his Abilities to have 'done an Injury, when perhaps he has received 'one It would be tedious to enumerate the 'Strokes that Nations and particular Friends have
'suffer'd from Persons very contemptible

'I think Henry IV of France, so formidable
'to his Neighbours, could no more be secur'd
'against the resolute Villain of Katillac, than 'Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, could be against 'that of Felton And there is no mean'd Person
'so destitute, but can provide himself with a Knife
'or a Pistol, if he finds stomach to apply them
'That Things and Persons of no moment should 'give such powerful Resolutions to the progress
'of those of the greater, seems a providential 'Disposition to bristle and abate the Pride of 'human Sufficiency as also to engage the Hu'manity and Benevolence of Superiors to all be'low 'em, by letting them into this Secret, that

'the Stronger depends upon the Weaker

Dear Sir,

Ten file, Paper-Bu Idlers

'I received a Letter from you some time ago,

'informed me in yours to what part of this Island
'I might have directed my Impertinence but 'having been let into the knowledge of that Mat'ter this I and some I receive is no longer service'able My Neighbour Prettypiece shall be the 'Subject of this Letter who falling in with the 'SPECTATOR's Doctrine concerning the Month of 'May, began from that Sex on to dedicate him'self to the Service of the Fair in the following 'Manner I observed at the Beginning, of the 'Month he bought him a new Night-gown either 'side to be worn outwards both equally gorgeous 'and attractive but till the End of the Month I 'did not enter so fully into the knowledge of his 'Continuance, as the Use of that Garment has 'since suggested to me Now you must know
'that all new Clothes raise and warm the Beers
'Imagination into a Concept of I believe a much 'finer Gentleman than he is before tampering
'all Sobriety and Reflection, and giving him up to 'Gallantry and Amour Inform'd therefore with 'this way of thinking, and full of the Spirit of the 'Month of May, did this mercenary Youth resolve 'upon the Business of Coquetry At first he 'confined himself to his Room only, and then ap'pearing at his Window in his Night-gown, and 'priece in, that easy Posture which expresses the 'very Top and Dignity of Languishment It is 'pleasant to see him diversify his Loveliness,
'sometimes obliging the Passengers only with a 'Side Frier, with a Look in his Hand sometimes 'being so generous as to expose the whole of the 'fulness of his Beauty at the other times, by a 'judicious throwing back of his Perriwig, he 'could throw in his Ears You know he is that 'Sort of Person which the Mob call a handsome 'jolly Man which Appearance can't miss of Cap'tives in this part of the Town Being en-
'boldened by duly Success, he leaves his Room 'with a Resolution to extend his Conquests and 'I have apprehended him in his Night-gown
'smiling in all Parts of this Neighbourhood
'This I, being of an amorous Completion, saw 'with Indignation, and had Thoughts of pur'chasing a Wig in these Parts into which being 'at a greater Distance from the Earth I might 'have thrown a very liberal Mixture of white 'Horse-hair, which would make a fairer, and 'consequently a handsomer Appearance while 'my Situation would secure me against any Dis'coveries But the Passion to the handsome 'Gentleman seems to be so fixed to that part of 'the Building, that it will be extremely difficult to 'divert it to mine so that I am resolved to stand
'boldly to the Completion of my own Eye-brow,
'and prepare me an immense Black Wig of the 'same sort of Structure with that of my Rival
'Now, tho' by this I shall not, perhaps lessen the 'number of the Admirers of his Completion, I 'shall have a fair Chance to divide the Passengers,

'by the irresistible Force of mine.

'I expect sudden Dispatches from you with 'Advice of the Family you are in now, how to 'deport myself upon this so delicate a Conjunction
'ture with some comfortable Resolution in 'favour of the handsome black Man against the 'handsome fair one

Audire est operis pretium procedere recte Qui mecum non nullus Hor

MR SPECTATOR,

THERE are very many of my Acquaintance Followers of Socrates, with more particular regard to that part of his Philosophy which we, among ourselves, call his Domesticks, under which Denomination, or Title, we include all the Conjugal Joys and Sufferings. We have indeed, with very great Pleasure, observed the Honour you do the whole Fraternity of the Hen peck'd in placing that illustrious Man at our Head, and it does in a very great measure baffle the Raillery of pert Rogues, who have no advantage above us, but in that they are single.
Put when you look about into the Crowd of Mankind, you will find the Fair Sex reigns with greater Tyranny over Lovers than Husbands.
You shall hardly meet one in a thousand who is 'wholly exempt from their Dominion, and those 'that are so, are capable of no Taste of Life, and 'breathe and walk about the Earth as Insignifi'cants. But I am going to desire your further 'Favour in behalf of our harmless Brotherhood,

'and hope you will shew in a true light the un'married Hen peck'd, as well as you have done
'Justice to us, who submit to the Conduct of our 'Wives. I am very particularly acquainted with 'one who is under entire Submission to a kind
'Girl as he calls her and tho' he knows I have 'been Witness both to the ill Usage he has re'ceived from her and his Inability to resist her 'Tyranny, he still pretends to make a Jest of 'me for a little more than ordinary Obsequious-
'ness to my Spouse. No longer than Tuesday
'last he took me with him to visit his Mistress
'and he having, it seems, been a little in Dis'grace before, thought by bringing me with him
'she would construe herself, and insensibly fall 'into general Discourse with him and so he 'might break the Ice, and save himself all the 'ordinary Compunctions and Mortifications she 'used to make him suffer before she would be re'conciled after my Act of Rebellion on his Part.
'When we came into the Room, we were received 'with the utmost Coldness and when he pre'sented me to Mr Such-and-one, his very good 'Friend, she just had Patience to suffer my 'Salutation but when he himself, with a very 'gay Air offered to follow me, she gave him a 'thundering Box on the Ear, called him pitiful 'poor spirited Wretch, how durst he see her 'Face? His Wig and Hat fell on different Parts 'of the Floor. She seized the Wig too soon for 'him to recover it, and kicking it down Stairs,
'threw herself into an opposite Room, pulling
'the Door after her with a Force, that you 'would have thought the Hinges would have 'given Way. We went down, you must think,
'with no very good Countenances and as we 'sneaked off, and were driving home together, he 'confessed to me, that her Anger was thus highly 'rased, because he did not think fit to fight a 'Gentleman who had said she was what she was 'but, says he, a kind Letter or two, or fifty 'pieces, will put her in Humour again. I asked 'him why he did not part with her, he answered
'he loved her with all the tenderness imaginable,
'and she had too many Charms to be abandoned
'for a little Quickness of Spirit. Thus does this 'illegitimate Hen pecked over-look the Hussy
'having no Regard to his very Life and Fame, in 'putting him upon an infamous Dispute about her 'Reputation, yet has he the Confidence to laugh
'at me, because I obey my poor Dear in keeping
'out of Harm's Way, and not staying too late 'from my own Family, to pass through the 'Hazards of a Town full of Ranters and De-'bauchees. You that are a Philosopher should 'urge in our behalf, that when we bear with a 'froward Woman, our Patience is preserved, in 'consideration that a breach with her might be a 'Dishonour to Children who are descended from 'us, and whose Concern makes us tolerate a 'thousand Frailties, for fear they should redound
'Dishonour upon the Innocent. This and the 'like Circumstances, which carry with them the 'most valuable Regards of human Life, may be mentioned for our long Suffering, but in the case of Gallants, they swallow ill Usage from one to whom they have no Obligation, but from a base Passion, which it is mean to indulge, and which it would be glorious to overcome.

'These Sort of Fellows are very numerous, and some have been conspicuously such, without Shame, nay, they have carried on the Jest in the very Article of Death, and, to the Diminution of the Wealth and Happiness of their Families, in bar of those honourably near to them, have left immense Wealth to their Partners. What is this but being a Cully in the Grave? Sure this is being Hen peck'd with a Vengeance! But without dwelling upon these less frequent Instances of eminent Cullyism, what is there so common as to hear a Fellow curse his Fate that he cannot get rid of a Passion to a Jilt, and quote an Half-Line out of a Miscellany Poem to prove his Weakness is natural? If they will go on thus, I have nothing to say to it. But then let them not pretend to be free all this while, and laugh at us poor married Patients.

'I have known one Wench in this Town carry an haughty Dominion over her Lovers so well, that she has at the same time been kept by a Sea-Captain in the Straits, a Merchant in the City, a Country Gentleman in Hampshire, and had all her Correspondences managed by one she kept for her own Uses. This happy Man (as the Phrase is) used to write very punctually every Post, Letters for the Mistress to transcribe. He would sit in his Night Gown and Slippers, and be as grave giving an Account, only changing Names, that there was nothing in those idle Reports they had heard of such a Scoundrel as one of the other Lovers was, and how could he think she could condescend so low, after such a fine Gentleman as each of them? For the same Epistle said the same thing to and of every one of them. And so Mr Secretary and his Lady went to Bed with great Order.

'To be short, Mr SPECTATOR, we Husbands shall never make the Figure we ought in the Imaginations of young Men growing up in the World, except you can bring it about that a Man of the Town shall be as infamous a Character as a Woman of the Town. But of all that I have met in my time, commend me to Betty Duall. She is the Wife of a Sailor, and the kept Mistress of a Man of Quality, she dwells with the latter during the Sea-faring of the former. The Husband asks no Questions, sees his Apartments furnished with Riches not his, when he comes into Port, and the Lover is as joyful as a Man arrived at his Haven when the other puts to Sea. Betty is the most eminently victorious of any of her Sex, and ought to stand recorded the only Woman of the Age in which she lives, who has possessed at the same time two Abused, and two Contented ----- T

Cum prostrata sopore
Urget membra quies, et mens sine pondere ludit Petr

THO' there are many Authors, who have written on Dreams, they have generally considered them only as Revelations of what has already happened in distant parts of the World, or as Privileges of what is to happen in future Periods of time.

I shall consider this Subject in another Light as Dreams may give us some Idea of the great Excellency of an Human Soul, and some Intimation of its Independency on Matter.

In the first Place, our Dreams are great Instances of that Activity which is natural to the human Soul, and which it is not in the power of Sleep to deaden or abate. When the Man appears tired and worn out with the Labours of the Day, this active part in his Composition is still busied and unwearied. When the Organs of Sense want their due Repose and necessary Respirations, and the Body is no longer able to keep pace with that spiritual Substance to which it is united, the Soul exerts her self in her several Faculties, and continues in Action till her Partner is again qualified to bear her Company. In this case Dreams look like the Relaxations and Amusements of the Soul, when she is disincumbered of her Machine, her Sports and Recreations, when she has laid her Charge asleep.

In the Second Place, Dreams are an Instance of that Agility and Perfection which is natural to the Faculties of the Mind, when they are disengaged from the Body. The Soul is clogged and retarded in her Operations, when she acts in Conjunction with a Companion that is so heavy and unwieldy in its Motions. But in Dreams it is wonderful to observe with what a Sprightliness and Alacrity she exerts her self. The slow of Speech make unpremeditated Harangues, or converse readily in Languages that they are but little acquainted with. The Grave abound in Pleasantries, the Dull in Repartees and Points of Wit. There is not a more painful Action of the Mind, than Invention: yet in Dreams it works with that Ease and Activity, that we are not sensible when the Faculty is employed. For instance, I believe every one, some time or other, dreams that he is reading Papers, Books, or Letters in which case the Invention prompts so readily, that the Mind is imposed upon, and mistakes its own Suggestions for the Compositions of another.

I shall, under this Head, quote a Passage out of the Religio Medici,² in which the ingenious Author gives an account of himself in his dreaming and his waking Thoughts. We are somewhat more than our selves in our Sleeps, and the Slumber of the Body seems to be but the Waking of the Soul. It is the Litigation of Sense, but the Liberty of Reason, and our waking Conceptions do not match the Fancies of our Sleeps

At my Nativity my Ascendant was the watery Sign of Scorpius I was born in the Planetary Hour of Saturn, and I think I have a piece of that leaden Planet in me I am no way facetious, nor disposed for the Mirth and Galliardize of Company, yet in one Dream I can compose a whole Comedy, behold the Action, apprehend the Fests, and laugh my self awake at the Conceits thereof Were my Memory as faithful as my Reason is then fruitful, I would never study but in my Dreams, and thus time also would I chuse for my Devotions but our grosser Memories have then so little hold of our abstracted Understandings, that they forget the Story, and can only relate to our awaked Souls a confused and broken Tale of that that has passed—Thus it is observed that Men sometimes, upon the Hour of their Departure, do speak and reason above themselves, for then the Soul beginning to be freed from the Ligaments of the Body, begins to reason like herself, and to discourse in a strain above Mortality

We may likewise observe in the third Place, that the Passions affect the Mind with greater Strength when we are asleep, than when we are awake Joy and Sorrow give us more vigorous Sensations of Pain or Pleasure at this time, than at any other Devotion likewise, as the excellent Author above-mentioned has hinted, is in a very particular manner heightened and inflamed, when it rises in the Soul at a time that the Body is thus laid at Rest Every Man's Experience will inform him in this matter, though it is very probable that this may happen differently, in different Constitutions I shall conclude this Head with the two following Problems, which I shall leave to the Solution of my Reader Supposing a Man always happy in his Dreams, and miserable in his waking Thoughts, and that his Life was equally divided between them, whether would he be more happy or miserable? Were a Man a King in his Dreams, and a Beggar awake, and dreamt as consequentially, and in as continued unbroken Schemes as he thinks when awake, whether he would be in reality a King or Beggar, or rather whether he would not be both?

There is another Circumstance, which methinks gives us a very high Idea of the Nature of the Soul, in regard to what passes in Dreams, I mean that innumerable Multitude and Variety of Ideas which then arise in her Were that active watchful Being only conscious of her own Existence at such a time, what a painful Solitude would her Hours of Sleep be? Were the Soul sensible of her being alone in her sleeping Moments, after the same manner that she is sensible of it while awake, the time would hang very heavy on her, as it often actually does when she Dreams that she is in such a Solitude?

*Semperque relinquit Sola sub, semper longam incomitata videtur
Ire viam—* Virg

But this Observation I only make by the way What I would here remark, is that wonderful Power in the Soul, of producing her own Company on these Occasions She converses with numberless Beings of her own Creation, and is transported into ten thousand Scenes of her own rusing She is herself the Theatre, the Actors, and the Beholder This puts me in mind of a Saying which I am infinitely pleased with, and which Plutarch ascribes to Heracitus, *That all Men whilst they are awake are in one common World, but that each of them, when he is asleep, is in a World of his own*¹ The waking Man is conversant in the World of Nature, when he sleeps he retires to a private World that is particular to himself There seems something in this Consideration that intimates to us a natural Grandeur and Perfection in the Soul, which is rather to be admired than explained

I must not omit that Argument for the Excellency of the Soul, which I have seen quoted out of Tertullian,² namely, its Power of divining in Dreams That several such Divinations have been made, none can question, who believes the Holy Writings, or who has but the least degree of a common Historical Faith, there being innumerable Instances of this nature in several Authors, both Antient and Modern Sacred and Profane Whether such dark Presages, such Visions of the Night proceed from any latent Power in the Soul, during this her state of Abstraction, or from any Communication with the Supreme Being, or from any Operation of Subordinate Spirits, has been a great Dispute among the Learned the matter of Fact is, I think, incontestable, and has been looked upon as such by the greatest Writers, who have been never suspected either of Superstition or Enthusiasm

I do not suppose, that the Soul in these Instances is entirely loose and unfettered from the Body It is sufficient, if she is not so far sunk, and immersed in Matter, nor intangled and perplexed in her Operations, with such Motions of Blood and Spirits, as when she actuates the Machine in its waking Hours The Corporeal Union is slackened enough to give the Mind more Play The Soul seems gathered within herself, and recovers that Spring which is broke and weakened, when she operates more in concert with the Body

The Speculations I have here made, if they are not Arguments, they are at least strong Intimations, not only of the Excellency of an Human Soul, but of its Independance on the Body and if they do not prove, do at least confirm these two great Points, which are established by many other Reasons that are altogether unanswerable.

O

¹ The reference is in the little book 'On Superstition,' where Plutarch quotes Heracitus to add this comment of his own 'But to the superstitious man there is no common world, for neither does he use right reason when awake, nor is he freed, when sleeping, from his perturbations'

² Tertullian, in his book 'On the Soul,' has seven chapters (43—49) on Sleep and Dreams, with abundant recognition of divine communications to the soul in sleep, and quotations of several authors, sacred and profane.

Quantus empta? parvi Quantus ergo? octo assibus Eheu!—Hor

I FIND, by several Letters which I receive daily, that many of my Readers would be better pleased to pay Threepence for my Paper, than Two Pence. The ingenious T. W. tells me, that I have deprived him of the best Part of his Breakfast, for that since the rise of my Paper, he is forced every Morning to drink his Dish of Coffee by it self, without the Addition of the Spectator, that used to be better than Laced to it. Eugenius informs me very obligingly, that he never thought he should have disliked any Passage in my Paper, but that of late there have been two Words in every one of them, which he could heartily wish left out, viz. Price Two Pence. I have a Letter from a Soap boiler, who condole with me very affectionately, upon the necessity we both lie under of setting in higher Price on our Commodities, since the late Tax has been laid upon them, and desiring me, when I write next on that Subject, to speak a Word or two upon the present Duties on Castile-Soap. But there is none of these my Correspondents, who writes with a greater Turn of good Sense and Elegance of Expression, than the generous Philomedes, who advises me to value every Spectator at Six Pence, and promises that he himself will engage for above a Hundred of his Acquaintance, who shall take it in at that Price.

Letters from the Female World are likewise come to me, in great quantities, upon the same Occasion, and as I naturally bear a great Deference to this Part of our Species, I am very glad to find that those who approve my Conduct in this Particular, are much more numerous than those who condemn it. A large Family of Daughters have drawn me up a very handsome Remonstrance, in which they set forth, that their Father having refused to take in the Spectator, since the additional Price was set upon it, they offered him unanimously to bate him the Article of Bread and Butter in the Tea-Table Account, provided the Spectator might be served up to them every Morning as usual. Upon this the old Gentleman, being pleased, it seems, with their Desire of improving themselves, has granted them the continuance both of the Spectator and their Bread and Butter having given particular Orders, that the Tea Table shall be set forth every Morning with its Customary Bill of Fare, and without any manner of Defalcation. I thought myself obliged to mention this Particular, as it does Honour to this worthy Gentleman and if the young Lady Letitia, who sent me this Account, will acquaint me with his Name, I will insert it at length in one of my Papers, if he desires it.

I should be very glad to find out any Expedient that might alleviate the Expence which this my Paper brings to any of my Readers and, in order to it, must propose two Points to their Consideration. First, that if they retrench any the smallest Particular in their ordinary Expence, it will easily make up the Half Penny a Day, which we have now under Consideration. Let a Lady sacrifice but a single Ribband to her Morning Studies, and it will be sufficient. Let a Family burn but a Candle a Night less than the usual Number, and they may take in the Spectator without Detriment to their private Affairs.

In the next Place, if my Readers will not go to the Price of buying my Papers by Retail, let them have Patience, and they may buy them in the Lump, without the Burthen of a Tax upon them. My Speculations, when they are sold single, like Cherries upon the Stick, are Delights for the Rich and Wealthy after some time they come to Market in greater Quantities, and are every ordinary Man's Money. The Truth of it is, they have a certain Flavour at their first Appearance, from several accidental Circumstances of Time, Place and Person, which they may lose if they are not taken early but in this case every Reader is to consider, whether it is not better for him to be half a Year behind hand with the fashionable and polite part of the World, than to strain himself beyond his Circumstances. My Bookseller has now about Ten thousand of the Third and Fourth Volumes, which he is ready to publish, having already disposed of a large Edition both of the First and Second Volume. As he is a Person whose Head is very well turned to his Business, he thinks they would be a very proper Present to be made to Persons at Christenings, Marriages, Visiting-Days, and the like joyful Solemnities, as several other Books are frequently given at Funerals. He has printed them in such a little portable Volume, that many of them may be ranged together upon a single Plate, and is of Opinion, that a Silver of Spectators would be as acceptable an Entertainment to the Ladies, as a Silver of Sweetmeats.

I shall conclude this Paper with an Epigram lately sent to the Writer of the Spectator, after having returned my Thanks to the ingenious Author of it.

SIR,

Having heard the following Epigram very much commended, I wonder that it has not yet had a place in any of your Papers. I think the Suffrage of our Poet Laureat should not be overlooked, which shews the Opinion he entertains of your Paper, whether the Notion he proceeds upon be true or false. I make bold to convey it to you, not knowing if it has yet come to your Hands.

SIR,
UPON reading your Essay concerning the Pleasures of the Imagination, I find, among the three Sources of those Pleasures which you have discovered, [that] Greatness is one. This has suggested to me the reason why, of all Objects that I have ever seen, there is none which affects my Imagination so much as the Sea or Ocean. I cannot see the Heavings of this prodigious Bulk of Waters, even in a Calm, without a very pleasing Astonishment but when it is worked up in a Tempest, so that the Horizon on every side is nothing but foaming Pillows and floating Mountains it is impossible to describe the terrible Horrour that rises from such a Prospect. A troubled Ocean, to a Man who sails upon it, is, I think, the biggest Object that he can see in motion and consequently gives his Imagination one of the highest kinds of Pleasure that can arise from Greatness. I must confess, it is impossible for me to survey this World of fluid Matter, without thinking on the Hand that first poured it out, and made a proper Channel for its Reception. Such an Object naturally raises in my Thoughts the Idea of an Almighty Being and convinces me of his Existence as much as a metaphysical Demonstration. The Imagination prompts the Understanding and by the Greatness of the sensible Object produces in it the Idea of a Being who is neither circumscribed by Time nor Space.

Thomas Shadwell, the Whig substitute for Dryden, rec'd his version of the Psalms produced in concert with his friend Dr. Nicholas Brady, Gate produced his own notion of an improvement upon Shakespeare's King Lear and nine dramatic pieces, with other poetry, of which the above lines are a specimen. I was in his younger days the writer of the second part of Dryden's 'Absalom' and 'Achithophel', to which Dryden himself contributed only the characters of Julian Johnson and Ben Jochanan of Shadwell as Oz and of Settle as Doeg. His salary as poet laureate was £100 a year and a butt of claret. He died three years after the date of this Spectator a poor man who had made his home in the Mint to escape his creditors.

As I have made several Voyages upon the Sea, I have often been tossed in Storms, and on that occasion have frequently reflected on the Descriptions of them in ancient Poets. I remember Lucanus highly recommends one in Homer, because the Poet has not amused himself with little Fancies upon the occasion, as Authors of an inferior Genius, whom he mentions, had done, but because he has gathered together those Circumstances which are the most apt to terrify the Imagination, and which really happen in the raging of a Tempest. It is for the same reason, that I prefer the following Description of a Ship in a Storm, which the Psalmist has made, before any other I have ever met with. They that go down to the Sea in Ships, that do Business in great Waters. These see the Works of the Lord, and his wonders in the Deep. For he commanded and raised the stormy Wind, which lifted up the Waters thereof. They mount up to the Heavens, they go down again to the Depths, their soul is melted because of Trouble. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken Man, and are at their Wits End. They cry unto the Lord in their Trouble, and he bringeth them out of their Distresses. He vaileth the Storm a Calm, so that the Waves thereof are still. Then they are glad because they be quiet, so he bringeth them unto their desired Haven.

By the way, how much more comfortable as well as rational is this System of the Psalmist, than the Pagan Scheme in Virgil, and other Poets, where one Deity is represented as raising a Storm, and as other is trying it? Were we only to consider the Sublime in this Piece of Poetry, what can be nobler than the Idea it gives us of the Supreme Being thus raising a Tumult among the Elements, and recovering them out of their Confusion thus troubling, and becalming Nature?

Great Painters do not only give us Landscapes of Gardens, Groves, and Meadows, but very often employ their Pencils upon Sea Pieces. I could wish you would follow the Example. If this small Sketch may deserve a Place among your Works, I shall accompany it with a divine Ode, made by a Gentleman upon the Conclusion of his Travels.

¹ On the Sublime, § 20, where he compares a description of the terrors of the sea in a lost poem of the Arimaspians, by Aristeus the Proconnesian, with the passage in the 15th Book of the Iliad, which Pope thus translates

*He bursts upon them all Bursts as a wave that from the cloud impside,
And swell'd with tempests on the ship descends.
While are the decks with foam, the winds aloft Howl o'er the masts, and sing through every shroud Fale, tren bling, tir'd, the sailors freeze with fears,
And instant death on every wave appears*

Domus et placens Uxor — Hor

I HAVE very long entertain'd in Ambition to make the Word Wife the most agreeable and delightful Name in Nature. If it be not so in it self, all the wiser Part of Mankind from the Beginning of the World to this Day has consented in an Error. But our Unhappiness in England has been, that a few loose Men of Genius for Pleasure, have turn'd it all to the Gratification of ungovern'd Desires, in spite of good Sense, Form and Order, when, in truth, any Satisfaction beyond the Boundaries of Reason, is but a Step towards Madness and Folly. But is the Sense of Joy and Accomplishment of Desire no way to be indulged or attain'd? and have we Appetites given us not to be at all gratify'd? Yes certainly Marriage is an Institution calculated for a constant Scene of as much Delight as our Being is capable of. Two Persons who have chosen each other out of all the Species, with design to be each other's mutual Comfort and Entertainment, have in that Action bound themselves to be good-humour'd, affable, discreet, forgiving, patient and joyful with respect to each other's frailties and Perfections, to the End of their Lives. The wiser of the two (and it always happens one of them is such) will for her or his own sake, keep things from Outrage with the utmost Sanctity. When this Union is thus preserved (as I have often said) the most indifferent Circumstance administers Delight. Their Condition is an endless Source of new Gratifications. The married Man can say, If I am unacceptable to all the World beside, there is one whom I entirely love, that will receive me with Joy and Transport, and think herself obliged to double her Kindness and Caresses of me from the Gloom with which she sees me overcast. I need not dissemble the Sorrow of my Heart to be agreeable there, that very Sorrow quickens her Affection.

This Passion towards each other, when once well fixed, enters into the very Constitution, and the Kindness flows as easily and silently as the Blood in the Veins. When this Affection is enjoy'd in the most sublime Degree, unskilful Eyes see nothing of it, but when it is subject to be chang'd and has an Allay in it that may make it end in Distaste, it is apt to break into Rage, or overflow into Fondness, before the rest of the World.

Uxander and Viramira are amorous and young, and have been married these two Years, yet do they so much distinguish each other in Company, that in your Conversation with the Dear Things you are still put to a Sort of Cross-Purposes. Whenever you address your self in ordinary Discourse to Viramira, she turns her Head another way, and the Answer is made to the dear Uxander. If you tell a merry Tale, the Application is still directed to her Dear and when she should commend you, she says to him, as if he had spoke it, That is, my Dear, so pretty — This puts me in mind of what I have somewhere read in the admired Memoirs of the famous Cervantes, where, while honest Sancho Pança is putting some necessary humble Question concerning Kozzante, his Supper, or his Lodgings, the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance is ever improving the harmless lowly Hints of his Squire to the poetical Conceit, Rapture and Flight, in Contemplation of the dear Dulcinea of his Affections.

On the other side, Dictamnus and Moria are ever squabbling, and you may observe them all the time they are in Company, in a State of Impatience. As Uxander and Viramira wish you all gone, that they may be at freedom for Dilliance, Dictamnus and Moria wait your Absence, that they may speak their harsh Interpretations on each other's Words and Actions during the time you were with them.

It is certain that the greater Part of the Evils attending this Condition of Life, arises from Fashion Prejudice in this Case is turn'd the wrong way, and instead of expecting more Happiness than we shall meet with in it, we are lugh'd into a Prepossession, that we shall be disappointed if we hope for lasting Satisfaction.

With all Persons who have made good Sense the Rule of Action, Marriage is describ'd as the State capable of the highest human Felicity. Lully has Epistles full of affectionate Pleasure, when he writes to his Wife, or speaks of his Children. But above all the Hints of this kind I have met with in Writers of ancient date, I am pleas'd with an Epigram of Martial,¹ in honour of the Beauty of his Wife Cleopatra. Commentators say it was written the day after his Wedding-Night. When his Spouse was retir'd to the Bathing room in the Heat of the Day, he, it seems, came in upon her when she was just going into the Water. To her Beauty and Carriage on this occasion we owe the following Epigram, which I shew'd my friend WILL. HONNYCOMB in French, who has translated it as follows, without understanding the Original. I expect it will please the English better than the Latin Reader.

When my bright Consort, now or Wife nor Maid,

Asham'd and wanton, of Embrace afraid, Fled to the Streams, the Streams my Fair betray'd.

To my fond Eyes she all transparent stood,
She blush'd, I smil'd at the slight covering Flood Thus thro' the Glass the lovely Lully glows, Thus thro' the ambient Gem shines forth the Rose.

I saw new Charms, and plung'd to seize my Store,

Kisses I snatch'd, the Waves prevented more.

My Friend would not allow that this luscious Account could be given of a Wife, and therefore used the Word Consort which, he learnedly said, would serve for a Mistress as well, and give a more Gentlemanly Turn to the Epigram. But, under favour of him and all other such fine Gentlemen I cannot be persuaded but that the Passion a Bridegroom has for a virtuous young Woman, will, by little and little, grow into Friendship, and then it is ascend'd to [1] higher Pleasure than it was in its first Fervour. Without this happens, he is a very unfortunate Man who has enter'd into this State, and left the Habitudes of Life he might have enjoy'd with a faithful Friend. But when the Wife proves capable of filling serious as well as joyous Hours, she brings Happiness unknown to Friendship itself. Spencer speaks of each kind of Love with great Justice, and attributes the highest Praise to Friendship, and indeed there is no disputing that Point, but by making that Friendship take [Place 2] between two married Persons.

Hard is the Doubt, and difficult to deem,
When all three kinds of Love together meet,
And to dispart the Heart with Power extreme, Whether shall weigh the Balance down, to
Or
The dear Affection unto Kindred sweet, Or raging Irr. of Love to Womenkind, Or Zeal of Friends combin'd by Virtues meet
But, of them all, the Band of virtuous Mind Mell unks the gentle Heart should most assured bind.

For natural Affection soon doth cease,
And quenched is with Cupid's greater Flame,
But faithful Friendship doth them both surpass,
And them with mastering Discipline does tame, Though Thoughts aspiring to eternal Fame
For as the Soul doth rule the Earthly Mass,
And all the Service of the Body frame,
So Love of Soul doth Love of Body pass,
No less than perfect Gold surmounts the meanest Brass.

— Digna satis fortuna revisit — Virg

It is common with me to run from Book to Book to exercise my Mind with many Objects, and qualify myself for my daily Labours. After an Hour spent in this loitering Way of Reading, something will remain to be food to the Imagination. The Writings that please me most on such Occasions are Stories, for the Truth of which there is good Authority. The Mind of Man is naturally a Lover of Justice, and when we read a Story wherein a Criminal is overtaken, in whom there is no Quality which is the Object of Pity, the Soul enjoys a certain Revenge for the Offence done to its Nature, in the wicked Actions committed in the preceding Part of the History. This will be better understood by the Reader from the following Narration³ it self, than from any thing which I can say to introduce it.

When Charles Duke of Burgundy, surnamed The Bold, reigned over spacious Dominions now

[1 an]

³ Founded upon note N to the Memoir of Charles of Burgundy in Bayle's Dictionary, where the authorities cited are Pontus Heuterus and others. It is not in Comines.

swallowed up by the Power of France, he heaped many Favours and Honours upon Claudius Rhynsault, a German, who had serv'd him in his Wars against the Insults of his Neighbours. A great part of Zealand was at that time in Subjection to that Dukedom. The Prince himself was a Person of singular Humanity and Justice. Rhynsault, with no other real Quality than Courage, had Disimulation enough to pass upon his generous and unsuspecting Master for a Person of blunt Honesty and Fidelity, without any Vice that could bias him from the Execution of Justice. His Highness prepossessed to his Advantage, upon the Decease of the Governour of his chief Town of Zealand, gave Rhynsault that Command. He was not long seated in that Government, before he cast his Eyes upon Sapphira, a Woman of Exquisite Beauty, the Wife of Paul Danvelt, a wealthy Merchant of the City under his Protection and Government. Rhynsault was a Man of a warm Constitution, and violent Inclination to Women, and not unskilled in the soft Arts which win their Favour. He knew what it was to enjoy the Satisfaction which is reaped from the Possession of Beauty, but was in utter Stranger to the Decencies, Honours and Delicacies that attend the Passion towards them in elegant Minds. However he had so much of the World, that he had a great share of the Language which usually prevails upon the weaker Part of that Sex, and he could with his Tongue utter a Passion with which his Heart was wholly untouch'd. He was one of those brutal Minds which can be gratified with the Violation of Innocence and Beauty, without the least Pity, Passion or Love to that with which they are so much delighted. Ingratitude is a Vice inseparable to a lustful Man and the Possession of a Woman by him who has no thought but alluring a Passion painful to himself, is necessarily followed by Distaste and Aversion. Rhynsault being resolv'd to accomplish his Will on the Wife of Danvelt, left no Arts untried to get into a Familiarity at her House, but she knew his Character and Disposition too well, not to shun all Occasions that might ensnare her into his Conversation. The Governour despairing of Success by ordinary Means, apprehended and Imprisoned her Husband, under pretence of an Information that he was guilty of a Correspondence with the Enemies of the Duke, to betray the Town into their Possession. This Design had its desired Effect, and the Wife of the unfortunate Danvelt, the day before that which was appointed for his Execution, presented herself in the Hall of the Governor's House, and as he pass'd thro' the Apartment, threw her self at his Feet, and holding his Knees, beseeched his Mercy. Rhynsault beheld her with a dissembled Satisfaction, and assuming an Air of Thought and Authority, he bid her arise, and told her she must follow him to his Closet and asking her whether she knew the Hand of the Letter he pulled out of his Pocket, went from her, leaving this Admonition aloud, If you will save your Husband, you must give me an account of all you know without Prevarication, for every body is satisfied he was too fond of you to be able to hide from you the Names of the rest of the Conspirators, or any other Particulars whatsoever. He went to his Closet, and soon after the Lady was sent to for an Audience. The Servant knew his distance when Matters of State where to be debated and the Governour, laying aside the Air with which he had appear'd in publick, began to be the Suppliant, to rally an Affliction, which it was in her Power easily to remove, and relieve an innocent Man from his Imprisonment. She easily perceiv'd his Intention, and, bathed in Tears, began to deprecate so wicked a Design. Lust, like Ambition, takes all the Faculties of the Mind and Body into its Service and Subjection. Her becoming Tears, her honest Anguish, the wringing of her Hands, and the many Changes of her Posture and Figure in the Vehemence of speaking, were but so many Attitudes in which he beheld her Beauty, and further Incentives of his Desire. All Humanity was lost in that one Appetite, and he signified to her in so many plain Terms, that he was unhappy, till he had possess'd her, and nothing less shou'd be the Price of her Husband's Life, and she must, before the following Noon, pronounce the Death or Enlargement of Danvelt. After this Notification, when he saw Sapphira enough again distracted to make the Subject of their Discourse to common Eyes appear different from what it was, he called Servants to conduct her to the Gate. Loaded with insupportable Affliction, she immediately repairs to her Husband, and having signified to his Gofers, that she had a Proposal to make to her Husband from the Governour, she was left alone with him, reveal'd to him all that had pass'd, and represented the endless Conflict she was in between Love to his Person, and Fidelity to his Bed. It is easie to imagine the sharp Affliction this honest Pair was in upon such an Incident, in Lives not us'd to any but ordinary Occurrences. The Man was bridled by Shame from speaking what his Fear prompted, upon so near an approach of Death but let fall Words that signifi'd to her, he should not think her polluted, though she had not yet confess'd to him that the Governour had violated her Person, since he knew her Will had no part in the Action. She parted from him with this oblique Permission to save a Life he had not Resolution enough to resign for the safety of his Honour.

The next Morning the unhappy Sapphira attended the Governour, and being led into a remote Apartment, submitted to his Desires. Rhynsault commended her Charms, claim'd a Familiarity after what had pass'd between them, and with an Air of Gaity in the Language of a Gallant, bid her return, and take her Husband out of Prison. But, continu'd he, my Fair one must not be offended that I have taken care he should not be an Interruption to our future Assignations. These last Words foreboded what she found when she came to the Goal, her Husband executed by the Order of Rhynsault.

It was remarkable that the Woman, who was full of Tears and Lamentations during the whole Course of her Affliction, uttered neither Sigh nor Complaint, but stood fix'd with Grief at this Consummation of her Misfortunes. She betook herself to her abode, and after having in Solitude paid her Devotions to him who is the Avenger of Innocence, she repair'd privately to Court. Her Person and certain Grandeur of Sorrow negligent of Forms run d her Passage into the Presence of the Duke her Sovereign. As soon as she came into the Presence, she broke forth into the following words Behold, O mighty Charles, a Wretch weary of Life, too gay at last, having been spent with Licentiousness and Virtue. It is not in your power to release my Injuries, but it is in your power to protect me from the Distress of, and the Punishment of Oppressors, as a Task worthy a Prince, I bring the Duke of Burgundy ample matter for doing Honour to his own great Name, and to you & to the safety of mine.

When she had spoke thus, she deliver'd the Duke a Paper reciting her Story. He read it with all the Motions of Indignation and Pity could raise in a Prince jealous of his Honour in the Behaviour of his Officers, and Prosperity of his Subjects.

Upon an appointed Day, Rhyssault was sent for to Court, and in the Presence of a few of the Council, confronted by Saffira the Prince's Isling, Do you know that Lady? Rhyssault, as soon as he could recover his Surprise, told the Duke he would marry her, if his Highness would please to think that a Reparation. The Duke seem'd contented with this Answer, and stood by during the immediate Solemnization of the Ceremony. At the Conclusion of it he told Rhyssault, Thus far have you done as you intended by my Authority. I shall not be satisfied of your Use of her, unless you sign a Gift of your whole Estate to her after your Death. To the Performance of this also the Duke was a Witness. When these two Acts were executed, the Duke turn'd to the Lady, and told her, it now remains for me to put you in quiet Possession of what your Husband has so bountifully bestow'd on you and order'd the immediate Execution of Rhyssault.

Quicquid est boni moris Letitiae extinguatur Sen

Dear Mr SPECTATOR, Tue bridge, Sept 18.
I AM a young Woman of Eighteen Years of Age, and, I do assure you, a Maid of unspotted Reputation, founded upon a very careful Carriage in all my Looks, Words and Actions. At the same time I must own to you that it is with much constraint to Flesh and Blood that my Behaviour is so strictly irreproachable for I am naturally addicted to Mirth, to Gaiety, to a Free Air, to Motion and Gadding. Now what gives me a great deal of Anxiety, and some Discouragement in the Pursuit of Virtue, is that the young Women who run into greater Freedoms with the Men are more taken Notice of than I am. The Men are such unthinking Sots that they do not prefer her who restrains all her Passions and Affections and keeps much within the Bounds of what is lawful, to her who goes to the utmost Verge of Innocence, and paries at the very Brink of Vice, whether she shall be a Wife or a Mistress. But I must appeal to your Spectatorial Wisdom who I find, have passed very much of your Time in the Study of Woman, whether this is not a most unreasonable Proceeding. I have read somewhere, that Holles of Malmesbury asserts, that continent Persons have more of what they contain, than those who give a loose to their Desires. According to this Rule, let there be equal Age, equal Wit, and equal Good Humour, in the Woman of Prudence, and her of Liberty: what Stores has he to expect, what does the former? What Refuse must he be contented with, who chuses the latter? Well, but I sate down to write to you to vent my Indignation against several pert Creatures who are address'd to and courted in this Place, while poor I, and two or three like me, are wholly unregarded.

Every one of these affect prunning the Hearts of your Sex. This is generally attempted by a particular manner of carrying themselves with Familiarity. Green has a dancing Walk, and keeps Tune in her ordinary Gait. Chloe, her Sister who is unwilling to interrupt her Conquests, comes into the Room before her with a familiar Run. Dulcena takes Advantage of the Approach of the Winter, and has introduc'd a very pretty Shiver, closing up her Shoulders, and shrinking as she moves. All that are in this Mode carry their Fins between both Hands before them. Dulcena herself, who is Author of this Air, adds the pretty Runt to it and has also, when she is in very good Humour, a taking Familiarity in throwing herself into the lowest Seat in the Room, and letting her hoop'd Petticoats fill with a loud Decency about her. I now she practices this way of sitting down in her Chamber, and indeed she does it as well as you may have seen an Actress fall down wide in a Tragedy. Not the least Indecency in her Posture. If you have observ'd what pretty Carcasses are carry'd off at the end of a Verse at the Theatre, it will give you a Notion how Dulcena plumps into a Chair. Here's a little Country Girl that's very cunning that makes her use of being young and unbred, and outdoes the Insurers, who are almost twice her Age. The Air that she takes is to come into Company after a Will, and is very successfully out of Breath upon occasion. Her Mother is in the Secret, and calls her Rump, and then looks round to see what young Men stare at her.

It would take up more than can come into one of your Papers, to enumerate all the particular Aurs of the younger Company in this Place. But I cannot omit Dulcena, whose manner is the most indolent imaginable, but still as watchful of Conquest as the busiest Virgin among us. She has a peculiar Art of staring at a young Fellow, till she sees she has got him, and mislead him by so much Observation. When she sees she has him, and he begins to toss his Head upon it, she is immediately short sighted, and labours to observe what he is at a distance with her Eyes half shut. Thus the Captive, that thought her first struck, is to make very near Approaches, or

'be wholly disregarded. This Artifice has done more Execution than in all the ogling of the rest of the Women here, with the utmost Variety of half Glances, attentive Heedlessnesses, childish Inadvertencies, haughty Contempts, or artificial Oversights. After I have said thus much of Ladies among us who fight thus regularly, I am to complain to you of a Set of Familiar Komps who have broken thro' all common Rules, and have thought of a very effectual way of shewing more Charms than all of us. These, Mr SPECTATOR, are the Swingers. You are to know these careless pretty Creatures are very Innocents again, and it is to be no matter what they do, for 'tis all harmless Freedom. They get on Ropes, as you must have seen the Children, and are swung by their Men Visitors. The Jest is, that Mr such a one can name the Colour of Mrs Such a one's Stockings, and she tells him, he is a lying Thief, so he is, and full of Roguery and she'll lay a wager, and her Sister shall tell the Truth if he says right, and he can't tell what Colour her Garters are of. In this Diversion there are very many pretty Shrieks, not so much for fear of falling, as that their Petticoats should untie. For there is a great care had to avoid Improprieties, and the Lover who swings the Lady, is to tie her Clothes very close with his Hand, before she admits him to throw up her Heels.

Now, Mr SPECTATOR, except you can note these Wantonnesses in their Beginnings, and bring us sober Girls into Observation, there is no help for it, we must swim with the Tide: the Coquets are too powerful a Party for us. I look into the Merit of a regular and well behaved Woman, is a slow thing. A loose trivial Song gums the Affections, when a wise Homely is not attended to. There is no other way but to make war upon them, or we must go over to them. As for my Part, I will shew all the World it is not for want of Charms that I stand so long unasked, and if you do not take measures for the immediate Redress of us Rigids, as the Fellows call us, I can move with a sparkling Mien, can look significantly, can lisp, can trip, can loll, can start, can blush, can rage, can weep, if I must do it, and can be frightened as agreeably as any She in England. All which is humbly submitted to your Spectatorial Consideration with all Humility, by

Your most humble Servant,

Mauldy Mohur

Qualem commendes etiam atque etiam adspice, ne mox

Incutiant aliena tibi peccata pudorem—Hor

IT is no unpleasant matter of Speculation to consider the recommendatory Epistles that pass round this Town from Hand to Hand, and the abuse People put upon one another in that kind. It is indeed come to this pass, that instead of being the Testimony of Merit in the Person recommended, the true reading of a Letter of this sort is, The Bearer hereof is so uncase to me that it will be an Act of Charity in you to take him off my Hands: whether you prefer him or not, it is all one, for I have no manner of Kindness for him, or Obligation to him or his, and do what you please as to that. As negligent Men are in this respect a point of Honour is concerned in it, and there is nothing a Man should be more ashamed of, than passing a worthless Creature into the Service or Interests of a Man who has never injured you. The Women indeed are a little too keen in their Resentments, to trespass often this Way. But you shall sometimes know that the Mistress and the Maid shall quarrel, and give each other very free Language, and at last the Lady shall be persuaded to turn her out of Doors, and give her a very good Word to any body else. Hence it is that you see, in a Lev and Hall's time, the same Face a Domestick in all parts of the Town. Good breeding and Good nature lead People in a great Measure to this Injustice. When Suitors of no Consideration will have Confidence enough to press upon their Superiors, those in Power are tender of speaking the Exceptions they have against them, and are mortgaged into Promises out of their Impatience of Importunity. In this latter Case, it would be a very useful Enquiry to know the History of Recommendations. There are, you must know, certain Abettors of this way of Forment, who make it a Profession to manage the Affairs of Candidates. These Gentlemen let out their Impudence to their Clients, and supply any Defective Recommendation, by informing how such and such a Man is to be attacked. They will tell you, get the least Scrap from Mr Such a one, and leave the rest to them. When one of these Undertakers have your Business in hand, you may be sick, absent in Town or Country, and the Patron shall be worried, or you prevail. I remember to have been shewn a Gentleman some Years ago, who push'd a whole People for their Facility in giving their Credentials. This Person had belonged to a Regiment which did Duty in the West Indies, and by the Mortality of the Place happened to be commanding Officer in the Colony. He oppress'd his Subjects with great frankness, till he became sensible that he was heartily hated by every Man under his Command. When he had carried his Point to be thus detestable, in a pretended Fit of Dishumour, and feigned Uneasiness of living where he found he was so universally unacceptable, he communicated to the chief Inhabitants a Design he had to return for England, provided they would give him ample Testimonials of their Approbation. The Plinters came into it to a Man, and in proportion to his deservings the quite contrary, the Words Justice, Generosity, and Courage, were inserted in his Commission, not omitting the general Good liking of People of all Conditions in the Colony. The Gentleman returns for England, and within few Months after came back to them their Governour on the Strength of their own Testimonials.

Such a Rebuke as this cannot indeed happen to easy Recommenders, in the ordinary course of things from one hand to another, but how would a Man bear to have it said to him, the Person I took into Confidence on the Credit you gave him, has proved false, unjust, and has not answered any way the Character you gave me of him!

I cannot but conceive very good hopes of that Rake Jack Tofer of the Temple, for an honest Scrupulousness in this Point. A Friend of his meeting with a Servant that had formerly lived with Jack, and having a mind to take him, went to him to know what Faults the Fellow had, since he could not please such a careless Fellow as he was. His Answer was as follows:

SIR,

'Thou art that live I with men is turned away because he is too good for me. You know I live in Taverns, he is in order, sober, Rational, and thinks much to sleep in an Inn till two in a Morning. He told me one day when he was dressing me, that he wondered I was not dead before now, since I went to Dinner in the Evening, and went to Supper at two in the Morning. We were coming down Essex-street one Night, quite frustrated, and I was giving him the Word to alarm the Watch, he had the Impudence to tell me it was against the Law. You that are married and live one Day after another the same Way, and so on the whole Week, I dare say will like him, and he will be glad to have his Merit in due Season. The Fellow is certainly very Honest. My Service to your Lady.

Yours, J. J.

Now this was very fair Dealing. Jack knew very well, that though the Love of Order made a Man very awkward in his Quippen, it was a valuable Quality among the Quier People who live by Rule, and had too much good Sense and good Nature to let the fellow starve, because he was not fit to attend his Vicarities.

I shall end this Discourse with a Letter of Recommendation from Horne to Christian. Now you will see in that Letter a Slowness to ask a Favour, a strong Reason for being unable to deny his good Word any longer, and that it is a Service to the Person to whom he recommends, to comply with what is asked. All which are necessary Circumstances both in Justice and Good breeding, if a Man would not so as to have reason to complain of a Denial, and in deed a Man should not in strictness ask otherwise. In hopes the Authority of Horne, who perfectly understood how to live with great Men may have a good Effect towards amending this Frigidity in People of Condition, and the Confidence of those who apply to them without Merit, I have translated the Epistle.

So CI AUDIUS ADRO

SIR,

'Septimus, who waits upon you with this, is very well acquainted with the price you are pleased to allow me in your Friendship. For when he beseeches me to recommend him to your Notice, in such a manner as to be received by you who are delicate in the choice of your Friends and Domesticks, he knows our Intimacy, and understands my Ability to serve him better than I do myself. I have defended myself against his Ambition to be your, as long as I possibly could, but fearing the Imputation of hiding my Power in you out of mean and selfish Considerations, I am at last prevailed upon to give you this Trouble. Thus to avoid the Appearance of a greater Fault I have put on this Confidence. If you can forgive this Transgression of Modesty in behalf of a Friend, receive this Gentleman into your Intere is and Friendship, and take it from me that he is an honest and a brave Man.

ABOUT the Year 1650 it was the fashion in England, for every one that would be thought religious, to throw as much Sincerity as possible into his Price, and in particular to abstain from all Appearances of Mirth and Pleasantry, which were looked upon as the Marks of a Carnal Mind. The Saint was of a sorrowful Countenance, and generally eaten up with Spleen and Melancholy. A Gentleman, who was lately a great Ornament to the Learned World, had diverted me more than once with an Account of the Reception which he met with from a very famous Independent Minister who was Head of a College in those times. This Gentleman was then a young Adventurer in the Republic of Letters, and just fitted out for the University with a good Cargo of Latin and Greek. His Friends were resolved that he should try his Fortune at an Election which was drawing near in the College, of which the Independent Minister whom I have before mentioned was Governor. The Youth, according to Custom waited on him in order to be examined. He was received at the Door by a Servant, who was one of that gloomy

¹ Supposed to be Anthony Henley, a gentleman of property, who corresponded with Swift was a friend of Steele's, and contributed some unidentified papers to the Tatler. He died in August, 1711.

Generation that were then in fashion. He conducted him, with great Silence and Seriousness, to a long Gallery which was darkened at Noon-day, and had only a single Candle burning in it. After a short stay in this melancholy Apartment, he was led into a Chamber hung with Black, where he entertained himself for some time by the glimmering of a Taper, till at length the Head of the College came out to him, from an inner Room, with half a Dozen Night Caps upon his Head, and a religious Horror in his Countenance. The young Man trembled, but his Fears increased when, instead of being ask'd what Progress he had made in Learning, he was examined how he abounded in Grace. His Latin and Greek stood him in little stead, he was to give an account only of the state of his Soul, whether he was of the Number of the Elect, what was the Occasion of his Conversion, upon what Day of the Month, and Hour of the Day it happened, how it was carried on, and when completed. The whole Examination was summed up with one short Question, namely, Whether he was prepared for Death? The Boy, who had been bred up by honest Parents, was frightened out of his Wits at the Solemnity of the Proceeding, and by the last dreadful Interrogatory so that upon making his Escape out of this House of Mourning, he could never be brought a second time to the Examination, as not being able to go through the Terrors of it.

Notwithstanding this general Form and Out-side of Religion is pretty well worn out among us, there are many Persons, who, by a natural Unchearfulness of Heart, mistaken Notions of Piety, or Weakness of Understanding, love to indulge this uncomfortable way of Life, and give up themselves a Prey to Grief and Melancholy. Superstitious Fears and groundless Scruples cut them off from the Pleasures of Conversation, and all those social Entertainments, which are not only innocent, but laudable, as if Mirth was made for Reprobates, and Chearfulness of Heart denied those who are the only Persons that have a proper Title to it.

Sombrius is one of these Sons of Sorrow. He thinks himself obliged in Duty to be sad and disconsolate. He looks on a sudden fit of Laughter as a Breach of his Baptismal Vow. An innocent Jest startles him like Blasphemy. Tell him of one who is advanced to a Title of Honour, he lifts up his Hands and Eyes, describe a publick Ceremony, he shakes his Head, shew him a gay Equipage, he blesses himself. All the little Ornaments of Life are Pomps and Vanities. Mirth is a ton, and Wit profane. He is scandalized at Youth for being lively, and at Childhood for being playful. He sits at a Christening, or a Marriage Feast, as at a Funeral sighs at the Conclusion of a merry Story, and grows devout when the rest of the Company grow pleasant. After all, Sombrius is a religious Man, and would have behaved himself very properly, had he lived when Christianity was under a general Persecution.

I would by no means presume to tax such Characters with Hypocrisy, as is done too frequently, that being a Vice which I think none but He, who knows the Secrets of Men's Hearts, should pretend to discover in another, where the Proofs of it do not amount to a Demonstration. On the contrary, as there are many excellent Persons, who are weighed down by this habitual Sorrow of Heart, they rather deserve our Compassion than our Reproaches. I think, however, they would do well to consider, whether such a Behaviour does not deter Men from a Religious Life, by representing it as an unsociable State, that extinguishes all Joy and Gladness, darkens the Face of Nature, and destroys the Relish of Being it self.

I have, in former Papers, shewn how great a Tendency there is to Chearfulness in Religion, and how such a Frame of Mind is not only the most lovely, but the most commendable in a virtuous Person. In short, those who represent Religion in so unamiable a Light, are like the Spies sent by Moses to make a Discovery of the Land of Promise, when by their Reports they discouraged the People from entering upon it. Those who shew us the Joy, the Chearfulness, the Good-humour, that naturally spring up in this happy State, are like the Spies bringing along with them the Clusters of Grapes, and delicious Fruits, that might invite their Companions into the pleasant Country which produced them.

An eminent Pagan Writer¹ has made a Discourse, to shew that the Atheist, who denies a God, does him less Dishonour than the Man who owns his Being, but at the same time believes him to be cruel, hard to please, and terrible to Human Nature. For my own part, says he, I would rather it should be said of me, that there was never any such Man as Plutarch, than that Plutarch was ill-natured, capricious or inhuman.

If we may believe our Logicians, Man is distinguished from all other Creatures by the Faculty of Laughter. He has an Heart capable of Mirth, and naturally disposed to it. It is not the Business of Virtue to extirpate the Affections of the Mind, but to regulate them. It may moderate and restrain, but was not designed to banish Gladness from the Heart of Man. Religion contracts the Circle of our Pleasures, but leaves it wide enough for her Votaries to expatiate in. The Contemplation of the Divine Being, and the Exercise of Virtue, are in their own Nature so far from excluding all Gladness of Heart, that they are perpetual Sources of it. In a word, the true Spirit of Religion cheers, as well as composes the Soul. It banishes indeed all Levity of Behaviour, all vicious and dissolute Mirth, but in exchange fills the Mind with a perpetual Serenity, uninterrupted Chearfulness, and an habitual Inclination to please others, as well as to be pleased in it self. AS I am one, who, by my Profession am obliged to look into all kinds of Men, there are none whom I consider with so much Pleasure, as those who have any thing new or extraordinary in their Characters, or Ways of living. For this reason I have often amised myself with Speculations on the Race of People called Jews, many of whom I have met with in most of the considerable Towns which I have passed through in the Course of my Travels. They are, indeed, so disseminated through all the trading parts of the World, that they are become the Instruments by which the most distant Nations converse with one another, and by which Mankind are knit together in a general Correspondence. They are like the Pegs and Nails in a great Building, which, though they are but little valued in themselves, are absolutely necessary to keep the whole Frame together.

That I may not fall into any common beaten Tricks of Observation, I shall consider this People in three Views. First, with regard to their Number. Secondly, their Dispersion, and Thirdly, their Adherence to their Religion; and afterwards endeavour to shew, First, what Natural Reasons, and, Secondly, what Providential Reasons may be assigned for these three remarkable Particulars.

The Jews are looked upon by many to be as numerous at present, as they were formerly, in the Land of Canaan.

This is wonderful, considering the dreadful Slaughter made of them under some of the Roman Emperors, which Historians describe by the Death of many Hundred Thousands in a War, and the innumerable Massacres and Persecutions they have undergone in Turkey, as well as in all Christian Nations of the World. The Rabbins, to express the great Havock which has been sometimes made of them, tell us, after their usual manner of Hyperbole, that there were such Torrents of Holy Blood shed as carried Rocks of an hundred Yards in Circumference above three Miles into the Sea.

Their Dispersion is the second remarkable Particular in this People. They swarm over all the Fus, and are settled in the remotest Parts of China. They are spread through most of the Nations of Europe and Africa, and many Families of them are established in the West Indies, not to mention whole Nations bordering on Prester-John's Country, and some discovered in the inner Parts of America, if we may give any Credit to their own Waters.

Their firm Adherence to their Religion is no less remarkable than their Numbers and Dispersion, especially considering it is persecuted or condemned over the Face of the whole Earth. This is likewise the more remarkable, if we consider the frequent Apostacies of this People, when they lived under their Kings, in the Land of Promise, and within sight of their Temple.

If in the next place we examine, what may be the Natural Reasons for these three Particulars which we find in the Jews, and which are not to be found in any other Religion or People, I can, in the first place attribute their Numbers to nothing, but their constant Employment, their Abstinence, their Exemption from Wars, and above all, their frequent Marriages, for they look on Celibacy as an accursed State, and generally are married before Twenty, as hoping the Messiah may descend from them.

The Dispersion of the Jews into all the Nations of the Earth is the second remarkable Particular of that People, though not so hard to be accounted for. They were always in Rebellions and Tumults while they had the Temple and Holy City in View, for which reason they have often been driven out of their old Habitations in the Land of Promise. They have as often been banished out of most other Places where they have settled, which must very much disperse and scatter a People, and oblige them to seek a Livelihood where they can find it. Besides, the whole People is now a Race of such Merchants as are Wanderers by Profession, and at the same time, are in most if not all Places incapable of either Lands or Offices that might engage them to make any Part of the World their Home.

This Dispersion would probably have lost their Religion, had it not been secured by the Strength of its Constitution. For they are to live all in a Body, and generally within the same Enclosure, to marry among themselves and to eat no Meats that are not killed or prepared their own way. This shuts them out from all Table Conversation, and the most agreeable Intercourses of Life and, by consequence, excludes them from the most probable Means of Conversion.

If, in the last place, we consider what Providential Reason may be assigned for these three Particulars, we shall find that their Numbers, Dispersion, and Adherence to their Religion, have furnished every Age, and every Nation of the World, with the strongest Arguments for the Christian Faith, not only as these very Particulars are foretold of them, but as they themselves are the Depositories of these and all the other Prophecies, which tend to their own Confusion. Their Number furnishes us with a sufficient Cloud of Witnesses that attest the Truth of the Old Bible. Their Dispersion spreads these Witnesses thro all parts of the World. The Adherence to their Religion makes their Testimony unquestionable. Had the whole Body of the Jews been converted to Christianity, we should certainly have thought all the Prophecies of the old Testament, that relate to the Coming and History of our Blessed Saviour, forged by Christians, and have looked upon them, with the Prophecies of the Sybs, as made many Years after the Events they pretended to foretell.

Gnatum pariter uti his decuit aut etiam amplius, Quod illa ætas magis ad hæc utenda idonea est
Terent Heaut. A 1 Sc 1

Mr SPECTATOR,

THOSE Ancients who were the most accurate in their Remarks on the Genius and Temper of Mankind, by considering the various Bent and Scope of our Actions throughout the Progress of Life, have with great Exactness allotted Inclinations and Objects of Desire particular to every Stage, according to the different Circumstances of our Conversation and Fortune, thro' the several Periods of it. Hence they were disposed easily to excuse those Excesses which might possibly arise from too eager Pursuit of the Affections more immediately proper to each State. They indulged the Levity of Childhood with Tenderness, overlooked the Gayety of Youth with Good nature, tempered the forward Ambition and Impatience of ripen'd Manhood with Discretion, and kindly imputed the tenacious Aversion of old Men to their want of relish for any other Enjoyment. Such Allowances as these were no less advantageous to common Society than obliging to particular Persons: for by maintaining a Decency and Regularity in the Course of Life, they supported the Dignity of human Nature, which then suffers the greatest Violence when the Order of things is inverted, and in nothing is it more remarkably vilify'd and ridiculous, than when I ceckless preposterously attempts to adorn it self with that outward Pomp and Lustre, which serve only to set off the Bloom of Youth with better advantage. I was insensibly carried into Reflections of this nature, by just now meeting Paulino who is in his Characterick bedeck'd with the utmost Splendour of Dress and Equipage, and giving an unbounded Loose to all manner of Pleasure, whilst his only Son is debarr'd all innocent Diversion, and may be seen frequently solacing himself in the Mall with no other Attendance than one antiquated Servant of his Father's for a Companion and Director.

It is a monstrous want of Reflection, that a Man cannot consider that when he cannot resign the Pleasures of Life in his Decay of Appetite and Inclination to them, his Son must have a much uneasier Task to resist the Impetuosity of growing Desires. The Skill therefore should, methinks, be to let a Son want no lawful Diversion, in proportion to his future Fortune, and the Figure he is to make in the World. The first Step towards Virtue that I have observed in young Men of Condition that have run into Excesses, has been that they had regard to their Quality and Reputation in the Management of their Vices. Narrowness in their Circumstances has made many Youths, to supply themselves as Debauchees, commence Cheats and Rascals. The Father who allows his Son to his utmost ability avoids this latter Evil, which is to the World is much greater than the former. But the contrary Practice has prevail'd so much among some Men, that I have known them deny them what was merely necessary for Education suitable to their Quality. Poor young Antonio is a lamentable Instance of ill Conduct in this kind. The young Man did not want natural Talents but the Father of him was a Coxcomb, who is sected being a fine Gentleman so unmercifully, that he could not endure in his sight, or the frequent mention of one, who was his Son, growing into Manhood, and thrusting him out of the gay World. I have often thought the Father took a secret Pleasure in reflecting that when that fine House and Seat came into the next hands, it would revive his Memory, as a Person who knew how to enjoy them, from Observation of the Rusticity and Ignorance of his Successor. Certain it is that a Man may, if he will, let his Heart close to the having no regard to any thing but his dear self, even with exclusion of his very Children. I recommend this Subject to your Consideration, and am,

SIR, Your most humble Servant, T B

Mr SPECTATOR, London, Sept 26, 1712

I am just come from Tunbridge, and have since my return read Mrs Matilda Mohair's Letter to you. She pretends to make a mighty Story about the Diversion of Swinging in that Place. What was done, was only among Relations and no Man swung any Woman who was not second Cousin at farthest. She is pleased to say, care was taken that the Gallants tied the Ladies Legs before they were waisted into the Air. Since she is so spiteful, I'll tell you the plain Truth, there was no such Nicety observed, since we were all, as I just now told you, near Relations but Mrs Mohair her self has been swung there, and she invents all this Malice, because it was observed she has crooked Legs, of which I was an Eye-Witness.

Your humble Servant,
Rachel Shoestrang

Mr SPECTATOR, Tunbridge, Sept 26, 1712

We have just now read your Paper, containing Mrs Mohair's Letter. It is an Invention of her own from one end to the other, and I desire you would print the enclosed Letter by it self, and shorten it so as to come within the Compress of your Half-Sheet. She is the most malicious Mixx in the World, for all she looks so innocent. Don't leave out that Part about her being in love with her Father's Butler, which makes her shun Men, for that is the truest of it all.

Your humble Servant,
Sarah Ince

P S 'She has crooked Legs

Mr SPECTATOR, Tunbridge, Sept 26, 1712

All that Mrs Mohair is so vexed at against the good Company of this Place, is, that we all know she has crooked Legs. This is certainly true. I don't care for putting my Name, because one would not be in the Power of the Creature.

Your humble Servant and neighbour

Mr SPECTATOR, Tunbridge, Sept 26, 1712

'Οὐκ εἰς ἀπὲρ γαλιώτης γέριον — Menander

A FAVOUR well bestow'd, is almost as great an Honour to him who confers it, as to him who receives it. What indeed makes for the superior Reputation of the Patron in this case, is, that he is always surrounded with specious Pretences of unworthy Candidates, and is often alone in the kind Inclination he has towards the Well-deserving. Justice is the first Quality in the Man who is in a Post of Direction and I remember to have heard an old Gentleman talk of the Civil Wars, and in his Relation give an Account of a General Officer, who with this one Quality, without any shining Endowments, became so peculiarly beloved and honoured, that all Decisions between Man and Man were laid before him by the Parties concerned in a private Way, and they would lay by their Animosities implicitly, if he bid them be friends, or submit themselves in the Wrong without Reluctance, if he said it, without waiting the Judgment of Court Martials. His Manner was to keep the Dates of all Commissions in his Closet, and wholly dismiss from the Service such who were deficient in their Duty, and after that, took Care to prefer according to the Order of Battle. His Familiars were his entire Friends, and could have no interested Views in coining his Acquaintance for his Affection was no Step to their Preferment, tho' it was to their Reputation. By this means a kind Aspect, a Salutation, a Smile, and giving out his Hand, had the weight of what is esteem'd by vulgar Minds more substantial. His Business was very short, and he who had nothing to do but Justice, was never affronted with a Request of a familiar daily Visitant for what was due to a brave Man at a Distance. Extraordinary Merit he used to recommend to the King for some Distinction at home, till the Order of Battle made way for his rising in the Troop. Add to this, that he had an excellent Manner of getting rid of such whom he observed were good at an Hall, as his Phrase was.
Under this Description he comprehended all those who were contented to live without Reproach, and had no Promptitude in their Minds towards Glory.
These Fellows were also recommended to the King, and taken off of the General's hands into Posts wherein Diligence and common Honesty were all that were necessary. This General had no weak Part in his Line but every Man had as much Care upon him, and as much Honour to lose as himself. Every Officer could answer for what pass'd where he was, and the General's Presence was never necessary any where, but where he had plac'd himself at the first Disposition, except that Accident happen'd from extraordinary Efforts of the Enemy which he could not foresee.

but it was remarkable that it never fell out from Failure in his own Troops. It must be confess'd, the World is just so much out of order, as an unworthy Person possesses what should be in the Direction of him who has better Pretensions to it.

Instead of such a Conduct as this old Fellow us'd to describe in his General, all the Evils which have ever happen'd among Mankind have arose from the wanton Disposition of the Favours of the Powerful. It is generally all that Men of Modesty and Virtue can do to fall in with some whimsical Turn in a Great Man, to make way for things of real and absolute Service. In the time of Don Sebastian of Portugal, or some time since, the first Minister would let nothing come near him but what bore the most profound Face of Wisdom and Gravity. They carry'd it so far, that, for the greater Shew of their profound Knowledge, a Pair of Spectacles tied on their Noses, with a black Ribband round their Heads, was what completed the Dress of those who made their court at his Levée, and none without naked Noses were admitted to his Presence. A blunt honest Fellow, who had a Command in the Train of Artillery, had attempted to make an Impression upon the Porter day after day in vain, till at length he made his appearance in a very thoughtful dark suite of Clothes, and two Pairs of Spectacles on at once. He was conducted from Room to Room with great deference, to the Minister and carrying on the Face of the Place, he told his Excellence, that he had pretended in this manner to be wiser than he really was, but with no ill Intention but he was honest. Such one of the Train, and he came to tell him that they wanted Wheel barrows and Pick axes. The thing happened not to displease, the Great Man was seen to smile, and the successful Officer was reconducted with the same profound Ceremony out of the House.

When Leo X. reigned Pope of Rome, his Holiness, tho' a Man of Sense and of an excellent Taste of Letters, of all things affected Fools, Buffoons, Humourists, and Coxcombs. Whether it were from Vanity, and that he enjoy'd no Talents in other Men but what were inferior to him, or whatever it was, he carry'd it so far, that his whole Delight was in finding out new Fools, and, as our Phrase is, prying them off, and making them shew themselves to advantage. A Priest of his former Acquaintance suffered a great many Disappointments in attempting to find access to him in a regular Character, till at last in despair he retired from Rome, and returned in an Equipage so very fantastical, both as to the Dress of himself and Servants, that the whole Court were in an Emulation who should first introduce him to his Holiness. What added to the Expectation his Holiness had of the Pleasure he should have in his Follies, was, that this Fellow, in a Dress the most exquisitely ridiculous, desired he might speak to him alone, for he had Matters of the highest Importance, upon which he wanted a Conference. Nothing could be denied to a Cox-comb of so great hope, but when they were apart,

¹ Founded on Note F to Bayle's account of Leo X.

the Impostor revealed himself, and spoke as follows

Do not be surpris'd, most holy Father, at seeing, instead of a Coxcomb to laugh at, your old Friend who has taken this way of Access to admonish you of your own Folly. Can any thing shew your Holiness how unworthily you treat Mankind, more than my being put upon this Difficulty to speak with you? It is a degree of Folly to delight to see it in others, and it is the greatest Insolence imaginable to rejoice in the Disgrace of human Nature. It is a criminal Humility in a Person of your Holiness's Understanding, to believe you cannot excel but in the Conversation of Half-wits, Humorists, Coxcombs and Buffoons. If your Holiness has a mind to be diverted like a rational Man, you have a great opportunity for it, in disrobing all the Impertinents you have favour'd, of all their Riches and Trappings at once, and bestowing them on the Humble, the Virtuous, and the Meek. If your Holiness is not concerned for the sake of Virtue and Religion, be pleased to reflect, that for the sake of your own Safety it is not proper to be so very much in jest. When the Pope is thus merry, the People will in time begin to think many things, which they have hitherto beheld with great Veneration, are in themselves Objects of Scorn and Derision. If they once get a Trick of knowing how to laugh, your Holiness's saying this Sentence in one Night Cap and t'other with the other, the change of your Slippers, bringing you your Staff in the midst of a Prayer, then stripping you of one Vest and clapping on a second during divine Service, will be found out to have nothing in it. Consider, Sir, that at this rate a Head will be reckoned never the wiser for being Bald, and the ignorant will be apt to say, that going bare foot does not at all help on in the way to Heaven. The red Cap and the Coul will fall under the same Contempt, and the Vulgar will tell us to our Faces that we shall have no Authority over them, but from the Force of our Arguments, and the Sanctity of our Lives. To the SPECTATOR GENERAL of Great Britain

From the farther end of the Widow's Coffee-house in Devereux Court, Monday Evening, twenty eight Minutes and a Half past Six

Dear Dumb,

IN short, to use no further Preface, if I should tell you that I have seen a Hackney-Coachman, when he has come to set down his Fare, which has consisted of two or three very fine Ladies, hand them out, and salute every one of them with an Air of Familiarity, without giving the least Offence, you would perhaps think me guilty of a Gasconade. But to clear my self from that Imputation, and to explain this Matter to you, I assure you that there are many Illustrious

Youths within this City, who frequently recreate themselves by driving of a Hackney-Coach. But those whom, above all others, I would recommend to you, are the young Gentlemen belonging to our Inns of Court. We have, I think, about a dozen Coachmen, who have Chambers here in the Temple and as it is reasonable to believe others will follow their Example, we may perhaps in time (if it shall be thought convenient) be drove to Westminster by our own Fraternity, allowing every fifth Person to apply his Meditations in this way, which is but a modest Computation, as the Humour is now likely to take. It is to be hop'd likewise, that there are in the other Nurseries of the Law to be found a proportionable number of these hopeful Plants, springing up to the everlasting Renown of their native Country. Of how long standing this Humour has been, I know not the first time I had any particular Reason to take notice of it, was about this time twelvemonth, when being upon Hampstead-Heath with some of these studious young Men, who went thither purely for the sake of Contemplation, nothing would serve them but I must go thro' a Course of this Philosophy too, and being ever willing to embellish my self with any commendable Qualification, it was not long e'er they persuaded me into the Coach-box, nor indeed much longer, before I underwent the Fate of my Brother Phaeton, for having drove about fifty Paces with pretty good Success, through my own natural Sagacity, together with the good Instructions of my Tutors, who, to give them their due, were on all Hands encouraging and assisting me in this laudible Undertaking. I say Sir, having drove about fifty Paces with pretty good Success, I must needs be exercising the Lash, which the Horses resented so ill from my Hands, that they gave a sudden Start, and thereby pitched me directly upon my Head, as I very well remembered about Half an Hour afterwards, which not only deprived me of all the Knowledge I had gain'd for fifty Yards before, but had like to have broken my Neck into the Bargain. After such a severe Reprimand, you may imagine I was not very easily prevail'd with to make a second Attempt and indeed, upon mature Deliberation, the whole Science seem'd, at least to me, to be surrounded with so many Difficulties, that notwithstanding the unknown Advantages which might have accrued to me thereby, I gave over all Hopes of attaining it, and I believe had never thought of it more, but that my Memory has been lately refreshed by seeing some of these ingenious Gentlemen ply in the open Streets, one of which I saw receive so suitable a Reward of his Labours, that tho' I know you are no Friend to Story-telling, yet I must beg leave to trouble you with this at large. About a fortnight since, as I was diverting my self with a pennyworth of Walnuts at the Temple Gate, a lively young Fellow in a Fustian Jacket shot by me, beckon'd a Coach, and told the Coachman he wanted to go as far as Chelsey. They agreed upon the Price, and this young Gentleman mounts the Coach-box, the Fellow staring at him, desir'd to know if he should not drive till they were out of Town? No, no, replied

He was then going to climb up to him, but received another Check, and was then ordered to get into the Coach, or behind it, for that he wanted no Instructors but besure you Dog you, says he, don't you balk me The Fellow thereupon surrender'd his Whip, scratch'd his Head, and crept into the Coach Having my self occasion to go into the Strand about the same Time, we started both together, but the Street being very full of Coaches, and he not so able a Coachman as perhaps he imagined himself, I had soon got a little Way before him, often, however, having the curiosity to cast my Eye back upon him, to observe how he behaved himself in this high Station, which he did with great Composure till he came to the Pass, which is a Military Term the Brothers of the Whip have given the Strat to St Clement's Church when he was arrived near this Place, where are always Coaches in waiting, the Coachmen begin to suck up the Muscles of their Cheeks, and to tip the Wink upon each other as if they had some Roguery in their Heads, which I was immediately convinced of for he no sooner came within Reach, but the first of them with his Whip took the exact Dimension of his Shoulders, which he very ingeniously call'd Endorsing and indeed I must say, that every one of them took due Care to endorse him as he came thro' their Hands He seem'd at first a little uneasy under the Operation, and was going in all haste to take the Numbers of their Coaches but at length by the Mediation of the worthy Gentleman in the Coach, his Wrath was asswaged, and he prevail'd upon to pursue his Journey tho' indeed I thought they had clapt such a Spoke in his Wheel, as had disabled him from being a Coachman for that Day at least For I am only mistaken, Mr SPEC if some of these Endorsements were not wrote in so strong a Hand, that they are still legible Upon my enquiring the Reason of this unusual Salutation, they told me, that it was a Custom among them, whenever they saw a Brother tottering or unstable in his Post, to lend him a hand in order to settle him again therein For my part I thought their Allegations but reasonable, and so march'd off Besides our Coachmen, we abound in divers other Sorts of ingenious robust Youth, who, I hope, will not take it ill if I refer giving you an account of their several Recreations to another Opportunity In the mean time, if you would but bestow a little of your wholesome Advice upon our Coachmen, it might perhaps be a Reprieve to some of their Necks As I understand you have several Inspectors under you, if you would but send one amongst us here in the Temple, I am persuaded he would not want Employment But I leave this to your own Consideration, and am,

SIR, Your very humble Servant,
Moses Greenbag

P.S. I have heard our Critics in the Coffee-houses hereabout talk mightily of the Unity of Time and Place According to my Notion of the Matter, I have endeavour'd at something like it in the Beginning of my Epistle I desire to be inform'd of it as to that Particular In my next

I design to give you some account of excellent Watermen, who are bred to the Law, and far outdo the Land-Students abovementioned T

MY Friend WILL HONEYCOMB has told me, for above this half Year, that he had a great mind to try his Hand at a Spectator, and that he would fain have one of his writing in my Works This Morning I received from him the following Letter, which, after having rectified some little Orthographical Mistakes, I shall make a Present of to the Publick.

Dear SPEC

I was, about two Nights ago, in Company with a very agreeable young People of both Sexes, where talking of some of your Papers which are written on Conjugal Love, there arose a Dispute among us, whether there were not more bad Husbands in the World than bad Wives A Gentleman, who was Advocate for the Ladies, took this occasion to tell us the story of a famous Siege in Germany, which I have since found related in my Historical Dictionary, after the following manner When the Emperor Conrad the Third had besieged Guelphus, Duke of Bavaria, in the City of Hensberg, the Women finding that the Town could not possibly hold out long, petitioned the Emperor that they might depart out of it, with so much as each of them could carry The Emperor knowing they could not convey away many of their Effects, granted them their Petition, When the Women, to his great Surprise, came out of the Place with every one her Husband upon her back The Emperor was so moved at the sight, that he burst into Tears, and after having very much extolled the Women for their conjugal Affection, gave the Men to their Wives, and received the Duke into his Favour

The Ladies did not a little triumph at this Story, asking us at the same time, whether in our Consciences we believed that the Men of any Town in Great Britain would, upon the same Offer, and at the same Conjunction, have laden themselves with their Wives, or rather, whether they would not have been glad of such an opportunity to get rid of them To this my very good Friend Tom Dapperwit, who took upon him to be the Mouth of our Sex, replied, that they would be very much to blame if they would not do the same good Office for the Women, considering that their Strength would be greater, and their Burdens lighter As we were amusing our selves with Discourses of this nature, in order to pass away the Evening, which now begins to grow tedious, we fell into that laudable and primitive Diversion of Questions and Commands I was no sooner vested with the regal Authority, but I enjoined all the Ladies, under pain of my Displeasure, to tell the Company ingeniously, in 'case they had been in the Siege abovementioned, and had the same Offers made them as the good Women of that Place, what every one of them would have brought off with her, and have thought most worth the saving? There were several merry Answers made to my Question, which entertained us till Bed-time. This filled my Mind with such a huddle of Ideas, that upon my going to sleep, I fell into the following Dream.

'I saw a Town of this Island, which shall be nameless, invested on every side, and the Inhabitants of it so strained as to cry for Quarter. The General refused any other Terms than those granted to the abovementioned Town of Hensberg, namely, that the married Women might come out with what they could bring along with them. Immediately the City-Gates flew open, and a Female Procession appeared Multitudes of the Sex following one another in a row, and staggering under their respective Burdens. I took my Stand upon an Eminence in the Enemies Camp, which was appointed for the general Rendezvous of these Female Carriers, being very desirous to look into their several Ladings. The first of them had a huge Sack upon her Shoulders, which she set down with great Care. Upon the opening of it, when I expected to have seen her Husband shot out of it, I found it was filled with China-Ware. The next appeared in a more decent Figure, carrying a handsome young Fellow upon her Back. I could not forbear commending the young Woman for her Conjugal Affection, when to my great Surprise, I found that she had left the good Man at home, and brought away her Gallant. I saw the third, at some distance, with a little withered Face peeping over her Shoulder, whom I could not suspect for any but her Spouse, till upon her setting him down I heard her call him dear Pugg, and found him to be her Favourite Monkey. A fourth brought a huge Bile of Cards along with her, and the fifth a Bolonia Lap-Dog for her Husband, it seems, being a very Burly Man, she thought it would be less trouble for her to bring away little Cupid. The next was the Wife of a rich Usurer, ladden with a Bag of Gold. She told us that her Spouse was very old, and by the course of Nature could not expect to live long, and that to shew her tender regards for him, she had saved that which the poor Man loved better than his Life. The next came towards us with her Son upon her Back, who, we were told, was the greatest Rake in the Place, but so much the Mother's Darling, that she left her Husband behind with a large Family of hopeful Sons and Daughters, for the sake of this Graceless Youth.

'It would be endless to mention the several Persons, with their several Loads that appeared to me in this strange Vision. All the Place about me was covered with packs of Ribbands, Brocades, Embroidery, and Ten thousand other Materials, sufficient to have furnished a whole Street of Toy shops. One of the Women, having an Husband who was none of the heaviest, was bringing him off upon her Shoulders, at the same time that she carried a great bundle of Planders lace under her Arm, but finding herself so overladen, that she could not save both of them, she

'dropp'd the good Man, and brought away the Bundle. In short, I found but one Husband among this great Mountain of Baggage, who was a lively Cobler, that kick'd and spurr'd all the while his Wife was carrying him on, and, as it was said, had scarce pass'd a Day in his Life without giving her the Discipline of the Strap.

'I cannot conclude my Letter, Dear Spectator, without telling thee one very odd Whim in this my Dream, I saw, methoughts, a dozen Women employed in bringing off one Man. I could not guess who it should be, till upon his nearer approach I discover'd thy short Phiz. The Women all declared that it was for the sake of thy Works, and not thy Person, that they brought thee off, and that it was on condition that thou should'st continue the Spectator. If thou think'st this Dream will make a tolerable one, it is at thy Service, from,

Dear Spectator

Thine, Sleeping and Waking,

WILL. HONFINGTON

The Ladies will see, by this Letter, what I have often told them, that WILL is one of those old-fashioned Men of Wit and Pleasure of the Town, that shews his Parts by Ruffery on Marriage, and one who has often tried his Fortune that way without Success. I cannot however dismiss his Letter, without observing, that the true Story on which it is built does Honour to the Sex, and that in order to abuse them, the Writer is obliged to have recourse to Dream and Fiction.

SIR,
YOU who are so well acquainted with the Story of Socrates, must have read how, upon his making a Discourse concerning Love, he pressed his Point with so much Success, that all the Bachelors in his Audience took a Resolution to Marry by the first Opportunity, and that all the married Men immediately took Horse and galloped home to their Wives. I am apt to think your Discourses, in which you have drawn so many agreeable Pictures of Marriage, have had a very good Effect thus wry in England.

'At the end of this number and in all following numbers there is a change in the colophon, caused by the addition of Tonson's name to Buckley's. It runs henceforth thus LONDON Printed for S Buckley and J Tonson And Sold by A Baldwin in Warwick-Lane. But an announcement at the head of the advertisements sets forth that

'Advertisements for this Paper continue to be taken in by S Buckley at the Dolphin in Little Britain, J Tonson at Shakespear's Head in the Strand, C Lillie at the Corner of Neauford Buildings, and A. Baldwin in Warwick-Lane.'

'We are obliged to you, at least for having taken off that Senseless Ridicule which for many Years the Writings of the Town have turned upon their Authors and Mothers. For my own part, I was born in Wedlock, and I don't care who knows it. For which Reason, among many others, I should look upon my self as a most insufferable Coxcomb, did I endeavour to maintain that Cuckoldom was inseparable from Marriage, or to make use of Husband and Wife as Terms of Reproach. Nay, Sir, I will go one step further, and declare to you before the whole World, that I am a married Man, and at the same time I have so much Assurance as not to be ashamed of what I have done.

'Among the several Pleasures that accompany this state of Life, and which you have described in your former Papers, there are two you have not taken Notice of, and which are seldom cast into the Account, by those who write on this Subject. You must have observed, in your Speculations on Human Nature, that nothing is more gratifying to the Mind of Man than Power or Dominion, and this I think my self amply possessed of as I am the Father of a Family. I am perpetually taken up in giving out Orders, in prescribing Duties, in hearing Petitions, in administering Justice, and in distributing Rewards and Punishments. To speak in the Language of the Centurion, I say unto one Go, and he goeth, and to another, Come, and he cometh, and to my Servant, Do this, and he doth it. In short, Sir, I look upon my Family as a Patriarchal Sovereign, in which I am my self both King and Priest. All great Governments are nothing else but Clusters of these little private Royalties, and therefore I consider the Masters of families as small Deputy Governors presiding over the several little Parcels and Divisions of their Fellow Subjects. As I take great pleasure in the Administration of my Government in particular, so I look upon my self not only as more useful, but as a much greater and happier Man than any Bachelor in England of [my] Rank and Condition.

'There is another accidental Advantage in Marriage, which has likewise fallen to my share. I mean the having a Multitude of Children. These I cannot but regard as very great Blessings. When I see my little Troop before me, I rejoice in the Additions which I have made to my Species, to my Country, and to my Religion in having produced such a Number of reasonable Creatures, Citizens, and Christians. I am pleased to see my self thus perpetuated and as there is no Production comparable to that of a human Creature, I am more proud of having been the Occasion of ten such glorious Productions, than if I had built a hundred Pyramids at my own Expence or published as many Volumes of the finest Wit and Learning. In what a beautiful Light has the Holy Scripture represented Abdon one of the Judges of Israel, who had forty Sons and thirty Grandsons that rode on Three-score and Ten Ass Colts, according to the Magnificence of the Eastern Countries? How

² [my own]

'must the Heart of the old Man rejoice, when he saw such a beautiful Procession of his own Descendants, such a numerous Cavalcade of his own rising? For my own part, I can sit in my Parlour with great content, when I take a review of half a dozen of my little Boys mounting upon Hobby Horses, and of as many little Girls tutoring their Babies, each of them endeavouring to excel the rest, and to do something that may gain my Favour and Approbation. I cannot question but he who has blessed me with so many Children, will assist my Endeavours in providing for them. There is one thing I am able to give each of them, which is a virtuous Education. I think it is Sir Francis Bacon's Observation, that in a numerous Family of Children the eldest is often spoiled by the Prospect of an Estate, and the youngest by being the Darling of the Parent; but that some one or other in the middle, who has not perhaps been regarded, has made his way in the World, and over-topped the rest. It is my Business to implant in every one of my Children the same Seeds of Industry, and the same honest Principles. By this Means I think I have a fair Chance, that one or other of them may grow considerable in some or other way of Life, whether it be in the Army, or in the Fleet, or in Trade, or any of the three learned Professions. For you must know, Sir, that from long Experience and Observation, I am persuaded of what seems a Paradox to most of those with whom I converse, namely, That a Man who has many Children, and gives them a good Education is more likely to raise a Family, than he who has but one, notwithstanding he leaves him his whole Estate. For this reason I cannot forbear improving my self with finding out a General, an Admiral, or an Alderman of London, a Divine, a Physician, or a Lawyer, among my little People who are now perhaps in Petticoats and when I see the Motherly Air of my little Daughters when they are playing with their Puppets. I cannot but flatter my self that their Husbands and Children will be happy in the Possession of such Wives and Mothers.

'If you are a Father, you will not perhaps think this either impertinent or but if you are a single Man, you will not know the Meaning of it, and probably throw it into the Fire. Whichever you determine of it, you may assure yourself that it comes from one who is

Durum sed levius fit patientia Quicquid corrigere est nefas—Hor

AS some of the finest Compositions among the Ancients are in Allegory, I have endeavoured, in several of my Papers, to revive that way of Writing, and hope I have not been altogether unsuccessful in it for I find there is always a great Demand for those particular Papers, and cannot but observe that several Authors have endeavoured of late to excel in Works of this Nature Among these, I do not know any one who has succeeded better than a very ingenious Gentleman, to whom I am much obliged for the following Piece, and who was the Author of the Vision in the CCCCLXth Paper O

How are we tortured with the Absence of what we covet to possess, when it appears to be lost to us! What Excursions does the Soul make in Imagination after it! And how does it turn into it self again, more foolishly fond and dejected, at the Disappointment? Our Grief, instead of having recourse to Reason, which might restrain it, searches to find a further Nourishment It calls upon Memory to relate the several Passages and Circumstances of Satisfaction which we formerly enjoyed the Pleasures we purchased by those Riches that are taken from us, or the Power and Splendour of our departed Honours, or the Voice, the Words, the Looks, the Temper, and Affections of our Friends that are deceased It needs must happen from hence that the Passion should often swell to such a Size as to burst the Heart which contains it, if Time did not make these Circumstances less strong and lively, so that Reason should become a more equal Match for the Passion, or if another Desire which becomes more present did not overpower them with a livelier Representation These are Thoughts which I had, when I fell into a kind of Vision upon this Subject, and may therefore stand for a proper Introduction to a Relation of it

I found my self upon a naked Shore, with Company whose afflicted Countenances witnessed their Conditions Before us flowed a Water deep, silent, and called the River of Tears, which issuing from two Fountains on an upper Ground, encompassed an Island that lay before us The Boat which plied in it was old and shattered, having been sometimes overset by the Impatience and Haste of single Passengers to arrive at the other side This immediately was brought to us by Misfortune who steers it, and we were all preparing to take our places, when there appeared a Woman of a mild and composed Behaviour, who began to deter us from it, by representing the Dangers which would attend our Voyage Hereupon some who knew her for Patience, and some of those too who till then cry'd the loudest, were persuaded by her, and returned back The rest of us went in, and she (whose Good-nature would not suffer her to forsake Persons in Trouble) desired leave to accompany us, that she might at least administer some small Comfort or Advice while we sailed We were no sooner embark'd but the Boat was push'd off, the Sheet was spread, and being filled with Sighs, which are the Winds of that Country, we made a passage to the farther Bank, through several Difficulties of which the most of us seemed utterly regardless

When we landed, we perceived the Island to be strangely overcast with Fogs, which no Brightness could pierce, so that a kind of gloomy Horror sat always brooding over it This had something in it very shocking to easy Tempers, insomuch that some others, whom Patience had by this time gained over, left us here, and privily convey'd themselves round the Verge of the Island to find a Ford by which she told them they might escape

For my part, I still went along with those who were for piercing into the Centre of the Place and joining our selves to others whom we found upon the same Journey, we marched solemnly as at a Funeral, through bordering Hedges of Rose mary, and through a Grove of Yew-trees, which love to over-shadow Tombs and flourish in Church-yards Here we heard on every side the Wailings and Complaints of several of the Inhabitants, who had cast themselves disconsolately at the Feet of Trees, and as we chanced to approach any of these, we might perceive them wringing their Hands, beating their Breasts, tearing their Hair, or after some other manner visibly agitated with Vexation Our Sorrows were heightened by the Influence of what we heard and saw, and one of our Number was wrought up to such a Pitch of Wildness, as to talk of hanging himself upon a Bough which shot temptingly across the Path we travelled in, but he was restrained from it by the kind Endeavours of our above mentioned Companion

We had now gotten into the most dusky silent part of the Island, and by the redoubled Sounds of Sighs, which made a doleful Whistling in the Branches, the thickness of Air which occasioned faintish Respiration, and the violent Throbings of Heart which more and more affected us, we found that we approached the Grotto of Grief It was a wide, hollow, and melancholy Cave, sunk deep in a Dale, and watered by Rivulets that had a Colour between Red and Black These crept slow and half congealed amongst its Windings, and mixed their heavy Murmur with the Echo of Groans that rolled through all the Passages In the most retired Part of it sat the Doleful Being her self the Path to her was strowed with Goads, Stings and Thorns, and her Throne on which she sat was broken into a Rock, with ragged Pieces pointing upwards for her to lean upon A heavy Mist hung above her, her Head oppressed with it reclined upon her Arm Thus did she reign over her disconsolate Subjects, full of her self to stupidity, in eternal Pensiveness, and the profoundest Silence On one side of her stood Dejection just dropping into a Swoon, and Paleness wasting to a Skeleton on the other side were Care inwardly tormented with Imaginations, and Anguish suffering outward Troubles to suck the Blood from her Heart in the shape of Vultures The whole Vault had a genuine Dismalness in it, which a few scattered Lamps, whose bluish Flames arose and sunk in their Urns, discovered to our Eyes with Encrease Some of us fell down, overcome and spent with what they suffered in the way, and were given over to those Tormentors that stood on either hand of the Presence others, galled and mortified with Pain, recover'd the Entrance, where Patience, whom we had left behind, was still waiting to receive us

With her (whose Company was now become more grateful to us by the want we had found of her) we wound round the Grotto, and ascended at the back of it, out of the mournful Dale in whose Bottom it lay On this Eminence we

Humanity, that you would be apt to pronounce us a Nation of Savages. It cannot be called a Mistake of what is pleasant, but the very contrary to it is what most assuredly takes with them. The other Night an old Woman carried off with a Pin in her Side, with all the Distortions and Anguish of Countenance which is natural to one in that Condition, was laughed and clipped off the Stage. Terrence's Comedy, which I am speaking of, is indeed written as if he hoped to please none but such as had as good a Taste as himself. I could not but reflect upon the natural Description of the innocent young Woman made by the Servant to his Master. When I came to the House and he, an old Woman opened the Door, and I fell in love with her, because I could by entering upon them unawares better observe what was your Mistress's ordinary manner of spending her Time, the only way of judging at you is that of nature and Genius. I found that her Need in a sort of second Mourning, which she wore for an Aunt she had lately lost. She had nothing in but what she wore dressed only for herself. Her Hair hung negligently about her Shoulders. She had none of the Arts with which others use to set themselves off, but had that Negligence of Person which is remarkable in those who are careless of their Minds. Then she had a Maid who was at work near her, that was a Slattern, because her Mistress was careless, which I take to be another Argument of your security in her, for the Go between of Women of Intrigue are rewarded too well to be dirty. When you were named, I told her you desired to see her, she threw down her Work for Joy, covered her Face, and decently hid her Tears. He must be a very good Actor, and draw Attention rather from his own Character than the Words of the Author, that could gain it among us for this Speech, though so full of Nature and good Sense.

The intolerable Folly and Confidence of Players putting in Words of their own, does in a great measure feed the absurd Taste of the Audience. But however that is, it is ordinary for a Cluster of Coxcombs to take up the House to themselves, and equally insult both the Actors and the Company. These Savages, who want all manner of Regard and Deference to the rest of Mankind, come only to shew themselves to us, without any other Purpose than to let us know they despise us.

The gross of an Audience is composed of two sorts of People, those who know no Pleasure but of the Body, and those who improve or command corporeal Pleasures by the addition of fine Sentiments of the Mind. At present the intelligent part of the Company are wholly subdued, by the Insurrections of those who know no Satisfaction but what they have in common with all other Animals.

This is the reason that when a Scene tending to Procreation is acted, you see the whole Pit in such a Chuckle, and old Letchers, with Mouths open, stare at the loose Gesticulations on the Stage with shameful Earnestness, when the justest Pictures of human Life in its calm Dignity, and the pro-perest Sentiments for the Conduct of it, pass by like meer Narration, and concluding, only to somewhat much better which is to come after. I have seen the whole House at some times in so proper a Disposition, that indeed I have trembled for the Boxes, and feared the Intertainment would end in the Representation of the Rape of the Sabine.

I would not be understood in this Talk to argue, that nothing is tolerable on the Stage but what has an immediate Tendency to the Promotion of Virtue. On the contrary, I can allow, provided there is nothing against the Interests of Virtue and is not offensive to Good Manners, that things of an indifferent nature may be represented. For this Reason I have no Exception to the well drawn Rusticities in the Country House,¹ and there is something so miraculously pleasant in Dickens's acting, the author of Trinny and Crumb's Row of Hob in different Circumstances, that I shall not be able to say why I never it is acted. All that vexes me is, that the Gallantry of riding the Chickens for Glittering, with the Pride of Heart in twining himself up, and taking Aim at his Adversary, as well as the other Protestation in the Humility of low Romance. That he could not promise the Squire to beat His Head, but he would, if he could do it in Love, then flourish and begin. I say, what vexes me is that such excellent Fables as these as well as the Squire being out of all patience at His Success, and venturing himself into the Crowd, are Circumstances hardly taken Notice of, and the Light of the Jest is only in the very Point that Heads are broken. I am confident, were there a Scene written, wherein Perkett might break his Leg by wrestling with Bulldog, and Dicky come in to set it, without one word said to what should be according to the exact Rules of Surgery in making this Attention, and binding up the Leg, the whole House should be in a Roar of Applause at the dissembled Anguish of the Patient, the Help given by him who threw him down, and the handy Address and rich Looks of the Surgeon. To enumerate the entrance of Ghosts, the Fighting of Armies, the Noise of Heroes in Love with a thousand other Inconveniences, would be to transgress the bounds of this Paper, for which reason it is possible they may have hereafter distinct Discourses, not forgetting any of the Audience who shall set up for Actors, and interrupt the Play on the Stage, and Players who shall prefer the Applause of Fools to that of the reasonable part of the Company.

¹ Dickens had been acting a few nights before in the Country House. The part of Hob was his own in every sense, he being the author of the farce which if crowds were made into a very popular ballad opera called Perkett, or Hob in the Well.

'the Church-Door, and I could hear some say, A very fine Lady, others, I'll warrant ye, she's no better than she should be and one very wise old Lady said, She ought to have been taken up. Mr SPECTATOR, I think this Matter lies wholly before you for the Offence does not come under any Law, tho' it is apparent this Creature came among us only to give herself Air, and enjoy her full Swing in being admir'd. I desire you would print this, that she may be confin'd to her own Parish, for I can assure you there is no attending any thing else in a Place where she is a Novelty. She has been talk'd of among us ever since under the Name of the Phantom. But I would advise her to come no more, for there is so strong a Party made by the Women against her, that she must expect they will not be excell'd a second time in so outrageous a manner, without doing her some Insult. Young Women, who assume after this rate, and affect exposing themselves to view in Congregations at t'other end of the Town, are not so mischievous, because they are rival'd by more of the same Ambition, who will not let the rest of the Company be particular. But in the Name of the whole Congregation where I was, I desire you to keep these agreeable Disturbances out of the City, where Sobriety of Manners is still preserv'd, and all glaring and ostentatious Behaviour, even in things laudable, discountenanced. I wish you may never see the Phantom, and am,

SIR,

Your most humble Servant,

Ralph Wonder

Lepus tute es, et pulpamentum quaris—Ter

IT is a great Convenience to those who want Wit to furnish out a Conversation, that there is something or other in all Companies where it is wanted substituted in its stead, which according to their Taste, does the Business as well. Of this nature is the agreeable Pastime in Country-Halls of Cross purposes, Questions and Commands, and the like. A little superior to these are those who can play at Crambo, or cap Verses. Then above them are such as can make Verses, that is, Rhime, and among those who have the Latin tongue, such as use to make what they call golden Verses. Commend me also to those who have not Brains enough for any of these Exercises and yet do not give up their Pretensions to Mirth. These can slap you on the Back unawares, laugh loud, ask you how you do with a Twang on your Shoulders, say you are dull to-day, and laugh a Voluntary to put you in Humour, the laborious Way among the minor Poets, of making things come into such and such a Shape, as that of an Egg, an Hand, an Ax, or any thing that no body had ever thought on before for that purpose, or which would have cost a great deal of Pains to accomplish it if they did. But all these Methods, tho' they are mechanical, and may be arm'd at with the smallest Capacity, do not serve an honest Gentleman who wants Wit for his ordinary Occasions, therefore it is absolutely necessary that the Poor in Imagination should have something which may be serviceable to them at all Hours upon all common Occurrences. That which we call Punning is therefore greatly affected by Men of small Intellects. These Men need not be concerned with you for the whole Sentence, but if they can say a quaint thing, or bring in a Word which sounds like any one Word you have spoken to them they can turn the Discourse, or distract you so that you cannot go on, and by consequence if they cannot be as witty as you are, they can hinder your being any wittier than they are. Thus if you talk of a Candle, he can deal with you and if you ask him to help you to some Bread, a Punster should think himself very ill bred if he did not, and if he is not as well-bred as your self, he hopes for Grains of Allowance. If you do not understand that last Fancy, you must recollect that Bread is made of Grain, and so they go on for ever, without Possibility of being exhausted.

There are another Kind of People of small Faculties, who supply want of Wit with want of Breeding, and because Women are both by Nature and Education more offended at any thing which is unmodest than we Men are, these are ever harping upon things they ought not to allude to, and deal mightily in double Meanings. Every ones own Observation will suggest Instances enough of this kind, without my mentioning any, for your double Meaners are dispersed up and down thro' all Parts of Town or City where there are any to offend, in order to set off themselves. These Men are mighty loud Laughers, and held very pretty Gentlemen with the siller and unbred Part of Womankind. But above all already mentioned, or any who ever were, or ever can be in the World, the happiest and surest to be pleasant, are a Sort of People whom we have not indeed lately heard much of, and those are your *Biter*s.

A *Biter*¹ is one who tells you a thing you have no reason to disbelieve in it self, and perhaps has given you, before he bit you, no reason to disbelieve it for his saying it, and if you give him Credit, laughs in your Face, and triumphs that he has deceiv'd you. In a Word, a Biter is one who thinks you a Fool, because you do not think him a Knave. This Description of him one may insist upon to be a just one, for what else but a Degree of Knavery is it, to depend upon Deceit

¹ See No 47. Swift writes, 'I'll teach you a way to outwit Mrs Johnson, it is a new fashioned way of being witty, and they call it a Bite. You must ask a bantering question, or tell some lie in a serious manner, then she will answer, or speak as if you were in earnest, and then cry you, "Madam, there's a Bite." I would not have you undervalue this, for it is the constant amusement in Court, and every where else among the great people, and I let you know it, in order to have it among you, and to teach you a new refinement.'—Journal to Stella. Although 'bite' and 'biter' have not retained this sense, it remains in an occasional use of the word 'bitten'.

for what you grin of another, be it in point of Wit or Interest, or any thing else?

This way of Wit is called Biting, by a Metaphor taken from Beasts of Prey, which devour harmless and unarmed Animals, and look upon them as their Food wherever they meet them. The Sharps about Town very ingeniously understood themselves to be to the undesigning Part of Mankind what Foxes are to Lambs, and therefore used the Word Biting to express any Exploit wherein they had over reach'd any innocent and inadvertent Man of his Pursue. These Rascals of late Years have been the Gallants of the Town, and carried it with a fashionable brightly Air, to the discouragement of Modesty and all honest Arts. Shallow Fops, who are govern'd by the Lye, and admire every thing that struts in vogue, took up from the Sharps the Phrase of Biting, and used it upon all Occasions, either to disown any nonsensical Stuff they should talk themselves, or to evade the Force of what was reasonably said by others. This, when one of these cunning Creatures was enter'd into a Debate with you whether it was practicable in the present State of Affairs to accomplish such a Proposition, and you thought he had let fall what destroy'd his Side of the Question, as soon as you look'd with an Earnestness ready to lay hold of it, he immediately cry'd, Bite, and you were immediately to acknowledge all that Part was in Jest. They carry this to all the Extravagance imaginable, and if one of these Wittings knows any Particulars which may give Authority to what he says, he is still the more ingenuous if he imposes upon your Credulity. I remember a remarkable Instance of this Kind. There came up a shrewd young Fellow to a plain young Man, his Countryman, and taking him aside with a grave concern'd Countenance, goes on at this rate. I see you here, and have you heard nothing out of Perilshire—You look so surpriz'd you could not have heard of it—and yet the Particulars are such, that it cannot be false. I am sorry I am got into it so far that I now must tell you, but I know not but it may be for your Service to know—on Tuesday last, just after Dinner—you know his Manner is to smoke, opening his Box, your I tither fell down dead in an Apoplexy. The Youth shew'd the filial Sorrow which he ought—Upon which the witty Mincry d, Bite, there was not in me all this . . .

To put an end to this silly, pernicious, inviolous Way at once, I will give the Reader one late Instance of a Bite, which no Biter for the future will ever be able to equal, tho' I heartily wish him the same Occasion. It is a Superstition with some Surgeons who beg the Bodies of condemn'd Malefactors, to go to the Gall, and bargain for the Carcase with the Criminal himself. A good honest Fellow did so last Sessions, and was admitted to the condemn'd Men on the Morning wherein they died. The Surgeon communicated his Business, and fell into discourse with a little Fellow, who refused Twelve Shillings, and insisted upon Fifteen for his Body. The Fellow, who kill'd the Officer of Ne-igate, very forwardly, and like a Man who was willing to deal, told him, Look you, Mr Surgeon, that little dry Fellow, who has been halfstarv'd all his Life, and is now half dead with Fear, cannot answer your Purpose. I have ever liv'd high and freely, my Veins are full, I have not pin'd in Imprisonment, you see my Crest swells to your Knife, and after Jack-Catch has done, upon my Honour you'll find me as sound as e'er a Bullock in any of the Markets. Come, for Twenty Shillings I am your Man—Says the Surgeon, Done, there's a Guinea—Thus witty Rogue took the Money, and as soon as he had it in his Fist, cries, Bite, I am to be hang'd in Chains. T

THOSE who have maintain'd that Men would be more miserable than Beasts, were their Hopes confin'd to this Life only, among other Considerations take notice that the latter are only afflicted with the Anguish of the present Evil, whereas the former are very often punned by the Reflection on what is passed, and the Fear of what is to come. This Fear of any Future Difficulties or Misfortunes is so natural to the Mind, that were a Man's Sorrow and Disquietudes summ'd up at the End of his Life, it would generally be found that he had suffer'd more from the Apprehension of such Evils as never happen'd to him, than from those Evils which had really befallen him. To this we may add, that among those Evils which befall us, there are many that have been more painful to us in the Prospect, than by their actual Pressure.

This natural Impatience to look into Futurity, and to know what Accidents may happen to us hereafter, has given birth to many ridiculous Arts and Inventions. Some found their Prescience on the Lines of a Man's Hand, others on the Features of his Face, some on the Signatures which Nature has impress'd on his Body, and others on his own Hand-Writing. Some read Mens Fortunes in the Stars, as others have searched after them in the Entrails of Beasts, or the Flights of Birds. Men of the best Sense have been touched, more or less, with these groundless Horrors and Presages of Futurity, upon surveying the most indifferent Works of Nature. Can any thing be more surprizing than to consider Cicero, who made the greatest Figure at the Bar, and in the Senate of the Roman Commonwealth, and, at the same time, outshin'd all the Philosophers of Antiquity in his Library and in his Retirements, as busying himself in the College of Augurs, and observing, with a religious Attention, after what manner the Chickens peck'd the several Grains of Corn which were thrown to them?

Notwithstanding these Follies are pretty well worn out of the Minds of the Wise and Learned in the present Age, Multitudes of weak and ignorant Persons are still Slaves to them. There are numberless Arts of Prediction among the Vulgar, which are too trifling to enumerate and infinite Observations, of Days, Numbers, Voices, and Figures, which are regarded by them as Portents and Prophecies. In short, every thing Prophecies to the superstitious Man, there is scarce a Straw or a rusty Piece of Iron that lies in his way by Accident.

It is not to be conceiv'd how many Wizards, Gypsies, and Cunning-Men are dispers'd thro' all the Countreys and Market-Towns of Great-Britain, not to mention the Fortune tellers and Astrologers, who live very comfortably upon the Curiosity of several well-dispos'd Persons in the Cities of London and Westminster.

Among the many pretended Arts of Divination, there is none which so universally amuses as that by Dreams. I have indeed observ'd in a late Speculation, that there have been sometimes, upon very extraordinary Occasions, supernatural Revelations made to certain Persons by this means, but as it is the chief Business of this Paper to root out popular Errors, I must endeavour to expose the Folly and Superstition of those Persons, who, in the common and ordinary course of Life, lay any stress upon things of so uncertain, shadowy, and chimerical a nature. This I cannot do more effectually than by the following Letter, which is dated from a Quarter of the Town that has always been the Habitation of some prophetic Philomath, it having been usual, time out of Mind, for all such People as have lost their Wits, to resort to that Place either for their Cure or for their Instruction.

Mr SPECTATOR, Moor-Fields, Oct. 4, 1712

'Having long consider'd whether there be any Trade wanting in this great City, after having survey'd very attentively all kinds of Ranks and Professions, I do not find in any Quarter of the Town an Oenocritic, or, in plain English, an Interpreter of Dreams. For want of so useful a Person, there are several good People who are very much puzzled in this Particular, and dream a whole Year together without being ever the wiser for it. I hope I am pretty well qualify'd for this Office, having studied by Candlelight all the Rules of Art which have been laid down upon this Subject. My great Uncle by my Wife's Side was a Scotch Highlander, and second-sighted. I have four Fingers and two Thumbs upon one Hand, and was born on the longest Night of the Year. My Christian and Sir Name begin and end with the same Letter. I am lodg'd in Moorfields, in a House that for these fifty years has been always tenanted by a Conjurer.

'If you had been in Company, so much as my

* Bedlam was then in Moorfields

'self, with ordinary Women of the Town, you must know that there are many of them who every day in their Lives, upon seeing or hearing of any thing that is unexpected, cry, My Dream is out and cannot go to sleep in quiet the next night, till something or other has happen'd which has expounded the Visions of the preceding one. There are others who are in very great pain for not being able to recover the Circumstances of a Dream, that made strong Impressions upon them while it lasted. In short, Sir, there are many whose waking Thoughts are wholly employ'd on their sleeping ones. For the benefit therefore of this curious and inquisitive Part of my Fellow Subjects, I shall in the first place tell those Persons what they dream of, who fancy they never dream at all. In the next place, I shall make out any Dream, upon hearing a single Circumstance of it and in the last place, shall expound to them the good or bad Fortune which such Dreams portend. If they do not presage good luck, I shall desire nothing for my Prins, not questioning at the same time that those who consult me will be so reasonable as to afford me a moderate Share out of any considerable Estate, Profit or Emolument which I shall thus discover to them. I interpret to the Poor for nothing, on condition that their Names may be inserted in Publick Advertisements, to attest the Truth of such my Interpretations. As for People of Quality or others, who are indisposed, and do not care to come in Person, I can interpret their Dreams by seeing their Water. I set aside one Day in the Week for Lovers, and interpret by the great for any Gentleman who is turn'd of Sixty, after the rate of half a Crown per Week, with the usual Allowances for good Luck. I have several Rooms and Apartments fitted up, at reasonable rates, for such as have not Conveniences for dreaming at their own Houses.

*Candida perpetuo reside, concordia, lecto,

Mart.

THE following Essay is written by the Gentleman, to whom the World is oblig'd for those several excellent Discourses which have been marked with the Letter X.

I have somewhere met with a Fable that made IVealth the Father of Love. It is certain a Mind ought, at least, to be free from the Apprehensions of Want and Poverty, before it can fully attend to all the Softnesses and Endearments of this Passion. Notwithstanding we see Multitudes of married People, who are utter Strangers to this delightful Passion amidst all the Affluence of the most plentiful Fortunes.

It is not sufficient to make a Marriage happy,

Flavilla happens to assert, Tom immediately contradicts with an Oath, by way of Preface, and, My Dear, I must tell you, you talk most confoundedly silly. Flavilla had a Heart naturally as well dispos'd for all the Tenderness of Love as that of Latitia, but as Love seldom continues long after Esteem, it is difficult to determine, at present, whether the unhappy Flavilla hates or despises the Person most, whom she is oblig'd to lead her whole Life with. THERE is something very Sublime, tho' very fanciful, in Plato's Description of the Supreme Being, That Truth is his Body, and Light his Shadow. According to this Definition, there is nothing so contradictory to his Nature, as Error and Falshood. The Platonists have so just a Notion of the Almighty's Aversion to every thing which is false and erroneous, that they look'd upon Truth as no less necessary th'n in Virtue, to qualify a human Soul for the Enjoyment of a separate State. For this reason, as they recommended Moral Duties to qualify and season the Will for a future Life, so they prescribed several Contemplations and Sciences to rectify the Understanding. Thus Plato has call'd Mathematical Demonstrations the Catharticks or Purgatives of the Soul, as being the most proper Means to cleanse it from Error, and to give it a Relish of Truth, which is the natural Food and Nourishment of the Understanding, as Virtue is the Perfection and Happiness of the Will.

There are many Authors who have shewn wherein the Malignity of a Lie consists, and set forth in proper Colours, the Heinousness of the Offence. I shall here consider one Particular Kind of this Crime, which has not been so much spoken to. I mean that abominable Practice of Party-living. This Vice is so very predominant among us at present, that a Man is thought of no Principles, who does not propagate a certain System of Lies. The Coffee Houses are supported by them, the Press is choked with them, eminent Authors live upon them. Our Bottle Conversation is so infected with them, that a Party-Lie is grown as fashionable an Entertainment, as a lively Catch or a merry Story. The Truth of it is, half the great Talkers in the Nation would be struck dumb, were this Fountain of Discourse dried up. There is however one Advantage resulting from this detestable Practice, the very Appearances of Truth are so little regarded, that Lies are at present discharg'd in the Air, and begun to hurt no Body. When we hear a Party-story from a Stranger, we consider whether he is a Whig or a Tory that relates it, and immediately conclude they are Words of course, in which the honest Gentleman designs to recommend his Zeal, without any Concern for his Veracity. A Man is look'd upon as bereft of common Sense, that gives Credit to the Relations of Party-Writers [nry] his own friends shake their Heads at him, and consider him in no other Light than as an officious Fool or a well meaning Ideot. When it was formerly the Fashion to husband a Lie, and trump it up in some extraordinary Emergency, it generally did Execution, and was not a little serviceable to the Faction that made use of it. but it prevails every Man is upon his Guard, the Artifice has been too often repeated to take Effect.

I have frequently wonder'd to see Men of Probity, who would scorn to utter a Falshood for their own particular Advantage, give so readily into a Lie when it becomes the Voice of their Faction, notwithstanding they are thoroughly sensible of it as such. How is it possible for those who are Men of Honour in their Persons, thus to become notorious Liars in their Party? If we look into the Bottom of this Matter, we may find, I think, three Reasons for it, and at the same time discover the Insufficiency of these Reasons to justify so Criminal a Practice.

In the first place, Men are apt to think that the Guilt of a Lie, and consequently the Punishment, may be very much diminish'd, if not wholly worn out, by the Multitudes of those who partake in it. Tho' the Weight of a Falshood would be too heavy for one to bear, it grows light in their Imaginations, when it is shurr'd among many. But in this Case a Man very much deceives himself, Guilt, when it spreads thro' numbers, is not so properly divided as multiplied. Every one is criminal in proportion to the Offence which he commits, not to the Number of those who are his Companions in it. Both the Crime and the Penalty lie as heavy upon every Individual of an offending Multitude, as they would upon any single Person had none shurr'd with him in the Offence. In a word, the Division of Guilt is like that of Matter, tho' it may be separated into infinite Portions, every Portion shall have the whole Essence of Matter in it, and consist of as many Parts as the Whole did before it was divided.

But in the second place, tho' Multitudes, who join in a Lie, cannot exempt themselves from the Guilt, they may from the Shame of it. The Scandal of a Lie is in a manner lost and annihilated, when diffus'd among several Thousands as a Drop of the blackest Tincture wears away and vanishes, when mix'd and confus'd in a considerable Body of Water the Blot is still in it, but is not able to discover it self. This is certainly a very great Motive to several Party Offenders, who avoid Crimes, not as they are prejudicial to their Virtue, but to their Reputation. It is enough to shew the Weakness of this Reason, which palliates Guilt without removing it, that every Man who is influenced by it declares himself in effect an infamous Hypocrite, prefers the Appearance of Virtue to its Reality, and is determin'd in his Conduct neither by the Dictates of his own Conscience, the Suggestions of true Honour, nor the Principles of Religion.

The third and last great Motive for Mens joining in a popular Falshood, or, as I have hitherto call'd it, a Party-Lie, notwithstanding they are convinc'd of it as such, is the doing Good to a Cause which every Party may be supposed to look upon as the most meritorious. The Unsoundness of this Principle has been so often exposed, and is so universally acknowledged, that a Man must be an utter Stranger to the Principles, either of natural Religion or Christianity, who suffers himself to be guided by it. If a Man might promote the supposed Good of his Country by the blackest Calumnies and Falshoods, our Nation abounds more in Patriots than any other of the Christian World. When Pompey was desired not to set sail in a Tempest that would hazard his Life, It is necessary for me says he, to sail & it is not necessary for me to live. Every Man should say to himself, with the same Spirit. It is my Duty to speak Truth, tho' it is not my Duty to be in an Office. One of the Fathers hath carried this Point so high, as to declare, He would not tell a Lie, tho' he were sure to gain Heaven by it. However extravagant such a Protestation may appear, every one will own, that a Man may say very reasonably, He would not tell a Lie, if he were sure to gain Hell by it, or, if you have a mind to soften the Expression, that he would not tell a Lie to gain any Temporal Reward by it when he should run the hazard of losing much more than it was possible for him to gain. Omnēs autem et habet et dicuntur Tyranni, qui potestate et perpetua, et ea Civitate quae liberata usa est — Corn Nepos

THE following Letters complain of what I have frequently observed with very much Indignation, therefore I shall give them to the Publick in the Words with which my Correspondents, who suffer under the Hardships mentioned in them, describe them

MR SPECTATOR,

In former Ages all Pretensions to Dominion have been supported and submitted to, either upon Account of Inheritance Conquest or Ilection and all such Persons who have taken upon them any Sovereignty over their Fellow Creatures upon any other Account, have been always scall'd Tyrants, not so much because they were guilty of any particular Barbarities, as because every Attempt to such a Superiority was in its Nature tyrannical. But there is another sort of Potentates, who may with greater Propriety be call'd Tyrants, than those last mention'd, both as they assume a despoil'd Dominion over those as free as themselves, and as they support it by Acts of notable Oppression and Injustice, and these are the Rulers in all Clubs and Meetings. In other Governments, the Punishments of some have been alleviated by the Reward of others, but what makes the Reign of these Potentates so particularly grievous, is, that they are exquisite in punishing their Subjects, at the same time they have it not in their power to reward 'em. That the Reader may the better comprehend the Nature of these Monarchs, as well as the miserable State of those that are their Vassals, I shall give an Account of the King of the Company I am fallen into, whom for his particular Tyranny I shall call Diogenes, as also of the Seeds that sprung up to this odd sort of Empire.

Upon all Meetings at Taverns, 'tis necessary some one of the Company should take it upon him to get all things in such order and readiness, as may contribute as much as possible to the Pleasantry of the Convention, such as hastening the Fire getting, a sufficient number of Candles, tasting the Wine with a judicious Smack, fixing the Supper, and being brisk for the Dispatch of it. Know then, that Diogenes went thro' these Offices with an Air that seem'd to express a satisfaction rather in serving the Publick, than in gratifying any particular Inclination of his own. We thought him a Person of an exquisite Palate, and therefore by consent beseech'd him to be always our Proveditor, which Post, after he had handsomely demur'd, he could do no otherwise than accept. At first he made no other use of his Power, than in recommending such and such things to the Company, ever allowing these Points to be disputable, inasmuch that I have often earned the Debate for Partridge, when his Majesty has given Intimation of the high Relish of Duck, but at the same time has cheerfully submitted, and devour'd his Partridge with most generous Resignation. This Submission on his side naturally produc'd the like on ours, of which he in a little time made such barbarous Advantage, as in all those Matters, which before seem'd indifferent to him, to issue out certain Edicts as uncontrollable and unalterable as the Laws of the Medes and Persians. He is by turns outrageous, peevish, froward and jovial. He thinks it our Duty for the little Offices, as Proveditor, that in Return all Conversation is to be interrupted or promoted by his Inclination for or against the present Humour of the Company. We feel, at present, in the utmost Extremity, the Insolence of Office; however, I being naturally warm, ventured to oppose him in a Dispute about a Branch of Venison. I was altogether for roasting, but Diogenes declar'd himself for boiling, with so much Prowess and Resolution, that the Cook thought it necessary to consult his own Safety rather than the Luxury of my Proposition. With the same Authority that he orders what we shall eat and drink, he also commands us where to do it, and we change our Taverns according as he suspects any unreasonable Practices in the settling the Bill by the Master, or sees any bold Rebellion in point of Attendance by the Waiters. Another Reason for changing the Seat of Luncheon, I conceive to be the Pride he takes in the Promulgation of our Slavery, tho' we pay our Club for our Entertainments even in these Palaces of our grand Monarch. When he has a mind to take the Air, a Party of us are commanded out by way of Life-Guard, and we march under as great Restrictions as they do. If we meet a neighbouring King, we 'give or keep the Way according as we are outnumber'd or not, and if the Issue of each is equal in number, rather than give Battle, the Superiority is soon adjusted by a Desertion from one of 'em

'Now, the Expulsion of these unjust Rulers out of all Societies, would gain a Man as everlasting a Reputation, as either of the Brutus's got from their Endeavours to extirpate Tyranny from among the Romans. I confess my self to be in a Conspiracy against the Usurper of our Club, and to shew my Reading, as well as my merciful Disposition, shall allow him till the Ides of March to dethrone himself. If he seems to affect Empire till that time, and does not gradually recede from the Incursions he has made upon our Liberties, he shall find a Dinner dress'd which he has no Hand in, and shall be treated with an Order, Magnificence and Luxury as shall break his proud Heart at the same time that he shall be convinc'd in his Stomach he was unfit for his Post, and a more mild and skilful Prince receive the Acclamations of the People, and be set up in his room but, as Milton says,

'—These Thoughts

'Full Counsel must mature Peace is despair'd,
'And who can think Submission? War, then

'Open, or understood, must be resolv'd'

'I am, Sir, Your most obedient humble Servant

MR SPECTATOR,

'I am a young Woman at a Gentleman's Seat in the Country, who is a particular Friend of my Father's, and came hither to pass away a Month or two with his Daughters. I have been entertained with the utmost Civility by the whole Family, and nothing has been omitted which can make my Stay easy and agreeable on the Part of the Family, but there is a Gentleman here, a Visitant as I am, whose Behaviour has given me great Uneasinesses. When I first arriv'd here, he used me with the utmost Complaisance but, forsooth, that was not with regard to my Sex, and since he has no Designs upon me, he does not know why he should distinguish me from a Man in things indifferent. He is you must know, one of those familiar Coxcombs, who have observ'd some well bred Men with a good Grace converse with Women, and say no fine things, but yet treat them with that sort of Respect which flows from the Heart and the Understanding, but is exerted in no Professions or Compliments. This Puppy, to imitate this Excellence, or to avoid the contrary Fault of being troublesome in Complaisance, takes upon him to try his Talent upon me, inasmuch that he contradicts me upon all Occasions, and one day told me I lied. If I had stuck him with my Bodkin, and behaved my self like a Man, since he won't treat me as a Woman, I had, I think, serv'd him right. I wish, Sir, you would please to give him some Maxims of Behaviour in these Points, and resolve me if all Maids are not in point of Conversation to be treated by all Bachelors as their Mistresses? if 'not so, are they not to be used as gently as their Sisters? Is it sufferable, that the Top of whom I complain should say, as he would rather have such a one without a Groat, than me with the Indies? What right has any Man to make Suppositions of things not in his Power, and then declare his Will to the dislike of one that has never offended him? I assure you these are things worthy your Consideration, and I hope we shall have your Thoughts upon them. I am, tho' a Woman justly offended, ready to forgive all this, because I have no Remedy but leaving very agreeable Company sooner than I desire. This also is an heinous Aggravation of his Offence, that he is inflicting Banishment upon me. Your printing this Letter may perhaps be an Admonition to reform him. As soon as it appears I will write my Name at the End of it, and lay it in his Way, the marking which just Reprimand, I hope you will put in the Power of,

SIR,

Your constant Reader,
and humble Servant

THE useful Knowledge in the following Letter shall have a Place in my Paper, tho' there is nothing in it which immediately regards the Polite or the Learned World. I say immediately, for upon Reflection every Man will find there is a remote Influence upon his own Affairs, in the Prosperity or Decay of the Trading Part of Mankind. My present Correspondent, I believe was never in Print before, but what he says well deserves a general Attention, tho' delivered in his own homely Maxims, and a Kind of Proverbial Simplicity which Sort of Learning has ruin'd more Estates than ever were, or will be, from attention to Virgil, Horace, Tully, Seneca, Plutarch, or any of the rest, whom, I dare say, this worthy Citizen would hold to be indeed ingenious, but unprofitable Writers. But to the Letter

MR WILLIAM SPECTATOR,

SIR,

Broadstreet, Oct 10, 1712

'I receive you of many Discourses on the Subject of Money, which you have heretofore promis'd the Publick, but have not discharg'd your self thereof. But, forasmuch as you seem to depend upon Advice from others what to do in that Point, have sate down to write you the Needful upon that Subject. But, before I enter thereupon, I shall take this Opportunity to observe to you, that the thriving frugal Man shews it in every Part of his Expence, Dress, Servants, and House, and I must in the first place, complain to you, as SPECTATOR, that in these Particulars there is at this Time, throughout the City of London, a lamentable Change from that Simplicity of Manners, which is the true Source of Wealth and Prosperity. I just now said, the Man of Thrift shews Regularity in every thing, but you may, perhaps, hugh that I take Notice of such a Particular as I am going to do, for an Instance that this City is declining, if their antient Oeconomy is not restored. The Thing which gives me this Prospect, and so much Offence, is the Neglect of the Royal Exchange, I mean the Idleness so called, and the Walks appertaining thereunto. The Royal Exchange is a I think that will deserve to be so called as well to express that our Monarchs highest Glory and Advantage consists in being the Patrons of Trade, as that it is commodious for Business, and in Instance of the Grandeur both of Prince and People. But this at present it hardly seems to be set apart for any such Use or Purpose. Instead of the Assembly of honourable Merchants, substantial Traders, and knowing Masters of Ships, the Mumpers, the Halls, the Blind, and the Lame, your Venders of Irish, Apples, Plumbs, your Ragged muslin, Rakes, frames and Wenches, have justled the greater Number of the former out of that Place. Thus it is, especially on the Evening Change, so that what with the Din of Squirlings, Orths and Cries of Beggars, Men of the greatest Consequence in our City absent themselves from the Place. This Particular by the way, is of evil Consequence for if the Change be no Place for Men of the highest Credit to frequent, it will not be a Disgrace to those of less Abilities to absent. I remember the time when Rascally Company were kept out, and the unlucky Boys with Toys and Brills were whipped away by a Pindie. I have seen this done indeed of late but then it has been only to chase the Lads from Church, that the Beadle might seize their Copper.

I must repeat the Abomination that the Walk Trade is carry'd on by old Women within the Walls, which makes the Place impassable by reason of Shells and Trash. The Benches around are so filthy, that no one can sit down yet the Beadles and Officers have the Impudence to Charge us to ask for their Box though they deserve the Striped. I do not think it impertinent to have mentioned this because it speaks a neglect in the Domestick Care of the City and the Domestick is the truest Picture of a Man every where else.

But I designed to speak on the Business of Money and Advancement of Gain. The Man proper for this speaking in the general, is of a sedate plain, good Understanding not apt to go out of his way, but so behaving himself at home that Business may come to him. Sir William Turner, that valuable Citizen has left behind him a most excellent Rule, and couched it in very few Words, suited to the mearest Capacity. He would say, Keep your Shop and your Shop will keep you. It must be confessed that if a Man of a great Genius could add Steadiness to his Virtues, or substitute slower Men of Fidelity to transact the methodical part of his Affairs, such a one would outstrip the rest of the World. But Business and Trade is not to be managed by the same Herds which write Poetry and make Plans for the Conduct of Life in general. So tho' we are at this day beholden to the witty and inventive Duke of Buckingham for the whole Trade and Manufacture of Glass, yet

I suppose there is no one will aver, that, were his Grace yet living, they would not rather deal with my diligent Friend and Neighbour, Mr Gumley, for my Goods to be prepared and delivered on such a Day, than he would with that illustrious Mechanick above-mentioned.

No, no, Mr SPECTATOR, you will must not pretend to be rich and it is possible the Reason may be, in some Measure, because you despise, or at least you do not value it enough to let it take up your chief Attention which the Trader must do, or lose his Credit, which is to him what Honour, Reputation, Fame, or Glory is to other sort of Men.

I shall not speak to the Point of Cash it self, till I see how you approve of these my Maxims in general. But, I think, a Speculation upon Many a Little makes a Mickle, A Penny saved is a Penny got, Penny wise and Pound foolish, It is Need that makes the old Wife trot, would be very useful to the World, and if you treated them with Knowledge would be useful to your self, for it would make Demands for your Paper among those who have no Notion of it at present. But of these Matters more hereafter. If you did this, as you excel many Writers of the present Age for Politeness, so you would outgo the Author of the true Stroops of Ravors for Use.

I shall conclude this Discourse with an Explanation of a Proverb, which by vulgar Error is taken and used when a Man is reduced to an Extremity whereas the Propriety of the Maxim is to use it when you would say, there is Plenty, but you must make such a Choice, as not to hurt another who is to come after you.

Mr Tobias Hobson, from whom we have the Expression, was a very honourable Man, for I shall ever call the Man so who gets an Estate honestly. Mr Tobias Hobson was a Carrier, and being a Man of great Abilities and Invention, and one that saw where there might good Profit arise, though the duller Men overlooked it, this ingenious Man was the first in this Island who let out Hackney Horses. He lived in Carbridge, and observing that the Scholars did hard, his manner was to keep a large Stable of Horses, with Boots, Bridles, and Whips to furnish the Gentlemen at once, without going from College to College to borrow, as they have done since the Death of this worthy Man. I say, Mr Hobson kept a Stable of forty good Cattle, always ready and fit for travelling but when a Man came for a Horse, he was led into the Stable, where there was great Choice, but he obliged him to take the Horse which stood next to the Stable-Door so that every Customer was alike well served according to his Chance, and every Horse ridden with the same Justice. From whence it became a Proverb, when what ought to be your Election was forced upon you, to say, Hobson's Choice. This memorable Man stands drawn in Fresco at an Inn (which he used) in Bishopsgate street with an hundred Pound Bag under his Arm, with this Inscription upon the said Bag,

The fruitful Mother of an Hundred more Whatever Tradesman will try the Experiment,

*Si sapias
Neque praterquam q[uod] ipse amor molestias Habet addas et illas, quas habet, recte feras* Ter

I WAS the other day driving in [a] Hack thro Gerrard street, when my Lye was immediately catch'd with the prettiest Object imaginable, the Face of a very fair Girl, between Thirteen and Fourteen, fix'd at the Churn to a painted Sash, and made part of the Landskip. It seem'd admirably done, and upon throwing my self eagerly out of the Coach to look at it, it laugh'd and flung from the Window. This amiable Figure dwelt upon me, and I was considering the Vanity of the Girl, and her pleasant Coquetry in acting a Picture till she was taken Notice of and rais'd the Admiration of her Beholders. This little Circumstance made me run into Reflections upon the Force of Beauty, and the wonderful Influence the Female Sex has upon the other part of the Species. Our Hearts are seiz'd with their Enchantments, and there are few of us, but brutal Men who by that Hardness lose the chief Pleasure in them, can resist their Insinuations, tho' never so much against our own Interest and Opinion. It is common with Women to destroy the good Effects a Man's following his own Will and Inclination might have upon his Honour and Fortune, by interposing their Power over him in matters where-in they cannot influence him, but to his Loss and Dispragement. I do not know therefore I ask so difficult in human Life, as to be proof against the Importunities of a Woman a Man loves. There is certainly no Armour against Tears, sullen Looks, or the best constrained Familiarities, in her whom you usually meet with Transport and Alacrity. Sir Walter Raleigh was quoted in a Letter (of a very ingenious Correspondent of mine) on this Subject. That Author, who had liv'd in Courts, Camps, travell'd through many Countries, and seen many Men under several Climates, and of as various Complexions, speaks of our Impotence to resist the Wiles of Women, in very severe Terms. His words are as follows.

What Means did the Devil find out, or what Instruments did his own Subtlety present him, as fittest and aptest to work his Mischief by? Even the unquiet Vanity of the Woman, so as by Adam's hearkening to the Voice of his Wife, contrary to the express Commandment of the living God, Mankind by that her Is cantation became the subject of Labor, Sorrow, and Death, the Woman being given to Man for a Comforter and Companion, but not for a Counsellor. It is also to be noted by whom the Woman was tempted, even by the most ugly and unworthy of all Beasts, into whom the Devil entered and persued. Secondly, W^hat was the Motive of her Disobedience? Even a desire to know what as most unfitting her Knowledge, an Affection which has ever since remained in all the Posterity of her Sex. Thirdly, What was it that mov'd the Man to yield to her Persuasions, even the same Cause which hath mov'd all Men since to the like Consent, namely, an Unwillingness to grieve her or make her sad, lest she should pine, and be overcome with Sorrow. But if Adam in the state of Perfection and Solomon the Son of David, God's closer Servants, and himself a Man endued with the greatest Wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator by the Persuasion of a fair Love they bare to a Woman, it is so wonderful as lame, that all other Men in succeeding Ages have been allur'd to so many convenient and wicked Practices by the Persuasion of their Wives, or other beloved Darlings, to overcome and shadow many malicious Purposes with a counterfeit Passion of dissimulate Sorrow and Urqueness.

The Motions of the Minds of Lovers are no where so well described, as in the Works of skillful Writers for the Stage. The Scene between Antonia and Carlos, in the second Act of John son's Catiline, is an excellent Picture of the Power of a Lady over her Gallant. The Wench plays with his Affections, and is a Man of all Pices in the World wishes to make a good Figure with his Mistress, upon her upbraiding him with Want of Spirit, he alludes to Enterprizes which he cannot reveal but with the Hazard of his Life. When he is work'd thus far, with a little Flattery of her Opinion of his Gallantry, and desire to know more of it out of her overflowing Fondness to him, he brings to her till his Life is in her Disposal.

When a Man is thus liable to be vanquish'd by the Charms of her he loves, the safest Way is to determine what is proper to be done, but to avoid all Expostulation with her before he executes what he has resolv'd. Women are ever too hard for us upon a Treaty, and one must consider how senseless a thing it is to argue with one whose Looks and Gestures are more prevalent with you, than your Reason and Arguments can be with her. It is a most miserable Slave y to submit to what you disapprove, and give up a Truth for no other Reason, but that you had not Fortitude to support you in asserting it. A Man has enough to do to conquer his own unreasonable Wishes and Desires, but he does that in vain, if he has those of another to gruffy. Let his Pride be in his Wife and Family, let him give them all the Conveniences of Life in such a manner as if he were proud of them, but let it be his own innocent Pride, and not their exorbitant Desires, which are indulg'd by him. In this case all the little Arts imaginable are used to soften a Man's Heart and raise his Passion above his Understanding, but in all Concessions of this Kind, a Man should consider whether the Present he makes flows from his own Love, or the Importunity of his Beloved. If from the latter, he is her Slave; if from the former, her Friend. We laugh it off, and do not weigh this Subjection to Women with that Seriousness which so important a Circumstance deserves. Why was Courage given to Man, if his Wife's Fears are to frustrate it? When this is once indulged, you are no longer her Guardian and Protector, as you were designed by Nature; but, in Compliance to her Weaknesses, you have disabled yourself from avoiding the Misfortunes into which they will lead you both, and you are to see the Hour in which you are to be reproached by her self for that very Compliance to her. It is indeed the most difficult Mystery over our selves we can possibly attain, to resist the Grief of her who charms us; but let the Heart be, be the Anguish never so quick and painful, it is what must be suffered and passed through; if you think to live like a Gentleman, or be conscious to your self that you are a Man of Honesty. The old Argument that Ye do not let me if ye do not let this, which first was used to obtain a Truce, by habitual Success will oblige the unhappy Man who gives Way to it, to resign the Cause even of his Country and his Honour.

² [an] and in first reprint

³ History of the World, Bk. 1. ch. 4, sect. 4

Quis in meritis turba quod amaret in illis?
Ovid

Dear Sir,

FINDING that my last Letter took, I do intend to continue my epistolary Correspondence with thee, on those dear confounded Creatures, Women. Thou knowest, all the little Learning I am Master of is upon that Subject. I never looked in a Book, but for their sakes. I have lately met with two pure Stones for a Spectator, which I am sure will please mightily, if they pass through thy Hands. The first of them I found by chance in an English Book called Hermotus, that lay in my Friend Daffern's Window, as I visited him one Morning. It luckily opened in the Place where I met with the following Account. He tells us that it was the Manner among the Persians to have several Wives in the Kingdom, it which all the young, unmarried Women were annually exposed to Sale. The Men who wanted Wives came hither to provide them selves. Every Woman was given to the highest Bidder, and the Man which she fetched laid aside for the publick Use, to be employed as thou shalt hear by and by. By this means the richest People had the Choice of the Market, and called out all the most extraordinary Beauties. As soon as the Fair was thus picked, the Refuse was to be distributed among the Poor, and among those who could not go to the Price of a Beauty. Several of these married the Unless somebody chanced to think it worth his while to bid for them, in which Case the best Bidder was always the Purchaser. But now you must know, Sir, it happened in Persia as it does in our own Country, that there were as many ugly Women, as Beauties or Agreeables, so that by Consequence, after the Magistrates had put off a great many, there were still a great many that stuck upon their Hands. In order therefore to clear the Market, the Money which the Beauties had sold for, was disposed of among the Ugly, so that a poor Man who could not afford to have a Beauty for his Wife, was forced to take up with a Fortune, the greatest Portion being always given to the most Deformed. To this the Author adds, that every poor Man was forced to live kindly with his Wife, or in case he repented of his Marriage, to return her Portion with her to the next publick Sale.

What I would recommend to thee on this Occasion is to establish such an imaginary Fair in Great Britain. Thou couldst make it very pleasant, by matching Women of Quality with Cobblers and Carmen, or describing Titles and Garters lending off in great Ceremony Shopkeepers and Farmers Daughters. Tho to tell thee the Truth, I am confoundedly afraid that as the love of Money prevails in our Island more than it did in Persia, we should find that some of our greatest Men would chase out the Portions, and rival one another for the richest Piece of Deformity; and that on the contrary, the Torists and Belles would be bought up by extravagant Heirs Gamblers and Spendthrifts. Thou couldst make very pretty Reflections upon this Occasion in Honour of the Persian Politicks who took care, by such Marriages, to beautify the upper part of the Species, and to make the greatest Persons in the Government the most graceful. But this I shall leave to thy judicious Pen.

I have another Story to tell thee, which I likewise met with in a Book. It seems the General of the Tartars, after having laid siege to a strong Town in China, and taken it by Storm, would set to Sale all the Women that were found in it. Accordingly, he put each of them into a Sack and after having thoroughly considered the Value of the Woman who was inclosed, marked the Price that was demanded for her upon the Sack. There were a great Confluence of Chappmen, that resorted from every Part, with a Design to purchase, which they were to do in sight unseen. The Book mentions a Merchant in particular, who observing one of the Sacks to be marked pretty high, bargained for it, and carried it off with him to his House. As he was resting with it upon a half way Bridge, he was resolved to take a Survey of his Purchase. Upon opening the Sack, a little old Woman popped her Head out of it at which the Adventurer was in so great a Rage, that he was going to shoot her out into the River. The old Lady, however, begged him first of all to hear her Story, by which he learned that she was sister to a great Mandarin, who would infallibly make the Fortune of his 'Brother-in Law as soon as he should know to whose Lot she fell Upon which the Merchant again tied her up in his Sack, and carried her to his House, where she proved an excellent Wife, and procured him all the Riches from her Brother that she had promised him

'I fancy, if I was disposed to dream a second time, I could make a tolerable Vision upon this Plan I would suppose all the unmarried Women in London and Westminster brought to Market in Sacks, with their respective Prices on each Sack. The first Sack that is sold is marked with five thousand Pound Upon the opening of it, I find it filled with an admirable Housewife, of an agreeable Countenance The Purchaser, upon hearing her good Qualities, pays down her Price very cheerfully The second I would open, should be a five hundred Pound Sack. The Lady in it, to our surprise, has the Face and Person of a Toast As we are wondering how she came to be set at so low a Price, we hear that she would have been valued at ten thousand Pound, but that the Publick had made those Abatements for her being a Scold I would afterwards find some beautiful, modest, and discreet Woman, that should be the top of the Market and perhaps discover half a dozen Romps tied up together in the same Sack, at one hundred Pound in Head The Prude and the Coquet should be valued at the same Price, tho' the first should go off the better of the two I fancy thou wouldst like such a Vision, had I time to finish it, because, to talk in thy own way, there is a Moral in it. Whatever thou may'st think of it, prythee do not make any of thy queer Apologies for this Letter, as thou didst for my last The Women love a gay lively Fellow, and are never angry at the Raileries of one who is their known Admirer I am always bitter upon them, but well with them

Thine,

O HONEY COMB

Lectorem delectando pariterque monendo—Hor

THERE is nothing which we receive with so much Reluctance as Advice We look upon the Man who gives it us as offering an Affront to our Understanding, and treating us like Children or Idiots. We consider the Instruction as an implicit Censure, and the Zeal which any one shews for our Good on such an Occasion as a Piece of Presumption or Impertinence. The Truth of it is, the Person who pretends to advise, does, in that particular, exercise a Superiority over us, and can have no other Reason for it, but that in comparing us with himself, he thinks us defective either in our Conduct or our Understanding For these Reasons, there is nothing so difficult as the Art of making Advice agreeable and indeed all the Writers, both Ancient and Modern, have distinguished themselves among one another, according to the Perfection at which they have arrived in this Art. How many Devices have been made use of, to render this bitter Potion palatable? Some convey their Instructions to us in the best chosen Words, others in the most harmonious Numbers, some in Points of Wit, and others in short Proverbs

But among all the different Ways of giving Counsel, I think, the finest, and that which pleases the most universally, is Fable, in whatsoever shape it appears If we consider this way of instructing or giving Advice, it excels all others, because it is the least shocking, and the least subject to those Exceptions which I have before mentioned

This will appear to us, if we reflect in the first place, that upon the reading of a Fable we are made to believe we advise ourselves We peruse the Author for the sake of the Story, and consider the Precepts rather as our own Conclusions, than his Instructions The Moral insinuates it self imperceptibly, we are taught by Surprise and become wiser and better unawares In short, by this method a Man is so far over-reached as to think he is directing himself, whilst he is following the Dictates of another, and consequently is not sensible of that which is the most displeasing Circumstance in Advice

In the next place, if we look into human Nature, we shall find that the Mind is never so much pleased, as when she exerts her self in any Action that gives her an Idea of her own Perfections and Abilities This natural Pride and Ambition of the Soul is very much gratified in the reading of a Fable for in Writings of this kind, the Reader comes in for half of the Performance every thing appears to him like a Discovery of his own, he is busied all the while in applying Characters and Circumstances, and is in this respect both a Reader and a Composer It is no wonder therefore that on such Occasions, when the Mind is thus pleased with it self, and amused with its own Discoveries, that it is highly delighted with the Writing which is the occasion of it For this reason the Abraham and *Achutophel*¹ was one of the most popular Poems that ever appeared in English The poetry is indeed very fine, but had it been much finer, it would not have so much pleased, without a plan which gave the Reader an Opportunity of exerting his own Talents.

This oblique manner of giving Advice is so inoffensive, that if we look into ancient Histories, we find the wise Men of old very often chose to give Counsel to their Kings in Fables To omit many which will occur to every one's Memory, there is a pretty Instance of this Nature in a Turkish Tale, which I do not like the worse for that little Oriental Extravagance which is mixed with it.

We are told that the Sultan Mahmoud, by his perpetual Wars abroad, and his Tyranny at home, had filled his Dominions with Ruin and Desolation, and half unpeopled the Persian Empire The Visier to this great Sultan (whether an Hu-mourner or an Enthusiast, we are not informed) pretended to have learned of a certain Dervise to understand the Language of Birds, so that there was not a Bird that could open his Mouth, but the Visier knew what it was he said. As he was one Evening with the Emperor, in their return from Hunting, they saw a couple of Owls upon a Tree that grew near an old Wall out of an Heap of Rubbish. I would fain know, says the Sultan, what those two Owls are saying to one another, listen to their Discourse, and give me an account of it. The Visier approached the Tree pretending to be very attentive to the two Owls. Upon his return to the Sultan, Sir, says he, I have heard part of their Conversation, but dare not tell you what it is. The Sultan would not be satisfied with such an Answer, but forced him to repeat word for word every thing the Owls had said. You must know then, said the Visier, that one of these Owls has a Son, and the other a Daughter, betwixt whom they are now upon a Treaty of Marriage. The Father of the Son said to the Father of the Daughter, in my hearing, Brother, I consent to this Marriage, provided you will settle upon your Daughter fifty runned Villages for her Portion. To which the Father of the Daughter replied. Instead of fifty I will give her five hundred, if you please. God grant a long Life to Sultan Mahmoud whilst he reigns over us, we shall never want runned Villages.

The Story says, the Sultan was so touched with this Fable, that he rebuilt the Towns and Villages which had been destroyed, and from that time forward consulted the Good of his People.

To fill up my Paper I shall add a most ridiculous piece of natural Magic, which was taught by no less a Philosopher than Democritus, namely, that if the Blood of certain Birds, which he mentioned, were mixed together, it would produce a Serpent of such a wonderful Virtue, that whoever did eat it should be skilful in the Language of Birds, and understand every thing they said to one another. Whether the Dervise above-mentioned might not have eaten such a Serpent, I shall leave to the Determinations of the Learned. O

Afflata est numme quando Jam propiore Dei ———— Virg

THE following Letter comes to me from that excellent Man in Holy Orders, whom I have mentioned more than once as one of that Society who assist me in my Speculations. It is a Thought in Sickness, and of a very serious Nature, for which Reason I give it a place in the Paper of this Day.

SIR,

The Indisposition which has long hung upon me, is at last grown to such [a] Head, that it

¹ Pilpay's Fables ² [an] and in first reprint must quickly make an End of me, or of it self. You may imagine, that whilst I am in this bad state of Health, there are none of your Works which I read with greater Pleasure than your Saturday's Papers. I should be very glad if I could furnish you with any Hints for that Day's Entertainment. Were I able to dress up several Thoughts of a serious nature, which have made great Impressions on my Mind during a long time of Sickness, they might not be an improper Entertainment for that Occasion.

Among all the Reflections which usually rise in the Mind of a sick Man, who has Time and Inclination to consider his approaching End, there is none more natural than that of his going to appear Naked and Unbodied before Him who made him. When a Man considers, that as soon as the vital Union is dissolved, he shall see that Supreme Being, whom he now contemplates at a Distance, and only in his Works or to speak more philosophically, when by some Faculty in the Soul he shall apprehend the Divine Being, and be more sensible of his Presence, than we are now of the Presence of any Object which the Eye beholds, a Man must be lost in Carelessness and Stupidity, who is not alarmed at such a Thought. Dr Sherlock, in his excellent Treatise upon Death has represented, in very strong, and lively Colours, the State of the Soul in its first Separation from the Body, with regard to that invisible World which every where surrounds us, tho' we are not able to discover it through this grosser World of Matter which is accommodated to our Senses in this Life. His Words are as follow.

That Death, which is our leaving this World, is nothing else but our putting off these Bodies, teaches us, that it is only our Union to these Bodies, which intercepts the sight of the other World. The other World is not at such a distance from us, as we may imagine, the Throne of God indeed is at a great remove from this Earth, above the third Heavens, where he displays his Glory to those blessed Spirits which encompass his Throne, but as soon as we step out of these Bodies, we step into the other World, which is not so properly another World, (for there is the same Heaven and Earth still) as a new state of Life. To live in these Bodies is to live in this World, to live out of them is to remove into the next. For while our Souls are confined to these Bodies, as I can look only thro' these material Casements, nothing but what is material can affect us, nay, nothing but what is so gross, that it can reflect Light, and convey the Shapes and Colours of Things with it to the Eye. So that though within this visible World, there be a more glorious Scene of Things than what appears to us, we perceive nothing at all of it, for this Veil of Flesh parts the visible and the invisible World. But when we put off these Bodies, there are new and surprising Wonders present themselves to our View, when these material Spectacles are taken off, the Soul, with its own naked Eyes sees what was invisible before. And then we are in the other World, when we can see it, and con

Mr SPECTATOR,

I CAME home a little later than usual the other Night, and not finding my self inclined to sleep, I took up Virgil to divert me till I should be more disposed to Rest. He is the Author whom I always chuse on such Occasions, no one writing in so divine, so harmonious, nor so equal a Strain, which leaves the Mind composed, and softened into an agreeable Melancholy, the Temper in which, of all others, I chuse to close the Day. The Passages I turned to were those beautiful Raptures in his Georgicks, where he professes himself entirely given up to the Muses, and smit with the Love of Poetry, passionately wishing to be transported to the cool Shades and Retreatments of the Mountain Horrus. I clos'd the Book and went to Bed. What I had just before been reading made so strong an Impression on my Mind, that I fancy seem'd almost to fulfil to me the Wish of Virgil, in presenting to me the following Vision. Methought I was on a sudden plac'd in the Plains of Bacotia, where at the end of the Horizon I saw the Mountain Parnassus rising before me. The Prospect was of so large an Extent, that I had long wonder'd about to find a Path which should directly lead me to it. I did not see at some distance a Grove of Trees, which in a Plain that had nothing else remarkable enough in it to fix my Sight, immediately determin'd me to go thither. When I arriv'd at it, I found it parted out into a great Number of Walks and Alleys, which often widened into beautiful Openings, as Circles or Ovals, set round with Yews and Cypresses, with Niches, Grotto's, and Caves placed on the Sides, encompassed with Ivy. There was no Sound to be heard in the whole Place, but only that of a gentle Breeze passing over the Leaves of the Forest, every thing beside was buried in a profound Silence. I was captivated with the Beauty and Retirement of the Place, and never so much, before that Hour was pleas'd with the Enjoyment of my self. I indulg'd the Humour, and suffer'd my self to wander without Choice or Design. At length, at the end of a Range of Trees, I saw three Figures seated on a Bank of Moss, with a silent Brook creeping at their Feet. I ador'd them as the tutelar Divinities of the Place, and stood still to take a particular View of each of them. The Middlemost, whose Name was Solitude, sat with her Arms across each other, and seem'd rather pensive and wholly taken up with her own Thoughts, than any ways grieved or displeas'd. The only Companions which she admitted unto that Retirement, was the Goddess Silence, who sat on her right Hand with her Finger on her Mouth, and on her left Contentment, with her Eyes fix'd upon the Heavens. Before her lay a celestial Globe, with several Schemes of Mathematical Theorems. She presented my Speech with the greatest Affability in the World. Fear not, said she, I know your Request before you speak. You would be led to the Mountain of the Muses, the only way to it lies thro' this Place, and no one is so often employ'd in conducting Persons thither as my self. When she had thus spoken, she rose from her Seat and I immediately plac'd my self under her Direction. Out whilst I pass'd through the Grove, I could not help enquiring of her who were the Persons admitted into that sweet Retirement. Surely, said I, there can nothing enter here but Virtue and virtuous Thoughts. The whole Wood seems design'd for the Reception and Reward of such Persons as have spent their Lives according to the Dictates of their Conscience and the Commands of the Gods. You imagine right, said she, assure your self this Place was at first designed for no other. Such it continu'd to be in the Reign of Satan, when none enter'd here but holy Priests, Deliverers of their Country from Oppression and Tyranny, who repos'd themselves here after their Labours, and those whom the Study and Love of Wisdom had fitted for divine Conversation. But now it is become no less dangerous than it was before. Desirable Vice has learn'd so to mimic Virtue, that it often creeps in hither under its Disguise. See there! just before you, Revenge stalking by, habited in the Robe of Honour. Observe not far from him Ambition standing alone if you ask him his Name, he will tell you it is Emulation or Glory. But the most frequent Intruder we have is Idleness, who succeeds now the Deity to whom in better Days this Grove was entirely devoted. Virtuous Love, with Hymen, and the Graces attending him, once reign'd over this happy Place, a whole Train of Virtues waited on him, and no dishonourable Thought durst presume for Admittance. But now! how is the whole Prospect chang'd? and how seldom renew'd by some few who dare despise sordid Wealth and imagine themselves fit Companions for so charming a Divinity?

The Goddess had no sooner said thus, but we were arriv'd at the utmost Boundaries of the Wood, which lay contiguous to a Plain that ended at the Foot of the Mountain. Here I kept close to my Guide, being solicited by several Phantomes, who assur'd me they would shew me a nearer Way to the Mountain of the Muses. Among the rest Vanity was extremely importunate, having deluded infinite Numbers whom I saw wandering at the Foot of the Hill. I turned away from this despicable Troop with Disdain, and addressing my self to my Guide, told her, that as I had some Hopes I should be able to reach up part of the Ascent, so I despaired of having Strength enough to attain the Plain on the Top. But being inform'd by her that it was impossible to stand upon the Sides, and that if I did not proceed onwards, I should irrecoverably fall down to the lowest Verge, I resolv'd to hazard any Labour and Hardship in

'the Attempt So great a desire had I of enjoying 'the Satisfaction I hoped to meet with at the End 'of my Enterprize !

'There were two Paths, which led up by different 'Ways to the Summit of the Mountain, the 'one was guarded by the Genius which presides
'over the Moment of our Births He had it in 'charge to examine the several Pretensions of 'those who desired a Pass that Way, but to admit
'none excepting those only on whom Melpomene
'had look'd with a propitious Eye at the 'Hour of their Nativity The other Way was 'guarded by Diligence, to whom many of those 'Persons apply'd who had met with a Denial the 'other Way, but he was so tedious in granting 'their Request, and indeed after Admittance the 'Way was so very intricate and laborious, that 'many after they had made some Progress, chose 'rather to return back than proceed, and very few
'persisted so long as to arrive at the End they 'proposed. Besides these two Paths, which at 'length severally led to the Top of the Mountain,
'there was a third made up of these two, which a 'little after the Entrance joined in one This 'carried those happy Few, whose good Fortune
'it was to find it, directly to the Throne of Apollo
'I don't know whether I should even now have 'had the Resolution to have demanded Entrance
'at either of these Doors, had I not seen a 'Peasant like Man (followed by a numerous and 'lovely Train of Youths of both Sexes) insist upon
'Entrance for all whom he led up He put me
'in mind of the Country Clown who is painted in 'the Map for leading Prince Eugene over the 'Alps He had a Bundle of Papers in his Hand,
'and producing several, which he said, were given 'to him by Hands which he knew Apollo would 'allow as Passes, among which, methoughts, I 'saw some of my own Writing, the whole Assembly
'was admitted, and gave, by their Presence,
'a new Beauty and Pleasure to these happy
'Mansions I found the Man did not pretend to 'enter himself, but served as a kind of Forester 'in the Lawns to direct Passengers who by their 'own Merit, or Instructions he procured for them,
'had Virtue enough to travel that way I looked 'very attentively upon this kind homely Benefactor,
'and forgive me, Mr SPECTATOR, if I own
'to you I took him for your self We were no 'sooner entered, but we were sprinkled three 'times with the Water of the Fountain Aganippe,
'which had Power to deliver us from all Harms,
'but only Envy, which reached even to the End 'of our Journey We had not proceeded far in 'the middle Path when we arrived at the Summit
'of the Hill, where there immediately appeared 'to us two Figures, which extremely engaged
'my Attention the one was a young
'Nymph in the Prime of her Youth and Beauty
'she had Wings on her Shoulders and Feet, and 'was able to transport herself to the most distant
'Regions in the smallest Space of Time She was 'continually varying her Dress, sometimes into
'the most natural and becoming Habits in the 'World, and at others into the most wild and 'freakish Garb that can be imagined There 'stood by her a Man full aged, and of great 'Gravity, who corrected her Inconsistencies, by

'shewing them in his Mirror, and still flung her 'affected and unbecoming Ornaments down the 'Mountain, which fell in the Plain below, and 'were gathered up and wore with great Satisfaction
'by those that inhabited it. The Name of the 'Nymph was Fancy, the Daughter of Liberty,
'the most beautiful of all the Mountain-Nymphs
'The other was Judgment, the Offspring of 'Time, and the only Child he acknowledged to 'be his A Youth, who sat upon a Throne just 'between them, was their genuine Offspring his 'Name was Wisdom, and his Seat was composed 'of the Works of the most celebrated Authors I 'could not but see with a secret Joy, that though
'the Greeks and Romans made the Majority, yet
'our own Countrymen were the next both in 'Number and Dignity I was now at Liberty
'to take a full Prospect of that delightful Region
'I was inspired with new Vigour and Life, and 'saw every thing in nobler and more pleasing
'Views than before, I breathed a purer Air than in 'a Sky which was a continued Azure, gilded with 'perpetual Sun shine The two Summits of the 'Mountain rose on each Side, and formed in the 'midst a most delicious Vale, the Habitation of 'the Muses, and of such as had composed Works
'worthy of Immortality Apollo was seated upon 'a Throne of Gold, and for a Canopy in aged 'Laurel spread its Boughs and its Shade over his 'Head His Bow and Quiver lay at his Feet
'He held his Harp in his Hand, whilst the Muses
'round about him celebrated with Hymns his 'Victory over the Serpent Python, and sometimes 'sung in softer Notes the Loves of Leucothoe and 'Daphnis Homer, Virgil, and Milton were 'seated the next to them Behind were a great 'Number of others, among whom I was surprized
'to see some in the Habit of Laplanders, who,
'notwithstanding the Uncouthness of their Dress,
'had lately obtained a Place upon the Mountain
'I saw Pindar walking all alone, no one daring
'to accost him, till Cowley join'd himself to him,
'but growing weary of one who almost walked 'him out of breath, he left him for Horace and 'Anacreon, with whom he seemed infinitely delighted

'A little further I saw another Groupe of Figures,
'I made up to them, and found it was 'Socrates dictating to Xenophon, and the Spirit 'of Plato, but most of all, Musæus had the 'greatest Audience about him I was at too 'great a Distance to hear what he said, or to discover 'the Faces of his Hearers only I thought
'I now perceived Virgil, who had joined them,
'and stood in a Posture full of Admiration at the 'Harmony of his Words

'Lastly, At the very Brink of the Hill I saw
'Boccalini sending Dispatches to the World
'below of what happened upon Parnassus, but 'I perceived he did it without leave of the Muses,
'and by stealth, and was unwilling to have them
'revised by Apollo I could now from this Height 'and serene Sky behold the infinite Cares and 'Anxieties with which Mortals below sought out 'their way through the Maze of Life I saw the 'Path of Virtue lie strait before them, whilst Interest,
'or some malicious Demon, still hurry'd
'them out of the Way I was at once touched

'with Pleasure at my own Happiness, and Com'passion at the sight of their inextricable Errors.
'Here the two contending Passions rose so high,
'that they were inconsistent with the sweet Re-
'pose I enjoy'd, and waking with a sudden start,
'the only Consolation I could admit of for my 'Loss, was the Hopes that this Relation of my 'Dream will not disperse you.'

*Pudet me et misereat qui harum moros cantabat

Mouisse frustra* Ter

MR SPECTATOR,
I AM obliged to you for printing the Account of a Coquet who disturbed a sober Congregation in the City of London That Intelligence ended at her taking Coach and bidding the Driver go where he knew I could not leave her so, but dogged her, as hard as she drove, to Paul's Church-Yard, where there was a Stop of Coaches attending Company coming out of the Cathedral. This gave me opportunity to hold up a Crown to her Coachman, who gave me the Signal, that he would hurry on, and make no Haste, as you know the Way is when they favour a Chaise. By his many Kind Blunders, driving against other Coaches, and slipping off some of his Tackles, I could keep up with him, and lodged my fine Lady in the Pinnish of St James's. As I guessed when I first saw her at Church her Business is to win Hearts and throw 'em away, regarding nothing but the Triumph I have had the Happiness, by tracing her through all with whom I heard she was acquainted, to find one who was intimate with a Friend of mine, and to be introduced to her Notice. I have made so good use of my Time as to procure from that Intimate of hers one of her Letters, which she writ to her when in the Country. This Epistle of her own may serve to turn the World against her in ordinary Life, as mine, I hope, did those, who shall behold her at Church. The Letter was written last Winter to the Lady who gave it me and I doubt not but you will find it the Soul of an happy self loving Dame, that takes all the Admiration she can meet with, and returns none of it in Love to her Admirers

Dear Jenny,

"I am glad to find you are likely to be dispos'd
"of in Marriage so much to your Approbation as Birth of the Person to whom the Letters were written, the Writer of them is misinformed.

Immortale odium et nunquam sanabile vulnus Inde furor vulgo, quod Numina vicinorum Odit uterque locus, quum solos credit habendos Esse Deos quos ipse colat—— Juv

OF all the monstrous Passions and Opinions which have crept into the World, there is none so wonderful as that those who profess the common Name of Christians, should pursue each other with Rancour and Hatred for Differences in their Way of following the Example of their Saviour It seems so natural that all who pursue the Steps of any Leader should form themselves after his Manners, that it is impossible to account for Effects so different from what we might expect from those who profess themselves Followers of the highest Pattern of Meekness and Chanty, but by ascribing such Effects to the Ambition and Corruption of those who are so audacious, with Souls full of Fury, to serve at the Altars of the God of Peace

The Massacres to which the Church of Rome has animated the ordinary People, are dreadful Instances of the Truth of this Observation, and whoever reads the History of the Irish Rebellion, and the Cruelties which ensued thereupon, will be sufficiently convinced to what Rage poor Ignorants may be worked up by those who profess Holiness, and become Incendiaries, and under the Dispensation of Grace, promote Evils abhorrent to Nature

This Subject and Catastrophe, which deserves so well to be remarked by the Protestant World, will, I doubt not, be considered by the Reverend and Learned Prelate that Preaches to-morrow before many of the Descendants of those who perished on that lamentable Day, in a manner suitable to the Occasion, and worthy his own great Virtue and Eloquence

I shall not dwell upon it any further, but only transcribe out of a little Tract, called, The Christian Hero published in 1701, what I find there in Honour of the renowned Hero William III who rescued that Nation from the Repetition of the same Distresses His late Majesty, of glorious Memory, and the most Christian King, are considered at the Conclusion of that Treatise as Heads of the Protestant and Roman Catholick World in the following Manner

'There were not ever, before the Entrance of 'the Christian Name into the World, Men who 'have maintained a more renowned Carriage, than
 'the two great Rivals who possess the full Fame
 'of the present Age, and will be the Theme and 'Examination of the future. They are exactly 'form'd by Nature for those Ends to which 'Heaven seems to have sent them amongst us
 'Both animated with a restless Desire of Glory, but 'pursue it by different Means, and with different 'Motives To one it consists in an extensive undis'puted Empire over his Subjects, to the other in 'their rational and voluntary Obedience One's 'Happiness is founded in their want of Power, the other's in their want of Desire to oppose him. The one enjoys the Summit of Fortune with the Luxury of a Persian, the other with the Moderation of a Spartan. One is made to oppress, the other to relieve the Oppressed. The one is satisfy'd with the Pomp and Ostentation of Power to prefer and debase his Inferiours: the other delighted only with the Cause and Foundation of it to cherish and protect 'em. To one therefore Religion is but a convenient Disguise, to the other a vigorous Motive of Action.

'For without such Ties of real and solid Honour, there is no way of forming a Monarch, but after the Machiavillian Scheme, by which a Prince must ever seem to have all Virtues, but really to be Master of none, but is to be liberal, merciful and just, only as they serve his Interests. While, with the noble Art of Hypocrisy, I might would be to be extended and new Conquests made by new Devices, by which prompt Address his Creatures might insensibly give Law in the Business of Life, by leading Men in the Intertainment of it.

'Thus when Words and Show are apt to pass for the substantial things they are only to express, there would need no more to enslave a Country but to adorn a Court for while every Man's Vanity makes him believe himself capable of becoming Luxury, Enjoyments are a ready But for Sufferings, and the Hopes of Preferment Invitations to Servitude, which Slavery would be colour'd with all the Agreements, as they call it, imaginable. The noblest Arts and Artists, the finest Pens and most elegant Minds jointly employ'd to set it off, with the various Embellishments of sumptuous Intertainments, charming Assemblies, and polished Discourses and those apostate Abilities of Men, the adored Monarch might profusely and skillfully encourage, while they flatter his Virtue, and gild his Vice as so high a rate, that he, without Scorn of the one, or Love of the other, would alternately and occasionally use both. So that his Bounty should support him in his Rapines, his Mercy in his Cruelties.

'Nor is it to give things a more severe Look than is natural, to suppose such must be the Consequences of a Prince's having no other Pursuit than that of his own Glory: for, if we consider an Infant born into the World, and beholding it self the mightiest thing in it, it self the present Admiration and future Prospect of a swarming People, who profess themselves great or mean, according to the Figure he is to make amongst them, what I may would not be debauched to believe they were but what they professed themselves, his mere Creatures, and use them as such by purchasing with their Lives a boundless Renown, which he, for want of a more just Prospect, would place in the Number of his Slaves, and the Extent of his Territories? Such undoubtedly would be the tragical Effects of a Prince's living with no Religion, which are not to be surprised but by his having a false one.

'If Ambition were spirited with Zeal, what would follow, but that his People should be converted into an Army, whose Swords can make Right in Power, and solve Controversy in Battle? And if Men should be stiff-neck'd to the Doctrine of that visible Church, let them be contented with an Oar and a Churn, in the midst of Stripes and Anguish, to contemplate on him, whose Yoke is easy, and whose Burden is light.

'With a Tyranny begun on his own Subjects, and Indignation that others draw their Breath independent of hisrown or Smile, why should he not proceed to the Seizure of the World? And if nothing but the Thirst of Sway were the Motive of his Actions, why should Treaties be other than mere Words, or solemn national Compacts be any thing but an Halt in the March of that Army, who are never to lay down their Arms, till all Men are reduc'd to the necessity of hanging their Lives on his wayward Will, who might supinely and at leisure expropriate his own Sins by other Men's Sufferings, while he daily meditates new Slaughter, and new Conquest?

'For mere Man when giddy with unbridled Power is an insatiate Idol not to be appeased with Myrrours offer'd to his Pride, which may be puff'd up by the Adulation of a base and prostrate World, into an Opinion that he is something more than human, by being something less. And, alas, what is there that mortal Man will not believe of himself, when complimented with the Attributes of God? Can he then conceive Thoughts of a Power as Omnipotent as his? But should there be such a Race of Mankind now upon Earth, have our Sins so far provoked Heaven that we are left utterly naked to his Fury? Is there no Power, no Leader, no Genius, that can conduct and animate us to our Death or our Defence? Yes, our great God never gave one to reign by his Permission, but he gave to another also to reign by his Grace.

'All the Circumstances of the illustrious Life of our Prince, seem to have conspired to make him the Check and Bridle of Tyranny for his Mind has been strengthened and confirmed by one continual Struggle, and Heaven has educated him by Adversity to a quick Sense of the Distresses and Miseries of Mankind, which he was born to redress. In just scorn of the trivial Glories and light Ostentations of Power, that glorious Instrument of Providence moves, like that, in a steady, calm, and silent Course, independent either of Applause or Calumny, which renders him, if not in a political yet in a moral, a philosophick, an heroic, and a Christian Sense, an absolute Monarch who satisfy'd with this unchangeable, just, and ample Glory, must needs turn all his Regards from himself to the Service of others, for he begins his Enterprize with his

¹ The extracts from very near the close of Steele's Christian Hero. At this part a few lines have been omitted. In the original the paragraph closed thus: 'the Entertaiment of it, and making their great Monarch the Fountain of all their delicate and refined, and his Court the Model for Opinions in Pleasure, as well as the Pattern in Dress, which might prevail so far upon an undiscerning world as (to accomplish it or its approaching Slavery) to make it receive a superfluous Babble for an Universal Language.'

'own Share in the Success of them for Integrity bears in it self its Reward, nor can that which depends not on Event ever know Disappointment

'With the undoubted Character of a glorious Captain, and (what he much more values than the most splendid Titles) that of a sincere and honest Man, he is the Hope and Stay of Europe, an universal Good not to be engrossed by us only, for distant Potentates implore his Friendship, and injur'd Empires court his Assistance. He rules the World, not by an Invasion of the People of the Earth, but the Address of its Princes: and if that World should be again rous'd from the Repose which his prevailing Arms had given it, why should we not hope that there is an Almighty, by whose Influence the terrible Enemy that thinks himself prepar'd for Battel, may find he is but ripe for Destruction? and that there may be in the Womb of Time great Incidents, which may make the Catastrophe of a prosperous Life as unfortunate as the particular Scenes of it were successful? For there does not want a skilful Eye and resolute Arm to observe and grasp the Occasion. A Prince, who from

WE last night received a Piece of ill News at our Club, which very sensibly afflicted every one of us. I question not but my Readers themselves will be troubled at the hearing of it. To keep them no longer in Suspence, Sir ROGER DE COVERLY is dead. He departed this Life it his

Here Steele abruptly breaks with 'Fuit Illum'—the glory has departed—on the sentence 'A Prince who from just Notion of his Duty to that Being to whom he must be accountable, has in the Service of his Fellow Creatures a noble Contempt of Pleasures, and Patience of Labours, to whom us Hereditary to be the Guardian, to Asserter of the native Rights and Liberties of Mankind.' A few more clauses to the sentence formed the summary of William's character before the book closed with a prayer that Heaven would guard his important life

In No 1 of the Bee (for February, 1733) Eustace Budgell who set up that publication and who probably was the intimate friend of Addison to whom he there refers, said of Sir Roger de Coverley, Mr Addison was so fond of this character that a little before he laid down the Spectator (foreseeing that some nimble gentleman would catch up his pen the moment he quitted it) he said to an intimate friend, with a certain warmth in his expression which he was not often guilty of, By God, I'll kill Sir Roger, that nobody else may murder him. Accordingly the House in the Country, after a few Weeks Sickness Sir ANDREW FREEPORT has a Letter from one of his Correspondents in those Parts, that informs him the old Man caught a Cold at the County-Sessions, as he was very warmly promoting an Address of his own penning, in which he succeeded according to his Wishes. But this Particular comes from a Whig-Justice of Peace, who was always Sir ROGER's Enemy and Antagonist. I have Letters both from the Chaplain and Captain Sentry which mention nothing of it, but are filled with many Particulars to the Honour of the good old Man. I have likewise a Letter from the Butler, who took so much care of me last Summer when I was at the Knight's House. As my Friend the Butler mentions, in the Simplicity of his Heart, several Circumstances the other have passed over in Silence, I shall give my Reader a Copy of his Letter, without any Alteration or Diminution

Honoured Sir,

Knowing that you was my old Master's good Friend, I could not forbear sending you the melancholy News of his Death, which has afflicted the whole Country, as well as his poor Servants, who loved him, I may say, better than we did our Lives. I am afraid he caught his Death the last County Sessions, where he would go to see Justice done to a poor Widow Woman, and her Fatherless Children, that had been wronged by a neighbouring Gentleman for you know, Sir, my good Master was always the poor Man's friend. Upon his coming home, the first Complaint he made was, that he had lost his Rorst-Beef Stomach, not being able to touch a Sirloin, which was served up according to Custom and you know he used to take great Delight in it. From that time forward he grew worse and worse, but still kept a good Heart to the last. Indeed we were once in great [Hope] of his Recovery, upon a kind Message that was sent him from the Widow Lady whom he had made love to the Forty last Years of his Life, but this only proved a Light'ning before Death. He has bequeathed to this Lady, as a token of his Love, a great Pearl Necklace, and a Couple of Silver Bracelets set with Jewels, which belonged to my good old Lady his Mother. He has bequeathed the fine white Gelding, that he used to ride a hunting upon, to his Chaplain, because he thought he would be kind to him, and has left you all his Books. He has, moreover, bequeathed to the Chaplain a very pretty Fencement with good Lands about it. It being a very cold Day when he made his Will, he left for Mourning, to every Man in the Parish, a great whole Spectator No 517 consists of nothing but an account of the old knight's death, and some moving circumstances which attended it. Steele had by this date resolv'd on bringing his Spectator to a close, and Addison's paper on the death of Sir Roger, the first of several which are to dispose of all members of the Spectator's Club and break up the Club itself, was the first clear warning to the public that he had such an intention

'Frize Coat, and to every Woman a black Riding-hood. It was a most moving Sight to see him take leave of his poor Servants, commending us all for our Fidelity, whilst we were not able to speak a Word for weeping. As we most of us are grown Gray-headed in our Dear Master's Service, he has left us Pensions and Legacies, which we may live very comfortably upon, the remaining part of our Days. He has bequeath'd a great deal more in Charity, which is not yet come to my Knowledge, and it is peremptorily said in the Parish, that he has left Money to build a Steeple to the Church for he was heard to say some time ago that if he lived two Years longer, Coventry's Church should have a Steeple to it. The Chaplain tells every body that he made a very good End and never speaks of him without Tears. He was buried according to his own Directions among the Family of the Coventry's, on the Left Hand of his Father Sir Isidore. The Coffin was carried by Six of his Gentlemen, and the Pall held up by Six of the Quorum. The whole Parish follow'd the Corps with heavy Hearts, and in their Mourning Suits. The Men in Frize and the Women in Riding Hoods. Captain Sentry my Master's Nephew, has taken Possession of the Hall House, and the whole Estate. When my old Master saw him a little before his Death, he shook him by the Hand and wished him Joy of the Estate which was falling to him, desiring him only to make good Use of it and to pay the several Legacies, and the Gifts of Charity which he told him he had left as Quitt-rents upon the Estate. The Captain truly seems a courteous Man, though he says but little. He makes much of those whom my Master loved, and shews great kindness to the old House dog that you know my poor Master was so fond of. It would have gone to your Heart to have heard the Mourn the dumb Creature made on the Day of my Master's Death. He has ne'er joyed himself since no more has any of us. 'Twas the melancholiest Day for the poor People that ever happened in Worcestershire. This being all from,

Honoured Sir,
Your most Sorrowful Servant,
Edward Discant

P. S. My Master desired, some Week before he died, that a Book which comes up to you by the Carrier should be given to Sir Andrew. I rec'd it, in his Name.

This Letter, notwithstanding the poor Butler's Manner of writing it, gave us such an Idea of our good old Friend, that upon the reading of it there was not a dry Eye in the Club. Sir Andrew opening the Book, found it to be a Collection of Acts of Parliament. There was in particular the Act of Uniformity, with some Passages in it marked by Sir Roger's own Hand. Sir Andrew found that they related to two or three Points, which he had disputed with Sir Roger the last time he appeared at the Club. Sir Andrew who would have been merry at such an Incident on another Occasion, at the sight of the old Man's Hand writing burst into Tears and put the Book into his Pocket. Captain Sentry informs me, that the Knight has left Rings and Mourning for every one in the Club.

THIS being a Day of Business with me, I must make the present Intertainment like a Treat at an House warming, out of such Presents as have been sent me by my Guests. The first Dish which I serve up is a Letter come fresh to my Hand.

MR. SPECTATOR,

'Tis with inexpressible Sorrow that I hear of the Death of good Sir Roger, and do heartily condole with you upon so melancholy an Occasion. I think you ought to have blacken'd the Edges of a Paper which brought us so ill News, and to have had it stamp'd likewise in Black. It is expected of you that you should write his Epitaph, and, if possible, fill his Place in the Club with as worthy and diverting a Member. I question not but you will receive many Recommendations from the publick of such as will appear Candidates for that Post.

'Since I am talking of Death, and have mentioned in Epitaph, I must tell you, Sir, that I have made discovery of a Church-Yard in which I believe you might spend an Afternoon, with great Pleasure to your self and to the Publick. It belongs to the Church of Stebon-Heath, commonly called Stepney. Whether or no it be that the People of that Parish have a particular Genius for an Epitaph, or that there be some Poet among them who undertakes that Work by the Great I can't tell, but there are more remarkable Inscriptions in that place than in any other I have met with, and I may say without Vanity, that there is not a Gentleman in England that better read in Tomb stones than my self, my Studies having had very much in Church-Yards. I shall beg leave to send you a Couple of Epitaphs for a Sample of those I have just now mentioned. They are written in a different manner the first being in the diffus'd and luxuriant, the second in the close contracted Style. The first has much of the Simple and Pathetick the second is something Light, but Nervous. The first is thus

*Here Thomas Sapper lies interr'd Ah why I Born in New England, did in London dye, Was the third Son of Engl's, begot upon His Mother Martha by his Father John Much for our'd by his Prince he 'gan to be,
But 'tis by Death at the Age of Twenty Three Fatal to him 'was that we Sirrill fox name,*

Of the two letters which form this number the second is by John Henley, known afterwards as 'Orator Henley,' of whom see a note to No. 396

*By which his Mother as d to Brethren came Also to breathe their last nine Years before,
And now have left their Father to deplore
The loss of all his Children, with his Wife, Who was the Joy and Comfort of his Life*

The Second is as follows

Here lies the Body of Daniel Saul, Spittle fields Weaver, and that's all

'I will not dismiss you, whilst I am upon this 'Subject, without sending a short Epitaph which 'I once met with, though I cannot possibly recol'lect the Place The I thought of it is serious, and 'in my Opinion, the finest that I ever met with
'upon this Occasion You know, Sir, it is usual,
'after having told us the Name of the Person who 'lies interr'd to lurch out into his Praises Thus 'Epitaph takes a quite contrary Turn, having 'been made by the Person himself some time be'fore his Death

The following Letter is dated from Cambridge

'SIR,

'Having lately read among your Speculations, an 'Essay upon Physiognomy, I cannot but think 'that if you made a Visit to this ancient Uni'versity, you might receive very considerable 'Lights upon that Subject, there being scarce a 'young Fellow in it who does not give certain
'Indications of his particular Humour and Dispo'sition conformable to the Rules of that Art. In 'Courts and Cities every body lays a Constraint
'upon his Countenance, and endeavours to look 'like the rest of the World but the Youth of 'this Place, having not yet so formed themselves by 'Conversation, and the Knowledge of the World,
'give their Limbs and Features their full Play,

'As you have considered Human Nature in all 'its Lights, you must be extremely well apprized,
'that there is a very close Correspondence be'tween the outward and the inward Man, that 'scarce the least Drawing, the least Parturient
'towards a Thought can be stirring in the Mind
'of Man, without producing a suitable Revolu'tion in his Exteriors, which will easily dis'cover it self to an Adept in the Theory of 'the Phil Hence it is, that the intrinsick
'Worth and Merit of a Son of Alma Mater
'is ordinarily calculated from the Cast of his
'Visage, the Contour of his Person, the Me'chanism of his Dress, the Disposition of his 'Limbs, the Manner of his Gait and Air, with a 'number of Circumstances of equal Consequence

'and Information The Practitioners in this Art
'often make use of a Gentleman's Eyes to give 'them light into the Posture of his Brains, take a 'Handle from his Nose, to judge of the Size of his 'Intellects, and interpret the over much Visibility,
'and Pertness of one's Eye, as an infallible mark of 'Reprobation, and a Sign the Owner of so saucy
'a Member fears neither God nor Man In con'formity to this Scheme, a contracted Brow, a
'lumpish down cast Look, a sober sedate Pice,
'with both Hands danglings quiet and steddily in 'Lines exactly parallel to each lateral Pocket
'of the Galligallians, is Logic, Metaphysics
'and Mathematics in Perfection So likewise
'the Belles Lettres are typified by a Gaunter in
'the Gate a Fall of one Wing of the Pernike
'backward, an Insertion of one Strand in the Gobb,
'and a negligent Sliding of the other, with a Pinch
'of right and fine Barcelona between I finger and 'Thumb, a due Quantity of the same upon the 'upper Lip, and a Noddle Crise laden with Pul'vil Again, a grave solemn talking Pice is 'Heroic Poetry, and Polucl's in Unequal one,
'a Genius for the Ode, and the modern Ballad
'and an open Brevet, with an audacious Display 'of the Holland Shirt, is construed a fatal Tende'ncy to the Art Military

'I might be much larger upon these Hints, but 'I know whom I write to If you can graft any 'Speculation upon them, or turn them to the Ad'vantage of the Persons concerned in them, you 'will do a Work very becoming the British Spec- 'tator, and oblige

THOUGH there is a great deal of Pleasure in contemplating the material World, by which I mean that System of Bodies into which Nature has so curiously wrought the Mass of dead Matter, with the several Relations which those Bodies bear to one another there is still, methinks, something more wonderful and surprising in Con-templations on the World of Life, by which I mean all those Animals with which every Part of the Universe is furnished The Material World is only the Shell of the Universe The World of Life are its Inhabitants

If we consider those parts of the Material World which lie the nearest to us, and are therefore subject to our Observations and Enquiries, it is amazing to consider the Infinity of Animals with which it is stocked Every part of Matter is peopled Every green Leaf swarms with Inhabitants. There is scarce a single Humour in the Body of a Man, or of any other Animal, in which our Glasses do not discover Myriads of living Creatures The Surface of Animals is also

¹ The European Magazine for July, 1787, says that the exact copy of this Epitaph, which is on a

Qualis erant, dies ista hæc cum venerit, scries*

covered with other Animals, which are in the same manner the Basis of other Animals that live upon it, viz, we find in the most solid Bodies, as in Marble it self, innumerable Cells and Cavities that are crowded with such imperceptible Inhabitants as are too little for the naked Eye to discover. On the other hand, if we look into the more bulky parts of Nature, we see the Seas, Lakes and Rivers teeming with numberless kinds of living Creatures. We find every Mountain and Marsh, Wilderness and Wood, plentifully stocked with Birds and Beasts, and every part of Matter affording proper Necessaries and Conveniences for the Livelihood of Multitudes which inhabit it.

The Author of the Plurality of Worlds draws a very good Argument from this Consideration, for the Feeling of every Planet as indeed it seems very probable from the Analogy of Reason that if no Part of Matter, which we are acquainted with lies waste and useless, those great Planets which are at such a Distance from us should not be desert and unpeopled, but rather that they should be furnished with Beings adapted to their respective Situation.

Existence is a Blessing to those Beings only which are endowed with Perception, and is in a manner thrown away upon dead Matter as further than as it is subservient to Beings which are conscious of their Existence. Accordingly we find, from the Bodies which lie under our Observation, that Matter is only made as the Basis and Support of Animals, and that there is no more of the one, than what is necessary for the Existence of the other.

Infinite Goodness is of so communicative a nature, that it seems to delight in the conferring of Existence upon every Degree of [Perceptive] Being. As this is a Speculation, which I have often pursued with great Pleasure to my self, I shall enlarge further upon it, by considering that part of the Scale of Beings which comes within our Knowledge.

There are some living Creatures which are raised but just above dead Matter. To mention only that Species of Shell fish, which are found in the Fashion of a Cone, that grow to the Surface of several Rocks, and immediately die upon their being severd from the Place where they grow. There are many other Creatures but remove from these which have no other Sense besides that of Feeling and Taste. Others have still an additional one of Hearing, others of Smell, and others of Sight. It is wonderful to observe, by what a gradual Progress the World of Life advances through a prodigious Variety of Species, before a Creature is formed that is complete in all its Senses, and even among these there is such a different Degree of Perfection in the Sense which one Animal enjoys, beyond what appears in another, that though the Sense in different Animals be distinguished by the same common Denomination, it seems almost of a different Nature. If after this we look into the several inward Perfections of Cunning and Sagacity, or what we generally call Instinct, we find that in my after the same Manner, imperceptibly one above another, and receiving additional Improvement, are owing to the Species in which they are implanted. This Progress in Nature is so very gradual, that the most perfect of an inferior Species comes very near to the most imperfect of that which is immediately above it.

The exuberant and overflowing Goodness of the Supreme Being, whose Mercy extends to all his Works, is plainly seen, as I have before hinted from his having made so very little Matter, at least what fills within our Knowledge, that does not swarm with Life. Nor is his Goodness less seen in the Diversity, than in the Multitude of living Creatures. Had he only made one Species of Animals, none of the rest would have enjoyed the Happiness of Existence he has, therefore, spread in his Creation every degree of Life, every Capacity of Being. The whole Chain in it, from a Plant to a Man is filled up with diverse kinds of Creatures, rising one over another by such a gentle and easy Ascent, that the little Transitions and Deviations from one Species to another, are almost insensible. This intermediate Space is so well subdivided and marked, that there is scarce a degree of Perception which does not appear in some one part of the World of Life. Is the Goodness, or Wisdom of the divine Being, more manifested in this his Process?

There is a Consequence besides those I have already mentioned, which seems very naturally deducible from the foregoing Considerations. If the Scale of Beings rises by such a regular Progress, so high as Man, we may by a parity of Reason suppose that it still proceeds gradually through those Beings which are of a Superior Nature to him, since there is an infinitely greater space and room for different Degrees of Perfection, between the Supreme Being and Man, than between Man and the most despicable Insect. This Consequence of so great a variety of Beings which are superior to us, from that variety which is inferior to us is made by Mr. Leck, in a Passage which I shall here set down, after having perceived that notwithstanding there is such an immense room between Man and his Maker for the Creative Power to exert it self in, it is impossible that it should ever be filled up, since there will be still an infinite Gain or Distance between the highest created Being and the Power which produced him.

It is therefore should be more Species of intelligent Creatures above us, than there are of sensible or insensible below us, as probable to me from these, than in all the visible corner of the World we see so many Gaps, or no Gaps at all quite even from us, the descent is by easy steps and a continued Series of things, that in each step we differ very little from the other. There are Fishes that have Wings, and are of Strangers to the airy Region, and there are some Birds, that are Inhabitants of the Water, and so cold as to be cold as to be cold, and there is Fish so little in taste, that the Scrupulo is allowed then on Fish days. There are Animals so near

'But pry spare me a little longer give me Leave to tell you the Manner of her Death She took leave of all her Family, and bore the vain Application of Medicines with the greatest Patience imaginable When the Physician told her she must certainly die, she desired, as well as she could, that all who were present, except my self, might depart the Room She said she had nothing to say, for she was resigned, and I knew all she knew that concerned us in this World but she desired to be alone, that in the presence of God only she might, without Interruption, do her last Duty to me of thanking me for all my Kindness to her adding, that she hoped in my last Moments I should feel the same Comfort for my Goodness to her, as she did in that she had acquitted herself with Honour, Truth and Virtue to me

'I curb my self, and will not tell you that this Kindness cut my Heart in twain, when I expected an Accusation for some passionate Starts of mine, in some Parts of our Time together, to say nothing, but thank me for the Good, if there was any Good suitable to her own Excellence' All that I had ever said to her, all the Circumstances of Sorrow and Joy between us, crowded upon my Mind in the same Instant, and when immediately after I saw the Pangs of Death come upon that dear Body which I had often embraced with Transport, when I saw those cherishing Eyes begin to be ghastly, and their last Struggle to be to fix themselves on me, how did I lose all patience? She expired in my Arms, and in my Distraction I thought I saw her Bosom still heave There was certainly Life yet still left I cried she just now spoke to me 'Bur alas' I grew giddy, and all things moved about me from the Distemper of my own Head for the best of Women was breathless, and gone for ever

'Now the Doctrine I would, methinks, have you ruse from this Account I have given you is, that there is a certain Equanimity in those who are good and just, which runs into their very Sorrow, and disappoints the Force of it. Though they must pass through Afflictions in common with all who are in human Nature, yet their conscious Integrity shall undermine their Affliction nay, that very Affliction shall add Force to their Integrity, from a Reflection of the Use of Virtue in the Hour of Affliction I sat down with a Design to put you upon giving us Rules how to overcome such Griefs as these, but I should rather advise you to teach Men to be capable of them

'You Men of Letters have what you call the fine Taste in their Apprehensions of what is properly done or said There is something like this deeply grafted in the Soul of him who is honest and faithful in all his Thoughts and Actions Every thing which is false, vicious or unworthy, is despicable to him, though all the World should approve it At the same time he has the most lively Sensibility in all Enjoyments and Sufferings which it is proper for him to have, where any Duty of Life is concerned To want Sorrow when you in Decency and Truth should be afflicted, is, I should think, a greater Instance

'of a Man's being a Blockhead, than not to know the Beauty of any Passage in Virgil You have not yet observed, Mr SPECTATOR, that the fine Gentlemen of this Age set up for Hardness of Heart and Humanity has very little share in their Pretences He is a brave Fellow who is always ready to kill a Man he hates, but he does not stand in the same Degree of Esteem who laments for the Woman he loves I should fancy you might work up a thousand pretty Thoughts, by reflecting upon the Persons most susceptible of the sort of Sorrow I have spoken of and I dare say you will find upon Examination, that they are the wisest and the bravest of Mankind who are most capable of it

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I HAVE been for many Years loud in this Assertion, That there are very few that can see or hear, I mean that can report what they have seen or heard and this thro' Incapacity or Prejudice, one of which disables almost every Man who talks to you from representing things as he ought. For which Reason I am come to a Resolution of believing nothing I hear and I condemn the Men given to Narration under the Appellation of a Matter of Fact Man And according to me, a Matter of Fact Man is one whose Life and Conversation is spent in the Report of what is not Matter of Fact

'I remember when Prince Eugene was here there was no knowing his Height or Figure till you, Mr SPECTATOR gave the Publick Satisfaction in that Matter In Relations the Force of the Expression has very often more in the Look, the Tone of Voice, or the Gesture, than the Words themselves which being repeated in any other Manner by the Undiscerning bear a very different Interpretation from their original Meaning I must confess, I formerly have turn'd this Humour of mine to very good Account for whenever I heard any Narration uttered with extraordinary Vehemence and grounded upon considerable Authority I was always ready to say any Wager that it was not so Indeed I never pretended to be so rash, as to fix the Matter in any particular Way in Opposition to theirs but as there are a hundred Ways of any thing happening, besides that it has happen'd, I only controverted its falling out in that one Manner as they settled it, and left it to the Ninety nine other Ways and consequently had more Probability of Success I had arriv'd at a particular skill in warming a Man so far in his Narration, as to make him throw in a little of the Marvelous and then, if he has much fire,

'the next Degree is the Impossible Now this is always the Time for fixing the Wager But this requires the nicest Management, otherwise very probably the Dispute may arise to the old Determination by Battle In these Conceits I have been very fortunate and have won some Wagers of those who have professedly valued themselves upon Intelligence, and have put themselves to great Charge and Expence to be misinformed considerably sooner than the Rest of the World

'Having got a comfortable Sum by this my Opposition to publick Report I have brought my self now to so great a Perfection in Invention more especially to Party Relations that at the same time I seem with greedy Ears to devour up the Discourse, I certainly don't know one Word of it, but pursue my own Course of Thought, whether upon Business or Amusement, with much Tranquillity I say Inattention because a late Act of Parliament has secur'd all Party-Liars from the Penalty of a Wager, and consequently made it unprofitable to attend them However good Breeding obliges a Man to maintain the Figure of the keenest Attention the true Posture of which in a Coffee-house I take to consist in leaning over a Table with the Edge of it pressing hard upon your Stomach for the more Pain the Narration is received with the more gracious is your bending over Besides that the Narrator thinks you forget your Pain by the Pleasure of hearing him

'Fort Knock has occasioned several very perplexed and inelegant Heats and Animosities, and there was one other day in a Coffee-house where I was, that took upon him to clear that Business to me, for he said he was there I knew him to be that sort of Man that had not strength of Capacity to be inform'd of any thing that depended merely upon his being an Eye Witness, and therefore was fully satisfied he could give me no Information, for the very same Reason he believed he could, for he was there However, I heard him with the same Greediness as Shakespear describes in the following Lines

'I saw a Smith stand on his Hammer, thus,
'With open Mouth swallowing a Taylor's News

'I confess of late I have not been so much amazed at the Declaimers in Coffee-houses as I formerly was, being satisfied that they expect to be rewarded for their Vociferations Of these Liars there are two Sorts The Genius of the first consists in much Impudence and a strong Memory the others have added to these Qualifications a good Understanding and smooth Language These therefore have only certain Heads, which they are as eloquent upon as they can, and may be call'd Embellishers the others repeat only what they hear from others as literally as their Parts or Zeal will permit, and are called Reciters Here was a Fellow in Town some Years ago, who used to divert himself by telling a Lie at Charing Cross in the Morning at eight of [the] Clock, and then following it through all

* By 7 Anne, cap 17, all wagers laid upon a contingency relating to the war with France were declared void.

'Parts of the Fown till eight at Night, at which time he came to a Club of his Friends, and diverted them with an Account what Censure it had at Will's in Covent-Garden, how dangerous it was believed to be at Child's, and what Interference they drew from it with Relation to Stocks at Jonathan's I have had the Honour to travel with this Gentleman I speak of in Search of one of his Fishhoods and have been present when they have described the very Man they have spoken to, as him who first reported it, tall or short, black or fair, a Gentleman or a Raggamuffin, according as they liked the Intelligence I have heard one of our ingenious Writers of News say, that when he has had a Customer come with an Advertisement of an Apprentice or a Wife run away, he has desired the Advertiser to compose himself a little, before he dictated the Description of the Offender For when a Person is put into a publick Paper by a Man who is angry with him, the real Description of such Person is hid in the Deformity with which the angry Man described him, therefore this Fellow always made his Customers describe him as he would the Day before he offended, or else he was sure he would never find him out. These and many other Hints I could suggest to you for the Elucidation of all fictions, but I leave it to your own Sagacity to improve or neglect this Speculation

I SHOULD esteem my self a very happy Man, if my Speculations could in the least contribute to the rectifying the Conduct of my Readers in one of the most important Affairs of Life, to wit their Choice in Marriage This State is the Foundation of Community, and the chief Band of Society and I do not think I can be too frequent on Subjects which may give Light to my unmarried Readers, in a particular which is so essential to their following Happiness or Misery A virtuous Disposition, a good Understanding, an agreeable Person and an easy Fortune, are the things which should be chiefly regarded on this Occasion Because my present View is to direct a young Lady, who, I think, is now in doubt whom to take of many Lovers, I shall talk at this time to my female Reader. The Advantages, as I was going to say, of Sense, Beauty and Riches, are what are certainly the chief Motives to a prudent young Woman of Fortune for changing her Condition: but as she is to have her Eye upon each of these, she is to ask herself whether the Man who has most of these Recommendations in the Lump is not the most desirable. He that has excellent Talents, with a moderate Estate, and an agreeable Person, is preferable to him who is only rich, if it were only that good Faculties may purchase Riches, but Riches cannot purchase worthy Endowments. I do not mean that Wit, and a Capacity to entertain is what should be highly valued, except it is founded upon Good nature and Humanity. There are many ingenious Men, whose Abilities do little else but make themselves and those about them uneasy. Such are those who are far gone in the Pleasures of the Town, who cannot support Life without quick Sensations and gay Reflections, and are Strangers to Tranquillity, to right Reason, and a calm Motion of Spirits without Transport or Dejection. These ingenious Men, of all Men living, are most to be avoided by her who would be happy in [a] Husband. They are immediately satiated with Possession, and must necessarily fly to new Acquisitions of Beauty, to pass away the whiling Moments and Intervals of Life for with them every Hour is heavy that is not joyful. But there is a sort of Man of Wit and Sense, that can reflect upon his own Make, and that of his Partner with the Eyes of Reason and Honour: and who believes he offends against both these, if he does not look upon the Woman (who chose him to be under his Protection in Sickness and Health) with the utmost Gratitude, whether from that Moment she is shining, or defective in Person or Mind. I say, there are those who think themselves bound to supply with Good nature the Villains of those who love them, and who always think those the Objects of Love and Pity, who come to their Arms the Objects of Joy and Admiration.

Of this latter sort is Lysander, a Man of Wit, Learning, Sobriety and Good nature, of Birth and Estate below no Woman to accept, and of whom it might be said should he succeed in his present Wishes, his Mistress ruin'd his Fortune, but not that she made it. When a Woman is deliberating with herself whom she shall chuse of many near each other in other Pretensions, certainly he of best Understanding is to be preferred. Life hangs heavily in the repeated Conversation of one who has no Impugnation to be fired at the several Occasions and Objects which come before him, or who cannot strike out of his Reflections new Paths of pleasure. Discourse. Honest Wall / Frank and his Wife, tho' not married above four Months, have scarce had a Word to say to each other this six weeks, and one cannot form to one's self a sillier Picture, than these two Creatures in solemn Pomp and Plenty unable to enjoy their Fortunes, and at a full stop among a Crowd of Servants, to whose Love of Life they are beholden for the little Satisfaction by which they can be understood to be so much as barely in Being. The Hours of the Day, the Distinctions of Noon and Night, Dinner and Supper, are the greatest Notices they are capable of. This is perhaps representing the Life of a very modest Woman, joined to dull Fellow, more insipid than it really deserves, but I am sure it is not to exalt the Commerce with an ingenious Companion too high, to say that every new Accident or Object which comes into such a Gentleman's way, gives his Wife new Pleasures and Satisfaction. The Approbation of his Words and Actions is a continual new Feast to her, nor can she enough applaud her good Fortune in having her Life varied every hour, her Mind more improv'd, and her Heart more glad from every Circumstance which they meet with. He will lay out his Invention in forming new Pleasures and Amusements, and make the Fortune she has brought him subservient to the Honour and Reputation of her and hers. A Man of Sense who is thus oblig'd, is ever contriving the Happiness of her who did him so great a Distinction while the Fool is ungrateful without Vice, and never returns a Favour because he is not sensible of it. I would, methinks, have so much to say for my self, that if I fell into the hands of him who treated me ill, he should be sensible when he did so. His Conscience should be of my side, whatever became of his Inclination. I do not know but it is the insipid Choice which has been made by those who have the Care of young Women, that the Marriage State it self has been liable to so much Ridicule. But a well-chosen Love, mov'd by Passion on both sides, and perfected by the Generosity of one Party, must be adorn'd with so many handsome Incidents on the other side, that every particular Couple would be an example in many Circumstances to all the rest of the Species. I shall end the Chapter upon this Subject with a couple of Letters, one from a Lover who is very well acquainted with the way of Bargaining on these Occasions, and the other from his Rival, who has a less Estate, but great Gallantry of Temper. As for my Man of Prudence, he makes love, as he says, as if he were already a Father, and laying aside the Passion, comes to the Reason of the Thing.

Madam,

'My Counsel' has perused the Inventory of your Estate, and consider'd what Estate you have, which it seems is only yours, and to the Male-Heirs of your Body: but, in Default of such Issue, to the right Heirs of your Uncle Edward for ever. Thus, Madam, I am advis'd you cannot (the Reminder not being in your dock) the Entail by which means my Estate, which is Fee-Simple, will come by the Settlement proposed to your Children begotten by me, whether they are Males or Females: but my Children begotten upon you will not inherit your Lands, except I begot a Son. I AM always highly delighted with the discovery of any rising Genius among my Countrymen. For this reason I have read over, with great pleasure, the late Miscellany published by Mr Pope,² in which there are many excellent Compositions of that ingenious Gentleman. I have had a pleasure of the same kind, in perusing a Poem that is just publish'd on the Prospect of Peace, and which, I hope, will meet with such a Reward from its Patrons, as so noble a Performance deserves. I was particularly well pleas'd to find that the Author had not amused himself with Fables out of the Pagan Theology, and that when he hints at any thing of [this] nature, he alludes to it only as to a Fable

Many of our Modern Authors, whose Learning very often extends no farther than Ovid's Metamorphosis, do not know how to celebrate a Great Man, without mixing a parcel of School Boy Tales with the Recital of his Actions. If you read a Poem on a fine Woman, among the Authors of this Class, you shall see that it turns more upon Venus or Helen, than on the Party concerned. I have known a Copy of Verses on a great Hero highly commended but upon asking to hear some of the beautiful Passages, the Admirer of it has repeated to me a Speech of Apollo, or a Description of Polypheme. At other times when I have search'd for the Actions of a great Man, who gave a Subject to the Writer, I have been entertained with the Exploits of a River God, or have been forced to attend a Fury in her mischievous Progress, from one end of the Poem to the other. When we are at School it is necessary for us to be acquainted with the System of Pagan Theology, and may be allowed to enliven a Theme, or point an Epigram with an Heathen God, but when we would write a manly Panegyrick, that should carry in it all the Colours of Truth, nothing can be more ridiculous than to have recourse to our Jupiters and Junos

No Thought is beautiful which is not just, and no Thought can be just which is not founded in Truth, or at least in that which passes for such

In Mock-Heroick Poems, the Use of the Heathen Mythology is not only excusable but graceful, because it is the Design of such Compositions to divert, by adapting the fabulous Machines of the Ancients to low Subjects, and at the same time by ridiculing such kinds of Machinery in modern Writers. If any are of opinion, that there is a Necessity of admitting these Classical Legends into our serious Compositions, in order to give them a more Poetical Turn I would recommend to their Consideration the Pastorals of Mr Philips. One would have thought it impossible for this Kind of Poetry to have subsisted without Fawns and Sittys, Wood-Nymphs, and Water-Nymphs, with all the Tribe of rural Deities. But we see he has given a new Life, and a more natural Beauty to this way of Writing by substituting in the place of these Antiquated Fables, the superstitious Mythology which prevails among the Shepherds of our own Country

Virgil and Homer might compliment their Heroes, by interweaving the Actions of Deities with their Achievements but for a Christian Author to write in the Pagan Creed, to make Prince Eugene a Favourite of Mars, or to carry on a Correspondence between Billona and the Marshal de Villars, would be downright Puerility, and unpardonable in a Poet that is past Sixteen. It is want of sufficient Elevation in a Genius to describe Realities, and place them in a shining Light, that makes him have recourse to such trifling antiquated Fables, as a Man may write a fine Description of Bacchus or Apollo, that does not know how to draw the Character of any of his Contemporaries

In order therefore to put a stop to this absurd Practice I shall publish the following Edict, by virtue of that Spectatorial Authority with which I stand invested

Whereas the Time of a General Peace is in all appearance, drawing near, being inform'd that there are several ingenious Persons who intend to shew their Talents on so happy an Occasion, and being willing, as much as in me lies, to prevent that Effusion of Nonsense which we have good Cause to apprehend I do hereby strictly require every Person, who shall write on this Subject, to remember that he is a Christian, and not to Sacrifice his Catechism to his Poetry In order to it, I do expect of him in the first place, to make his own Poem, without depending upon Phaëbus for any part of it, or calling out for Aid upon any one of the Muses by Name I do likewise positively forbid the sending of Mercury with any particular Message or Dispatch relating to the Peace, and shall by no means suffer Minerva to take upon her the Shape of any Plenipotentiary concerned in this Great Work I do further declare, that I shall not allow the Destinies to have laid in hand in the Deaths of the several thousands who have been slain in the late War, being of opinion that all such Deaths may be very well accounted for by the Christian System of Powder and Ball I do therefore strictly forbid the Fates to cut the Thread of Man's Life upon any pretence whatsoever, unless it be for the sake of the Rhyme And whereas I have good Reason to fear, that Neptune will have a great deal of Business on his Hands, in several Poems which we may now suppose are upon the Anvil, I do also prohibit his Appearance, unless it be done in Metaphor, Simile or any very short Allusion, and that even here he be not permitted to enter, but with great Caution and Circumspection I desire that the same Rule may be extended to his whole Fraternity of Heathen Gods, it being my design to condemn every Poem to the Flames in which Jupiter Thunders, or exercises any other Act of Authority which does not belong to him In short, I expect that no Pagan Agents shall be introduc'd or any Fact related which a Man cannot give Credit to with a good Conscience Provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend, to several of the Female Poets in this Nation who shall be still left in full Possession of their Gods and Goddesses, in the same manner as if this Paper had never been written to Print nothing of that nature, which was not of my own Invention But several laborious Dreamers have of late communicated to me Works of this Nature, which, for their Reputations and my own, I have hitherto suppress'd Had I printed every one that came to my Hands, my Book of Speculations would have been little else but a Book of Visions Some of my Correspondents have indeed been so very modest, as to offer it in Excuse for their not being in Capacity to dream better I have by me, for example, the Dream of a young Gentleman not past Fifteen I have likewise by me the Dream of a Person of Quality, and another called the Lady's Dream In these, and other Pieces of the same nature, it is oppos'd the usual Allowances will be made to the Age, Condition and Sex of the Dreamer I prevent this Inundation of Dreams which daily flows in upon me I shall apply to all Dreamers of Dreams, the Advice which Epictetus has couched after his manner in a very simple and concise Precept Ne v' tell thy Dreams, says that Philosopher for thou thy self mayst take a Pleasure in telling thy Dream, another will take no Pleasure in hearing it After this short Preface I must do Justice to two or three Visions which I have lately publish'd and which I have owned to have been written by other Hands I shall add a Dream to these, which comes to me from Scotland, by one who declares himself of that Country, and for all I know may be second sighted There is, indeed, something in it of the Spirit of John Bunyan, but at the same time a certain Sublime, which that Author was never master of I shall publish it, because I question not but it will fall in with the Taste of all my popular Readers, and amuse the Imaginations of those who are more profound declaring at the same time, that this is the last Dream which I intend to publish this Season

SIR,

I was last Sunday in the Evening led into a serious Reflection on the Reasonableness of Virtue, and great Folly of Vice, from an excellent Sermon I had heard that Afternoon in my Parish Church Among other Observations, the Preacher shew'd us that the Temptations which the Tempter propos'd were all on a Supposition, that we are either Madmen or Fools, or with in Intention to render us such, that in no other Affair we would suffer ourselves to be thus imposed upon in a Case so plainly and clearly against our visible Interest His illustrations and Arguments carried so much Persuasion and Conviction with them, that they remained a considerable while fresh, and working

Nos populo damus Sen

WHEN I first of all took it in my Head to write Dreams and Visions, I determin'd

The dream in this Paper is taken to have the wonderful Escape in the World, the Water you used to drink is of a bewitching Nature, you would else have been mightily shocked at the Deformities and Meanness of the Place, for beside the Set of blind Fools, in whose Company you was, you may now observe many others who are only bewitched after another no less dangerous manner. Look a little that way, the great Crowd of Passengers, they are indeed so good a Herd as not to suffer themselves to be blinded by this bewitching Water, the black Lower is not vanished out of their sight, they see it whenever they look up to it but see how they go side ways, and with their Eyes downwards, as if they were wroth that they may thus rush into the Net, without being beforehand troubled at the Thought of so miserable a Destruction. Their Wills are so perverse and their Hearts so fond of the Pleasures of the Place, that rather than forgo them they will run all Hazards, and venture upon all the Miseries and Woes before them.

See there that other Company, tho they should drink none of the bewitching Water, yet they take a Course be watching and eluding, see how they chuse the crookedest Paths, whereby they have often the black Lower behind them, and sometimes see the radiant Column side ways, which gives them some weak Glimpse of it. These Fools content themselves with that, not knowing whether any other have any more of its Influence and Light than themselves. This Road is called that of Superstition or Human Ignorance, they grossly overlook that which the Rules and Laws of the Place prescribe to them, and contrive some other Scheme and Set of Directions and Prescriptions for themselves, which they hope will serve their turn. He showed me many other kind of Fools which put me quite out of humour with the Place. At last he carried me to the right Paths, where I found true and solid Pleasure which entertained me all the way, till we came in close sight of the Pillar, where the Satisfaction increased to that measure that my Faculties were not able to contain it in the straining of them I was violently waked, not a little grieved at the vanishing of so pleasing a Dream.

'Οδ' εἰς τὸ σῶθαι ἐν ἀρετῇ τ' ἄγων ἔργας,

Ζηλωτος ἀνθρώποις ——— I υπ

It is my Custom to take [frequent] Opportunities of enquiring from time to time what Success my Speculations meet with in the Town. I am glad to find in particular, that my Discourses on Marriage have been well received. A friend of mine gives me to understand, from Doctors Commons, that more Licences have been taken out there of late than usual. I am likewise informed of several pretty Fellows, who have resolved to commence Herds of Families by the first favourable Opportunity. One of them writes me word, that he is ready to enter into the Bonds of Matrimony, provided I will give it him under my Hand as I now do; that a Man may shew his Face in good Company after he is married, and that he need not be ashamed to treat a Woman with Kindness, who puts herself into his Power for Life.

I have other Letters on this Subject, which say that I am attempting to make a Revolution in the World of Gallantry, and that the Consequence of it will be, that a great deal of the sprightliest Wit and Satyr of the last Age will be lost. That a baful Fellow, upon changing his Condition, will be no longer puzzled how to stand the Raillery of his facetious Companions: that he need not own he married only to plunder an Heiress of her Fortune, nor pretend that he uses her ill, to avoid the [ridiculous] Name of a fond Husband.

Indeed if I may speak my Opinion of great part of the Writings which once prevail'd among us under the Notion of Humour, they are such as would tempt one to think there had been an Association among the Wits of those times to rally Legitimacy out of our Island. A Strife of Wedlock was the common Mark for all the Adventurers in Prose and Comedy, as well as the Essays in Lucre in Satyr, to shoot at, and nothing was a more striding Jest in all Clubs of fashionable Mirth, and gay Conversation. It was determined among those very Critics, that the Appellation of a Sober Man should signify a Spiritless Fellow. And I am apt to think it was about the same time, that Good Nature, a Word so peculiarly elegant in our Language that some have affirmed it cannot well be expressed in any other, came first to be rendered suspicious, and in danger of being transferred from its original Sense to so distant an Idea as that of Folly.

I must confess it has been my Ambition, in the course of my Writings, to restore, as well as I was able, the proper Ideas of things. And as I have attempted this already on the Subject of Marriage, in several Papers, I shall here add some further Observations which occur to me on the same Head.

Nothing seems to be thought, by our fine Gentlemen, so indispensable an Ornament in fashionable Life, as Love. A Knight Errant, says Don Quixot without a Mistress, is like a Free without Leats, and a Man of Mode among us, who has not some Fair One to sigh for, might as well pretend to appear dressed, without his Perwig. We have Lovers in Prose innumerable. All our Pretenders to Rhyme are professed Immortals: and there is scarce a Poet, good or bad, to be heard of, who has not some real or supposed Sacharissa to improve his Verses.

If Love be any Refinement, Conjugal Love must be certainly so in a much higher Degree. There is no comparison between the frivolous Affection of turning the Eyes of Women with whom you are only captivated by Way of Amusement, and of whom perhaps you know nothing more than their Features, and a regular and uniform Endeavour to make your self valuable, both as a Friend and Lover, to one whom you have chosen to be the Companion of your Life. The first is the Spring of a thousand Fopperies, silly Artifices, Falshoods, and perhaps Barbarities or at best arises no higher than to a kind of Dancing-School Breeding, to give the Person a more sparkling Air. The latter is the Parent of substantial Virtues and agreeable Qualities, and cultivates the Mind while it improves the Behaviour. The Passion of Love to a Mistress, even where it is most sincere, resembles too much the Flame of a Fever, that to a Wife is like the Vital Heat.

I have often thought if the Letters written by Men of Good nature to their Wives, were to be compared with those written by Men of Gallantry to their Mistresses, the former, notwithstanding any Inequality of Style, would appear to have the Advantage. Friendship, Tenderness and Constancy, dress in a Simplicity of Expression, recommend themselves by a more native Elegance, than passionate Raptures, extravagant Encomiums, and slavish Adoration. If we were admitted to search the Cabinet of the beautiful Narcissa, among Heaps of Epistles from several Admirers, which are there preserv'd with equal Care, how few should we find but would make any one Sick in the Reading, except her who is flattered by them? But in how different a Style must the wise Benevolus, who converses with that good Sense and good Humour among all his Friends, write to a Wife who is the worthy Object of his utmost Affection? Benevolus, both in Publick and Private, on all Occasions of Life, appears to have every good Quality and desirable Ornament. Abroad he is revered and esteemed at home beloved and happy. The Satisfaction he enjoys there, settles into an habitual Complacency, which shines in his Countenance, enlivens his Wit, and seasons his Conversation. Even those of his Acquaintance, who have never seen him in his Retirement, are Shivers in the Happiness of it, and it is very much owing to his being the best and best beloved of Husbands, that he is the most steadfast of Friends, and the most agreeable of Companions.

There is a sensible Pleasure in contemplating such beautiful Instances of Domestick Life. The Happiness of the Conjugal State appears heightened to the highest degree it is capable of, when we see two Persons of accomplished Minds, not only united in the same Interests and Affections, but in their Taste of the same Improvements, Pleasures and Diversions. Pliny, one of the finest Gentlemen, and politest Writers of the Age in which he lived, has left us, in his Letter to Hispulla his Wife's Aunt, one of the most agreeable Family-Pieces of this Kind I have ever met with. I shall end this Discourse with a Translation of it. And I believe the Reader will be of my opinion, that Conjugal Love is drawn in it with a Delicacy which makes it appear to be, as I have represented it, an Ornament as well as a Virtue.

PLINY to HISPULLA.¹

'As I remember the great Affection which was

'between you and your excellent Brother, and know you love his Daughter as your own, so as not only to express the Tenderness of the best of Aunts, but even to supply that of the best of Fathers, I am sure it will be a pleasure to you to hear that she proves worthy of her Father, worthy of you, and of your and her Ancestors. Her Ingenuity is admirable, her Frugality extraordinary. She loves me, the surest Pledge of her Virtue, and adds to this a wonderful Disposition to Learning, which she has acquir'd from her Affection to me. She reads my Writings, studies them, and even gets them by heart. You'd smile to see the Concern she is in when I have a Cause to plead, and the Joy she shews when it is over. She finds means to have the first News brought her of the Success I meet with in Court, how I am heard, and what Decree is made. If I recite any thing in publick, she cannot refrain from placing her self privately in some Corner to hear, where with the utmost delight she fersts upon my Applauses. Sometimes she sings my Verses, and accompanies them with the lute, without any Master, except Love, the best of Instructors. From these Instances I take the most certain Omens of our perpetual and encreasing Happiness, since our Affection is not founded on my Youth and Person, which must gradually decay, but she is in love with the immortal Part of me, my Glory and Reputation. Nor indeed could less be expected from one who had the Happiness to receive her Education from you, who in your House was accustomed to every thing that was virtuous and decent, and even began to love me by your Recommendation. For, as you had always the greatest Respect for my Mother, you were pleased from my Infancy to form me, to commend me, and kindly to presage I should be one day what my Wife fancies I am. Accept therefore our united Thanks, mine, that you have bestowed her on me, and hers, that you have given me to her, as a mutual Grant of Joy and Felicity.

I AM very loth to come to Extremities with the young Gentlemen mention'd in the following Letter, and do not care to christen them with my own Hand, till I am forc'd by Provocations too great to be suffer'd without the absolute Destruction of my Spectatorial Dignity. The Crimes of these Offenders are plac'd under the Observation of one of my chief Officers, who is posted just at the entrance of the Pass between London and Westminster. As I have great Confidence in the Capacity, Resolution and Integrity of the Person deputed by me to give an Account of Enormities, I doubt not but I shall soon have before me all proper Notices which are requisite for the Amendment of Manners in Publick, and the Instruction of each Individual of the Human Species in what is due from him, in respect to the whole Body of Mankind. The present Paper shall consist only of the above mentioned Letter, and the Copy of a Deposition which I have given to my trusty Friend Mr. John Sir, wherein he is charged to testify to me all that is necessary for my Animadversion upon the Delinquents mentioned in my Correspondent, as well as all others described in the said Deposition.

To the SPECTATOR, SECRETARY of Great Britain

I grant it does look a little familiar, but I must call you

Dear Durk

Being so again to the farther End of the Week's Coffee-house I shall from hence give you some account of the Behaviour of our Hackney Coachmen since my last These Indefatigable Gentlemen without the least Indifference of Self Interest or Advantage to themselves, do still ply as Voluntary Day and Night for the Good of their Country. I will not trouble you with enumerating many Particulars, but I must by no means omit to inform you of an Infant about six foot high, and between twenty and thirty Years of Age, who was seen in the Arms of a Hackney Coachman driving by Wills's Coffee-house in Great Garden, between the Hours of four and five in the Afternoon of that very Day, wherein you published a Memorial against them. This impudent young Cur, tho' he could not sit in a Coach box without holding, yet would he venture his Neck to his defiance to your Spectatorial Authority or to any thing that you could command. Who he was I know no, but I heard this Relation this Morning from a Gentleman who was an Eye Witness of this his Impudence, and I was willing to take the first opportunity to inform you of him, as holding it extremely requir'd that you should nip him in the Bud. Put I am my self most concerned for my Fellow-Templers, Fellow-Suitorians and Fellow-Sherriers in the Law. I mean such of them as are dignified and distinguished under the Designation of Hackney Coachmen. Such as rising Men's have these ambitious young Men that they cannot enjoy themselves out of a Coach-box. It is however an unspeakable Comfort to me, that I can now tell you that some of them are grown so bashful as to study only in the Night time, or in the Country. The other Night I spied one of our young Gentlemen very diligent at his Lectures in Heat-Sire, and by the way, I should be under some concern, lest this hard Student should one time or other crack his Brain with studying, but that I am in hopes Nature has taken care to fortify him in proportion to the great Undertakings he was design'd for. Another of my Fellow-Templers, on Monday last, was getting up into his Study at the Bottom of Grays Inn Lane, in order I suppose, to contemplate in the fresh Air. Now, Sir, my Request is that the great Modesty of these two Gentlemen may be recorded in a Pattern to the rest, and if you would but give them two or three Touches with your own Pen, tho' you might not perhaps prevail with them to desist entirely from their Meditations, yet I doubt not but you would at least preserve them from being publick Spectacles of Folly in our Streets. I say, two or three Touches with your own Pen. I have really observed, Mr. Spectator that those Spectators which are so piously heed down the sides with little or how it is instructive soever they may be, do not carry with them that Authority as the others. I do again therefore desire, that for the sake of their dear Neck you will bestow one Penful of your own Ink upon them. I know you are loth to expose them, and it is, I must confess, a thousand Pities that my young Gentlemen who are one of honest Parents, should be brought to publish Shame. And indeed I should be glad to have them handled a little tenderly at the first, if fair means will not prevail, there is then no other Way to reclaim them, but by making use of the whole some Severities, and I think it is better that a Doer or two of such good for nothing Fellows should be made Examples of, than that the Reputation of some Hundred, of as useful young Gentlemen as my self should suffer thro' their Folly. It is not however, for me to direct you what to do, but in short, if our Coachmen will drive on this Trade, the very first of them that I do find meditating in the Street, I shall make Bold to take the Number of his Chambers, to call her with a Doer of his Name, and dispatch the n to you, that you may chastise him at your own Discretion.

I am, Dear Sir,

Per ever your,

Mose Greenbag,

I 17, if you please

P S 'Tis Hammett's, one of our Coachmen, is now pleading at the Bar, the other end of the Road but has a little too much Vehemence, and throws out his Arms too much to take his Audience with a good Grace.

I AM so tender of my Women-Readers, that I cannot defer the Publication of any thing which concerns their Happiness or Quiet. The Repose of a married Woman is consulted in the first of the following Letters, and the Felicity of a Maiden Lady in the second I call it a Felicity to have the Addresses of an agreeable Man and I think I have not any where seen a prettier Application of a Poetical Story than that of his, in making the Tale of Cephalus and Procris the History Picture of a Man in so gallant a manner as he addresses it But see the Letters

Mr SPECTATOR,

"It is now almost three months since I was in Town about some Business, and the Hurry of it being over, took Coach one Afternoon, and drove to see a Relation, who married about six Years ago a wealthy Citizen I found her at home, but her Husband gone to the Exchange, and expected back within an Hour at the farther After the usual Salutations of Kindness, a hundred Questions about Friends in the Country, we sat down to Piquet, played two or three Games, and drank Tea I should have told you that this was my second time of seeing her since Marriage, but before she lived at the same Town where I went to School so that the Plea of a Relation, added to the Innocence of my Youth, prevailed upon her good Humour to indulge me in a Freedom of Conversation as often, and oftner, than the strict Discipline of the School would allow of You may easily imagine after such an Acquaintance we might be exceeding merry without any Offence, as in calling to mind how many Inventions I had been put to in deluding the Master, how many Hands forged for Excuses, how many times been sick in perfect Health for I was then never sick but at School, and only then because out of her Company We had whiled away three Hours after this manner, when I found it past five, and not expecting her Husband would return till late, rose up, told her I should go early next Morning for the Country She kindly answered she was afraid it would be long before she saw me again, so I took my leave and parted Now, Sir, I had not been got home a Fortnight, when I received a Letter from a Neighbour of theirs, that ever since that fatal Afternoon the Lady had been most inhumanly treated, and the Husband publicly stormed that he was made a Member of too numerous a Society He had, it seems, listened most of the time my Cousin and I were together As jealous Ears always hear double, so he heard enough to make him mad, and as jealous Eyes always see thro' Magnifying Glasses, so he was certain it could not be to whom he had seen, a beardless Stripling, but fancied he saw a gray Gentleman of the Temple, ten Years older than my self, and for that reason, I presume, durst not come in, nor take any Notice when I went out He is perpetually asking his Wife if she does not think the time long (as she said she should) till she see her Cousin again Pray Sir, what can be done in this Case? I have writ to him to assure him I was at his House all that afternoon expecting to see him His Answer is, 'tis only a Trick of hers, and that he neither can nor will believe me The parting Kiss I find mightily nettles him, and confirms him in all his Errors Ben Jonson, as I remember makes a Foreigner in one of his Comedies, admire the desperate Valour of the bold English, who let out their Wives to all Li counters The general Custom of Salutation should Excuse the Favour done me, or you should lay down Rules when such Distinctions are to be given or omitted You cannot imagine, Sir how troubled I am for this unhappy Lady's Misfortune and beg you would insert this Letter, that the Husband may reflect upon this Accident coolly It is no small Matter the Ease of a virtuous Woman for her whole Life I know she will conform to any Regularities (tho' more strict than the common Rules of our Country require) to which her particular Temper shall incline him to oblige her This Accident puts me in mind how generously Pisistratus the 'Athenian Tyrant behaved himself on a like Occasion, when he was instigated by his Wife to put to death a young Gentleman because being passionately fond of his Daughter, he kissed her in public & she met her in the Street, What (says he) shall we do to those who are our Enemies? if we do this to those who are our Friends? I will not trouble you much longer, but am exceedingly concern'd lest this Accident may cause a virtuous Lady to lead a miserable Life with a Husband who has no Grounds for his Jealousy but what I have faithfully related and ought to be reckon'd none 'tis to be fear'd too if at last he sees his Mistake, yet People will be as slow and unwilling in disbelieving Scandals as they are quick and forward in believing it. I shall endeavour to enlighten this plain honest Letter, with Ovid's Relation about Cybele's Image. The Ship wherein it was aboard was stranded at the mouth of the Tyber, and the Men were unable to move it, till Claudia, a Virgin, but suspected of Unchastity, by a slight Pull hawled it in. The Story is told in the 'fourth Book of the Fasts:

Parent of Gods, began the weeping Fair, Re ward or punish, but oh! hear my Pray'r If Le-witnes e'er desil'd my Virgin Bloom, From Heav'n with Justice I receive my Doon,
But if my Honour yet has known no Stain, Thou, Goddess, thou my Innocence maintain,
Thou, who art the next Rules of Gods us s-way'd, Vouchsafe to follow an unblemish'd Maid She spoke, and touch'd the Cord with glad Surprise,

The pity'd Goddess easily comply'd, Follow'd in triumph, and adorn'd her Guide, While Claudia, thus still for fast Disgrace, March'd silent on with a slow solen n Pace Nor yet from some was all Distrust renov'd,

Your very humble Servant,

MR SPECTATOR,
You will oblige a languishing Lover, if you will please to print the enclosed Verses in your next Paper. If you remember the Metamor- phosis, you know Procris, the fond Wife of Cephalus, is said to have made her Husband, who delighted in the Sports of the Wood, a Present of an unerring Javelin. In process of time he was so much in the Forest, that his Lady suspected he was pursuing some Nymph, under the pretence of following a Chace more innocent Under this Suspicion she hid herself among the Trees, to observe his Motions. While she lay conceal'd, her Husband tired with the Labour of Hunting, came within her hearing. As he was fainting with Heat, he cried out, Aura veni, Oh charming Air approach The unfortunate Wife, taking the Word Air to be the name of a Woman, began to move among the Bushes and the Husband believing it a Deer, threw his Javelin and kill'd her. This History painted on a Fan, which I presented to a Lady, gave occasion to my growing poetical

Come gentle Air! th' Follin Shepherd said, While Procris fauted in the secret Shade, Come gentle Air! the fanner Delia cries, While at her Feet her Swain expiring lies Lo the glad Gales o'er all her Beauties stray, Breath on her Lips, and in her Bosom play In Delia's Hand this Joy is fatal found, Not did it fall'd Dart more surely wound But Gifts destructive to the Givers prove, Like bolts! Fovers fall by those they love
I et guiltless too this bright Destroyer lives, At random wounds, nor knows the Wound she graves

She tells the Story with attentive Eyes,
And pities Procris, while her Lover dies

Dum potuit solite geminum virtute repressit
Ovid

MR SPECTATOR,

I WHO now write to you, am a Woman loaded with Injuries, and the Aggravation of my Misfortune is, that they are such which are over-look'd by the Generality of Mankind, and tho' the most afflictive imaginable, not regarded as such in the general Sense of the World. I have had my vexation from all Mankind, but have now taken Pen, Ink and Paper, and am resolv'd to unbosom my self to you, and lay before you what grieves me and all the Sex. You have very often mentioned particular Hardships done to this or that Lady but, methinks, you have not in any one Speculation directly pointed at the partial Freedom Men take, the unreasonable Confinement Women are oblig'd to, in the only Circumstance in which we are necessarily to have a Commerce with them, that of Love. The Case of Celibacy is the great Evil of our Nation, and the Indulgence of the vicious Conduct of Men in that State, with the Ridicule to which Women are exposed, though ever so virtuous, if long unmarried, is the Root of the greatest Irregularities of this Nation. To shew you, Sir, that tho' you never have given us the Catalogue of a Lady's Library as you promised, we read good Books of our own chusing, I shall insert on this occasion a Paragraph or two out of Echard's Roman History. In the 44th Page of the second Volume the Author observes, that Augustus upon his Return to Rome at the end of a War, received Complaints that too great a Number of the young Men of Quality were unmarried.
The Emperor thereupon assembled the whole Equestrian Order and having separited the Married from the Single, did particular Honours to the former, but he told the latter, that is to say, Mr SPECTATOR he told the Bachelors,
"That their Lives and Actions had been so peculiar, that he knew not by what Name to call em, not by that of Men, for they performed nothing that was manly not by that of Citizens, for the City might perish notwithstanding their Care nor by that of Romans, for they designed to extirpate the Roman Name." Then

'proceeding to shew his tender Care and hearty Affection for his People, he further told them, "That their Course of Life was of such pernicious Consequence to the Glory and Grandeur of the Roman Nation, that he could not chuse but tell them, that all other Crimes put together could not equalize theirs. For they were guilty of Murder, in not suffering those to be born which should proceed from them, of Impiety in causing the Names and Honours of their Ancestors to cease and of Sacrilege, in destroying their Kind, which proceeded from the immortal Gods, and Human Nature, the principal thing consecrated to 'em. Therefore in this Respect they dissolved the Government, in disobeying its Laws, betrayed their Country, by making it barren and waste, and demolished their City, in depriving it of Inhabitants. And he was sensible that all this proceeded not from any kind of Virtue or Abstinence, but from a Looseness and Wantonness, which ought never to be encouraged in any Civil Government." There are no Particulars dwelt upon that let us into the Conduct of these young Worthies, whom this great Emperor treated with so much Justice and Indignation, but any one who observes what passes in this Town, may very well frame to himself a Notion of their Riots and Debaucheries all Night, and their apparent Preparations for them all Day. It is not to be doubted but these Romans never passed any of their Time innocently but when they were asleep, and never slept but when they were weary and heavy with Excesses, and slept only to prepare themselves for the Repetition of them. If you did your Duty as a SPECTATOR, you would carefully examine into the Number of Births, Marriages, and Burials, and when you had deducted out of your Deaths all such as went out of the World without marrying, then cast up the number of both Sexes born within such a Term of Years last past, you might from the single People departed make some useful Inferences or Guesses how many there are left unmarried, and raise some useful Scheme for the Amendment of the Age in that particular. I have not Patience to proceed gravely on this abominable Libertinism, for I cannot but reflect, as I am writing to you, upon a certain lascivious Manner which all our young Gentlemen use in publick, and examine our Eyes with a Petulancy in their own, which is a down right Affront to Modesty. A disdainful Look on such an Occasion is return'd with a Countenance rebuked, but by averting their Eyes from the Woman of Honour and Decency to some flippant Creature, who will, as the Phrase is, be kinder. I must set down things as they come into my Head, without standing upon Order. Ten thousand to one but the gay Gentleman who stared, at the same time is an House-keeper for you must know they have got into a Humour of late of being very regular in their Sins, and a young Fellow shall keep his four Maids and three Footmen with the greatest Gravity imaginable. There are no less than six of these venerable House keepers of my Acquaintance. This Humour among young Men of Condition is imitated by all the World below them, and a general Dissolution of Manners arises from the one Source of Libertinism, without Shame or Reprehension in the Male Youth. It is from this Fountain that so many Beautiful helpless young Women are sacrific'd and given up to Lewdness, Shame, Poverty and Disease. It is to this also that so many excellent young Women, who might be Patterns of conjugal Affection and Parents of a worthy Race, pine under unhappy Passions for such as have not Attention enough to observe, or Virtue enough to prefer them to their common Wenches. Now, M^r SPECTATOR, I must be free to own to you, that I my self suffer a tasteless insipid Being, from a Consideration I have for a Man who would not, as he has said in my hearing, resign his Liberty, as he calls it, for all the Beauty and Wealth the whole Sex is possessed of. Such Calumnies as these would not happen, if it could possibly be brought about, that by fining Bachelors as Papists Convict, or the like, they were distinguished to their disadvantage from the rest of the World, who fall in with the Measures of Civil Society. Lest you should think I speak this as being, according to the senseless rude Phrase, a malicious old Maid, I shall acquaint you I am a Woman of Condition not now three and twenty, and have had Proposals from at least ten different Men, and the greater Number of them have upon the Upshot refused me. Something or other is always amiss when the Lover takes to some new Wench. A Settlement is easily excepted against and there is very little Recourse to avoid the vicious Part of our Youth, but throwing one's self away upon some lifeless Blockhead, who tho' he is without Vice, is also without Virtue. Now-a-days we must be contented if we can get Creatures which are not bad, good are not to be expected. M^r SPECTATOR, I sat near you the other Day, and think I did not displease your Spectatorial Eyesight, which I shall be a better Judge of when I see whether you take notice of these Evils your own way, or print this Memorial dictated from the disdainful heavy Heart of,

SIR,

Your most obedient humble Servant,

UPON the hearing of several late Disputes concerning Rank and Precedence, I could not forbear amusing my self with some Observations which I have made upon the Learned World as to this great Particular. By the Learned World I here mean at large, all those who are any way concerned in Works of Literature, whether in the Writing, Printing or Repeting Part. To begin with the Writers. I have observed that the Author of a Folio, in all Companies and Conversations, sets himself above the Author of a Quarto, the Author of a Quarto above the

A thor of an Opera and so on, by a gradual Descent and Subordination, to an Author in Twenty Fours. This Distinction is so well observed, that in an Assembly of the Learned, I have seen a Solo Writer place himself in an Elbow Chair, when the Author of a Duo-decimo has, out of a just Deference to his superior Quality, seated himself upon a Squibb. In a word, Authors are usually ranged in Company after the same manner as their Works are upon a Shelf.

The most minute Pocket Author hath beneath him the Writers of all Pamphlets or Works that are only stitched. As for the Pamphleteer, he takes place of none but of the Authors of 72 Sheets, and of that Fraternity who publish their Labours on certain Days or on every Day of the Week. I do not find that the Precedency among the Individuals, in this latter Class of Writers, is yet settled.

For my own part, I have had so strict a regard to the Ceremonial which prevails in the Learned World that I never presumed to take place of a Pamphleteer till my daily Papers were gathered in to those two first Volumes, which have already appeared. After which I naturally jumped over the Heads not only of all Pamphleteers, but of every Octavo Writer in Great Britain, that had written but one Book. I am also informed by my bookseller, that six Octavos have at all times been looked upon as an Equivalent to a Folio, which I take notice of it rather, because I would not have the Learned World surprised, if after the Publication of half a dozen Volumes I take my place accordingly. When my scattered Forces are thus rallied, and reduced into regular bodies, I flatter myself that I shall make no despicable Figure at the Head of them.

Whether these Rules, which have been received time out of Mind in the Common Wealth of Letters were not originally established with an Eye to our Paper Manufacture, I shall leave to the Discussion of others, and shall only remark further in this place that all Printers and Booksellers like the Wall of one another, according to the aforementioned Merits of the Authors to whom they respectively belong.

I come now to that point of Precedency which is settled among the three Learned Professions, by the Wisdom of our Laws. I need not here take Notice of the Rank which is allotted to every Doctor in each of these Professions, who are all of them though not so high as Knights, yet a Degree above Squires. This last Order of Men being the illiterate Body of the Nation, are consequently thrown together into a Class below the three Learned Professions. I mention this for the sake of several Rural Squires, whose Reading does not rise so high as to the Present State of England, and who are often apt to usurp that Precedency which by the Laws of their Country is not due to them. Their Want of Learning, which has planted them in this Station, may in some measure extenuate their Misdemeanour, and our Professors ought to pardon them when they offend in this Particular, considering that they are in a State of Ignorance or, as we usually say, do not know their Right Hand from their Left.

There is another Tribe of Persons who are Rectifiers to the Learned World, and who regulate the notions upon all Occasions by several Laws peculiar to their Body. I mean the Players or Actors of both Sexes. Among these it is a standing and uncontroverted Principle, that a Tragedian always takes place of a Comedian, and is very well known to the merry Drolls who make us laugh are always placed at the lower End of the Table, and in every Entertainment give way to the Dignity of the Huskin. It is a Stage Maxim, Once a King, and always a King. For this Reason it would be thought very absurd in Mr. Fulst, notwithstanding the Height and Gracefulness of his Person to sit at the Right Hand of an Hero, tho' he were but five Foot high. The same Distinction is observed among the Ladies of the Theatre. Queens and Heroines preserve their Rank in private Conversation, while those who are Waiting Women and Maids of Honour upon the Stage, keep their Distance also behind the Scenes.

I shall only add that by a Parity of Reason, all Writers of Tragedy look upon it as their due to be seated next or seated before Comick Writers. Those who deal in Tragic Comedy usually taking their Seats between the Authors of the Side. There has been a long Dispute for Precedency between the Tragick and Heroick Poets. Virgil would have the latter yield the Place to the former, but Mr. Dryden and many others would never submit to this Decision. Burlesque Writers pay the same Deference to the Heroick, as Comick Writers to their Serious Brothers in the Drama.

By this short Table of Laws, Order is kept up and Distinction preserved in the whole Republic of Letters. O

IT is very usual for those who have been severe upon Marriage in some part or other of their Lives to enter into the Fraternity which they have ridiculed, and to see their Rullery return upon their own Heads. I scarce ever knew a Woman later that did not, sooner or later, pay for it. Marriage which is a Blessing to another Man, falls upon such a one as a Judgment. Mr. Cervantes Old Bachelor is set forth to us with much Wit and Humour, as an Example of this kind. In short, those who have most distinguished themselves by railing at the Sex in general, very often make an honourable Amends, by choosing one of the most worthless Persons of it, for a Companion and Yoke-fellow. Hyperu takes his Revenge in Kind, on those who turn his Mysteries into Ridicule

My Friend Will Honeycomb, who was so unmercifully witty upon the Women, in a couple of Letters, which I lately communicated to the Publick, has given the Ladies ample Satisfaction by marrying a Farmer's Daughter, a piece of News which came to our Club by the last Post. The Templer is very positive that he has married a Dury-mud. But Will, in his Letter to me on this Occasion, sets the best Face upon the Matter that he can, and gives a more tolerable Account of his Spouse. I must confess I suspected something more than ordinary, when upon opening the Letter I found that Will was fallen off from his former Gravity, having changed Dear Spec which was his usual Salute at the Beginning of the Letter, into My Worthy Friend, and subscribed himself in the latter End of it at full length William Honeycomb. In short, the gay, the loud, the vain Will Honeycomb, who had made Love to every great Fortune that has appeared in Town for [above¹] thirty Years together, and boasted of Favour from Ladies whom he had never seen, is at length wedded to a plain Country Girl.

His Letter gives us the Picture of a converted Rake. The sober Character of the Husband is dashed with the Man of the Town, and enlivened with those little Cant phrases which have made my Friend Will often thought very pretty Company. But let us hear what he says for himself.

My Worthy Friend,

I question not but you, and the rest of my Acquaintance, wonder that I, who have lived in the Smoak and Gallantries of the Town for thirty Years together, should all on a sudden grow fond of a Country Life. Had not my Dog [of²] Steward run away as he did, without making up his Accounts, I had still been immersed in Sin and Sea-Content. But since my late forced Visit to my Estate, I am so pleased with it, that I am resolved to live and die upon it. I am every Day abroad among my Acres, and can scarce forbear filling my Letter with Breezes, Shades, Flowers, Meadows, and purling Streams. The Simplicity of Manners, which I have heard you so often speak of, and which appears here in Perfection, charms me wonderfully. As an Instance of it, I must acquaint you, and by your means the whole Club, that I have lately married one of my Tenants Daughters. She is born of honest Parents, and though she has no Portion, she has a great deal of Virtue. The natural Sweetness and Innocence of her Behaviour, the Freshness of her Complexion, the unaffected Turn of her Shape and Person, shot me through and through every time I saw her, and did more Execution upon me in Groggum, than the greatest Beauty in Town or Court had ever done in Brocade. In short, she is such an one as promises me a good Hear to my Estate, and if by her means I cannot leave to my Children what are falsely called the Gifts of Birth, high Titles and Alliances I hope to convey to them the more real and valuable Gifts of Birth, strong Bodies, and Healthy Constitutions. As for our fine Women, I need not tell thee that I know them. I have had my share in their Graces, but no more of that. It shall be my Business hereafter to live the Life of an honest Man, and to act as becomes the Master of a Family. I question not but I shall draw upon me the Rallery of the Town, and be treated to the Tune of the Marriage Hater match'd, but I am prepared for it. I have been as witty upon others in my time. To tell thee truly, I am such a Tribe of Fashionable young fluttering Coxcombs shot up, that I did not think my Post of an homme de ruelle any longer tenable. I felt a certain Stiffness in my Limbs, which entirely destroyed that Juntyness of Air I was once Master of. Besides, for I may now confess my Age to thee, I have been eight and forty above these Twelve Years. Since my Retirement into the Country will make a Vacancy in the Club, I could wish you would fill up my Place with my Friend Tom Dapper. He has an infinite deal of Fire, and knows the Town. For my own part, as I have said before, I shall endeavour to live hereafter suitable to a Man in my Station, as a prudent Head of a Family, a good Husband, a careful Father (when it shall so happen) and so.

Your most Sincere Friend,
and Humble Servant,
WILLIAM HONEYCOMB

SIMONIDES being ask'd by Dionysius the Tyrant what God was, desired a Day's time to consider of it before he made his Reply. When the Day was expired, he desired two Days, and afterwards, instead of returning his Answer, demanded still double the Time to consider of it. This great Poet and Philosopher the more he contemplated the Nature of the Deity, found that he wanted but the more out of his Depth, and that he lost himself in the Thought, instead of finding an End of it.

If we consider the Idea which wise Men, by the Light of Reason, have framed of the Divine Being it amounts to this. That he has in him all the Perfection of a Spiritual Nature, and since we have no Notion of any kind of spiritual Perfection but what we discover in our own Souls, we join Infinitude to each kind of these Perfections, and what is a Faculty in an human Soul becomes an Attribute in God. We exist in Place and Time, the Divine Being fills the Immensity of Space with his Presence, and Inhabits Eternity.

² [the]

We are possessed of a little Power and a little Knowledge, the Divine Being is Almighty and Omniscient. In short, by adding Infinity to any kind of Perfection we enjoy, and by joining all these different kinds of Perfections in one Being we form our Idea of the great Sovereign of Nature.

Though every one who thinks must have made this Observation, I shall produce Mr. Locke's Authority to the same purpose, out of his Essay on Human Understanding. 'If we examine the Idea we have of the incomprehensible Supreme Being, we shall find that we come by it the same way and that the complex Ideas we have both of God and separate Spirits are made up of the simple Ideas we receive from Reflection or having from what we experiment in our selves got the Ideas of Existence and Duration of Knowledge and Power, of Pleasure and Happiness, and of several other Qualities and Powers, which it is better to have than to be without when we would frame an Idea the most suitable we can to the Supreme Being we enquire every one of these with our Idea of Infinity and so putting them together, make our Complex Idea of God.'

It is not impossible that there may be many kinds of Spiritual Perfection besides those which are lodged in a human Soul but it is impossible that we should have Ideas of any kind of Perfection except those of which we have some small Rays and short imperfect Strokes in our selves. It would be therefore a very high Presumption to determine whether the Supreme Being has not many more Attributes than those which enter in our Conceptions of him. This is certain that if there be any kind of Spiritual Perfection which is not marked out in a human Soul it belongs in its Fulness to the Divine Nature.

Several eminent Philosophers have imagined that the Soul in her separate State may have new Faculties springing up in her which she is not capable of exerting during her present Union with the Body and whether these Faculties may not correspond with other Attributes in the Divine Nature, and open to us hereafter new Matter of Wonder and Adoration we are altogether ignorant. This, as I have said before we ought to acquiesce in that the Sovereign Being the great Author of Nature has in him all possible Perfection as well in Kind as in Degree, to speak according to our Methods of reasoning.¹ I shall only add under this Head that when we have raised our Notion of this Infinite Being as high as it is possible for the Mind of Man to go it will still infinitely short of what He really is. There is no end of his Greatness. The most exalted Creature he has made is only capable of adoring it none but himself can comprehend it.

The Advice of the Son of Sirach is very just and sublime in this Light by his Word all things consist. We may speak much, and yet come short wherefore in sin, for it is all. How shall we be able to know if him? For he is great above all his Works. The Lord is terrible and very great, and marvellous in his Power. When you worship the Lord, exalt him as much as you can, for he will far exceed. And when you exalt him, put forth all your strength, and be not weary, for you can never go far enough. Who hath seen him, that he might tell us? And who can magnify him as he is? There are yet hid greater things than these, for we have seen but a few of his Works.'

I have here only considered the Supreme Being by the Light of Reason and Philosophy. If we would see him in all the Wonders of his Mercy we must have recourse to Revelation, which represents him to us not only as infinitely Great and Glorious, but as infinitely Good and Just in his Dispensations towards Man but as this is a Theory which falls under every one's Consideration, tho' indeed it can never be sufficiently considered, I shall here only take notice of that habitual Worship and Veneration which we ought to pay to this Almighty Being. We should often refresh our Minds with the Thought of him, and annihilate our selves before him, in the Contemplation of our own Worthlessness, and of his transcendent Excellency and Perfection. This would imprint in our Minds such a constant and uninterrupted Awe and Veneration as that which I am here recommending, and which is in reality a kind of incessant Prayer, and reasonable Humiliation of the Soul before him who made it.

This would effectually kill in us all the little Seeds of Pride, Vanity and Self conceit, which we are apt to shoot up in the Minds of such whose Thoughts turn more on those comparative Advantages which they enjoy over some of their Fellow-Creatures, than on that infinite Distance which is placed between them and the Supreme Model of all Perfection. It would likewise quicken our Desires and Endeavours of uniting our selves to him by all the Acts of Religion and Virtue.

Such an habitual Homage to the Supreme Being would, in a particular manner, banish from among us that prevailing Impiety of using his Name on the most trivial Occasions.

I find the following Passage in an excellent Sermon, preached at the Funeral of a Gentleman who was in Honour to his Country, and a more diligent as well as successful Enquirer into the Works of Nature, than any other our Nation has ever produced.² 'He had the profoundest Veneration for the Great God of Heaven and Earth that I have ever observed in any Person. The very Name of God was never mentioned by him without a Pause and a visible Stop in his Discourse, in which, one that knew him most particularly above twenty Years, has told me, that he was so exact, that he does not remember to have observed him once to fail in it.'

Every one knows the Veneration which was paid by the Jews to a Name so great, wonderful and holy. They would not let it enter even into their religious Discourses. What can we then think of those who make use of so tremendous a Name in the ordinary Expressions of their Anger, Mirth, and most impertinent Passions? Of those who admit it into the most familiar Questions and Assertions, ludicrous Phrases and Works of Humour? not to mention those who violate it by solemn Perjuries? It would be an Affront to Reason to endeavour to set forth the Horror and Prophaneity of such a Practice. The very mention of it exposes it sufficiently to those in whom the Light of Nature, not to say Religion, is not utterly extinguished. O

IT is a very honest Action to be studious to produce other Men's Merit, and I make no scruple of saying I have as much of this Temper as any Man in the World. It would not be a thing to be bragg'd of, but that it is what any Man may be Master of who will take Pains enough for it. Much Observation of the Unworthiness in being pained at the Excellence of another, will bring you to a Scorn of yourself for that Unwillingness. And when you have got so far, you will find it a greater Pleasure than you ever before knew, to be zealous in promoting the Fame and Welfare of the Praise worthy. I do not speak this as pretending to be a mortified self denying Man, but as one who has turned his Ambition into a right Channel. I claim to my self the Merit of having extorted excellent Productions from a Person of the greatest Abilities, who would not have let them appear by any other Means to have animated a few young Gentlemen into worthy Pursuits, who will be a Glory to our Age and at all Times, and by all possible Means in my Power, undermined the Interests of Ignorance, Vice, and Folly, and attempted to substitute in their Stead, Learning, Piety, and good Sense. It is from this honest Heart that I find myself honoured as a Gentleman Usher to the Arts and Sciences. Mr Trellet and Mr Pope have, it seems, this Idea of me. The former has writ me an excellent Paper of Verses in Praise, forsooth, of my self and the other enclosed for my perusal an admirable Poem² which, I hope, will shortly see the Light. In the mean time I cannot suppress any Thought of his, but insert his Sentiment about the dying Words of Adrian. I won't determine in the Case he mentions, but have thus much to say in favour of his Argument, that many of his own Works which I have seen, convince me that very pretty and very sublime Sentiments may be lodged in the same Bosom without diminution to its Greatness.

Mr SPECTATOR,

'I was the other day in Company with five or six Men of some Learning where chancing to

² The Temple of Fame.

'mention the famous Verses which the Emperor Adrian spoke on his Death bed, they were all agreed that 'twas a Piece of Gayety unworthy that Prince in those Circumstances. I could not but dissent from this Opinion. Methinks it was by no means a gay, but a very serious Soliloquy to his Soul at the Port of his Departure. In which Sense I naturally took the Verses at my first reading them when I was very young and before I knew what Interpretation the World generally put upon them.

'At milia vagula, Hardi la,

'Hæstes Cæmæque cerperis,

'Quæ r'ere abilis in loco!

'Pallidula, rigida, r'ridula,

'Nec (ut soles) dabis Teem!

'Alas, my Soul! the pleasing Companion of this Body, thou'st fleeing thing that art now deserting it! whether art thou flying to what unknown Region! Thou art all trembling, fearful, and surpris'd. Now what is become of thy former Wit and Humour! thou'st all just and be gay & merry. I confess I cannot apprehend where lies the Trisling in all this. 'tis the most natural and obvious Reflexion imaginable to a dying Man and if we consider the Emperor was a Heathen, that Doubt concerning the future Fate of his Soul will seem so far from being the Effect of Want of Thought, that 'twas scarce reasonable he should think otherwise. Not to mention that here is a plain Confession included of his Belief in its Immortality. The diminutive Epithets of Vagula, stolidula, and the rest, appear not to me as Expressions of Levity, but rather of Endearment and Concern, such as we find in Catullus, and the Authors of Hendrick give after him, where they are used to express the utmost Love and Tenderness for their Mistresses. - - - If you think me right in my Opinion of the last Words of Adrian, be pleas'd to insert this in the Spectator, if not, to suppress it.

I am, &c.

*At, fleeing spirit! wandering fire,
That long hast warm'd my tender breast,
Must thou no more thus frisk inspire!
No more a pleasing, cheerful guest!
With'er, ah, with'er art thou flying,
To that dark, undiscover'd shore!
Thou seem'st all trembling, allivering, dying,
And wilt and I must be no more*

Two days after the insertion of this letter from Pope, Steele wrote to the young poet (Nov. 12) 'I have read over your "Temple of Fame" twice, and cannot find anything amiss of weight enough to call a fault but see in it a thousand thousand beauties. Mr Addison shall see it tomorrow after his perusal of it I will let you know his thoughts. I desire you would let me know whether you are at leisure or not? I have a design which I shall open a month or two hence, with the assistance of a few like yourself

To the supposed Author of the Spectator
In Court's lucid air, and a shew dress Stage, How long the War's a' Wat' with Virtue's age!
Exhausted by this prostituted Fair,
Our Youth run headlong in the fatal Snare

'If your thoughts are unexpressed I shall explain myself further' This design was the Gravamen, which Steele was about to establish as the successor to the Spectator, and here we find him at work on the foundations of his new Journal while the finishing strokes are being given to the Spectator. Pope in his reply to Steele said (Nov. 16) 'I shall be very ready and glad to contribute to any design that tends to the advantage of mankind which, I am sure, all you do. I wish I had but as much capacity as leisure for I am perfectly idle (a sign I have not much capacity)'. If you will entertain the best opinion of me, be pleased to think me your friend. Assure Mr Addison of my most faithful service of every one's esteem he must be assured already. About a fortnight later, returning to the subject of Addison's verses, Pope wrote to Steele in reply to subsequent private discussion of the subject (Nov. 29) 'I am sorry you published that notion about Addison's verses as mine had I imagined you would use my name, I should have expressed my sentiments with more modesty and diffidence. I only wrote to have your opinion, and not to publish my own, which I distrusted.' Then after defending his view of the poem, and commenting upon the Latin diminutives, he adds, 'perhaps I should be much better pleased if I were told you called me "your little friend," than if you complimented me with the title of "a great genius," or "an eminent hand," as Jacob [Johnson] does "all his authors." Steele's general reply produced from Pope, as final result of the above letter to the Spectator, one of the most popular of his short pieces. Steele wrote (Dec. 4) 'This is to desire of you that you would please to make an ode as of a cheerful dying spirit that is to say, the Emperor Adrian's "animus togula," put into two or three stanzas for music. If you will comply with this and send me word so, you will very particularly oblige RICHARD STRETT'. This was written two days before the appearance of the last number of his Spectator. Pope answered, 'I do not send you word I will do, but have already done the thing you desire of me, and sent his poem of three stanzas, called I AM DYING CHRISTIAN TO HIS SOUL.

'Vital spark of heavenly flame,' &c.

These two letters were published by Warburton, but are not given by Pope in the edition of his correspondence, published in 1737, and the poem has no place in the collected works of 1717. It has been said that if the piece had been written in 1712 Steele would have inserted it in the Spectator. But it was not received until the last number of the Spectator had been published. Three months then elapsed before the appearance of the Guardian to which Pope contributed eight papers. Pope, on his part, would be naturally unwilling to connect with the poem the few words he had sent with it to Steele, saying, 'You have it (as Cowley

To the SPECTATOR

SIR,

'YOU have often given us very excellent Dis'courses against that unnatural Custom of 'Parents, in forcing their Children to marry con'trary to their Inclinations My own Case, with'out further Preface, I will lay before you, and

'leave you to judge of it My Father and Mo'ther both being in declining Years would fain
'see me, their eldest Son, as they call it settled
'I am as much for that as they can be, but I must 'be settled it seems, not according to my own,
'but their liking Upon this account I am teaz'd
'every Day, because I have not yet fallen in love,
'in spite of Nature, with one of a neighbouring
'Gentleman's Daughters, for out of their abund'ant Generosity, they give me the choice of four 'Jack, begins my Father, Mrs Catherine is a 'fine Woman—Yes, Sir, but she is rather too 'old—She will make the more discreet
'Manager, Boy Then my Mother phys her 'part Is not Mrs Betty exceeding fair? Yes,
'Madam, but she is of no Conversation, she has 'no Fire, no agreeable Vivacity, she neither 'speaks nor looks with Spirit True, Son but 'for those very Reasons, she will be an easy, soft,
'obliging, tractable Creature After all, cries an 'old Aunt, (who belongs to the Class of those 'who read Plays with Spectacles on) what think 'you, Nephew, of proper Mrs Dorothy? What 'do I think? why I think she cannot be above six 'foot two inches high Well, well, you may 'bunter as long as you please, but Height of 'Stature is commanding and majestic Come,
'come, says a Cousin of mine in the Family, I'll 'fit him Fidella is yet behind—Pretty
'Miss Fiddy must please you—Oh! your 'very humble Servant, dear Cos she is as much 'too young as her eldest Sister is too old Is it 'so indeed, quoth she, good Mr Pert? You who 'are but barely turned of twenty two, and Miss
'Fiddy in half a Year's time will be in her Teens,
'and she is capable of learning any thing Then
'she will be so observant, she'll cry perhaps now 'and then, but never be angry Thus they will 'think for me in this matter, wherein I am more 'particularly concerned than any Body else If 'I name any Woman in the World, one of these 'Daughters has certainly the same Qualities
'You see by these few Hints, Mr SPECTATOR,
'what a comfortable Life I lead To be still more 'open and free with you, I have been passionately 'fond of a young Lady (whom give me leave to 'call Miranda) now for these three Years I 'have often urged the Matter home to my Parents
'with all the Submission of a Son, but the Im'patience of a Lover Pray, Sir, think of three 'Years what inexpressible Scenes of Inquietude,
'what Variety of Misery must I have gone thro'
'in three long whole Years? Miranda's Fortune
'is equal to those I have mention'd but her 'Relations are not Intimates with mine Ah!
'there's the Rub Miranda's Person, Wit, and 'Humour, are what the nicest Fancy could im'agine and though we know you to be so elegant 'a Judge of Beauty, yet there is none among all 'your various Characters of fine Women prefer'able to Miranda In a Word, she is never 'guilty of doing any thing but one amiss, (if she 'can be thought to do amiss by me) in being as 'blind to my Faults, as she is to her own Perfec-
'tions

I am, SIR,

Your very humble obedient Servant, Dusterus

'but as far as I can remember, the whole Dispute about me has been, whether such a thing was proper for the Child to do, or not? Or whether such or such Food was the more wholesome for the young Lady to eat? This was ill for my Shape, that for my Complexion, and t'other for my Eyes I am not extravagant when I tell you, I do not know that I have trod upon the very Earth since I was ten Years-old A Couch or Chair I am obliged to for all my Motions from one Place to another ever since I can remember All who had to do to instruct me, have ever been bringing Stories of the notable things I have said and the Womanly manner of my behaving my self upon such and such an Occasion This has been my State, till I came towards Years of Womanhood, and ever since I grew towards the Age of Fifteen, I have been abused after another Manner Now, forsooth, I am so killing, no one can safely speak to me Our House is frequented by Men of Sense, and I love to ask Questions when I fall into such Conversation but I am cut short with something or other about my bright Eyes There is, Sir, a Language particular for talking to Women in and none but those of the very first good Breeding (who are very few, and who seldom come into my way) can speak to us without regard to our Sex Among the generality of those they call Gentlemen, it is impossible for me to speak upon any subject whatsoever, without provoking somebody to say, Oh! to be sure fine Mrs such-a-one must be very particularly acquainted with all that, all the World will contribute to her Entertainment and Information Thus, Sir, I am so handsome, that I murder all who approach me, so wise, that I want no new Notices and so well bred, that I am treated by all that know me like a Fool, for no one will answer as if I were their Friend or Companion Pray, Sir, be pleased to take the part of us Beauties and Fortunes into your Consideration, and do not let us be thus flattered out of our Senses I have got an Hussey of a Maud, who is most craftily given to this ill Quality I was at first diverted with a certain Absurdity the Creature was guilty of in every thing she said She is a Country Girl, and in the Dialect of the Shire she was born in, would tell me that every body reckon'd her Lady had the purest Red and White in the World Then she would tell me, I was the most like one Susly Dobson in their Town, who made the Miller make away with himself, and walk afterwards in the Corn Field where they used to meet With all this, this cunning Hussey can lay Letters in my way, and put a Billet in my Gloves, and then stand in it she knows nothing of it I do not know, from my Birth to this Day, that I have been ever treated by any one as I ought and if it were not for a few Books which I delight in, I should be at this Hour a Novice to all common Sense Would it not be worth your while to lay down Rules for Behaviour in this Case, and tell People, that we Fair ones expect honest plain Answers as well as other People? Why must I, good Sir, because I have a good Air, a fine Complexion, and am in the Bloom of my Years, be mus-led in all my

'Actions? and have the Notions of Good and Ill confounded in my Mind, for no other Offence, but because I have the Advantages of Beauty and Fortune? Indeed, Sir, what with the silly Homage which is paid to us by the sort of People I have above spoken of, and the utter Negligence which others have for us, the Conversation of us young Women of Condition is no other than what must expose us to Ignorance and Vanity, if not Vice All this is humbly submitted to your Spectatorial Wisdom, by,

Mr SPECTATOR,
'I am in the Condition of the Idol you was once pleased to mention, and Bar keeper of a Coffee-house I believe it is needless to tell you the Opportunities I must give, and the Importunities I suffer But there is one Gentleman who besieges me as close as the French did Bouchan His Gravity makes him work cautious, and his regular Approaches denote a good Engineer You need not doubt of his Oratory, as he is a Lawyer and especially since he has had so little Use of it at Westminster, he may spare the more for me
'What then can weak Woman do? I am willing to surrender, but he would have it at Discretion, and I with Discretion. In the meantime, whilst we parly our several Interests are neglected. As his Siege grows stronger, my Leg grows weaker, and while he pleads at my Bar, none come to him for Counsel but in Fortia. Paupers. Dear Mr SPECTATOR, advise him not to insist upon hard Articles, nor by his irregular Desires contradict the well meaning Lines of his Countenance. If we were agreed we might settle to something, as soon as we could determine where we should get most, by the Law, at the Coffee house, or at Westminster.

That Mr Sly name the said Officers, provided he will answer for their Principles and Morals. F

Spem longam rescies — Hor

MY Four Hundred and Seventy First Speculation turned upon the Subject of Hope in general. I design this Paper as a Speculation upon that vain and foolish Hope, which is misemployed on Temporal Objects, and produces many Sorrows and Calamities in human Life.

It is a Precept several times inculcated by Horace, that we should not entertain in Hope of any thing in Life which lies at a great Distance from us. The Shortness and Uncertainty of our Time here, makes such a kind of Hope unreasonable and absurd. The Grave lies unseen between us and the Object which we reach after. Where one Man lives to enjoy the Good he has in view, ten thousand are cut off in the Pursuit of it.

It happens likewise unluckily, that one Hope no sooner dies in us but another rises up in its stead. We are apt to fancy that we shall be happy and satisfied if we possess ourselves of such and such particular Enjoyments but either by reason of their Emptiness, or the natural Inquietude of the Mind we have no sooner gained one Point but we extend our Hopes to another. We still find new inviting Scenes and Landships lying behind those which at a Distance terminated our View.

The natural Consequences of such Reflections are these that we should take Care not to let our Hopes run out into too great a Length, that we should sufficiently weigh the Objects of our Hope, whether they be such as we may reasonably expect from them what we propose in their Fruition, and whether they are such as we are pretty sure of attaining, in case our Life extend itself so far. If we hope for things which are at too great a Distance from us, it is possible that we may be intercepted by Death in our Progress towards them. If we hope for things of which we have not thoroughly considered the value our Disappointment will be greater than our Pleasure in the Fruition of them. If we hope for what we are not likely to possess, we act and think in vain, and make Life a greater Dream and Shadow than it really is.

Many of the Miseries and Misfortunes of Life proceed from our Want of Consideration, in one or all of these Particulars. They are the Rocks on which the frangible Tribe of Lovers daily split, and on which the Bankrupt, the Politician, the Alchemist and Projector are cast away in every Age. Men of warm Imaginations and towering Thoughts are apt to overlook the Goods of Fortune (which are) near them for something that glitters in the Sight at a distance to neglect solid and substantial Happiness, for what is showy and superficial, and to content that Good which lies within their reach, for that which they are not capable of attaining. Hope calculates its Schemes for a long and durable Life presses forward to imaginary Points of Bliss, and grasps at Impossibilities, and consequently very often ensnares into Beggary, Ruin and Dishonour.

What I have here said, my critic as a Moral to an Arabian Fable, which I find translated into French by Monsieur Galland.² The Fable lies in it such a wild, but natural Simplicity, that I question not but my Reader will be as much pleased with it as I have been, and that he will consider himself, if he reflects on the several Amusements of Hope which have sometimes pressed in his Mind, as a near Relation to the Persian Glass Man.

Alnaschar, says the Fable, was a very idle Fellow, that never would set his Hand to any Business during his Father's Life. When his Father died, he left him to the value of an hundred Drachmas in Persian Money. Alnaschar, in order to make the best of it, hid it out in Glasses, Bottles, and the finest Earthen Ware. These he piled up in a large open Basket, and having made choice of a very little Shop, placed the Basket at his Feet, and leaned his Back upon the Wall, in Expectation of Customers. As he sat in this Posture with his Eyes upon the Basket, he fell into a most amusing Train of Thought, and was overheard by one of his Neighbours, as he talked to himself in the following manner. This Basket, says he, cost me at the Wholesale Merchant's an Hundred Drachmas, which is all I have in the World. I shall quickly make two hundred of it, by selling it in Retail. These two hundred Drachmas will in a very little while rise to four

Hundred, which of course will amount in time to four Thousand Four Thousand Drachmas cannot fail of making Eight Thousand As soon as by this means I am Master of Ten Thousand, I will lay aside my Trade of a Glass Man, and turn Jeweller I shall then deal in Diamonds, Pearls, and all sorts of rich Stones When I have got together as much Wealth as I can well desire, I will make a Purchase of the finest House I can find, with Lands, Slaves, Eunuchs and Horses I shall then begin to enjoy my self, and make a noise in the World I will not, however, stop there, but still continue my Traffick, till I have got together an Hundred Thousand Drachmas When I have thus made my self Master of an hundred thousand Drachmas, I shall naturally set my self on the foot of a Prince, and will demand the Grand Visier's Daughter in Marriage, after having represented to that Minister the Information which I have received of the Beauty, Wit, Discretion, and other high Qualities which his Daughter possesses I will let him know at the same time, that it is my Intention to make him a Present of a thousand Pieces of Gold on our Marriage-Night As soon as I have married the Grand Visier's Daughter, I'll buy her ten black Eunuchs, the youngest and best that can be got for Money I must afterwards make my Father-in Law a Visit with a great Train and Equipage And when I am placed at his Right hand, which he will do of course, if it be only to Honour his Daughter, I will give him the thousand Pieces of Gold which I promised him, and afterwards, to his great Surprise, will present him another Purse of the same Value, with some short Speech, as, Sir, you see I am a Man of my Word I always give more than I promise

When I have brought the Princess to my House, I shall take particular care to breed in her a due Respect for me, before I give the Reins to Love and Dalliance To this end I shall confine her to her own Apartment, make her a short Visit, and talk but little to her Her Women will represent to me, that she is inconsolable by reason of my Unkindness, and beg me with Tears to caress her, and let her sit down by me, but I shall still remain inexorable, and will turn my Back upon her all the first Night Her Mother will then come and bring her Daughter to me, as I am seated upon my Sofa The Daughter, with Tears in her Eyes, will sing herself at my Feet, and beg of me to receive her into my Favour Then will I, to imprint in her a thorough Veneration for my Person, draw up my Legs and spurn her from me with my Foot, in such a manner that she shall fall down several Paces from the Sofa

Anaschar was entirely swallowed up in this Chimerical Vision, and could not forbear acting with his Foot what he had in his Thoughts So that unluckily striking his Basket of brittle Ware, which was the Foundation of all his Grandeur, he kicked his Glasses to a great distance from him into the Street, and broke them into ten thousand Pieces

O vera Phrygiae neque enim Phryges! — Virg

AS I was the other day standing in my Bookseller's Shop, a pretty young Thing about Eighteen Years of Age, stept out of her Coach, and brushing by me, beck'ned the Man of the Shop to the further end of his Counter, where she whispered something to him with an attentive Look, and at the same time presented him with a Letter After which, pressing the End of her Fan upon his Hand, she delivered the remaining part of her Message, and withdrew I observed, in the midst of her Discourse, that she flushed, and cast an Eye upon me over her Shoulder, having been informed by my Bookseller, that I was the Man of the short Face, whom she had so often read of Upon her passing by me, the pretty blooming Creature smiled in my Face, and dropped me a Curtsie She scarce gave me time to return her Salute, before she quitted the Shop with an easie Scuttle, and stepped again into her Coach, giving the Footman Directions to drive where they were bid. Upon her Departure, my Bookseller gave me a Letter, superscribed To the ingenious Spectator, which the young Lady had desired him to deliver into my own Hands, and to tell me that the speedy Publication of it would not only oblige her self, but a whole Tea-Table of my Friends I opened it therefore, with a Resolution to publish it, whatever it should contain, and am sure, if any of my Male Readers will be so severely critical as not to like it, they would have been as well pleased with it as my self, had they seen the Face of the pretty Scribe

Mr SPECTATOR, London, Nov 1712
 'You are always ready to receive any useful Hint or Proposal, and such, I believe, you will think one that may put you in way to employ the most idle part of the Kingdom I mean that part of Mankind who are known by the Name of the Womens-Men or Beaus, &c Mr SPECTATOR, you are sensible these pretty Gentlemen are not made for any Manly Employments, and for want of Business are often as much in the Vapours as the Ladies Now what I propose is this, that since Knotting is again in fashion, which has been found a very pretty Amusement, that you would recommend it to these Gentlemen as something that may make them useful to the Ladies they admire And since 'tis not inconsistent with any Game, or other Diversion, for it may be done in the Phrygians, in their Coaches, at the Tea-Table, and, in short, in all Places where they come for the sake of the Ladies (except at Church, be pleased to forbid it there, to prevent Mistakes) it will be easily complied with 'Tis beside an Employment that allows, as we see by the Fair Sex, of many Graces, which will make the Beaus more readily come into it, it shews a white Hand and Diamond Ring to great advantage, it leaves the Eyes at full liberty to be employed as before, as also the Thoughts, and the Tongue In short, it seems in every respect so proper, that 'tis needless to

'in such a manner as to transform the most agreeable Beauty into the most odious Monster

'It is very disingenuous to level the best of Mankind with the worst, and for the Faults of Particulars to degrade the whole Species. Such Methods tend not only to remove a Man's good Opinion of others, but to destroy th^t Reverence for himself, which is a great Guard of Innocence, and a Spring of Virtue

'It is true indeed that there are surprising Mixtures of Beauty and Deformity, of Wisdom and Folly, Virtue and Vice, in the Human Race such a Disparity is found among Numbers of the same Kind, and every Individual, in some Instances, or at some Times, is so unequal to himself, that Man seems to be the most varying and inconsistent Being in the whole Creation. So that the Question in Morality, concerning the Dignity of our Nature, may at first sight appear like some difficult Questions in Natural Philosophy in which the Arguments on both Sides seem to be of equal Strength. But as I began with considering this Point as it relates to Action, I shall here borrow an admirable Reflection from Monsieur Pascal, which I think sets it in its proper Light

'It is of dangerous Consequence, says he, to represent to Man how near he is to the Level of Beasts, without shewing him at the same time his Greatness. It is likewise dangerous to let him see his Greatness, without his Meanness. It is more dangerous yet to leave him ignorant of either, but very beneficial that he should be made sensible of both. Whatever Imperfections we may have in our Nature, it is the Business of Religion and Virtue to rectify them, as far as is consistent with our present State. In the mean time, it is no small Encouragement to generous Minds to consider that we shall put them all off with our Mortality. That sublime Manner of Salutation with which the Jews approached their Kings,

'O King, live for ever!

'may be addressed to the lowest and most despised Mortal among us, under all the Infirmit^{ies} and Distresses with which we see him surrounded. And whoever believes the Immortality of the Soul, will not need a better Argument for the Dignity of his Nature, nor a stronger Incitement to Actions suitable to it

'I am naturally led by this Reflection to a Subject I have already touched upon in a former Letter, and cannot without pleasure call to mind the Thoughts of Cicero to this purpose, in the close of his Book concerning Old Age. Every one who is acquainted with his Writings, will remember that the elder Cato is introduced in that Discourse as the Speaker, and Scipio and Lælius as his Auditors. This venerable Person is represented looking forward as it were from the Verge of extreme Old Age, into a future State, and rising into a Contemplation on the unperishable Part of his Nature, and its Existence after Death. I shall collect Part of his Discourse. And as you have formerly offered some Argu-

'ments for the Soul's Immortality, agreeable both to Reason and the Christian Doctrine, I believe your Readers will not be displeased to see how the same great Truth shines in the Pomp of a Roman Eloquence

"This, says Cato, is my firm Persuasion, that since the human Soul exerts it self with so great Activity, since it has such a Remembrance of the Past, such a Concern for the Future, since it is enriched with so many Arts, Sciences and Discoveries, it is impossible but the Being which contains all these must be Immortal

"The elder Cyrus, just before his Death, is represented by XENOPHON speaking after this Manner. 'I think not, my dearest Children, that when I depart from you I shall be no more, but remember, that my Soul, even while I lived among you, was invisible to you, yet by my Actions you were sensible it existed in this Body. Believe it therefore existing still, though it be still unseen. How quickly would the Honours of illustrious Men perish after Death, if their Souls performed nothing to preserve their Fame! For my own part, I never could think that the Soul while in a mortal Body, lives, but when departed out of it, dies, or that its Consciousness is lost when it is discharged out of an unconscious Habitation. But when it is freed from all corporeal Alliance, then it truly exists. Further, since the Human Frame is broken by Death, tell us what becomes of its Parts? It is visible whether the Materials of other Beings are translated, namely to the Source from whence they had their Birth. The Soul alone, neither present nor departed, is the Object of our Eyes

"Thus Cyrus. But to proceed. No one shall persuade me, Scipio, that your worthy Father, or your Grandfathers Paulus and Africanus, or Africanus his Father, or Uncle, or many other excellent Men whom I need not name, performed so many Actions to be remembered by Posterity without being sensible that Futurity was their Right. And, if I may be allowed an old Man's Privilege, to speak of my self, do you think I would have endured the Fatigue of so many wearisome Days and Nights both at home and abroad, if I imagined that the same Boundary which is set to my Life must terminate my Glory? Were it not more desirable to have worn out my days in Ease and Tranquility, free from Labour, and without Emulation? But I know not how, my Soul has always raised it self, and looked forward on Futurity, in this View and Expectation, that when it shall depart out of Life, it shall then live for ever and if this were not true, that the Mind is immortal, the Souls of the most worthy would not, above all others, have the strongest Impulse to Glory. What besides this is the Cause that the wisest Men die with the greatest Acquiescence, the ignorant with the greatest Concern? Does it not seem that those Minds which have the most extensive Views, foresee they are removing to a happier Condition, which those of a narrower Sight do not perceive? I, for my part, am "transported with the Hope of seeing your Ancestors, whom I have honoured and loved, and am earnestly desirous of meeting not only those excellent Persons whom I have known, but those too of whom I have heard and read, and of whom I myself have written nor would I be detained from so pleasing a Journey. O happy Day, when I shall escape from this Croud, this Heap of Pollution, and be admitted to that Divine Assembly of exalted Spirits! When I shall go not only to those great Persons I have named but to my Cute, my Son, thro' whom a better Man was never born, and whose Funeral Rites I my self performed, when as he ought rather to have attended mine. Yet has not his Soul deserted me, but, seeming to cast back. Look on me, is gone before to those Habitations to which it was sensible I should follow him. And though I might appear to have born my Loss with Courage, I was not unaffected with it, but I comforted myself in the Assurance that it would not be long before we should meet again, and be divorced no more.

I am, SIR, &c

I question if I put my Reader will be very much pleased to hear, that the Gentleman who has obliged the World with the foregoing Letter, and who was the Author of the 210th Speculation on the Immortality of the Soul, (the 375th on Virtue in Distress,) the 525th on Conjugal Love, and two or three other very fine ones among those which are not lettered at the end, will soon publish a noble Poem, intitled An Ode to the Creator of the World, occasioned by the Fragments of Orpheus.

Finem tendens opus —Hor

SURPRIZE is so much the Life of Stories, that every one runs at it, who endeavours to please by telling them. Smooth Delivery, an elegant Choice of Words, and a sweet Arrangement, are all beautifying Graces, but not the particulars in this Point of Conversation which either long command the Attention, or strike with the Violence of a sudden Passion, or occasion the burst of Laughter which recompenses Humour. I have sometimes fancied that the Mind is in this case like a Traveller who sees a fine Seat in Haste he acknowledges the Delightfulness of a Walk set with Regularity, but would he tarry, if he were obliged to pass it over, when the first View had let him into all its Beauties from one End to the other.

However, a Knowledge of the Success which Stories will have when they are attended with a Turn of Surprise, as it has happily made the Characters of some, so has it also been the Ruin of the Characters of others. There is a Set of Men who outrage Truth, instead of affecting us with a Manner in telling it, who over-leap the Line of Probability, that they may be seen to move out of the common Road, and endeavour only to make their Hearers stare, by imposing upon them with a kind of Nonsense against the Philosophy of Nature, or such a Heap of Wonders told upon their own Knowledge, as it is not likely one Man should ever have met with.

I have been led to this Observation by a Company into which I fell accidentally. The Subject of Antipathies was a proper Field wherein such false Surprises might exult, and there were those present who appeared very fond to shew it in its full Extent of traditional History. Some of them, in a learned manner, offered to our Consideration the miraculous Powers which the Effluvia of Cheese have over Bodies whose Pores are disposed to receive them in a noxious manner; others gave an account of such who could indeed bear the sight of Cheese, but not the Taste for which they brought a Reason from the Milk of their Nurses. Others again discours'd, without endeavouring at Reasons, concerning an unconquerable Aversion which some Stomachs have against a Joint of Meat when it is whole, and the eager Inclination they have for it, when, by its being cut up, the Shape which had affected them is altered. I rom hence they passed to Eels, then to Parsnips, and so from one Aversion to another, till we had work'd up ourselves to such a pitch of Complaisance, that when the Dinner was to come in, we enquired the name of every Dish, and hop'd it would be no Offence to any in Company, before it was admitted. When we had sat down, this Civility amongst us turned the Discourse from Tables to other sorts of Aversions, and the eternal Cat, which plagues every Conversation of this nature, began then to engross the Subject. One had sweated at the Sight of it, another had smelled it out as it lay concealed in a very distant Cupboard, and he who croaked the whole set of these Stories, reckon'd up the Number of Times in which it had occasion'd him to swoon away. At last, says he, that you may all be satisfy'd of my invincible Aversion to a Cat, I shall give an unanswerable Instance. As I was going through a Street of London, where I had never been till then, I felt a general Drump and Puntness all over me, which I could not tell how to account for, till I chanced to cast my Eyes upwards, and found that I was passing under a Sign-Post on which the Picture of a Cat was hung.

The Extravagance of this Turn in the way of Surprise, gave a stop to the Talk we had been carrying on. Some were silent because they doubted, and others because they were conquered in their own Way so that the Gentleman had Opportunity to press the Belief of it upon us, and let us see that he was rather exposing himself than ridiculing others.

I must freely own that I did not all this while disbelieve every thing that was said, but yet I thought some in the Company had been endeavouring who should pitch the Bar farthest, that it had for some time been a measuring Cast, and at last my Friend of the Cat and Sign post had thrown beyond them all.

I then consider'd the Manner in which this Story had been received, and the Possibility that it might have pass'd for a Jest upon others, if he had not labour'd against himself. From hence, thought I there are two Ways which the well-bred World generally tries to correct such a Practice, when they do not think fit to contradict it flatly.

The first of these is a general Silence, which I would not advise any one to interpret in his own behalf. It is often the Effect of Prudence in avoiding a Quarrel, when they see another drive so fast, that there is no stopping him without being run against; and but very seldom the Effect of Weakness in believing suddenly. The generality of Mankind are not so grossly ignorant, as some over-bearing Spirits would persuade themselves; and if the Authority of a Character or a Caution against Danger make us suppress our Opinions, yet neither of these are of force enough to suppress our Thoughts of them. If a Man who has endeavour'd to amuse his Company with Improbabilities could but look into their Minds, he would find that they imagine he lightly esteems of their Sense when he thinks to impose upon them, and that he is less esteemed by them for his Attempt in doing so. His endeavour to glory at their Expence becomes a Ground of Quarrel, and the Scorn and Indifference with which they entertain it begins the immediate Punishment. And indeed (if we should even go no further) Silence, or a negligent Indifference has a deeper way of wounding than Opposition, because Opposition proceeds from an Anger that has a sort of generous Sentiment for the Adversary mingling along with it, while it shews that there is some Esteem in your Mind for him; in short, that you think him worth while to contest with. But Silence, or a negligent Indifference, proceeds from Anger, mixed with a Scorn that shews another he is thought by you too contemptible to be regarded.

The other Method which the World has taken for correcting this Practice of false Surprise, is to over-shoot such Talkers in their own Bow, or to raise the Story with further Degrees of Impossibility, and set up for a Voucher to them in such a manner as must let them see they stand detected. Thus I have heard a Discourse was once managed upon the Effects of Fear. One of the Company had given an account how it had turn'd his Friend's Hair grey in a Night, while the Terrors of a Shipwreck encompassed him. Another taking the Hint from hence, began, upon his own Knowledge, to enlarge his Instances of the like nature to such a Number, that it was not probable he could ever have met with them; and as he still grounded these upon different Causes, for the sake of Variety, it might seem at last, from his Share of the Conversation, almost impossible that any one who can feel the Passion of Fear should all his Life escape so common an Effect of it. By this time some of the Company grew negligent, or desirous to contradict him. But one rebuked the rest with an appearance of Severity, and with the known old Story in his Head, assured them they need not scruple to believe that the Fear of any thing can make a Man's Hair grey, since he knew one whose Perriwig had suffered so by it. Thus he stopped the Talk, and made them easy. Thus is the same Method taken to bring us to Shame, which we fondly take to increase our Character. It is indeed a kind of Mimicry, by which another puts on our Air of Conversation to show us to our selves. He seems to look ridiculous before you, that you may remember how near a Resemblance you bear to him, or that you may know he will not lie under the Imputation of believing you. Then it is that you are struck dumb immediately with a conscientious Shame for what you have been saying. Then it is that you are inwardly grieved at the Sentiments which you cannot but perceive others entertain concerning you. In short, you are against your self, the Laugh of the Company runs against you, the censuring World is obliged to you for that Triumph which you have allowed them at your own Expence and Truth, which you have injured, has a new way of being revenged on you, when by the bare Repetition of your Story you become a frequent Diversion for the [Publick].

Mr SPECTATOR,

'The other Day, walking in Pancras Church-yard, I thought of your Paper wherein you mention Epitaphs, and am of opinion this has a Thought in it worth being communicated to your Readers

*Here Innocence and Beauty lies, whose Breath Was snatch'd by early, not untimely Death Hence did she go, just as she did begin Sorrow to know, before she knew to sin Death, that does Sin and Sorrow thus prevent,
Is the next Blessing to a Life well spent*

Mr SPECTATOR,

I AM a young Widow of a good Fortune and Family, and just come to Town where I find I have Clusters of pretty Fellows come already to visit me, some dymg with Hopes, others with Fears, tho' they never saw me. Now what I would beg of you, would be to know whether I may venture to use these pert Fellows with the same Freedom as I did my Country Acquaintance. I desire your Leave to use them as to me shall seem meet, without Imputation of a Jilt; for since I make Declaration that not one of them shall have me, I think I ought to be allowed the Liberty of insulting those who have the Vanity to believe it is in their power to make me break that Resolution. There are Schools for learning to use Coils, frequented by those who never design to fight, and this useless way of wounding at the Heart, without design to wound it on either side, is the Play with which I am resolv'd to divert myself. The Man who pretends to win, I shall use like him who comes into 'a Fencing-School to pick a Quarrel I hope, upon this Foundation, you will give me the free use of the natural and artificial Force of my Eyes, Looks, and Gestures. As for verbal Promises, I will make none, but shall have no mercy on the concerted Interpreters of Glances and Motions. I am particularly skill'd in the down-cast Eye, and the Recovery into a sudden full Aspect, and was again as you may have seen sometimes praised by us Country Beauties beyond all that you have observed in Courts and Cities. Add to this, Sir, that I have a ruddy headless Look, which covers Artifice the best of any thing. Tho' I can dance very well, I affect a tottering untaught way of walking, by which I appear an easy Prey and never exert my instructed Charms till I find I have engaged a Pursuer. Be pleased, Sir, to print this Letter, which will certainly begin the Chase of a rich Widow. The many Foldings, Escapes, Returns and Doublings which I make, I shall from time to time communicate to you, for the better Instruction of all Lovers who set up, like me, for reducing the present exorbitant Power and Insolence of Man.

I am,
SIR,
Your faithful Correspondent, Relicta Lovely

Dear Mr SPECTATOR,
I depend upon your profess'd Respect for virtuous Love, for your immediate answering the Design of this Letter, which is no other than to lay before the World the Severity of certain Parents who desire to suspend the Marriage of a discreet young Woman of eighteen, three Years longer, for no other reason but that of her being too young to enter into that State. As to the consideration of Riches, my Circumstances are such, that I cannot be suspected to make my Address to her on such low Motives as Avarice or Ambition. If ever Innocence, Wit and Beauty, united their utmost Charms, they live in her. I wish you would expatiate a little on this Subject, and admonish her Parents that it may be from the very Imperfection of Human Nature it self, and not any personal Fault of her or me, that our Inclinations bustled at present may alter, and while we are arguing with our selves to put off the Enjoyment of our present Passions, our Afflictions may change their Objects in the Operation. It is a very delicate Subject to talk upon but if it were but hinted, I am in hopes it would give the Parties concern'd some Reflection that might expedite our Happiness. There is a Possibility, and I hope I may say it without Imputation of Immodesty to her, I love with the highest Honour. I say, there is a Possibility this Delay may be as painful to her as it is to me. If it be as much, it must be more, by reason of the severe Rules the Sex are under in being denied even the Relief of Complaint. If you oblige me in this, and I succeed, I promise you a Piece at my Wedding, and a Retirement suitable to your Spectatorial Dignity.

Your most humble Servant,
Eustace

SIR,
'I Yesterday heard a young Gentleman, that look'd as if he was just come to the Town, and a Scarf, upon Lvl speaking which Subject, you know, Archbishop Tillotson has so nobly handled in a Sermon in his Folio. As soon as ever he had named his Text and had opened a little the Drift of his Discourse, I was in great hopes he had been one of Sir ROBERT'S Chaplains. I have conceived so great an Idea of the charming Discourse above, that I should have thought one part of my Sabbath very well spent in hearing a Repetition of it. But alas! Mr SPECTATOR, this Reverend Divine gave us his Grace's Sermon, and yet I don't know how even I that I am sure have read it at least twenty times, could not tell what to make of it, and was at a loss sometimes to guess what the Man said at. He was so just indeed, as to give us all the Heads and the Subdivisions of the Sermon, and further I think there was not one beautiful Thought in it but what we had. But then, Sir, this Gentleman made so many pretty Additions, and he could never give us a Paragraph of the Sermon, but he introduced it with something which, methought, look'd more like a Design to show his own Ingenuity, than to instruct the People. In short, he added and curtailed in such a manner that he vexed me, inasmuch that I could not forbear thinking (what I confess I ought not to have thought of in so holy a Place) that this young Spark was as justly blamable as Bullock or Penckethman when they mend a noble Play of Shakespear or Johnson. Pray, Sir, take this into your Consideration and if we must be entertained with the Works of any of those great Men, desire these Gentlemen to give them us as they find them; that so, when we read them to our Families at home, they may the better remember they have heard them at Church.

SIR,
Your humble Servant

—Non Deficit Alter—Virg

Mr SPECTATOR,
'THERE is no Part of your Writings which I have in more Esteem than your Criticism upon Milton. It is in honourable and candid Endeavour to set the Works of our Noble Writers in the graceful Light which they deserve. You will lose much of my kind Inclination towards you, if you do not attempt the Eucomium of Spenser also, or at least indulge my Passion for that charming Author so far as to print the loose Hints I now give you on that Subject. Spenser's general Plan is the Representation of six Virtues Holiness, Temperance, Chastity, Friendship, Justice and Courtesy, in six Legends by six Persons. The six Personages are supposed under proper Allegories suitable to their respective Characters, to do all that is necessary for the full Manifestation of the respective Virtues which they are to exert.

'These one might undertake to shew under the several Heads, are admirably drawn, no Images improper, and most surprizingly beautiful. The Red-cross Knight runs through the whole Steps of the Christian Life. Guyon does all that Temperance can possibly require, Britomartis (a Woman) observes the true Rules of unaffected Chastity, Arthegal is in every Respect of Life strictly and wisely just, Calidore is rightly courteous.

In short, in Fairy Land, where Knights Errant have a full Scope to range, and to do even what Ariosto's or Orlando's could not do in the World without breaking into Credibility, Spencer's Knights have, under those six Heads, given a full and a truly Poetical System of Christian, Public, and Low Life.

His Legend of Friendship is more diffuse, and yet even there the Allegory is finely drawn, only the Heads various, one Knight could not there support all the Parts.

To do honour to his Country, Prince Arthur is an Universal Hero in Holiness, Temperance, Chastity, and Justice super excellent. For the same Reason, and to compliment Queen Elizabeth, Gloriana, Queen of Furies, whose Court was the Asylum of the Oppressed, represents that Glorious Queen. At her Commands all these Knights set forth, and only at her's the Red cross Knight destroys the Dragon. Guyon overturns the Bower of Bliss, Arthegal (i.e. Justice) beats down Gezono (i.e. Philip II. King of Spain) to rescue Belge (i.e. Holland) and he beats the Granitorio (the same Philip in another Light) to restore Irena (i.e. Peace to Europe).

Chastity being the first Female Virtue, Britomartis is a Briton, her Part is fine, though it requires Explanation. His style is very Poetical, no Puns Affectations of Wit, forced Antitheses, or any of that low Tribe.

His old Words are all true English, and numbers exquisite, and since of Words there is the Mulla Renascentur, since they are all proper, such a Poem should not (any more than Milton's) subsist all of it of common ordinary Words. See Instances of Descriptions.

Causeless Jealousy in Britomartis, V 6, 14, in its Restlessness

Like as a wayward Child whose sounder Sleep Is broken with some fearful Dream's Affright,
With froward Will doth set himself to weep, Ne can be still'd for all his Nurse's Might,
But kicks, and squalls, and shrieks for fell Despight,
Now scratching her, and her loose Locks misusing, Now seeking Darkness, and now seeking Light,
Then craving Suck, and then the Suck refusing Such was this Lady's Loves in her Love's fond accusing

Curiosity occasioned by Jealousy, upon occasion of her Lover's Absence. Ibid Stan 8, 9

Then as she looked long, at last she spy'd
One coming towards her with hasty Speed,

Well-went'd she then, e'er him she plain descri'd,
That it was one sent from her Love indeed,

There entering in, they found the Good-Man's self,

Full busily unto his Work went,
Who was so well a wretched wearish Elf, With hollow Eyes and raw bone Cheeks for-scent,
As if he had in Prison long been pent Full black and griseley did his Face appear, Besmeard with Smoke that night his Light sight blent,
With rugged Beard and Hoary shaggy Hair,
The which he never wont to comb, or comely shear

35

Rude was his Garment and to Rags all run, Ne better had he, ne for better cared,
His blister'd Hands amongst the Cinders bent,
And Fingers filthy, with long Nails prepared, Right fit to rend the Food on which he fed,
His Name was Care, a Blacksmith by his Trade, That neither Day nor Night from working spared,

MY Friend the Templer whom I have so often mentioned in these Writings, having determined to lay aside his Poetical Studies, in order to a closer Pursuit of the Law has put together, as a Farewell Essay, some Thoughts concerning (Præcæptum et Actum), which he has given me leave to communicate to the Publick. They are chiefly collected from his Favourite Author, Cicero, who is known to have been an intimate Friend of Roscius the Actor, and a good Judge of (Dramatick) Performances, as well as the most eloquent Pleader of the Time in which he lived.

Cicero concludes his celebrated Books de Oratore with some Precepts for Pronunciation and Action, without which Part he affirms that the best Orator in the World can never succeed and an indifferent one, who is Master of this, shall gain much greater Applause. What could make a stronger Impression, says he, than those Exclamations of Gracchus—Whether shall I turn? Where's that I am? In what Place be I? my self? Shall I go to the Capitol?—Alas! it is too late to call my Brother's Blood! Or shall I retire to my House? Yet there I behold my Mother slain and in misery, weeping and despairing! These Breaks and Turns of Passion, it seems, were so enforced by the Eyes, Voice, and Gesture of the Speaker, that his very Enemies could not refrain from Tears. I must, says Tully, upon this the rather, because our Orators, who are as it were Actors of the Truth itself, have quitted this manner of speaking and the Players, who are but the Imitators of Truth, have taken it up.

I shall therefore pursue the Hint he has here given me, and for the Service of the British Stage I shall copy some of the Rules which this great Roman Master has laid down, yet, without confining my self wholly to his Thoughts or Words, and to adapt this Essay the more to the Purpose for which I intend it, instead of the Examples he has inserted in his Discourse out of the ancient Tragedies, I shall make use of parallel Passages out of the most celebrated of our own.

The Design of Art is to assist Nature as much as possible in the Representation of Nature. For the Appearance of Reality is that which moves us in all Representations, and these have always the greater Force, the nearer they approach to Nature, and the less they shew of Imitation.

Nature herself has assigned to every Emotion of the Soul its peculiar Cast of the Countenance, Tone of Voice, and Manner of Gesture and the whole Person, all the Features of the Face and Tones of the Voice, answer, like Strings upon musical Instruments, to the Impressions made on the Mind by the Sounds of the Voice according to the various Touches which raise them from themselves into an Acute or Grave Quick or Slow, Loud or Soft Tone. These too may be subdivided into various kinds of Tones, as the gentle, the rough, the contracted, the diffuse, the continued, the intermitted, the broken, abrupt winding, softened, or elevated. Every one of these may be employed with Art and Judgment, and all supply the Actor, as Colours do the Painter, with an expressive Variety.

Anger exerts its peculiar Voice in an acute, raised and hurrying sound. The passionate Character of King Lear is admirably drawn by Shakspeare, abounds with the strongest Instances of this kind.

—Death's Confusion!

Ferry—What Quality?—why Gloster? Gloster!
I'd speak with the Duke of Cornwall and his Wife

Ire is your form of this? My breath and Flood!
Fury! the fiery Duke!—de

Sorrow and Complaint demand a Voice quite different, flexible, slow, interrupted, and modulated in a mournful tone as in that pathetic Soliloquy of Cardinal Wolsey on his Fall.

Farewel—a long Farewel to all my Greatness!
It is the State of Man!—to-day I set forth
The leader Leazes of Hopes, to-morrow blossoms,

*And tears his blessing Honours thick upon him,
The third Day comes a Frost, a kill'd Frost, It drenches his white, good easie Man, full surely His Greatness is a ripening, ripe his Root,
And then he falls as I do*

We have likewise a fine Example of this in the whole Part of Andromache in the Distress Mother, particularly in these Lines

*I'll go, and in the Arms of my Heart I'll cherish my Child—if he must die, my Life Is wrapped in his, I shall not long survive
'Tis for his sake that I have suffer'd I see, Grieved in Captivity, and out-tried Hector Yes, my Assyrian, we'll go together!
Together to the Realm of Night—we'll go There to thy muffled Eyes I'll show, As I point him out among the Shades below*

² [Dramatick], and in first reprint

Fear expresses it self in a low, hesitating and abject Sound. If the Reader considers the following Speech of Lady Macbeth, while her husband is about the Murder of Duncan and his Grooms, he will imagine her even affrighted with the Sound of her own Voice, while she is speaking it.

*Alas! I am afraid they have arriv'd, And 'tis not done, th' Attempt, and not the Deed, Confounds us — Hark! — I laid the Daggers ready,
He could not miss them. Had he not resembled My Father as he slept, I had done it*

Courage assumes a louder tone, as in that Speech of Don Sebastian ¹

*Here sat ate all your Fury, Let Fortune empty her whole Quarter on me,
I have a Soul that like an ample Shield Can take in all, and Verge enough for more*

Pleasure dissolves into a luxurious, mild, tender, and joyous Modulation as in the following Lines in Casus Marius ²

Lavinia! O there's music in the Name, That soft'ning me to infant Tenderness, Makes my Heart spring, like the first Leaps of Life

And Perplexity is different from all these grave, but not bemoaning, with an earnest uniform Sound of Voice, as in that celebrated Speech of Hamlet

*To be, or not to be — that is the Question Whether 'tis nobler in the Mind to suffer
The Stings and Arrows of a outrageous Fortune, Or to take Arms against a Sea of Troubles,
And by opposing end them. To die, to sleep,
No more, and by a Sleep to say we end
The Heart ach, and the thousand natural Shocks That Flesh is heir to, 'tis a Consummation Devoutly to be wish'd. To die, to sleep —
To sleep, perchance to dream! Ay, there's the Rub*

*For in that sleep of Death what Dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this Mortal Coil, Must give us pause — I have a Respect That makes Calamity of so long Life,
For who would bear the Whips and Scorns of Time,
Th' Oppressor's Wrongs, the proud Man's Contumely,
The Pangs of despis'd Love, the Law's Delay,
The Insolence of Office, and the Spurns That patient Merit of th' unworthy takes,
When he himself might his Quietus make With a bare Bodkin? Who would I should fear, To groan and sweat under a weary Life?
But that the dread of something after Death,
The undiscover'd Country, from whose Bourn No Traveller returns, puzzles the Will,
And makes us rather choose those ills we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of*

As all these Varieties of Voice are to be directed by the Sense, so the Action is to be directed by the Voice, and with a beautiful Propriety, as it were to enforce it. The Arm, which by a strong Figure Tully calls The Orator's Weapon, is to be sometimes raised and extended, and the Hand by its Motion, sometimes to lead, and sometimes to follow the Words, as they are uttered. The Stamping of the Foot too has its proper Expression in Contention, Anger, or absolute Command. But the Face is the Epitome of the whole Man, and the Eyes are as it were the Epitome of the Face, for which Reason, he says, the best Judges among the Romans were not extremely pleased, even with Arcadius himself in his Masque. No Part of the Body, besides the Face, is capable of so many Changes, as there are different Emotions in the Mind, and of expressing them all by those Changes. Nor is this to be done without the Freedom of the Eyes, therefore Plautinus called one, who barely rehearsed his Speech with his Eyes fix'd, an absent Actor.

As the Countenance admits of so great Variety, it requires also great Judgment to govern it. Not that the Form of the Face is to be shifted on every Occasion, lest it turn to a farce and Buffoonery, but it is certain that the Eyes have a wonderful Power of directing the Emotions of the Mind, sometimes by a steadfast Look, sometimes by a careless one, now by a sudden Regard, then by a joyful Sprinkling, as the Sense of the Words is diversified for Action is, as it were, the Speech of the Features, and Limbs, and must therefore conform itself always to the Sentiments of the Soul. And it may be observed, that in all which relates to the Gesture, there is a wonderful Force implanted by Nature, since the Vulgar, the Unskillful, and even the most Barbarous are easily affected by this. None are moved by the Sound of Words, but those who understand the Language, and the Sense of many things is lost upon Men of a dull Apprehension, but Action is a kind of Universal Language. All Men are subject to the same Passions, and consequently know the same Mirth of them in others, by which they themselves express them.

Perhaps some of my Readers may be of Opinion, that the Hints I have here made use of, out of Cicero, are somewhat too refin'd for the Players on our Theatre. In answer to which, I venture to lay it down as a Maxim, that without good Sense no one can be a good Player, and that he is very unfit to personate the Dignity of a Roman Hero, who cannot enter into the Rules for Pronunciation and Gesture delivered by a Roman Orator.

There is another thing, which my Author does not think too minute to insist on, though it is purely mechanical, and that is the right Pitch of the Voice. On this occasion he tells the Story of Gracchus who employed a Servant with a little Ivory Pipe to stand behind him, and give him the right Pitch, as often as he wandered too far from the proper Modulation. Every Voice, says Tully, ³ has its particular Medium and Compass, and the Sweetness of Speech consists in

SIR,

'I was this Morning in a Company of your Well wishers, when we read over, with great Satisfaction, Tully's Observations on Action adapted to the British Theatre. Though, by the way, we were very sorry to find that you have disposed of another Member of your Club. Poor Sir Roger is dead, and the worthy Clergyman dying. Captain Sentry has taken Possession of a fair Estate, Will Honeycomb has married a Farmer's Daughter, and the Templar withdraws himself into the Business of his own Profession. What will all this end in? We are afraid it portends no Good to the Publick. Unless you very speedily fix a Day for the Election of new Members, we are under Apprehensions of losing the British Spectator. I hear of a Party of Ladies who intend to address you on this Subject, and question not, if you do not give us the Slip very suddenly, that you will receive Addresses from all Parts of the Kingdom to continue so useful a Work. Pray deliver us out of this perplexity, and among the Multitude of your Readers you will particularly oblige

Your most Sincere Friend and Servant,

Nec diversa tamen— Ov

THOSE who were skillful in Anatomy among the Ancients, concluded from the outward and inward Make of an Human Body, that it was the Work of a Being transcendently Wise and Powerful. As the World grew more enlightened in this Art, their Discoveries gave them fresh Opportunities of admiring the Conduct of Providence in the Formation of an Human Body. Galen was converted by his Dissections, and could not but own a Supreme Being upon a Survey of this his Handy-work. There were, indeed, many Parts of which the old Anatomists did not know the certain Use, but as they saw that most of those which they examined were adapted with admirable Art to their several Functions, they did not question but those, whose Uses they could not determine, were contrived with the same Wisdom for respective Ends and Purposes. Since the Circulation of the Blood has been found out, and many other great Discoveries have been made by our modern Anatomists, we see new Wonders in the Human Frame, and discern several important Uses for those Parts, which the Ancients knew nothing of. In short, the Body of Man is such a Subject as stands the utmost Test of Examination. Though it appears formed with the nicest Wisdom, upon the most superficial Survey of it, it still tends upon the Search, and produces our Surprise and Amazement in proportion as we pry into it. What I have here said of an Human Body, may be applied to the Body of every Animal which has been the Subject of Anatomical Observations.

The Body of an Animal is an Object adequate to our Senses. It is a particular System of Providence, that lies in a narrow Compass. The Lye is able to comprehend it, and by successive Enquiries can search into all its Parts. Could the Body of the whole Earth, or indeed the whole Universe, be thus submitted to the Examination of our Senses, were it not too big and disproportioned for our Enquiries, too unwieldy for the Management of the Lye and Hand, there is no question but it would appear to us as curious and well-contrived a Frame as that of an Human Body. We should see the same Concentration and Subserviency, the same Necessity and Usefulness, the same Beauty and Harmony in all and every of its Parts, as what we discover in the Body of every single Animal.

The more extended our Reason is, and the more able to grapple with immense Objects, the greater still are those Discoveries which it makes of Wisdom and Providence in the Work of the Creation. A Sir Isaac Newton, who stands up as the Miracle of the Present Age, can look through a whole Planetary System, consider it in its Weight, Number, and Measure, and draw from it as many Demonstrations of infinite Power and Wisdom, as a more confined Understanding is able to deduce from the System of an Human Body.

But to return to our Speculations on Anatomy, I shall here consider the Fabric and Texture of the Bodies of Animals in one particular View, which, in my Opinion, shows the Hand of a thinking and all-wise Being in their Formation, with the Evidence of a thousand Demonstrations. I think we may lay this down as an uncontested Principle, that Chance never acts in a perpetual Uniformity and Consistence with itself. If one should always sling the same number with ten thousand Dice, or we every Throw just five times less, or five times more in Number than the Throw which immediately preceded it, who would not imagine there is some invisible Power which directs the Cast? This is the Proceeding which we find in the Operations of Nature. Every kind of Animal is diversified by different Magnitudes, each of which gives rise to a different Species. Let a Man trace the Dog, or Lion kind, and he will observe how many of the Works of Nature are published, if I may use the Expression, in a variety of Editions. If we look into the Reptile World, or into those different Kinds of Animals that fill the Element of Water, we meet with the same Repetitions among several Species, that differ very little from one another, but in Size and Bulk. You find the same Creature that is drawn so large, copied out in several Proportions, and ending in Miniature. It would be tedious to produce Instances of this regular Conduct in Providence, as it would be superfluous to those who are versed in the natural History of Animals. The magnificent Harmony of the Universe is such, that we may observe innumerable Divisions running upon the same Ground. I might also extend this Speculation to the dead Parts of Nature, in which we may find Matter disposed into many similar Systems, as well in our Survey of Stars and Planets, as of Stones, Vegetables, and other sublunary Parts of the Creation.

'Mind, and the Satisfaction I promise to my self in the Possession of my new Fortune I have continued all Sir ROBERT'S Servants, except such as it was a Relief to dismiss into little Things within my Manor. Those who are in a List of the good Knight's own Hand to be in care of by me, I have quartered upon such as have taken new Leases of me, and added so many Advantages during the Lives of the Persons so quartered, that it is the Interest of those whom they are joined with, to cherish and besfriend them upon all Occasions. I find a considerable Sum of ready Money, which I am laying out among my Dependants in the common Interest, but with a Design to lend it according to their Merit rather than according to their Ability. I shall lay a Tax upon such as I have highly obliged, to become Security to me for such of their own poor Youth, whether Male or Female, as want Help towards getting into some Place in the World. I hope I shall be able to manage my Affairs so, as to improve my Fortune every Year by doing Acts of Kindness. I will lend my Money to the Use of none but indigent Men, secured by such as have ceased to be indigent by the Favour of my Family or my self. What makes this the more practicable, is, that if they will do any one Good with my Money, they are welcome to it upon their own Security. And I make no Reception against it, because the Persons who enter into the Obligations do it for their own Family. I have laid out four thousand Pounds in this way, and it is not to be imagined what a Crowd of People are obliged by it. In Cases where Sir ROBERT has recommended I have lent Money to put out Children, with a Clause which makes void the Obligation, in case the Infant dies before he is out of his Apprenticeship by which means the Kindred and Masters are extremely careful of breeding him to Industry, that he may repay it himself by his Labour, in three Years Journey-work after his Time is out for the Use of his Securities. Opportunities of this kind are all that have occurred since I came to my Estate but I assure you I will preserve a constant Disposition to catch at all the Occasions I can to promote the Good and Happiness of my Neighbourhood.

But give me leave to say before you a little Establishment which has grown out of my past Life, that I doubt not, will administer great Satisfaction to me in that Part of it, whatever that is, which is to come.

There is a Prejudice in favour of the Way of Life to which a Man has been educated, which I know not whether it would not be faulty to overcome. It is like a Partiality to the Interest of one's own Country before that of any other Nation. It is from an Habit of Thinking, grown upon me from my Youth spent in Arms, that I have ever held Gentlemen, who have preserved Modesty, Good nature, Justice, and Humanity in a Soldier's Life to be the most valuable and worthy Persons of the human Race. To pass through imminent Dangers, suffer painful Watchings, frightful Alarms, and laborious Marches for the greater part of a Man's Time, and pass the rest in a Sobriety conformable to the Rules of the most virtuous civil Life, is a Merit too great to deserve the Treatment it usually meets with among the other part of the World. But I assure you Sir, were there not very many who have this Worth, we could never have seen the glorious Events which we have in our Days. I need not say more to illustrate the Character of a Soldier, than to tell you he is the very contrary to him you observe loud, saucy, and overbearing in a red Coat about Town. But I was going to tell you, that in Honour of the Profession of Arms, I have set apart a certain Sum of Money for a Table for such Gentlemen as have served their Country in the Army, and will please from Time to Time to sojourn all, or any Part of the Year, at Cambridge. Such of them as will do me that Honour, shall find Horses, Servants, and all things necessary for their Accommodation and Enjoyment of all the Conveniences of Life in a pleasant various Country. If Colonel Camperdown be in Town, and his Abilities are not employ'd another way in the Service, there is no Man would be more welcome here. That Gentleman's thorough Knowledge in his Profession, together with the Simplicity of his Manners and Goodness of his Heart, would induce others like him to honour my Abode. And I should be glad my Acquaintance would take themselves to be invited or not, as their Characters have an Affinity to his.

I would have all my Friends know, that they need not fear (though I am become a Country Gentleman) I will trespass against their Temperance and Sobriety. No Sir I shall return so much of the good Sentiments for the Conduct of Life, which is cultivated in each other at our Club, as to contain all inordinate Pleasures. But particularly remember, with our beloved Tully that the Delight in Food consists in Desire, not Satiety. They who most passionately pursue Pleasure, seldomest arrive at it. Now I am writing to a Philosopher, I cannot forbear mentioning the Satisfaction I took in the Passage I read yesterday in the Time Tally. A Nobleman of Athens made a Compliment to Plato the Morning after he had supped at his House, Ye is Entertainment as of only please I enjoin, see them, but also the Day after I am,

My worthy Friend,

I am most obediently humble Servant,

Letters from Rome say, the whole Conversation both among Gentlemen and Ladies has turned upon the Subject of this Epistle, ever since it arrived. The Jesuit who translated it says, it loses much of the Majesty of the Original in the Italian. It seems there was an Offer of the same nature made by a Predecessor of the present Emperor to Louis the XIIIth of France, but no Lady of that Court would take the Voyage, that Sex not being at that time so much used in polit-ick Negotiations. The manner of treating the Pope is, according to the Chinese Ceremonial very respectful. For the Emperor writes to him with the Quill of a Virgin Ostrich, which was never used before but in Writing Prayers. Instructions are preparing for the Lady who shall have so much Zeal as to undertake this Pilgrimage, and be an Empress for the sake of her Religion. The Principal of the Indian Missionaries has given in a List of the reigning Sins in China, in order to prepare the Indulgences necessary to this Lady and her Retinue, in advancing the Interests of the Roman Catholic Religion in those Kingdoms

IT gives me very great Scandal to observe, I where ever I go, how much Skill, in buying all in manner of Goods, there is necessary to defend yourself from being cheated in what ever you see exposed to Sale. My Reading makes such a strong impression upon me that I should think my self a Cheat in my Way, if I should transmute any thing from another Tongue, and not acknowledge it to my Readers. I understood from a common Report, that Mr Cibber was introducing a French Play upon our Stage, and thought my self concerned to let the Town know what was his, and what foreign. When I came to the Rehearsal, I found the House so partial to one of their own Intermity that they gave every thing which was sad such Grace, Emphasis, and Force in their Action, that it was no easy matter to make any Judgment of the Performance. Mrs Oldfield, who, it seems is the Heroick Daughter, had so just a Conception of her Part, that her Action made what she spoke appear decent, just, and noble. The Passions of Terror and Compassion, they made me believe were very artfully raised, and the whole Conduct of the Play artful and surprizing. We Authors do not much relish the Indisavours of Players in this kind but have the same Disdain as Physicians and Lawyers have when Attorneys and Apothecaries give Advice. Cibber himself took the liberty to tell me, that he expected I would do him Justice, and allow the Play well prepared for his Spectators, whatever it was for his Readers. He added very many Particulars not uncourious concerning the manner of taking an Audience, and saying what not only for their superficial Applause, but also

¹ Alpina or the Heroick Daughter, a Tragedy taken from the Cut of Corneille by Colley Cibber. The play was not published until after Steele's pamphlet, 'The Crisis,' had exposed him to political and (as it necessarily followed in those days) personal detraction. Cibber then dedicated his play to Steele, referring to the custom of his calumniators since they could not deny his literary services to transfer all the merit of them to Addison upon whom he had so generously heaped more than the half of his own fame, and said "Your I enemies therefore, thus knowing that your own consent had partly justified their insinuations, eyed a great deal of their malice from being ridiculous, and fairly left you to apply to such your singular conduct what Mr. Antony says of Octavius in the play—

*Fool that I was! upon my Eagle's wings
 I bore this Wren, till I was tired with soaring,
 And now, he mounts above me!*

True hearted Steele never read his relation to his friend in this fashion. With how fine a disregard of conventional dignity is the latter part of this paper given by Steele to the hind effort to help in setting a fallen man upon his legs again!

MR SPECTATOR, Nov 27, 1712
I HAVE read this Day's Paper with a great deal of Pleasure, and could send you an Account of several Elixirs and Antidotes in your third Volume, which your Correspondents have not taken Notice of in their Advertisements, and at the same time must own to you that I have seldom seen a Shop furnished with such a Variety of Medicaments, and in which there are fewer Soporifics. The several Vehicles you have invented for conveying your unacceptable Truths to us, are what I most particularly admire, as I am afraid they are Secrets which will die with you I do not find that any of your Critical Essays are taken Notice of in this Paper, notwithstanding I

Unreknowledge'd, but doubtless by Addison, who took this indirect way of answering Dennis.
Addison's hand is further shown by the addition made to the reprint look upon them to be excellent Cleansers of the Brain, and could venture to superscribe them with an Advertisement which I have lately seen in one of our News Papers wherein there is an Account given of a Sovereign Remedy for restoring the Taste of all such Persons whose Palates have been vitiated by Distempers, unwholesome Food, or any the like Occasions. Now to let fill the Allusion notwithstanding your Criticisms, and particularly the Candour which you have discover'd in them are not the least taking Part of your Works, I find your Opinion concerning Peccat Just is it is expressed in the first Part of your fortieth Spectator, is controverted by some erminent Critics and as you now seem, to our great Grief of Heart, to be winding up your Bottoms, I hoped you would have enlarg'd a little upon that Subject. It is indeed but a single Pa-graph in your Works, and I believe those who have read it with the same Attention I have done, will think there is nothing to be objected against it. I have however drawn up some additional Arguments to strengthen the Opinion which you have there deliver'd, having endeavor'd to go to the Bottom of that Matter, which you may either publish or suppress as you think fit

Horace in my Motto says, that all Men are vain, and that they differ from one another, only as they are more or less so. Bacon has given the same Account of our Wisdom, as Horace has of our Virtue

Tous les Hommes sont fous, et, malgré tous leurs sours,

Ne different entre eux, que du plus et du moins

All Men, says he, are Fools, and, in spite of their Indevours to the contrary, differ from one another only as they are more or less so

Two or three of the old Greek Poets have given the same turn to a Sentence which describe the Happiness of Man in this Life

Τὸ ζῆν ἀλώτως, ἀνδρός ἐστὶ ευτυχούς

That Man is most happy who is the least miserable. It will not perhaps be unentertaining to the Polite Reader to observe how these three beautiful Sentences are form'd upon different Subjects by the same way of thinking but I shall return to the first of them

Our Goodness being of a comparative, and not an absolute nature, there is none who in strictness can be call'd a Virtuous Man. Every one has in him a natural Alloy, tho' one may be fuller of Dross than another. For this reason I cannot think it right to introduce a perfect or a faultless Man upon the Stage not only because such a Character is improper to move Compassion, but because there is no such a thing in Nature.
This might probably be one Reason why the SPECTATOR in one of his Papers took notice of that late invented Term call'd Poetical Justice, and the wrong Notions into which it has led some Irregular Writers. The most perfect Man has Vices enough to draw down Punishments upon his Head, and to justify Providence in regard to any Miseries that may befall him. For this reason I cannot think, but that the Instruction

'and Moral are much finer, where a Man who is virtuous in the main of his Character falls into Distress and sinks under the Blows of Fortune at the End of a Tragedy, than when he is represented as Happy and Triumphant. Such an Example corrects the Insolence of Human Nature, softens the Mind of the Beholder with Sentiments of Pity and Compassion, comforts him under his own private Affliction, and teaches him not to judge Mens Virtues by their Successes. I cannot think of one real Hero in all Antiquity so far raised above Human Infirmities, that he might not be very naturally represented in a Tragedy as plunged in Misfortunes and Calamities. The Poet may still find out some prevailing Passion or Indiscretion in his Character, and shew it in such a Manner, as will sufficiently acquit the Gods of any Injustice in his Sufferings. For as Horace observes in my Text, the best Man is faulty, tho' not in so great a degree as those whom we generally call vicious Men.

If such a strict Poetical Justice, as some Gentlemen insist upon, was to be observed in this Art, there is no manner of Reason why it should not extend to Heroick Poetry, as well as Tragedy. But we find it so little observed in Homer, that his Achilles is placed in the greatest point of Glory and Success, though his Character is Morally Vicious, and only Poetically Good, if I may use the Phrase of our modern Critics. The Aeneid is filled with Innocent, unhappy Persons Nisus and Leiratus, Lausus and Pallas come all to unfortunate Ends. The Poet takes Notice in particular, that in the Sacking of Troy, Riphe is slain, who was the most just Man among the Trojans.

—Cadit et lapsus justissimus unus, Qui fuit in Teucris et servantissimus Aequi Dys aliter visum est—

'And that Pantheus could neither be preserved by his transcendent Piety, nor by the holy Fillets of Apollo, whose Priest he was

—nec Te tua plurima Panthen Labentem pietas, nec Apollinis infula teat

Æn 1 2

'I might here mention the Practice of ancient Tragick Poets, both Greek and Latin, but as this Particular is touched upon in the Paper above mentioned, I shall pass it over in Silence. I could produce Passages out of Aristotle in favour of my Opinion, and if in one Place he says that an absolute, virtuous Man should not be represented as unhappy, this does not justify any one who shall think fit to bring in an absolutely virtuous Man upon the Stage. Those who are acquainted with that Author's Way of Writing, know very well, that to take the whole extent of his Subject into his Divisions of it, he often makes use of such Cases as are imaginary, and not reducible to Practice. He himself declares that such Tragedies are ended unhappily bore away the Prize in Theatrical Contentions, from the which ended happily, and for the Fortieth Speculation which I am now considering, as it

'has given Reasons why these are more apt to please an Audience, so it only proves that these are generally preferable to the other, tho' at the same time it affirms that many excellent Tragedies have and may be written in both kinds.

'I shall conclude with observing that though the Spectator above-mentioned is so far against the Rule of Poetical Justice, as to affirm, that good Men may meet with an unhappy Catastrophe in Tragedy, it does not say that all Men may go off unpunished. The Reason for this Distinction is very plain, namely, because the best of Men are vicious enough to justify Providence for any Misfortunes and Afflictions which may befall them, but there are many Men so criminal that they can have no Claim or Pretence to Happiness. The best of Men may deserve Punishment, but the worst of Men cannot deserve Happiness.]

Quamvis digressu veteris confusus amici, Laudo tamen—Juv

I BELIEVE most People begin the World with a Resolution to withdraw from it into a serious kind of Solitude or Retirement, when they have made themselves easie in it. Our Unhappiness is, that we find out some Excuse or other for deferring such our good Resolutions till our intended Retreat is cut off by Death. But among all kinds of People there are none who are so hard to part with the World, as those who are grown old in the heaping up of Riches. Their Minds are so warped with their constant Attention to Gain, that it is very difficult for them to give their Souls another Bent, and convert them towards those Objects, which, though they are proper for every Stage of Life, are so more especially for the last. Horace describes an old Usurer as so charmed with the Pleasures of a Country Life, that in order to make a Purchase he called in all his Money, but what was the Event of it? Why in a very few Days after he put it out again. I am engaged in this Series of Thought by a Discourse which I had last Week with my worthy Friend Sir ANDREW GRIFPORT, a Man of so much natural Eloquence, good Sense, and Probity of Mind, that I always hear him with a particular Pleasure. As we were sitting together, being the sole remaining Members of our Club, Sir ANDREW gave me in Account of the many busie Scenes of Life in which he had been engaged, and at the same time reckoned up to me abundance of those lucky Hits, which at another time he would have called pieces of good Fortune, but in the Temper of Mind he was then, he termed them Mercies, Favours of Providence, and Blessings upon an honest Industry. Now, says he, you must know my good Friend, I am so used to consider my self as Creditor and Debtor, that I often state my Accounts after the same manner with regard to Heaven and my own Soul. In this case, when I look upon the Debtor side, I find such innumerable Articles, that I want raise the Credit of that Fund I have several Letters, dated from Jenny Man's, by Gentlemen who are Candidates for Capt SENTRY'S Place, and as many from a Coffee-House in Paul's Church-yard of such who would fill up the Vacancy occasioned by the Death of my worthy Friend the Clergyman, whom I can never mention but with a particular Respect.

Having maturely weighed these several Particulars, with the many Remonstrances that have been made to me on this Subject, and considering how invidious an Office I shall take upon me, if I make the whole Election depend upon my single Voice, and being unwilling to expose myself to those Clamours, which, on such an Occasion, will not fail to be raised against me for Partiality, Injustice, Corruption and other Qualities which my Nature abhors, I have formed to myself the Project of a Club as follows.

I have thoughts of issuing out Writs to all and every of the Clubs that are established in the Cities of London and Westminster, requiring them to chuse out of their respective Bodies a Person of the greatest Merit, and to return his name to me before Lady-day, at which time I intend to sit upon Business.

By this means I may have Reason to hope, that the Club over which I shall preside will be the very Flower and Quintessence of all other Clubs. I have communicated this my Project to none but a particular Friend of mine, whom I have celebrated twice or thrice for his Happiness in that kind of Wit which is commonly known by the Name of a Pun. The only Objection he makes to it is, that I shall raise up Enemies to myself if I act with so regal an Air, and that my Detractors, instead of giving me the usual Title of SPECTATOR, will be apt to call me the King of Clubs.

But to proceed on my intended Project. It is very well known that I at first set forth in this Work with the Character of a silent Man and I think I have so well preserved my Taciturnity, that I do not remember to have violated it with three Sentences in the space of almost two Years. As a Monosyllable is my Delight, I have made very few Excursions in the Conversations which I have related, beyond a Yes or a No. By this Means my Readers have lost many good things which I have had in my Heart, though I did not care for uttering them.

Now in order to diversify my Character, and to shew the World how well I can talk if I have a Mind, I have I thought of being very loquacious in the Club which I have now under Consideration. But that I may proceed the more regularly in this Affair, I design, upon the first Meeting of the said Club, to have a Mouth opened in order to regulate my self in this Particular by a certain Ritual which I have by me, that contains all the Ceremonies which are practised at the opening of the Mouth of a Cardinal. I have likewise examined the forms which were used of old by Pythagoras, when any of his Scholars, after an Apprenticeship of Silence, was made free of his Speech. In the mean time, as I have of the found my Name in foreign Gazettes upon less Specious, I quest on it but in their next Articles from Great Britain, they will inform the World that the SPECTATOR'S Mouth is to be opened on the twenty-fifth of March next. I may perhaps publish a very useful Paper at that Time of the Proceedings in that Solemnity, and of the Persons who shall assist at it. But of this more hereafter. O

Sic Honor et Nomen divinis vatibus atque Carminibus venit—Hor

MR SPECTATOR,
WHEN Men of worthy and excelling Genius's have obliged the World with beautiful and instructive Writings, it is in the nature of Gratitude that Praise should be returned them, as one proper consequent Reward of their Performances. Nor has Mankind ever been so degenerately sunk, but they have made this Return and even when they have not been wrought up by the generous Endeavour so as to receive the Advantages designed by it. This Praise, which arises first in the Mouth of particular Persons, spreads and lasts according to the Merit of Authors and when it thus meets with a full Success changes its Denomination, and is called Fame. They who have happily arrived at this, are, even while they live, enflamed by the Acknowledgments of others, and spurred on to new Undertakings for the Benefit of Mankind, notwithstanding the Detraction which some object Tempers would cast upon them. But when they decease, their Characters being freed from the Shadow which Envy laid them under, begin to shine out with greater Splendour, their Spirits survive in their Works, they are admitted into the highest Companies, and they continue pleasing and instructing Posterity from Age to Age. Some of the best gain a Character, by being able to shew that they are no Strangers to them and others obtain a new Warmth to labour for the Happiness and Ease of Mankind, from a Reflection upon those Honours which are paid to their Memories.

The Thought of this took me up as I turned over those Epigrams which are the Remains of several of the Wits of Greece, and perceived many dedicated to the Fame of those who had excelled in beautiful poetick Performances. Wherefore, in pursuance to my Thought, I concluded to do something along with them to bring their Praises into a new Light and Language, for the Encouragement of those whose modest Tempers may be deterred by the Fear of Envy or Detraction from fair Attempts, to which their Parts might render them equal. You will perceive them as they follow to be conceived in the form of Epitaphs, a sort of Writing which is wholly set apart for a short pointed Method of Praise.

MR SPECTATOR,

'Having read over in your Paper, No 551 some of the Epigrams made by the Grecian Wits, in commendation of their celebrated Poets, I could not forbear sending you another, out of the same Collection, which I take to be as great a Compliment to Homer, as any that has yet been paid him

Your great Admirer,

The Reader may observe that the Beauty of this Epigram is different from that of any in the foregoing. An Irony is look'd upon as the finest Palliative of Praise, and very often conveys the noblest Panegyrick under the Appearance of Satire. Homer is here seemingly accused and treated as a Plagiary, but what is drawn up in the form of an Accusation is certainly, as my Correspondent observes, the greatest Compliment that could have been paid to that Divine Poet.]

Dear MR SPECTATOR,

'I am a Gentleman of a pretty good Fortune, and of a Temper impatient of any thing which I think an Injury, however I always quarrelled according to Law, and instead of attacking my

'Adversary by the dangerous Method of Sword and Pistol, I made my Assaults by that more secure one of Writ or Warrant. I cannot help telling you, that either by the Justice of my Causes, or the Superiority of my Council, I have been generally successful, and to my great Satisfaction I can say it, that by three Actions of Slander, and half a dozen Responses, I have for several Years enjoy'd a perfect Tranquility in my Reputation and Estate. By these means, tho I have been made known to the Judges, the Sergeants of our Circuit are my intimate Friends, and the Ornamental Counsel pry a very profound Respect to one who has made so great a Figure in the Law. Affairs of Consequence having brought me to Town, I had the Curiosity to other day to visit Westminster-Hall, and having placed myself in one of the Courts, expected to be most agreeably entertained. After the Court and Counsel were, with due Ceremony, seated, up stands a learned Gentleman, and began, When this Matter was last stirr'd before your Lordship. The next humbly moved to quash an Indictment, another complain'd that his Adversary had snatch'd a Judgment, the next inform'd the Court that his Client was stripp'd of his Possession, another begg'd Leave to acquit his Lordship, that they had been saddled with Costs. At last up got a grave Serjeant, and told us his Client had been hung up a whole Term by a Writ of Error. At this I could bear it no longer, but came hither, and resolv'd to apply myself to your Honour to interpose with these Gentlemen, that they would leave off such low and unnatural Expressions. For surely tho the Lawyers subscribe to hideous French and false Latin, yet they should let their Clients have a little decent and proper English for their Money. What Man that has a Value for a good Name would like to have it sud in a publick Court, that Mr such a one was stripp'd, saddled or hung up? This being what has escap'd your Spectatorial Observation, be pleas'd to correct such an illiberal Cant among profess'd Speakers, and you'll infinitely oblige

Nec lussus pudet, sed non incidere ludum — Hor

THE Project which I published on Monday last has brought me in several Packets of Letters. Among the rest I have receiv'd one from a certain Projector, wherein after having represented, that in all probability the Solemnity of opening my Mouth will draw together a great Confluence of Beholders, he proposes to me the hiring of Statores Hall for the more convenient exhibiting of that Publick Ceremony. He undertakes to be at the Charge of it himself, provided he may have the erecting of Galleries on every side, and the letting of them out upon that Occasion. I have a Letter also from a Bookseller petitioning me in a very humble manner, that he may have the Printing of the Speech which I shall make to the Assembly upon the first opening of my Mouth. I am informed from all Parts, that there are great Canvassings in the several Clubs about Town, upon the chusing of a proper Person to sit with me on those arduous Affairs to which I have summoned them. Three Clubs have already proceeded to Election whereof one has made a double Return. If I find that my Enemies shall take Advantage of my Silence to begin Hostilities upon me, or if any other Emergency of Affairs may so require, since I see Elections in so great a forwardness, we may possibly meet before the Day appointed, or if matters go on to my Satisfaction, I may perhaps put off the Meeting to a further Day but of this Publick Notice shall be given.

In the mean time, I must confess that I am not a little gratify'd and oblig'd by this Concern which appears in this great City upon my present Design of laying down this Paper. It is likewise with much Satisfaction, that I find some of the most outlying Parts of the Kingdom alarm'd upon this Occasion having receiv'd Letters to expostulate with me about it from several of my Readers of the remotest Boroughs of Great Brittain. Among these I am very well pleas'd with a Letter dated from Berwick upon Tweed, wherein my Correspondent compares the Office which I have for some time executed in these Realms to the Wedding of a great Garden which, says he, it is not sufficient to weed once for all, and afterwards to give over, but that the Work must be continued duly, or the same Spots of Ground which are cleared for a while, will in a little time be over run as much as ever. Another Gentleman lays before me several Enormities that are already sprouting, and which he believes will discover themselves in their Growth immediately at my Disappearance. There is no doubt, says he, but the Ladies Heads will shoot up as soon as they know they are no longer under the Spectator's Eye and I have already seen such monstrous broad-brimmed Hats under the Arms of Foreigners, that I question not but they will overshadow the Island within a Month or two after the dropping of your Paper. But among all the Letters which are come to my hands, there is none so handsomely written as the following one, which I am the more pleas'd with, as it is sent me from Gentlemen who belong to a Body which I shall always Honour, and where I cannot speak it without a secret Pride; my Speculations have met with a very kind Reception. It is usual for Poets upon the publishing of their Works to print before them such Copies of Verses as have been made in their Praise. Not that you must imagine they are pleas'd with their own Commendations, but because the elegant Compositions of their Friends should not be lost. I must make the same Apology for the Publication of the ensuing Letter, in which I have suppress'd no Part of those Papers that are given my Speculations with too lavish and good natured a Hand, though my Correspondents can witness for me, that at other times I have generally blotted out those Parts in the Letters which I have received from them. [O]

MR SPECTATOR, Oxford, Nov 25
In spite of your Invincible Silence you have found out a Method of being the most agreeable Companion in the World. That kind of Conversation which you hold with the Town, has the good Fortune of being always pleasing to the Men of Taste and Leisure, and never offensive to those of Hurry and Business. You are never heard, but at what Horace calls dextro tempore, and have the Happiness to observe the politick Rule, which the same discerning Author gave his Friend, when he enjoin'd him to deliver his Book to Augustus.

Si talidus si latus erit si denique foscet
'You never begin to talk, but when People are desirous to hear you and I defy any one to be out of humour till you leave off. But I am led unawares into Reflections, foreign to the original Design of this Epistle which was to let you know, that some unassigned Admirers of your inimitable Papers, who could, without any Flattery, greet you with the Salutation used to the Eastern Monarchs, viz O Spec, tu per aet, have lately been under the same Apprehensions, with Mr Philo Spec that the haste you have made to dispatch your best Friends portends no long Duration to your own short Vantage. We could not, indeed, find any just Grounds for Complaint in the Method you took to dissolve that venerable Body. No, the World was not worthy of your Divine WILL. HONEYCOMB could not, with my Reputation, live single any longer. It was high time for the JEOPHAR to turn himself

'to Coke. And Sir ROGER's dying was the wisest thing he ever did in his Life. It was, however, matter of great Grief to us, to think that we were in danger of losing so Elegant and Valuable an Entertainment. And we could not, without Sorrow, reflect that we were likely to have nothing to interrupt our Sips in a Morning, and to suspend our Coffee in mid way, between our Lips and Right Ear, but the ordinary Irish of News Papers. We resolved, therefore, not to part with you so. But since, to make use of your own Allusion, the Cherries begin now to crowd the Market, and their Season is almost over, we consulted our future Enjoyments, and endeavoured to make the exquisite Pleasure that delicious Fruit gave our Taste as lasting as we could, and by drying them protract their stay beyond its natural Date. We own that thus they have not a Flavour equal to that of their juicy Bloom; but yet, under this Disadvantage, they pique the Palate, and become a Silver better than any other Fruit at its first Appearance. To speak plain, there are a Number of us who have begun your Works afresh, and meet two Nights in the Week in order to give you a Relieving. We never come together without drinking your Health, and is seldom part without general Expressions of Thanks to you for our Night's Improvement. This we conceive to be a more useful Institution than any other Club whatever, not excepting even that of ugly Faces. We have one manifest Advantage over that renowned Society, with respect to Mr Spectator's Company. For though they may brag, that you sometimes make your personal Appearance amongst them, it is impossible they should ever get a Word from you. Whereas you are with us the Reverse of what Phaedra would have his Mistress be in his Rival's Company, Present in your Absence. We make you talk as much and as long as we please, and let me tell you, you seldom hold your Tongue for the whole Evening. I promise my self you will look with an Eye of Favour upon a Meeting which owes its Original to a mutual Emulation among its Members, who shall shew the most profound Respect for your Paper, not but we have a very great Value for your Person, and I dare say you can nowhere find four more sincere Admirers, and humble Servants, than

tentanda Via est, quæ me quoque possim Tollere humo, Victorque virum solitare per Ora—Virg

I AM obliged for the following Essay, as well as for that which lays down Rules out of Tully for Pronunciation and Action, to the Ingenious Author of a Poem just Published, Entitled, An Ode to the Creator of the World occasioned by the Fragments of Orpheus

It is a Remark made, as I remember, by a celebrated French Author, that no Man ever pushed his Capacity as far as it was able to extend. I shall not enquire whether this Assertion be strictly true. It may suffice to say, that Men of the greatest Application and Acquirements can look back upon many vacant Spaces, and neglected Parts of Time, which have slipped away from them unemployed, and there is hardly any one considering Person in the World, but is apt to fancy with himself, at some time or other, that if his Life were to begin again, he could fill it up better.

The Mind is most provoked to cast on it self this ingenious Reproach, when the Examples of such Men are presented to it, as have far outshot the generality of their Species, in Learning, Arts, or any valuable Improvements.

One of the most extensive and improved Geniuses we have had is an Instance of in our own Nation, or in any other was that of Sir Francis Bacon Lord Verulam. This great Man, by an extraordinary Force of Nature, Compass of Thought, and indefatigable Study, had amassed to himself such stores of Knowledge as we cannot look upon without Amazement. His Capacity seems to have grasped All that was revealed in Books before his Time, and not satisfied with that, he began to strike out new Tracks of Science, too many to be travelled over by any one Man, in the Compass of the longest Life. These, therefore, he could only mark down, like imperfect Coastings in Maps, or supposed Points of Land, to be further discovered, and ascertained by the Industry of After-Ages, who should proceed upon his Notices or Conjectures.

The Excellent Mr Boyle was the Person, who seems to have been designed by Nature to succeed to the Labours and Enquiries of that extraordinary Genius I have just mentioned. By innumerable Experiments He, in a great Measure filled up those Plans and Out-Lines of Science which his Predecessor had sketched out. His Life was spent in the Pursuit of Nature, through a great Variety of Forms and Changes, and in the most rational, as well as devout Adoration of its Divine Author.

It would be impossible to name many Persons who have extended their Capacities so far as these two, in the Studies they pursued, but my learned Readers on this Occasion, will naturally turn their Thoughts to a Phidias,¹ who is yet living, and is likewise the Glory of our own Nation. The Improvements which others had made in Natural and Mathematical Knowledge have so vastly increased in his Hands, as to afford at once a wonderful Instance how great the Capacity is of a Human Soul, and how inexhaustible the Subject of its Enquiries, so true is that Remark in Holy Writ, that, though a wise Man seek to find out the Works of God from the Beginning to the End, yet shall he not be able to do it.

I cannot help mentioning here one Character more, of a different kind indeed from these, yet such a one as may serve to shew the wonderful Force of Nature and of Application, and is the most singular Instance of an Universal Genius I have ever met with. The Person I mean is Caro da Vinci, an Italian Painter, descended from a noble Family in Tuscany, about the beginning of the sixteenth Century. In his Profession of History Painting he was so great a Master, that some have affirmed he excelled all who went before him [It is certain] that he roused the Envy of Michael Angelo, who was his Contemporary, and that from the Study of his Works Raphael himself learned his best Manner of Designing. He was a Master too in Sculpture and Architecture, and skilful in Anatomy, Mathematics, and Mechanics. The Aqueduct from the River Adda to Milan, is mentioned as a Work of his Contrivance. He had learned several Languages, and was acquainted with the Studies of History, Philosophy, Poetry, and Music. Though it is not necessary to my present Purpose, I cannot but take notice, that all who have writ of him mention likewise his Perfections of Body. The Instances of his Strength are almost incredible. He is described to have been of a well formed Person, and a Master of all genteel Exercises. And lastly, we are told that his moral Qualities were agreeable to his natural and intellectual Endowments, and that he was of an honest and generous Mind, adorned with great Sweetness of Manners. I might break off the Account of him here, but I imagine it will be an Entertainment to the Curiosity of my Readers, to find so remarkable a Character distinguished by so remarkable a Circumstance at his Death. The Fame of his Works having gained him an universal Esteem, he was invited to the Court of France, where, after some time he fell sick, and Francis the First coming to see him, he roused himself in his Bed to acknowledge the Honour which was done him by that Visit. The King embraced him, and Leonardo fainting at the same Instant, expired in the Arms of that great Monarch.

It is impossible to attend to such Instances as these, without being roused into a Contemplation on the wonderful Nature of the Human Mind, which is capable of such Progressions in Knowledge, and can contain such a Variety of Ideas without Perplexity or Confusion. How reasonable is it from hence to infer its Divine Original? And whilst we find unthinking Matter endued with a Natural Power to last for ever, unless annihilated by Omnipotence, how absurd would it be to imagine, that a Being so much Superior to it should not have the same Privilege?

At the same time it is very surprizing, when we remove our Thoughts from such Instances as I have mentioned, to consider those we so frequently meet with in the Accounts of barbarous Nations among the Indians, where we find Numbers of People who scarce shew the first Glimmerings of Reason, and seem to have few Ideas above those of Sense and Appetite. These, methinks, appear like large Wilds, or vast uncultivated Tracts of Human Nature, and when we compare them with Men of the most exalted Characters in Arts and Learning, we find it difficult to believe that they are Creatures of the same Species.

Some are of Opinion that the Souls of Men are all naturally equal, and that the great Disparity we so often observe, arises from the different Organization or Structure of the Bodies to which they are United. But whatever constitutes this first Disparity, the next great Difference which we find between Men in their several Acquirements is owing to accidental Differences in their Education, Fortunes, or Course of Life. The Soul is a kind of rough Diamond, which requires Art, Labour, and Time to polish it. For want of which, many a good natural Genius is lost, or lies unfashioned, like a Jewel in the Mine.

One of the strongest Incitements to excel in such Arts and Accomplishments is in the highest Esteem among Men, is the natural Passion which the Mind of Man has for Glory, which, though it may be faulty in the Excess of it, ought by no means to be discouraged. Perhaps some Moralists are too severe in beating down this Principle, which seems to be a Spring implanted by Nature to give Motion to all the latent Powers of the Soul, and is always observed to exert it self with the greatest Force in the most generous Dispositions. The Men whose Characters have shone the brightest among the ancient Romans, appear to have been strongly animated by this Passion. Cicero, whose Learning and Services to his Country are so well known, was enflamed by it to an extravagant degree, and warmly presses Lucius, who was composing a History of those Times, to be very particular and zealous in relating the Story of his Consulship, and to execute it speedily, that he might have the Pleasure of enjoying in his Life-time some Part of the [Honour] which he foresaw would be paid to his Memory. This was the Ambition of a great Mind, but he is faulty in the Degree of it, and cannot refrain from soliciting the Historian upon this Occasion to neglect the strict Laws of History, and, in praising him, even to exceed the Bounds of Truth. The younger Pliny appears to have had the same Passion for Fame, but accompanied with greater Chastity and Modesty. His ingenuous manner of owning it to a Friend, who had prompted him to undertake some great Work, is exquisitely beautiful, and raises him to a certain Grandeur above the Imputation of Vanity. I must confess, says he, that nothing employs my Thoughts more than the Desire I have of perpetuating my Name, which is my Opinion is a Design worthy of a Man, at least of such a one, who being conscious of no Guilt, is not afraid to be remembered by Posterity.³

I think I ought not to conclude, without interesting all my Readers in the Subject of this Discourse. I shall therefore lay it down as a Maxim that though all are not capable of shining in Learning or the Politer Arts, yet every one is capable of excelling in something. The Soul has in this Respect a certain vegetative Power, which cannot be wholly idle. If it is not laid out and cultivated into a regular and beautiful Garden, it will of it self shoot up in Weeds or Flowers of a wilder Growth.

Resque quod non es ——— Pers

ALL the Members of the imaginary Society which were described in my First Papers, having disappear'd one after another, it is high time for the Spectator himself to go off the Stage. But, now I am to take my leave, I am under much greater Anxiety than I have known for the Work of any Day since I undertook this Province. It is much more difficult to converse with the World in a real than a personated Character. That might pass for Humour in the Spectator, which would look like Arrogance in a Writer who sets his Name to his Work. The Fictitious Person might condemn those who disapproved him, and extoll his own Performances, without giving Offence. He might assume a mock Authority, without being looked upon as vain and conceited. The Praises or Censures of himself fall only upon the Creature of his Imaginations: and if any one finds fault with him, the Author may reply with the Philosopher of old, Thou dost but beat the Case of Anaxarchus. When I speak in my own private Sentiments I cannot but address my self to my Readers in a more submissive manner, and with a just Gratitude, for the kind Reception which they have given to these Daily Papers that have been published for almost the space of two Years last past.

I hope the Apology I have made as to the Licence allowable to a feigned Character, may excuse any thing which has been said in these Discourses of the Spectator and his Works, but the Imputation of the grossest Vanity would still dwell upon me, if I did not give some Account by what Means I was enabled to keep up the Spirit of so long and approved a Performance. All the Papers marked with a C, an L, an I, or an O, that is to say, all the Papers which I have distinguished by any Letter in the name of the Muse CLIO, were given me by the Gentleman, of whose Assistance I formerly boasted in the Preface and concluding Leaf of my Tattlers. I am indeed much more proud of his long continued Friendship, than I should be of the Fame of being thought the Author of any Writings which he himself is capable of producing. I remember when I finished the Tender Husband, I told him there was nothing I so ardently wished, as that we might some time or other publish a Work written by us both, which should bear the Name of the Monument, in Memory of our Friendship. I heartily wish what I have done here, were as Honorary to that Sacred Name as Learning, Wit, and Humility under those Pieces which I have taught the Reader how to distinguish for his. When the Play above mentioned was first Acted there were so many applauded Stricks in it which I had from the same Hand, that I thought very meanly of my self that I had never publicly acknowledged them. After I have put other Friends upon importing him to publish Drumtouch, as well as other Writings he has by him, I shall end what I think I am obliged to say on this Head, by giving my Reader this Hint for the better judging of my Productions, that the best Comment upon them would be in Account when the Patron to the Tender Husband was in England, or Abroad.

The Reader will also find some Papers which are marked with the Letter X, for which he is obliged to the Ingenious Gentleman who diverted the Town with the Epilogue to the Distressed Mother. I might have owned these several Papers with the free Consent of these Gentlemen, who did not write them with a design of being known for the Authors. But as a candid and sincere Behaviour ought to be preferred to all other Considerations, I would not let my Heart reproach me with a Consciousness of having acquired a Praise which is not my Right.

The other Assistances which I have had, have been conveyed by Letter, sometimes by whole Papers, and other times by short Hints from unknown Hands. I have not been able to trace Favours of this kind, with any Certainty, but to the following Names, which I place in the Order wherein I received the Obligation, tho' the first I am going to name, can hardly be mentioned in a List wherein he would not deserve the Precedence. The Persons to whom I am to make these Acknowledgments are Mr Henry Marlyn, Mr Pope, Mr Hughes, Mr Carey of New-College in Oxford, Mr Tickell of Queen's in the same University, Mr Parnelle, and Mr Eusden of Trinity in Cambridge. Thus, to speak in the Language of my late Friend Sir ANDREW FRERFORT, I have Ballanced my Accounts with all my Creditors for Wit and Learning. But as these excellent Performances would not have seen the Light without the means of this Paper, I may still arrogate to my self the Merit of their being communicated to the Publick.

I have nothing more to add, but having swelled this Work to five hundred and fifty five Papers, they will be disposed into seven Volumes, four of which are already publish'd, and the three others in the Press. It will not be demanded of me why I now leave off tho' I must own my self obliged to give an Account to the Town of my Time hereafter since I retire when their Partiality to me is so great, that an Edition of the former Volumes of Spectators of above Nine thousand each Book is already sold off, and the 1st on each half Sheet has brought into the Stamp Office one Week with another above 200 1st Week arising from this single Paper, notwithstanding it at first reduced it to less than half the number that was usually Printed before this Fix was laid.

I humbly beseech the Continuance of this Inclination to favour what I may hereafter produce, and hope I have in many Occurrences of Life tasted so deeply of Pain and Sorrow, that I am Proof against much more prosperous Circumstances than my Advantages to which my own Industry can possibly exalt me.

[The following Letter¹] regards an ingenious Sett of Gentlemen, who have done me the Honour to make me one of their Society

Mr SPECTATOR, Dec 4, 1712

'The Academy of Painting, lately established in London, having done you and themselves the Honour to chuse you one of their Directors, that Noble and Lovely Art, which before was entitled to your Regards, as a Spectator, has an additional Claim to you, and you seem to be under a double Obligation to take some Care of her Interests

'The Honour of our Country is also concerned in the matter I am going to lay before you we (and perhaps other Nations as well as we) have a National false Humility as well as a National Van Glory, and tho' we boast ourselves to excel all the World in things wherein we are out done abroad, in other things we attribute to others a Superiority which we ourselves possess This is what is done, particularly, in the Art of Portrait or Face Painting

'Painting is an Art of a vast Extent, too great by much for any mortal Man to be in full possession of, in all its Parts, 'tis enough if any one succeed in painting Faces, History, Battels, Landscapes, Sea Pieces, Fruit, Flowers, or Drolls, &c Nay, no Man ever was excellent in all the Branches (tho' [many²] in Number) of these several Arts, for a distinct Art I take upon me to call every one of those several Kinds of Painting

'And as one Man may be a good Landscape-Painter, but unable to paint a Face or a History tolerably well, and so of the rest one Nation may excel in some kinds of Painting, and other kinds may thrive better in other Climates

'Italy may have the Preference of all other Nations for History-Painting Holland for Drolls, and a neat finished manner of Working, France, for Gav, Janty, Fluttering Pictures and England for Portraits but to give the Honour of every one of these kinds of Painting to any one of those Nations on account of their Excellence in any of these parts of it, is like adjudging the Prize of Heroick, Dramatick, Lyric, or Burlesque Poetry, to him who has done well in any one of them

'Where there are the greatest Genus's, and most Helps and Encouragements, 'tis reasonable to suppose an Art will arrive to the greatest Perfection By this Rule let us consider our own Country with respect to Face-Painting No Nation in the World delights so much in having their own, or Friends, or Relations Pictures, whether from their National Good Nature, or having a love to Painting, and not being encouraged in the great Article of Religious Pictures, which the Purity of our Worship refuses the free use of, or from whatever other Cause Our Helps are not inferior to those of any other

the number it stood last, following the next letter

¹ [Give me leave before I conclude to insert a Letter which]

² [few]

'People, but rather they are greater, for what the Antique Statues and Bas-reliefs which Italy enjoys are to the History-Painters, the Beautiful and noble Faces with which England is confessed to abound, are to Face-Painters and besides we have the greatest number of the Works of the best Masters in that kind of any People, not without a competent number of those of the most excellent in every other part of Painting And for Encouragement, the Wealth and Generosity of the English Nation affords that in such a degree, as Artists have no reason to complain

'And accordingly in Fact, Face Painting is no where so well performed as in England know not whether it has lain in your way to observe it, but I have, and pretend to be a tolerable Judge I have seen what is done abroad, and can assure you, that the Honour of that Branch of Painting is justly due to us I appeal to the judicious Observers for the Truth of what I assert If Foreigners have oftentimes or even for the most part excelled our Natives, it ought to be imputed to the Advantages they have met with here, join'd to their own Ingenuity and Industry nor has any one Nation distinguished themselves so as to ruse an Argument in favour of their Country but it is to be observed, that neither French nor Italians, nor any one of either Nation, notwithstanding all our Prejudices in their favour have, or ever had, for any considerable time, any Character among us as Face Painters

'This Honour is due to our own Country, and has been so for near an Age So that instead of going to Italy, or elsewhere, one that designs for Portrait-Painting ought to study in England Hither such should come from Holland, France, Italy, Germany, &c as he that intends to practice any other kind of Painting, should go to those Parts where 'tis in greatest Perfection 'Tis said the Blessed Virgin descended from Heaven, to sit to St Luke, I dare venture to affirm, that if she should desire another Madonna to be painted by the Life, she would come to England, and am of opinion that your present President, Sir Godfrey Kneller, from his Improvement since he arrived in this Kingdom, would perform that Office better than any Foreigner living I am, with all possible Respect,

SIR,

Your most Humble, and Most Obedient Servant, &c.

UPON having down the Office of SPECTATOR, I requir'd the World with my Design of electing a new Club, and of opening my Mouth in it after a most solemn Manner. Both the Election and the Ceremony are now past but not finding it so easy as I at first imagin'd, to break thro' a lisy Years Silence, I would not venture into the World under the character of a Man who pretends to talk like other People, till I had arriv'd at a full Freedom of Speech.

I shall reserve for another time the History of such Club or Clubs of which I am now a Talkative, but unworthy Member, and shall here give an Account of this surprising Change which has been produced in me, and which I look upon to be as remarkable an Accident as any recorded in History, since that which happened to the Son of Crasus, after having been many Years as much Tongue tied as my self.

Upon the first opening of my Mouth, I made a Speech consisting of about half a Dozen well turned Periods but grew so very hoarse upon it, that for three Days together, instead of finding the use of my Tongue, I was afraid that I had quite lost it. Besides, the unusual Extension of my Muscles on this Occasion, made my Neck ache on both Sides to such a Degree, that nothing but an invincible Resolution and Perseverance could have prevented me from falling back to my Monosyllables.

I afterwards made several Essays towards speaking, and that I might not be startled at my own Voice, which has happen'd to me more than once, I used to read aloud in my Chamber, and have often stood in the Middle of the Street to call a Coach, when I knew there was none within hearing.

When I was thus grown pretty well acquainted with my own Voice, I had hold of all Opportunities to exert it. Not caring however to speak much by my self, and to draw upon me the whole Attention of those I conversed with, I used, for some time, to walk every Morning in the Mall, and talk in Chorus with a Parcel of Frenchmen. I found my Modesty greatly relieved by the communicative Temper of this Nation, who are so very sociable, as to think they are never better Company, than when they are all opening at the same time.

I then fancied I might receive great Benefit from Female Conversation, and that I should have a Convenience of talking with the greater Freedom, when I was not under any Impediment of thinking. I therefore threw my self into an Assembly of Ladies, but could not for my Life get in a Word among them, and found that if I did not change my Company, I was in Danger of being reduced to my primitive Inertness.

The Coffee houses have ever since been my chief Places of Resort, where I have made the greatest Improvements, in order to which I have taken a particular Care never to be of the same Opinion with the Man I conversed with. I was a Tory at Buttor's, and a Whig at Child's, a Friend to the Englishman, or an Advocate for the Examur, as it best served my Turn, some fancy me a great Enemy to the French King, though, in reality, I only make use of him for a Help to Discourse. In short, I wrangle and dispute for Exercise and have carried this Point so far that I was once like to have been thrown through the Body for making a little too free with my Betters.

In a Word, I am quite another Man to what I was.

—Nil sinit unquam
Tam dispar sibi—

My old Acquaintance scarce know me any I was asked the other Day by a Jew or Jona'hau's, whether I was not related to a dumb Gentleman who used to come to that Coffee house? But I think I never was better pleas'd in my Life than about a Week ago, when, as I was sitting at a Table with a young Templar, his Companion gave him a Pull by the Sleeve, begging him to come away, for that the old Prig would talk him to Death.

Being now a very good Proficient in Discourse, I shall appear in the World with this Addition to my Character, that my Countrymen may reap the Fruits of my new acquired Loquacity.

Those who have been present at public Disputes in the University, know that it is usual to maintain Heresies for Argument's sake. I have heard a Man a most impudent Socinian for Half an Hour, who has been an Orthodox Divine all his Life after. I have taken the same Method to accomplish my self in the Gift of Utterance, having talked above a Twelve month, not so much for the Benefit of my Hearers as of my self. But since I have now gained the Faculty, I have been so long endeavouring after, I intend to make a right Use of it and shall think my self oblig'd, for the future, to speak always in Truth and Sincerity of Heart. While a Man is learning to fence, he pretises both on Friend and Foe, but when he is a Master in the Art, he never exerts it but on what he thinks the right Side.

That this last Allusion may not give my Reader a wrong Idea of my Design in this Paper, I must here inform him, that the Author of it is of no Faction, that he is a Friend to no Interests but those of Truth and Virtue, nor a Foe to any but those of Vice and Folly. Though I make more Noise in the World than I used to do, I am still resolv'd to act in it as an indifferent SPECTATOR. It is not my Ambition to encrease the Number either of Whigs or Tories, but of wise and good Men, and I could heartily wish there were not

* Addison's papers are marked on the authority of Tickell.

Faults common to both Parties which afford me sufficient Matter to work upon, without descending to those which are peculiar to either.

If in a Multitude of Counsellors there is Safety, we ought to think our selves the securest Nation in the World. Most of our Garrets are inhabited by Statesmen, who watch over the Liberties of their Country, and make a Shift to keep them selves from starving by taking into their Care the Properties of their Fellow Subjects.

As these Politicians of both Sides have already worked the Nation into a most unnatural Ferment, I shall be so far from endeavouring to raise it to a greater Height, that on the contrary, it shall be the chief Tendency of my Papers, to inspire my Countrymen with a mutual Good will and Benevolence. Whatever Faults either Party may be guilty of, they are rather inflamed than cured by those Reproaches, which they cast upon one another. The most likely Method of rectifying any Man's Conduct, is, by recommending to him the Principles of Truth and Honour, Religion and Virtue: and so long as he acts with an Eye to these Principles, whatever Party he is of, he cannot fail of being a good Libertarian, and a Lover of his Country.

As for the Persons concerned in this Work, the Names of all of them or at least of such as desire it shall be published hereafter. Till which time I must entreat the courteous Reader to suspend his Curiosity, and rather to consider what is written, than who they are that write it.

Having thus adjusted all necessary Preliminaries with my Reader I shall not trouble him with any more prefatory Discourses, but proceed in my old Method and entertain him with Speculations on every useful Subject that falls in my Way.

Quippe domini sunt ambiguum, Syriacque bilungue—Virg

THERE is a saying, says Plato so delightful, as the learning or the speaking of Truth. For this Reason there is no Conversation so agreeable as that of the Man of Integrity who hears without any Intention to betray, and speaks without any Intention to deceive.

Among all the Accounts which are given of Cato, I do not remember one that more redounds to his Honour than the following Passage related by Plutarch. As an Advocate was pleading the Cause of his Client before one of the Pretors, he could only produce a single Witness in a Point where the Law required the Testimony of two Persons upon which the Advocate insisted on the Integrity of that Person whom he had produced: but the Pretor told him, That where the Law required two Witnesses he would not accept of one, tho' it were Cato himself. Such a Speech from a Person who sat at the Head of a Court of Justice, while Cato was still living, shews us more than a thousand Examples, the high Reputation this great Man had gained among his Contemporaries upon the Account of his Sincerity.

When such an inflexible Integrity is a little softened and qualified by the Rules of Conversation and Good breeding, there is not a more shining Virtue in the whole Catalogue of Social Duties. A Man however ought to take great Care not to polish himself out of his Veracity, nor to refine his Behaviour to the Prejudice of his Virtue.

This Subject is exquisitely treated in the most elegant Sermon of the great British Preacher. I shall beg Leave to transcribe out of it two or three Sentences as a proper Introduction to a very curious Letter, which I shall relate the chief Entertaining of this Speculation.

The old English Plainness and Sincerity, that generous Integrity of Nature, and Honesty of Disposition, which always argues true Greatness of Mind, and is usually accompanied with undaunted Courage and Resolution, is in a great Measure lost among us.

The Dialect of Conversation is now a-days so swelled with Vanity and Compliment and so surfeited (as I may say) of Expressions of Kindness and Respect that if a Man that lived in Age or two ago should return into the World again, he would really want a Dictionary to help him to understand his own Language and to know the true intrinsic Value of the Phrase in Fashion and would hardly, at first, believe at what a low Rate the highest Strains and Expressions of Kindness are imprinted so commonly upon current Payment, and when he should come to understand it, it would be a great while before he could bring himself with a good Countenance and a good Conscience, to converse with Men upon equal Terms and in their own Way.

I have by me a Letter which I look upon as a great Curiosity, and which may serve as an Accomplishment to the foregoing Passage, cited out of this most excellent Prelate. It is said to have been written in King Charles II's Reign by the Ambassador of Danmark, a little after his Arrival in England.

Master,

'The People, where I now am, have Tongues further from their Hearts than from London. And thou knowest the Inhabitants of one of these Places does not know what is done in the other. They call thee and thy Subjects Barbarians, because we speak what we mean, and account themselves a civilized People, because they speak one thing and mean another. Truth they call Barbaity, and Falshood Politeness. Upon my first landing, one who was sent from the King of this Place to meet me told me, 'That he is extremely sorry for the Storm I had met with just before my Arrival'. I was troubled to hear him grieve and afflict himself upon my Account but in less than a Quarter of an Hour he sniled, and was as merry as if nothing had happened. Another who came with him told me by my Interpreter, He should be glad to do me any Service that lay in his Power. Upon which I desired him to carry one of my Portmanteaus for me, but instead of serving me according to his Promise he laughed, and bid another do it. I lodged, the first Week, at the House of one, who desired me to think my self at home, and to consider his House as my own. Accordingly, I the next Morning began to knock down one of the Walls of it, in order to let in the fresh Air, and had packed up some of the Household Goods, of which I intended to have made thee a Present. But the false Varlet no sooner saw me falling to Work, but he sent Word to desire me to give over, for that he would have no such Doings in his House. I had not been long in this Nation, before I was told by one, for whom I had asked a certain Favour from the Chief of the King's Servants, whom they here call the Lord Treasurer, That I had eternally obliged him. I was so surpris'd at his Gratitude that I could not forbear saying, What Service is there which one Man can do for another, that can oblige him to all Eternity? However I only asked him, for my Reward, that he would lend me his eldest Daughter during my Stay in this Country. but I quickly found that he was as treacherous as the rest of his Countrymen.

¹ Tillotson The Sermon 'Of Sincerity Towards God and Man' Works, Vol II, p 6, folio ed

At my first going to Court, one of the great Men almost put me out of Countenance, by asking ten thousand Pardons of me for only troubling by Accident upon my Toe. They call this kind of Lye a Compliment for when they are civil to a great Man, they tell him Untruths, for which thou wouldst order any of thy Officers of State to receive a hundred Blows upon his Foot. I do not know how I shall negotiate any thing with this People, since there is so little Credit to be given to 'em. When I go to see the King's Scribe, I am generally told that he is not at home, tho' perhaps I saw him go into his House almost the very Moment before. Thou wouldst fancy that the whole Nation are Physicists, for the first Question they always ask me, is how I do. I have this Question put to me above a hundred times a Day. Nay, they are not only thus inquisitive after my Health, but wish it in a more solemn Manner, with a full Glass in their Hands, every time I sit with them at Table, tho' at the same time they would persuade me to drink their Liquors in such Quantities as I have found by Experience will make me sick. They often pretend to pray for my Health also in the same Manner. but I have more Reason to expect it from the Goodness of thy Constitution, than the Sincerity of their Wishes. May thy Slave escape in Safety from this doubled-tongued Race of Men, and live to lay himself once more at thy Feet in thy Royal City of Bantam.

It is a celebrated Thought of Socrates, that if all the Misfortunes of Mankind were cast into a publick Stock, in order to be equally distributed among the whole Species, those who now think themselves the most unhappy, would prefer the Share they are already possess'd of, before that which would fall to them by such a Division. Horace has carried this Thought a great deal further in the Motto of my Paper, which implies that the Hardships or Misfortunes we lie under, are more easy to us than those of any other Person would be, in case we could change Conditions with him.

As I was ruminating on these two Remarks, and seated in my Elbow-Chair, I insensibly fell asleep when, on a sudden, methought there was a Proclamation made by Jupiter, that every Mortal should bring in his Griets and Calamities, and throw them together in a Heap. There was a large Plain appointed for this Purpose. I took my Stand in the Center of it, and saw with a great deal of Pleasure the whole human Species marching one after another and throwing down their several Loads, which immediately grew up into a prodigious Mountain that seemed to rise above the Clouds.

There was a certain Lady of a thin airy Shape, who was very active in this Solemnity. She carried a magnifying Glass in one of her Hands, and was cloath'd in a loose flowing Robe, embroidered with several Figures of Fiends and Spectres, that discover'd themselves in a Thousand chimerical Shapes, as her Garment hovered in the Wind. There was something wild and distracted in her Look. Her Name was FACCY. She led up every Mortal to the appointed Place, after having very officiously assist'd him in making up his Pack, and laying it upon his Shoulders. My Heart melted within me to see my Fellow-Creatures groaning under their respective Burthens,

Face for a lost Reputation But on all these Occasions, there was not one of them who did not think the new Blemish, as soon as he had got it into her Possession, much more disagreeable than the old one I made the same Observation on every other Misfortune or Calamity, which every one in the Assembly brought upon himself, in lieu of what he had parted with, whether it be that all the Evils which befall us are in some Measure suited and proportioned to our Strength, or that every Evil becomes more supportable by our being accustomed to it, I shall not determine

I could not for my Heart forbear pitying the poor hump-back'd Gentleman mention'd in the former Paper, who went off a very well-shaped Person with a Stone in his Bladder, nor the fine Gentleman who had struck up this Bargain with him, that lumped thro' a whole Assembly of Ladies, who used to admire him, with a Pair of Shoulders peeping over his Head

I must not omit my own particular Adventure My Friend with the long Visage had no sooner taken upon him my short Face, but he made such a grotesque Figure in it, that as I looked upon him I could not forbear laughing at my self, insomuch that I put my own Face out of Countenance The poor Gentleman was so sensible of the Ridicule, that I found he was ashamed of what he had done On the other Side I found that I myself had no great Reason to triumph, for as I went to touch my Forehead I missed the Place, and clipp'd my Finger upon my upper Lip Besides, as my Nose was exceeding Prominent, I gave it two or three unlucky Knocks as I was playing my Hand about my Face, and aiming at some other Part of it I saw two other Gentlemen by me, who were in the same ridiculous Circumstances These had made a foolish Swap between a Couple of thick bandy Legs, and two long Tripsticks that had no Calls to them One of these looked like a Man walking upon Stilts, and as he lifted up into the Air above his ordinary Height that his Head turned round with it, while the other made such backward Circles, as he attempted to walk, that he scarce knew how to move forward upon his new Supporters Observing him to be a pleasant Kind of Fellow, I stuck my Cane in the Ground, and told him I would buy him a Bottle of Wine, that he did not march up to it on a Line, that I drew for him, in a Quarter of an Hour

The Heap was at last distributed among the two Sexes, who made a most piteous Sight, as they wandered up and down under the Pressure of their several Burthens The whole Plain was filled with Murmurs and Complaints, Groans and Lamentations Jupiter at length, taking Compassion on the poor Mortals, ordered them a second time to lay down their Loads, with a Design to give every one his own again They discharged themselves with a great deal of Pleasure, after which, the Phantoms who had led them into such gross Delusions, was commanded to disappear There was sent in her stead a Goddess of a quite different figure Her Motions were steady and composed and her Aspect serious but cheerful She every now and then cast her Eyes towards Heaven, and fixed them upon Jupiter Her name was PATIENCE She had no sooner placed herself by the Mount of Sorrows, but what I thought very remarkable, the whole Heap sunk to such a Degree, that it did not appear a third part so big as it was before She afterwards returned every Man his own proper Calamity and teaching him how to bear it in the most commodious Manner, he marched off with it contentedly, being very well pleased that he had not been left to his own Choice, as to the kind of Evils which fell to his Lot

Besides the several Pieces of Morality to be drawn out of this Vision, I learnt from it, never to repine at my own Misfortunes, or to envy the Happiness of another, since it is impossible for any Man to form a right Judgment of his Neighbour's Sufferings, for which Reason also I have determined never to thank too lightly of another's Complaints but to regard the Sorrows of my Fellow Creatures with Sentiments of Humanity and Compassion

EVERY one has heard of the Famous Conjuror, who according to the Opinion of the Vulgar, has studied himself dumb, for which Reason as it is believed he delivers out all his Oracles in Writing Be that as it will, the blind Tuesias was not more famous in Greece, than this dumb Artist has been, for some Years last past, in the Cities of London and Westminster Thus much for the profound Gentleman who honours me with the following Epistle.

SIR, From my Cell, June 24, 1714

'Being informed that you have lately got the Use of your Tongue, I have some Thoughts of following your Example, that I may be a Fortune teller properly speaking I am grown weary of my Fortunality, and having served my Country many Years under the Title of the dumb Doctor, I shall now prophesie by Word of Mouth, and (as Mr Lee says of the Magpie, who you know was a great Fortune teller among the Ancients) *chat*ter Futurity I have hitherto chosen to receive Questions and return Answers in Writing, that I might avoid the Tediousness and Trouble of Debates, my Querists being generally of a Humour to think, that they have never Predictions enough for their Money In short, Sir, my Case has been something like that of those discreet Animals the Monkeys, who, as the Indians tell us can speak if they would, but purposely avoid it that they may not be made to work I have hitherto gained a Liveliness by holding my Tongue, but shall now open my Mouth in order to fill it If I appear a little Word bound in my first Solutions and Responses, I hope it will not be imputed to any Want of Foresight, but to the long Disuse of Speech I doubt not by this Invention to have all my former Customers over again, for if I have promised any of them Lovers or Husbands,

'Riches or good Luck, it is my Design to confirm to them — I have already given them under my Hand. If you will honour me with a Visit, I will compliment you with the first opening of my Mouth, and if you please you may make an entertaining Dialogue out of the Conversation of two dumb Men. Excuse this Trouble, worthy Sir, from one who has been a long time

Your Silent Admirer, Cornelius Agrippa.

I have received the following Letter, or rather Letter-dun, from a pert young Buckish, who congratulates with me upon the same Occasion

Dear Mr Pate, June 23, 1714
'I am a Member of a private Society who call ourselves the Claret Club, and am ordered by the whole Sisterhood, to congratulate you upon the Use of your Tongue. We have all of us a mighty Mind to hear you talk, and if you will take your Place among us for an Evening, we have unanimously agreed to allow you one Minute in ten, witho'ut Interruption.

I am, SIR,
Your Humble Servant

S 7

P S 'You may find us at my Lady Betty Clack's, who will leave Orders with her Porter, that if an elderly Gentleman is in a short Time enquires for her, he shall be admitted and a Question asked

As this particular Paper shall consist wholly of what I have received from my Correspondents I shall fill up the remaining Part of it with other congratulatory Letters of the same Nature

SIR, Oxford, June 25, 1714
'We are here wonderfully pleas'd with the Opening of your Mouth, and very frequently open a ours in Approbation of your Design especially since we find you are resolv'd to preserve your Taciturnity as to all Party Matters. We do not question but you are as great an Orator as Sir Hudibras, of whom the Poet sweetly sings,

— He could open
His Mouth, but cut there after a Trope

'If you will send us down the Half dozen well turn'd Periods, that produced such dismal Effects in your Muscles, we will deposit them near an old Manuscript of Tully's Orations, among the Archives of the University for we all agree with you, that there is not a more remarkable Accident recorded in History, since that which happened to the Son of Cæsar, viz, I believe you might have gone higher, and have added Balsam's Ass. We are impatient to see more of your Productions, and expect what Words will next fall from you, with as much attention as those, who were set to watch the speaking Head which Friar Bacon formerly erected in this Place. We are,

Worthy SIR,
Your most humble Servants,
B R T D, &c

Honest SIR, Middle-Temple, June 25

'I am very glad to hear that thou beginnest to prate and find, by thy Yesterday's Vision, thou art so used to it, that thou canst not forbear talking in thy Sleep. Let me only advise thee to speak to either Men, for I am afraid thou wilt be very Queer, if thou dost not intend to use the Phrases in Fashion, as thou callest them in thy Second Paper. Hast thou a Mind to pass for a harlot, or to make us all Quakers? I do assure thee, Dear Sir, I am not Politick out of my Veracity, when I subscribe myself

and humble Servant,

SIR

'I AM a tall broad shoulder'd, impudent, black I follow and as I thought, every way qualified for a rich Widow. But, after having tried my Fortune for above three Years together, I have not been able to get one single Relict in the Mind. My first Attacks were generally successful, but always broke off as soon as they came to the Word Settlement. Though I have not improved my Fortune this way, I have my Experience, and have learnt several Secrets which may be of use to those unhappy Gentlemen, who are commonly distinguished by the Name of Widow hunters, and who do not know that this Tribe of Women are, generally speaking as much upon the Catch as themselves. I shall here communicate to you the Mysteries of a certain Female Cabal of this Order, who call themselves the Widow Club. This Club consists of nine experienced Dunces, who take their Places once a Week round a large oval Table. The Mrs President is a Person who has disposed of six Husbands, and is now determined to take a seventh, being of Opinion that there is as much Virtue in the Louch of a seventh Husband as of a seventh Son. Her Comrades are as follow

'I Mrs Stiff, who has four Jointures, by four different Bed fellows, of four different Shires. She is at present upon the Point of Marriage with a Middlesex Man and is said to have an Ambition of extending her Possessions through all the Counties in England on this Side the Trent.

'III Mrs Meditator, who after two Husbands and a Gallant, is now wedded to an old Gentleman of Sixty. Upon her making her Report to the Club after a Week's Cohabitation, she is still allowed to sit as a Widow, and accordingly takes her Place at the Board.

'IV The Widow Quick, married within a Fortnight after the Death of her last Husband

'Her Wife have served her three, and are still as good as new

'V Lady Catherine Scallow She was a Widow at Eighteen, and has since buried a second Husband and two Coachmen

'VI The Lady Waddle She was married in the 15th Year of her Age to Sir Sidon Waddle, Knight, aged Three-score and Twelve, by whom she had Winn nine Months after his Decease. In the 55th Year of her Age she was married to Tanis Spindle Esq., a Youth of Ore and Twenty, who did not out live the Honey-Moon

'VII Deborah Conquest The Case of this Lady is something particular. She is the Relict of Sir Sampson Conquest, some time Justice of the Quorum. Sir Sampson was seven Foot high, and two Foot in Breadth from the Tip of one Shoulder to the other. He had married three Wives who all of them died in Child bed. This terrified the whole Sex, who none of them durst venture on Sir Sampson. At length Mrs. Deborah undertook him, and gave so good an Account of him that in three Years time she very fairly laid him out, and measured his Length upon the Ground. This Exploit has gained her so great a Reputation in the Club, that they have added Sir Sampson's three Victories to hers, and give her the Merit of a fourth Widowhood and she takes her Place accordingly.

'VIII The Widow Widdere, Relict of Mr. John Widdere, Fox-hunter, who broke his Neck over a six Bar Gate. She took his Death so much to Heart, that it was thought it would have put an End to her Life, had she not diverted her Sorrows by receiving the Addresses of a Gentleman in the Neighbourhood who made Love to her in the second Month of her Widowhood. This Gentleman was discarded in a fortnight for the sake of a young Terraplar, who had the Possession of her for six Weeks after, till he was beaten out by a broken Officer, who likewise gave up his Place to a Gentleman at Court. The Courtier was as short lived a Favourite as his Predecessors, but had the Pleasure to see himself succeeded by a long Series of Lovers, who followed the Widow Widdere to the 37th Year of her Age, at which time there ensued a Cessation of ten Years, when John Felt, Haberdasher, took it in his Head to be in love with her, and it is thought will very suddenly carry her off.

'IX The last is pretty Mrs. Kuene, who broke her first Husband's Heart before she was sixteen, at which time she was entered of the Club, but soon after left it, upon Account of a Second, who she made so quick a Dispute of, that she returned to her Seat in less than a Twelvemonth. This young Matron is looked upon as the most rising Member of the Society, and will probably be in the President's Chair before she dies.

'These Ladies, upon their first Institution, resolved to give the Pictures of their deceased Husbands to the Club-Room, but two of them being in their Dead at full Length, they covered all the Walls. Upon which they came to a second Revolution, that every Matron should give her own Picture, and set it round with her Husbands in Miniature.

'As they have most of them the Misfortune to be troubled with the Cholick, they have a noble Celler of Cordials and strong Waters. When they grow Muddled, they are very apt to commemorate their former Partners with a Letter. But ask them which of their Husbands they Condole, they are not able to tell you, and discover plainly that they do not Weep so much for the Loss of a Husband, as for the want of One.

'The principal Rule, by which the whole Society are to govern themselves is this, to cry up the Pleasures of a single Life upon all Occasions, in order to deter the rest of their Sex from Marriage, and engross the whole Male World to themselves.

'They are obliged, when any one makes Love to a Member of the Society, to communicate his Name, at which time the whole Assembly sit upon his Reputation, Person, Fortune, and good Humour, and if they find him qualified for a Sister of the Club, they lay their Heads together how to make him sure. By this Means they are acquainted with all the Widow hunters about Town, who often afford them great Diversion. There is an honest Irish Gentleman, it seems, who knows nothing of this Society, but at different times has made Love to the whole Club.

'Their Conversation often turns upon their former Husbands, and it is very diverting to hear them relate their several Arts and Stratagems, with which they amused the Jealous, puffed the Cholick, or wheedled the good natured Man, till at last, to use the Club Phrase, They sent him out of the House with his Heels foremost.

'The Politicals which are most cultivated by this Society, are the Machiavells, relate chiefly to these two Points. How to treat a Lover, and How to manage a Husband. As for the first Set of Artifices, they are too numerous to come within the Compass of your Paper, and shall therefore be reserved for a Second Letter.

'The Management of a Husband is built upon the following Doctrines, which are Universally assented to by the whole Club. Not to give him his Head at first. Not to allow him too great Freedoms and Familiarities. Not to be treated by him like a raw Girl, but as a Woman that knows the World. Not to lessen anything of her former Figure. To celebrate his Generosity, or any other Virtue, of a deceased Husband, which she would recommend to his Successor. To turn away all his old Friends and Servants, that she may have the Dear Man to her self. To make him disinherit the undutiful Children of any former Wife. Never to be thoroughly convinced of his Affection, till he has made over to her all his Goods and Chattels. After so long a Letter, I am, without more Ceremony,

Your Humble Servant, &c.

fusion to find that all his Jokes had passed through several Editions, and that what he thought was a new Conceit, and had appropriated to his own Use, had appeared in Print before he or his ingenious Friends were ever heard of. This had so good an Effect upon him, that he is content at present to pass for a Man of plain Sense in his ordinary Conversation, and is never facetious but when he knows his Company.

I SHALL entertain my Reader with two very curious Letters. The first of them comes from a chimerical Person, who I believe never writ to any Body before.

SIR,

'I am descended from the Ancient Family of the Blanks, a Name well known among all Men of Business. It is always read in those little white Spaces of Writing which want to be filled up, and which for that Reason are called blank Spaces, as of right appertaining to our Family. For I consider myself as the Lord of a Mannor, who lays his Claim to all Wastes or Spots of Ground that are unappropriated. I am a near Kinsman to John a Styles and John a Nokes, and they, I am told, came in with the Conquerour. I am mentioned oftner in both Houses of Parliament than any other Person in Great Britain. My Name is written, or more properly speaking, not written, thus, 'I am one that can turn my Hand to every thing, and appear under any Shape whatsoever. I can make my self Man, Woman, or Child. I am sometimes metamorphosed into a Year of our Lord, a Day of the Month, or an Hour of the Day. I very often represent a Sum of Money, and am generally the first Subsidy that is granted to the Crown. I have now and then supplied the Place of several Thousands of Land Soldiers, and have as frequently been employed in the Sea Service.

'Now, Sir, my Complaint is this, that I am only made use of to serve a Turn, being always discarded as soon as a proper Person is found out to fill up my Place.

'If you have ever been in the Play-house before the Curtain rises, you see most of the Front Boxes filled with Men of my Family, who forthwith turn out and resign their Stations upon the Appearance of those for whom they are retained.

'But the most illustrious Branch of the Blanks are those who are planted in high Posts, till such time as Persons of greater Consequence can be found out to supply them. One of these Blanks is equally qualified for all Offices: he can serve in time of Need for a Soldier, a Politician, a Lawyer, or what you please. I have known in my time many a Brother Blank that has been born under a lucky Planet, heap up great Riches, and swell into a Man of Figure and Importance, before the Grandees of his Party could agree

'among themselves which of them should step into his Place. Nay, I have known a Blank continue so long in one of these vacant Posts, (for such it is to be reckoned all the time a Blank is in it) that he has grown too formidable and dangerous to be removed.

'But to return to myself, since I am so very commodious a Person, and so very necessary in all well-regulated Governments, I desire you will take my Case into Consideration, that I may be no longer made a Tool of, and only employed to stop a Gap. Such Usage, without a Pun, makes me look very blank. For all which Reasons I humbly recommend myself to your Protection, and am

Your most obedient Servant,
Blank

'P S 'I herewith send you a Paper, drawn up by a Country Attorney employed by two Gentlemen, whose Names he was not acquainted with, and who did not think fit to let him into the Secret which they were transacting. I heard him call it a Blank Instrument, and read it after the following Manner. You may see by this single Instance of what Use I am to the busy World.

'I T Blank, Esq of Blank Town, in the County of Blank, do own my self indebted in the Sum of Blank, to Goodman Blank, for the Service he did me in procuring for me the Goods following, Blank. And I do hereby promise the said Blank to pay unto him the said Sum of Blank, on the Blank Day of the Month of Blank, next ensuing, under the Penalty and Forfeiture of Blank.

I shall take Time to consider the Case of this my imaginary Correspondent, and in the mean while shall present my Reader with a Letter which seems to come from a Person that is made up of Flesh and Blood.

Good Mr SPECTATOR,

'I am married to a very honest Gentleman that is exceedingly good natured, and at the same time very choleric. There is no standing before him when he is in a Passion, but as soon as it is over he is the best-humoured Creature in the World. When he is angry, he breaks all my China-Ware that chances to lie in his Way, and the next Morning sends me in twice as much as he broke the Day before. I may positively say, that he has broke me a Child's Fortune since we were first marry'd together.

'As soon as he begins to fret down goes every thing that is within Reach of his Cane. I once prevailed upon him never to carry a Stick in his Hand, but this saved me nothing, for upon seeing me do something that did not please him, he kicked down a great Jarr, that cost him above Ten Pound the Week before. I then laid the Fragments together in a Heap, and gave him his Cane again, desiring him that if he chanced to be in Anger, he would spend his Passion upon the China that was broke to his Hand. But the very next Day upon my giving a wrong Message to one of the Servants, he flew into such a Rage, that he swept down a Dozen Tea-Dishes, which,

'to my Misfortune, stood very convenient for a Side-Blow

'I then removed all my China into a Room which he never frequents but I got nothing by this neither, for my Looking Glasses immediately went to Rack

'In short, Sir, whenever he is in a Passion he is angry at every thing that is brittle and if on such Occasions he had nothing to vent his Rage upon, I do not know whether my Bones would be in Safety Let me beg of you, Sir, to let me know whether there be any Cure for this unaccountable Distemper or if not, that you will be pleased to publish this Letter For my Husband having a great Veneration for your Writings, will by that means know you do not approve of his Conduct

I am,
Your most humble Servant, &c.

Adst
Regula, peccatus quæ fenas irroget aquas Ne Scintilla dignum horribili sectere flagello

Hor

IT is the Work of a Philosopher to be every Day subduing his Passions, and laying aside his Prejudices. I endeavour at least to look upon Men and their Actions only as an impartial Spectator, without any regard to them as they happen to advance or cross my own private Interest But while I am thus employed my self, I cannot help observing, how those about me suffer themselves to be blinded by Prejudice and Inclination, how readily they pronounce on every Man's Character, which they can give in two Words, and make him either good for nothing, or qualified for every thing On the contrary, those who search thoroughly into humane Nature will find it much more difficult to determine the Value of their Fellow-Creatures, and that Mens Characters are not thus to be given in general Words There is indeed no such thing as a Person entirely good or bad Virtue and Vice are blended and mixed together, in a greater or less Proportion, in every one, and if you would search for some particular good Quality in its most eminent Degree of Perfection, you will often find it in a Mind, where it is darkned and eclipsed by an hundred other irregular Passions

Men have either no Character at all, says a celebrated Author, or it is that of being inconsistent with themselves They find it easier to join Extremities, than to be uniform and of a Piece This is finely illustrated in Xenophon's Life of Cyrus the Great That Author tells us, that Cyrus having taken a most beautiful Lady named Panthea, the Wife of Abadatias, committed her to the Custody of Arazbas, a young Persian Nobleman, who had a little before maintained in Discourse, that a Mind truly virtuous was incapable of entertaining an unlawful Passion The young Gentleman had not long been in Possession of his fair Captive, when a Complaint was made to Cyrus, that he not only solicited the Lady Panthea to receive him in the Room of her absent Husband, but that finding his Entreats had no Effect, he was preparing to make use of Force Cyrus, who loved the young Man, immediately sent for him, and in a gentle Manner representing to him his Fault, and putting him in Mind of his former Assertion, the unhappy Youth, confounded with a quick Sense of his Guilt and Shame, burst out into a Flood of Tears, and spoke as follows

Oh Cyrus, I am convinced that I have two Souls Love has taught me this Piece of Philosophy If I had but one Soul, it could not at the same time part after Virtue and Vice, wish and abhor the same thing It is certain therefore we have two Souls When the good Soul rules, I undertake noble and virtuous Actions, but when the bad Soul predominates, I am forced to do Evil All I can say at present is, that I find my good Soul, encouraged by your Presence, has got the Better of my bad

I know not whether my Readers will allow of this Piece of Philosophy but if they will not, they must confess we meet with as different Passions in one and the same Soul, as can be supposed in two We can hardly read the Life of a great Man who lived in former Ages, or converse with any who is eminent among our Contemporaries, that is not an Instance of what I am saying

But as I have hitherto only argued against the Partiality and Injustice of giving our Judgment upon Men in gross, who are such a Composition of Virtues and Vices, of Good and Evil, I might carry this Reflection still farther, and make it extend to most of their Actions If on the one Hand, we fairly weighed every Circumstance, we should frequently find them obliged to do that Action we at first Sight condemn, in order to avoid another we should have been much more displeased with If on the other Hand we nicely examined such Actions as appear most dazzling to the Eye, we should find most of them either deficient and lame in several Parts, produced by a bad Ambition, or directed to an ill End The very same Action may sometimes be so oddly circumstanced that it is difficult to determine whether it ought to be rewarded or punish'd Those who compiled the Laws of England were so sensible of this, that they have laid it down as one of their first Maxims, It is better suffering a Mischief than an Inconvenience, which is as much as to say in other Words That since no Law can take in or provide for all Cases, it is better private Men should have some Injustice done them, than that a public Grievance should not be redressed This is usually pleaded in Defence of all those Hardships which fall on particular Persons in particular Occasions, which could not be foreseen when a Law was made To remedy this however as much as possible, the Court of Chancery was erected, which frequently mitigates and breaks the Teeth of the Common Law, in Cases of Men's Properties, while in Criminal Cases there is a Power of pardoning still lodged in the Crown

Notwithstanding this, it is perhaps impossible in a large Government to distribute Rewards and Punishments strictly proportioned to the Merits of every Action. The Spartan Commonwealth was indeed wonderfully exact in this Particular and I do not remember in all my Reading to have met with so nice an Example of Justice as that recorded by Plutarch, with which I shall close my Paper for this Day.

The City of Sparta being unexpectedly attacked by a powerful Army of Thebans, was in very great Danger of falling into the Hands of their Enemies. The Citizens suddenly gathering themselves into a Body, fought with a Resolution equal to the Necessity of their Affairs, yet no one so remarkably distinguished himself on this Occasion, to the Amazement of both Armies, as Isadas the Son of Phalidas, who was at that time in the Bloom of his Youth, and very remarkable for the Comeliness of his Person. He was coming out of the Bath when the Alarm was given, so that he had not time to put on his Cloaths, much less his Armour, however transported with a Desire to serve his Country in so great an Emergency, snatching up a Spear in one Hand, and a Sword in the other, he flung himself into the thickest Ranks of his Enemies. Nothing could withstand his Fury, in what Part soever he fought he put the Enemies to Flight without receiving a single Wound. Whether, says Plutarch, he was the particular Care of some God, who rewarded his Valour that Day with an extraordinary Protection, or, that his Enemies, struck with the Unusualness of his Dress and Beauty of his Shape, supposed him something more than Man, I shall not determine.

The Gallantry of this Action was judged so great by the Spartans, that the Ephors, or chief Magistrates, decreed he should be presented with a Garland, but as soon as they had done so, fired him a thousand Drachmas for going out to the Battle unarmed.

No 565] FRIDAY, July 9, 1714. [Addison

—*Deum nan que ire per omnes Terrasque, tractusque maris, culumque profundi
—Aug*

I WAS Yesterday about Sun set walking in the open Fields, till the Night insensibly fell upon me. I at first amused my self with all the Richness and Variety of Colours, which appeared in the Western Parts of Heaven. In Proportion as they faded away and went out several Stars and Planets appeared one after another, till the whole Firmament was in a Glow. The Blevness of the Ether was exceedingly heightened and enlivened by the Season of the Year, and by the Rays of all those Luminaries that passed through it. The Galaxy appeared in its most beautiful White. To compleat the Scene the full Moon rose at length in that clouded Majesty, which Milton takes Notice of, and opened to the Eye a new Picture of Nature, which was more finely shaded, and disposed among softer Lights than that which the Sun had before discovered to us.

As I was surveying the Moon walking in her

Brightness and taking her Progress among the Constellations, a Thought rose in me which I believe very often perplexes and disturbs Men of serious and contemplative Natures. David himself fell into it in that Reflection. When I consider the Heavens the Work of thy Fingers, the Moon and the Stars which thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou regardest him? In the same manner when I considered that infinite Host of Stars, or, to speak more Philosophically, of Suns, which were then shining upon me with those innumerable Sets of Planets or Worlds, which were moving round their respective Suns. When I still enlarged the Idea, and supposed another Heaven of Suns and Worlds rising still above this which we discovered, and these still enlightened by a superior Firmament of Luminaries, which are placed at so great a Distance, that they may appear to the Inhabitants of the former as the Stars do to us. In short, whilst I pursued this Thought I could not but reflect on that little insignificant Figure which I myself bore amidst the Immensity of God's Works.

Were the Sun which enlightens this Part of the Creation, with all the Host of Planetary Worlds, that move about him, utterly extinguished and annihilated, they would not be missed more than a grain of Sand upon the Sea-shore. The Space they possess is so exceedingly little, in Comparison of the whole, that it would scarce make a Blank in the Creation. The Chasm would be imperceptible to an Eye, that could take in the whole Compass of Nature, and pass from one end of the Creation to the other, as it is possible there may be such a Sense in our selves hereafter, or in Creatures which are at present more exalted than our selves. We see many Stars by the help of Glasses, which we do not discover with our naked Eyes, and the finer our Telescopes are, the more still are our Discoveries. Huigenius carries this Thought so far, that he does not think it impossible there may be Stars whose Light is not yet travelled down to us, since their first Creation. There is no Question but the Universe has certain Bounds set to it but when we consider that it is the Work of infinite Power, prompted by infinite Goodness, with an infinite Space to exert itself in, how can our Imagination set any Bounds to it?

To return therefore to my first Thought, I could not but feel upon myself with secret Horror, as a Being that was not worth the smallest Regard of one who had so great a Work under his Care and Superintendency. I was afraid of being overlooked amidst the Immensity of Nature, and lost among that infinite Variety of Creatures, which in all Probability swarm through all these immeasurable Regions of Matter.

In order to recover my self from this mortifying Thought, I considered that it took its Rise from those narrow Conceptions, which we are apt to entertain of the Divine Nature. We our selves cannot attend to many different Objects at the same time. If we are careful to inspect some Things, we must of Course neglect others. This Imperfection which we observe in our selves, is an Imperfection that cleaves in some Degree to Creatures of the highest Capacities as they are Creatures, that is, Beings of finite and limited Natures. The Presence of every created Being is confined to a certain Measure of Space, and consequently his Observation is stunted to a certain number of Objects. The Sphere in which we move and act, and understand, is of a wider Circumference to one Creature than another, according as we rise one above another in the Scale of Existence. But the widest of these our Spheres has its Circumference. When therefore we reflect on the Divine Nature, we are so used and accustomed to this Imperfection in our selves that we cannot forbear in some measure ascribing it to him in whom there is no shadow of Imperfection. Our Reason indeed assures us that his Attributes are Infinite, but the Poorness of our Conceptions is such, that it cannot forbear setting Bounds to every Thing it contemplates, till our Reason comes again to our Succour and throws down all those little Prejudices which rise in us unawares and are natural to the Mind of Man.

We shall therefore utterly extinguish this melancholy Thought of our being overlooked by our Maker in the Multiplicity of his Works and the Infinity of those Objects among which he seems to be incessantly employed, if we consider, in the first Place, that he is Omnipresent, and in the second that he is Omniscient.

If we consider him in his Omnipresence. His Being passes through, actuates and supports the whole Frame of Nature. His Creation, and every Part of it is full of him. There is nothing he has made, that is either so distant, so little, or so inconsiderable, which he does not essentially inhabit. His Substance is within the Substance of every Being, whether material, or immaterial, and as intimately present to it as that Being is to itself. It would be an Imperfection in him were he able to remove out of one Place into another, or to withdraw himself from any Thing he has created, or from any Part of that Space which is diffused and spread abroad to Infinity. In short, to speak of him in the Language of the old Philosopher, he is a Being whose Centre is every where and his Circumference no where.

In the second Place, he is Omniscient as well as Omnipresent. His Omniscience indeed necessarily and naturally flows from his Omnipresence, he cannot but be conscious of every Motion that arises in the whole material World, which he thus essentially pervades, and of every Thought that is stirring in the intellectual World, to every Part of which he is thus intimately united. Several Moralists have considered the Creation as the Temple of God which he has built with his own Hands, and which is filled with his Presence. Others have considered infinite Space as the Receptacle, or rather the Habitation of the Almighty. But the noblest and most exalted Way of considering this infinite Space is that of Sir Isaac Newton, who calls it the Sensorium of the Godhead. Brutes and Men have their Sensoria or little Sensoriums, by which they apprehend the Presence and perceive the Actions of a few Objects, that lie contiguous to them. Their Knowledge and Observation turns within a very narrow Circle. But as God Almighty cannot but perceive and know every Thing in which he resides, Infinite Space gives Room to Infinite Knowledge, and is, as it were, an Organ to Omniscience.

Were the Soul separate from the Body, and with one Glance of Thought should start beyond the Bounds of the Creation, should it for Millions of Years continue its Progress through Infinite Space with the same Activity it would still find it self within the Embrace of its Creator and encompassed round with the Immensity of the Godhead. Whilst we are in the Body he is not less present with us, because he is concealed from us. O that I knew where I might find him! says Job. Behold I go forvara, but he is not there, and back ward, but I cannot perceive him. On the left hand, where he does work, but I cannot behold him: he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him. In short, Reason as well as Revelation assures us, that he cannot be absent from us, notwithstanding he is undiscovered by us.

In this Consideration of God Almighty's Omnipresence and Omniscience every uncomfortable Thought vanishes. He cannot but regard every Thing that has Being, especially such of his Creatures who fear they are not regarded by him. He is privy to all their Thoughts, and to that Anxiety of Heart in particular, which is apt to trouble them on this Occasion. For, as it is impossible he should overlook any of his Creatures, so we may be confident that he regards, with an Eye of Mercy, those who endeavour to recommend themselves to his Notice, and in an unfeigned Humility of Heart think themselves unworthy that he should be mindful of them.

Militia Species Amor est — Ovid

AS my Correspondents begin to grow pretty numerous, I think my self obliged to take some Notice of them, and shall therefore make this Paper a Miscellany of Letters. I have, since my resuming the Office of SPECTATOR, received abundance of Epistles from Gentlemen of the Blade, who, I find, have been so used to Action that they know not how to lie still. They seem generally to be of Opinion that the Fair at home ought to reward them for their Services abroad, and that, till the Cause of their Country calls them again into the Field, they have a sort of Right to Quarter themselves upon the Ladies. In Order to favour their Approaches, I am desired by some to enlarge upon the Accomplishments of their Profession, and by others to give them my Advice in the carrying on of their Attacks. But let us hear what the Gentlemen say for themselves.

MR SPECTATOR,
'Tho' it may look somewhat perverse amidst the Arts of Peace, to talk too much of War, it is but Gratitude to pay the last Office to its Manes,

'since even Peace it self is, in some Measure, obliged to it for its Being

'You have, in your former Papers, always recommended the Accomplished to the Favour of the Fur and, I hope, you will allow me to represent some Part of a Military Life not altogether unnecessary to the forming a Gentleman. I need not tell you that in France, whose Fashions we have been formerly so fond of, almost every one derives his Pretences to Merit from the Sword and that a Man has scarce the Face to make his Court to a Lady, without some Credentials from the Service to recommend him. As the Profession is very ancient, we have Reason to think some of the greatest Men, among the old Romans, derived many of their Virtues from it, their Commanders being frequently, in other Respects, some of the most shining Characters of the Age

'The Army not only gives a Man Opportunities of exercising those two great Virtues Patience and Courage, but often produces them in Minds where they had scarce any Footing before. I must add, that it is one of the best Schools in the World to receive a general Notion of Mankind, and a certain Freedom of Behaviour, which is not so easily acquired in any other Place. At the same Time I must own, that some Military Affairs are pretty extraordinary, and that a Man who goes into the Army a Coxcomb will come out of it a Sort of Publick Nuisance. But a Man of Sense, or one who before had not been sufficiently used to a mixed Conversation generally takes the true Turn. The Court has in all Ages been allowed to be the Standard of Good-breeding and I believe there is not a juster Observation on Monsieur Rochevenceau ill, than that A Man who has been bred up only to Business, can never get the Air of a Courtier at Court, but will immediately catch it in the Camp. The Reason of this most certainly is, that the very Essence of Good-breeding and Politeness consists in several Niceties, which are so minute that they escape his Observation, and he falls short of the Original he would copy after, but when he sees the same Things charged and aggravated to a Fault, he no sooner endeavours to come up to the Pattern which is set before him, than, though he stops somewhat short of that, he naturally rests where in reality he ought. I was two or three Days ago, mightily pleased with the Observation of an humorous Gentleman upon one of his Friends, who was in other Respects every way an accomplished Person, that he was tired nothing but a Dash of the Coxcomb in him, by which he understood a little of that Alertness and Unconcern in the common Actions of Life, which is usually so visible among Gentlemen of the Army, and which a Campaign or two would infallibly have given him.

'You will easily guess Sir, by this my Panegyrick upon a Military Education, that I am myself a Soldier, and indeed I am so, I remember, within three Years after I had been in the Army, I was ordered into the Country a Recruiting. I had very particular Success in this Part of the Service, and was over and above assured at my going away, that I might have taken a young 'Lady, who was the most considerable Fortune in the County along with me. I preferred the Pursuit of Fame at that time to all other Considerations, and tho' I was not absolutely bent on a Wooden Leg, resolved at least to get a Scar or two for the good of Europe. I have at present as much as I desire of this Sort of Honour, and if you could recommend me effectually, should be well enough contented to pass the Remainder of my Days in the Arms of some dear kind Creature and upon a pretty Estate in the Country. This, as I take it, would be following the Example of Licinus Cincinnatus, the old Roman Dictator, who at the End of a War left the Camp to follow the Plow. I am, Sir, with all imaginable Respect,

Your most Obedient,
Humble Servant,
Will Warly

MR SPECTATOR,

'I am an Half-pay Officer, and am at present with a Friend in the Country. Here is a rich Widow in the Neighbourhood, who has made Fools of all the Fox hunters within fifty Miles of her. She declares she intends to marry, but has not yet been asked by the Man she could like. She usually admits her humble Admirers to an Audience of two, but after she has once given them Denial will never see them more. I am assured by a Female Relation, that I shall have fair Play, at her but as my whole Success depends on my first Approaches, I desire your Advice, whether I had best Storm or proceed by way of Sap.

I am, SIR,
Yours, &c.

'P S I had forgot to tell you, that I have already carried one of her Outworks, that is, secured her Maid.

MR SPECTATOR,

'I have assisted in several Sieges in the Low-Countries, and being still willing to employ my Talents, as a Soldier and Engineer lay down this Morning at Seven a Clock before the Door of an obstinate Female who had for some time refused me Admittance. I made a Lodgment in an outer Parlour about Twelve. The Enemy returned to her Bed-Chamber yet I still pursued, and about two a-Clock this Afternoon she thought fit to Capitulate. Her Demands are indeed somewhat high, in Relation to the Settlement of her Fortune. But being in Possession of the House, I intend to insist upon Carle Blanche, and am in hopes, by keeping off all other Pretenders for the Space of twenty four Hours to starve her into a Compliance. I beg your speedy Advice, and am,

SIR, Yours,
Peter Push.

From my Camp in Red-Lion Square, Saturday 4, in the Afternoon.

—Is ceptus clamor frus' r'us Iantes—VING

I HAVE received private Advice from some of my Correspondents, that if I would give my Paper a general Run, I should take care to season it with Scandal. I have indeed observed of late, that few Writings sell which are not filled with great Names and illustrious Titles. The Reader generally casts his Eye upon a new Book, and if he finds several Letters separated from one another by a Dash, he buys it up, and peruses it with great Satisfaction. An M and an A, an S and an R, with a short Line between them, has sold many an insipid Pamphlet. Nay I have known a whole Edition go off by virtue of two or three well written S—s.

A sprinkling of the Words Faction, Frivolous, Infidel, Plunderer, and the like significant Terms in an Italic Character, have also a very good Effect upon the Eye of the Purchaser. I need not caution Scritler, Lerr Ro us, Rescu, As a, and Pilla n without which it is impossible to carry on a Modern Controversie.

Our Party writers are so sensible of the secret Virtue of an Innuendo to recommend their Productions, that of late they never mention the Q—n or P—t at length, though they speak of them with Honour, and with that Deference which is due to them from every private Person. It gives a secret Satisfaction to a Peruser of these mysterious Works, that he is able to decipher them without help and, by the Strength of his own natural Parts, to fill up a Blank-Space or make out a Word that has only the first or last Letter to it.

Some of our Authors indeed, when they would be more Satirical than ordinary, omit only the Vowels of a great Man's Name, and fill most unmercifully upon all the Consonants. This way of Writing was first of all introduced by J—n Brown, of facetious Memory, who, after having gutted a proper Name of all its intermediate Vowels, used to plant it in his Work, and take as free with it as he pleased, without any Danger of the Statute.

That I may imitate these celebrated Authors, and publish a Paper which shall be more striking than ordinary, I have here drawn up a very curious Libel, in which a Reader of Penetration will find a great deal of concealed Satire, and if he be acquainted with the present Posture of Affairs, will easily discover the Meaning of it.

If there are four Persons in the Nation who endeavour to bring all things into Confusion, and ruin their native Country, I think every honest Engl's-man ought to be upon his Guard. That there are such, every one will agree with me who hears me name  with his first Friend and Favourite  not to mention  nor  These People may cry Ch—rch, Ch—rch, as long as they please, but, to make use of a Must the br—t's Nation suffer forsooth, because my Lady Q—t—t has been disobligh'd? I will not make my Court to an ill Man tho' he were a King or a Prince. Nay, I would not stick to call so wretched a Politician, a Truitor, an Enemy to his Country, and a Blad—r's, &c. &c.

The remaining Part of this Political Treatise, which is written after the manner of the most celebrated Authors in Great Britain, I may communicate to the Publick at a more convenient Season. In the mean while I shall leave this with my curious Reader, as some malicious Writers do their Lanterns, and if any sagacious Person can fairly muddle it, I will print his Explanation, and if he pleases, acquaint the World with his Name.

I hope this short Essay will convince my Reader, it is not for want of Abilities that I avoid Strictures, and that if I would apply my Mind to it, I might in a little time be as great a Master of the Political Scratch as any the most eminent Writer of the Age. I shall only add, that in order to outshine all this Modern Race of Sincof's, and thoroughly content my F—gure Readers, I intend shortly to publish a SPECTATOR, that shall not have a single Vowel in it.

—Dum rect'as, incip' esse Tuns—MART

I WAS Yesterday in a Coffee-House not far from the Royal Exchange, where I observed three or four in close Conference over a Pipe of Tobacco upon which, having filled one for my own use, I lighted it at the little Wax Candle that stood before them, and after having thrown in two or three Whiffs amongst them, sat down and made one of the Company. I need not tell my Reader, that lighting a Man's Pipe at the same Candle, is looked upon among Brother smokers as an Overture to Conversation and Friendship. As we here lay our Heads together in a very amicable Manner, being intrenched under a Cloud of our own smoking, I took up the last SPECTATOR, and casting my Eye over it, the SPECTATOR, says, I us—ery witty to—Day, upon which a lusty lethargick old Gentleman, who sat at the Upper-end of the Table, having gradually blown out of his Mouth a great deal of Smoke, which he had been collecting for some Time before, My, says he, more w—t's it answ—e I am afraid. His Neighbour who sat at his right Hand immediately coloured and being an angry Politician, laid down his Pipe with so much Wrath that he broke it in the Middle, and by that Means furnished me with a Tobacco stopper I took it up very sedately, and looking him full in the Face, made use of it from Time to Time all the while he was speaking This fellow, says he, can't for his Life keep out of Politics Do you see how he abuses four great Men here? I fix'd my Eye very attentively on the Paper, and asked him if he meant those who were represented by Astensks. Astensks, says he, do you call them? they are all of them Stars He might as well have put Garters to 'em Then pray do but muddle the two or three next Lines? Ch-rich and P dding in the same Sentence! Our Clergy are very much beholden to him Upon this the third Gentleman, who was of a mild Disposition, and, as I found, a Whig in his Heart, desired him not to be too severe upon the SPECTATOR neither. For, says he, *you find he is very cautious of giving Offence, and has therefore put it in Dashes into his Pudding A Fig for his Dash, says the angry Politician In his next Sentence he gives a plain Innuendo, that our Posterity will be in a sweet P-ckle What does the Fool mean by his Pickle? Why does not he write it at length, if he means honestly? I have read over the whole Sentence, says I, but I look upon the Parenthesis in the Belly of it to be the most dangerous Part, and as full of Insinuations as it can hold But who, says I, is my Lady Q-p-t-s? A3, Answer that if you can, Sir, says the furious Statesman to the poor Whig that sits over-against him But without giving him Time to reply, I do assure you, says he, were I my Lady Q-p-t-s, I would sue him for Scandalum Magnatum What is the World come to? Must every Body be allowed to—? He had by this time filled a new Pipe and applying it to his Lips, when we expected the last Word of his Sentence, put us off with a Whiff of Tobacco which he redoubled with so much Rage and Repudiation, that he almost stifled the whole Company After a short Pause, I owned that I thought the SPECTATOR had gone too far in writing so many Letters of my Lady Q-p-t-s's Name, but however, says I, he has made a little Amends for it in his next Sentence, where he leaves a blank Space without so much as a Consonant to direct us? I mean, says I, after those Words, The Fleet, that used to be the Terror of the Ocean, should be Wind bound for the sake of a— after which ensues a Chasm, that in my Opinion looks modest enough Sir, says my Antagonist, *you may easily know his Meaning by his Gaping, I suppose he designs his Chasm, as you call it, for an Hole to creep out at, but I believe it will hardly serve his Turn Who can endure to see the great Officers of State, the B-y's and T's, treated after so scurrilous a Manner? I can't for my Life, says I, imagine who they are the SPECTATOR means? Not says he, — Your humble Servant, Sir! Upon which he flung himself back in his Chair after a contemptuous Manner, and smiled upon the old lethargick Gentleman on his left Hand, who I found was his great Admirer The Whig however had begun to conceive a Good will towards me, and seeing my Pipe out, very generously offered me the Use of his Box, but I declined it with great Civility, being obliged to meet a Friend about that Time in another Quarter of the City

At my leaving the Coffee house, I could not forbear reflecting with my self upon that gross Tribe of Fools who may be termed the Over-wise, and upon the Difficulty of writing any thing in this censorious Age which a weak Head may not construe into private Satyr and personal Reflection

A Man who has a good Nose at an Innuendo, smells Treason and Sedition in the most innocent Words that can be put together, and never sees a Vice or Folly stigmatized, but finds out one or other of his Acquaintance pointed at by the Writer I remember an empty pragmatical Fellow in the Country, who upon reading over the whole Duty of Man, had written the Names of several Persons in the Village at the Side of every Sin which is mentioned by that excellent Author so that he had converted one of the best Books in the World into a Libel against the 'Squire Church-wardens, Overseers of the Poor, and all other the most considerable Persons in the Parish This Book with these extraordinary marginal Notes fell accidentally into the Hands of one who had never seen it before, upon which there arose a current Report that Somebody had written a Book against the 'Squire and the whole Parish The Minister of the Place having at that Time a Controversy with some of his Congregation upon the Account of his Pithes, was under some Suspicion of being the Author, till the good Man set his People right by shewing them that the satyrical Passages might be applied to several others of two or three neighbouring Villages, and that the Book was writ against all the Sinners in England

NO Vices are so incurable as those which Men are apt to glory in One would wonder how Drunkenness should have the good Luck to be of this Number Anacharsis, being invited to a Match of Drinking at Corinth, demanded the Prize very humorously because he was drunk before any of the rest of the Company for, says he, when we run a Race, he who arrives at the Goal first is entitled to the Reward On the contrary, in this thirsty Generation, the Honour falls upon him who carries off the greatest Quantity of Liquor, and knocks down the rest of the Company I was the other Day with honest Will Funnell the West Saxon, who was reckoning up how much Liquor had past through him in the last twenty Years of his Life, which, according to his Computation, amounted to twenty three Hogsheads of October, four Ton of Port, half a Kilderkin of small Peer, nineteen Barrels of Cider, and three Glasses of Champagne, besides which, he had assisted at four hundred Bowls of Punch, not to mention Sips, Drams, and Whets without Number I question not but every Reader's Memory will suggest to him several ambitious young Men, who are as run in this Particular as Will Funnell, and can boast of as glorious Exploits

Our modern Philosophers observe that there is a general Decay of Moisture in the Globe of the Earth. Thus they chiefly ascribe to the Growth of Vegetables, which incorporate into their own Substance many fluid Bodies that never return again to their former Nature. But, with Submission, they ought to throw into their Account those unnumerable rational Beings which fetch their Nourishment chiefly out of Liquids, especially when we consider that Men, compared with their Fellow Creatures, drink much more than comes to their Share.

But however highly this Tribe of People may think of themselves, a drunken Man is a greater Monster than any that is to be found among all the Creatures which God has made: as indeed there is no Character which appears more despicable and deformed, in the Eyes of all reasonable Persons, than that of a Drunkard. Bonatus, one of our own Countrymen, who was addicted to this Vice, having set up for a Share in the Roman Empire, and being defeated in a great Battle, hung himself. When he was seen by the Army, in this melancholy Situation, notwithstanding he had believed himself very bravely the common Jest was, that he hung there as hanging upon the Tree before them was not a Man but a Bottle.

This Vice has very fatal Effects on the Mind, the Body, and Fortune of the Person who is devoted to it.

In regard to the Mind it first of all discovers every flaw in it. The sober Man, by the Strength of Reason, may keep under and subdue every Vice or Quality to which he is most inclined, but Wine makes every latent Seed sprout up in the Soul, and show itself. It gives Fury to the Passions, and force to those Objects which are apt to produce them. When a young Fellow complained to an old Philosopher that his Wife was not handsome, Put less Water in your Wine, says the Philosopher, and you'll quickly make her so. Wine heightens Indifference into Love, Love into Jealousy, and Jealousy into Madness. It often turns the Good natured Man into an Idiot and the Cholerick into an Assassin. It gives Bitterness to Resentment, it makes Vanity insupportable and displays every little Spot of the Soul in its utmost Deformity.

Nor does this Vice only betray the hidden Faults of a Man, and shew them in the most odious Colours, but often occasions Faults to which he is not naturally subject. There is more of Lorn than of Truth in a Saying of Seneca, That Drunkenness does not produce but discover Faults. Common Experience teaches us the contrary. Wine throws a Man out of himself, and infuses Quivies into the Mind, which she is a Stranger to in her sober Moments. The Person you converse with, after the third Bottle is not the same Man who at first sat down at Table with you. Upon this Maxim is founded one of the prettiest Sayings I ever met with, which is ascribed to Publius Syrus, Qui ebrium ludificat ledit absentem, He who jests upon a Man that is drunk, injures the Absent

Thus does Drunkenness act in direct Contradiction to Reason, whose Business it is to clear the Mind of every Vice which is crept into it, and to guard it against all the Approaches of any that endeavour to make its Entrance. But besides these ill Effects which this Vice produces in the Person who is actually under its Dominion, it has also a bad Influence on the Mind even in its sober Moments, as it insensibly weakens the Understanding, impairs the Memory, and makes those habitual which are produced by frequent Excesses.

I should now proceed to shew the ill Effects which this Vice has on the Bodies and Fortunes of Men: but these I shall reserve for the Subject of some future Paper.

THERE is scarce a Man living who is not actuated by Ambition. When this Principle meets with an honest Mind and great Abilities, it does infinite Service to the World: on the contrary, when a Man only thinks of distinguishing himself, without being thus qualified for it, he becomes a very pernicious or a very ridiculous Creature. I shall here confine my self to that petty kind of Ambition, by which some Men grow eminent for odd Accomplishments and trivial Performances. How many are there whose whole Reputation depends upon a Pun or a Quibble? You may often see an Artist in the Streets gain a Circle of Admirers, by carrying a long Pole upon his Chin or Forehead in a perpendicular Posture. Ambition has taught some to write with their Feet, and others to walk upon their Hands. Some tumble into Fame, others grow immortal by throwing themselves through a Hoop.

Cetera de genere hoc adeo sunt multa, loquacem Delassari valent I abum—

I am led into this Train of Thought by an Adventure I lately met with.

I was the other Day at a Tavern where the Master of the House, accommodating us himself with every thing we wanted I accidentally fell into a Discourse with him, and talking of a certain great Man, who shall be named, he told me, that he had sometimes the Honour to treat him with a Whistle, (adding by the way of Parenthesis) For you must know Gentlemen, that I whistle the best of any Man in Europe. This naturally put me upon desiring him to give us a Sample of his Art, upon which he called for a Case-Knife, and applying the Edge of it to his Mouth, converted it into a musical Instrument, and entertained me with an Italian Solo. Upon laying down the Knife, he took up a Pur of clean Tobacco Pipes and after having slid the small

* Named Dainty. He was of the truned bands, and commonly known as Captain Dainty.

End of them over the Table in a most melodious Trill, he fetched a Tune out of them, whistling to them at the same time in Consort. In short, the Tobacco Pipes became Musical Pipes in the Hands of our Virtuoso, who confessed to me ingenuously, he had broke such Quantities of them, that he had almost broke himself, before he had brought this Piece of Musick to any tolerable Perfection. I then told him I would bring a Company of Friends to dine with him the next Week, as an Encouragement to his Ingenuity upon which he thanked me, saying, I that he would provide himself with a new Frying-Pan against that Day. I replied, I that it was no matter, Roast and Boiled would serve our Turn. He smiled at my Simplicity, and told me, That it was his Design to give us a Tune upon it. As I was surprised at such a Promise, he sent for an old Frying Pan, and grating it upon the Board, whistled to it in such a melodious Manner, that you could scarce distinguish it from a Base-Viol. He then took his Seat with us at the Table, and hearing my Friend that was with me humm over a Tune to himself, he told him if he would sing out he would accompany his Voice with a Tobacco-Pipe. As my Friend has an agreeable Base, he chose rather to sing to the Frying-Pan, and indeed between them they made up a most extraordinary Consort. Finding our Landlord so great a Proficient in Kitchen Musick, I asked him if he was Master of the Tongs and Key. He told Me that he had laid it down some Years since, as a little unfashionable but that if I pleased he would give me a Lesson upon the Gridiron. He then informed me that he had added two Bars to the Gridiron, in order to give it a greater Compass of Sound, and I perceived was as well pleased with the Invention, as Sappho could have been upon adding two Strings to the Lute. To be short, I found that his whole Kitchen was furnished with musical Instruments, and could not but look upon this Artist as a kind of Burlesque Musician.

He afterwards of his own Accord fell into the Imitation of several Singing-Birds. My Friend and I toasted our Mistresses to the Nightingale, when all of a sudden we were surpriz'd with the Musick of the Thrush. He next proceeded to the Sky-Lark, mounting up by a proper Scale of Notes, and afterwards falling to the Ground with a very easy and regular Descent. He then contracted his Whistle to the Voice of several Birds of the smallest Size. As he is a Man of a larger Bulk and higher Stature than ordinary, you would fancy him a Giant when you look'd upon him, and a Tom Tit when you shut your Eyes. I must not omit acquainting my Reader, that this accomplished Person was formerly the Master of a Toy-shop near Temple-Bar, and that the famous Charles Mathers was bred up under him. I am told that the Misfortunes which he has met with in the World, are chiefly owing to his great Application to his Musick, and therefore cannot but recommend him to my Readers as one who deserves their Favour, and may afford them great Diversion over a Bottle of Wine, which he sells at the Queen's Arms, near the End of the little Piazza in Covent Garden.

AS the Work, I have engag'd in, will not only consist of Papers of Humour and Learning, but of several Essays Moral and Divine, I shall publish the following one, which is founded on a former SPECTATOR,¹ and sent me by a particular Friend, not questioning but it will please such of my Readers, as think it no Disparagement to their Understandings to give way sometimes to a serious Thought

SIR,

In your Paper of Friday the 9th Instant you had Occasion to consider the Ubiquity of the God-head, and at the same time, to shew, that as he is present to every thing, he cannot but be attentive to every thing, and privy to all the Modes and Parts of its Existence, or, in other Words, that his Omnipresence and Omnipresence are coexistent, and run together through the whole Infinitude of Space. This Consideration might furnish us with many Incentives to Devotion and Motives to Morality, but as this Subject has been handled by several excellent Writers, I shall consider it in a Light wherein I have not seen it placed by others.

First, How disconsolate is the Condition of an intellectual Being who is thus present with his Maker, but at the same time receives no extraordinary Benefit or Advantage from this his Presence?

Secondly, How deplorable is the Condition of an intellectual Being, who feels no other Effects from this his Presence but such as proceed from Divine Wrath and Indignation?

Thirdly, How happy is the Condition of that intellectual Being, who is sensible of his Maker's Presence from the secret Effects of his Mercy and Loving kindness?

First, How disconsolate is the Condition of an intellectual Being, who is thus present with his Maker, but at the same time receives no extraordinary Benefit or Advantage from this his Presence? Every Particle of Matter is actuated by this Almighty Being which passes through it. The Heavens and the Earth, the Stars and Planets, move and gravitate by Virtue of this great Principle within them. All the dead Part of Nature are invigorated by the Presence of their Creator, and made capable of exerting their respective Qualities. The several Instincts, in the brute Creation, do likewise operate and work towards the several Ends which are agreeable to them, by this Divine Energy. Man only, who does not co-operate with this holy Spirit, and is unattentive to his Presence, receives none of those Advantages from it, which are perfective of his Nature, and necessary to his Well being. The Divinity is with him, and in him, and every where about him, but of no Advantage to him. It is the same thing to a Man without Religion, as if there were no God in the World. It is indeed impossible for an in-

*Quod medicorum est
Promittant medici—* Hor

I AM the more pleased with these my Papers, since I find they have encouraged several Men of Learning and Wit to become my Correspondents. I Yesterday received the following Essay against Quacks, which I shall here communicate to my Readers for the Good of the Publick, begging the Writers Pardon for those Additions and Retrenchments which I have made in it.

The Desire of Life is so natural and strong a Passion, that I have long since ceased to wonder at the great Encouragement which the Practice of Physick finds among us. Well-constituted Governments have always made the Profession of a Physician both honourable and advantageous. Homer's Machaon and Virgil's Japis were Men of Renown, Heroes in War, and made at least as much Havock among their Enemies as among their Friends. Those who have little or no Faith in the Abilities of a Quack will apply themselves to him, either because he is willing to sell Health at a reasonable Profit, or because the Patient, like a drowning Man, catches at every twig, and hopes for Relief from the most Ignorant, when the most able Physicians give him none. Though Impudence and many Words are necessary to these Itinerary Galeas as a faced Hat or a Merry Andrew, yet they would turn very little to the Advantage of the Owner, if there were not some inward Disposition in the sick Man to favour the Pretensions of the Mountebank. Love of Life in the one, and of Money in the other, creates a good Correspondence between them.

There is scarce a City in Great-Britain but has one of this Tribe, who takes it into his Protection, and on the Market-Day harangues the good People of the Place with Aphorisms and Receipts. You may depend upon it, he comes not there for his own private Interest, but out of a particular Affection to the Town. I remember one of those Public-spirited Artists at Hammersmith, who told his Audience 'that he had been born and bred there, and that having a special Regard for the Place of his Nativity, he was determined to make a Present of five Shillings to as many as would accept of it'. The whole Crowd stood agape, and ready to take the Doctor at his Word, when putting his Hand into a long Bag, as every one was expecting his Crown Piece, he drew out an handful of little Packets, each of which he informed the Spectators was constantly sold at five Shillings and six pence, but that he would bate the odd five Shillings to every Inhabitant of that Place. The whole Assembly immediately closed with this generous Offer, and took off all his Physick, after the Doctor had made them vouch for one another, that there were no Foreigners among them, but that they were all Hammersmith-Men.

There is another Branch of Pretenders to this Art, who, without either Horse or Pickle Herring, lie snug in a Garret, and send down Notice to the World of their extraordinary Parts and Abilities by printed Bills and Advertisements. These seem to have derived their Custom from an Eastern Nation which Herodotus speaks of, among whom it was a Law, that whenever any Cure was performed, both the Method of the Cure, and an Account of the Distemper, should be fixed in some Publick Place but as Customs will corrupt, these our Moderns provide themselves of Persons to attest the Cure, before they publish or make an Experiment of the Prescription. I have heard of a Porter, who serves as a Knight of the Post under one of these Operators, and tho' he was never sick in his Life, has been cured of all the Diseases in the Dispensary. These are the Men whose Sagacity has invented Elixirs of all sorts, Pills and Lozenges, and take it as an Affront if you come to them before you are given over by every Body else. Their Medicines are infallible, and ever fail of Success, that is of enriching the Doctor, and setting the Patient effectually at Rest.

I lately dropt into a Coffee house at Westminster, where I found the Room hung round with Ornaments of this Nature. There were Elixirs, Tinctures, the Anodine Lotus, English Pills, Electuaries, and, in short, more Remedies than I believe there are Diseases. At the Sight of so many Inventions, I could not but imagine my self in a kind of Arsenal or Magazine, where store of Arms were reposed against any sudden Invasion. Should you be attack'd by the Enemy Side-ways, here was an infallible Piece of defensive Armour to cure the Pleurisie. Should a Distemper beat up your Head Quarters, here you might purchase an impenetrable Helmet, or, in the Language of the Artist, a Cephalic Tincture. If your moun Body be assaulted, here are various Kinds of Armour in Case of various Onsets. I began to congratulate the present Age upon the Happiness Men might reasonably hope for in Life, when Death was thus in a manner Deferred, and when Pain it self would be of so short a Duration, that it would but just serve to enhance the Value of Pleasure. While I was in these Thoughts, I unluckily called to mind a Story of an Ingenious Gentleman of the last Age, who lying violently afflicted with the Gout, a Person came and offered his Service to Cure him by a Method, which he assured him was Infallible. The Servant who received the Message carried it up to his Master, who enquiring whether the Person came on Foot or in a Chariot and being informed that he was on Foot, says he, send the Knave about his Business. Was his Method as infallible as he pretends, he would long before now have been in his Coach and Six. In like manner I concluded, that had all these Advertisers arrived to that Skill they pretend to, they would have had no Need for so many Years successively to publish to the World the Place of their Abode, and the Virtues of their Medicines. One of these Gentlemen indeed pretends to an effectual Cure for Leanness

What Effects it may have had upon those who have try'd it I cannot tell but I am credibly informed that the Call for it has been so great, that it has effectually cured the Doctor himself of that Distemper. Could each of them produce so good an Instance of the Success of his Medicines, they might soon persuade the World into an Opinion of them.

I observe that most of the Bills agree in one Expression, viz. that (i. e. the God's Blessing) they perform such and such Cures. This Expression is certainly very proper and emphatical, for that is all they have for it. And if ever a Cure is performed on a Patient where they are concerned, they can claim no greater Share in it than Virgil's Jafus in the curing of Aneas, he tried his Skill, was very assiduous about the Wound, and indeed was the only visible Means that relieved the Hero but the Poet assures us it was the particular Assistance of a Deity that speeded the Operation. An English Reader may see the whole Story in Mr Dryden's Translation.

*Prop'd on his Larce the pensiv' Herce stood,
And heard, and saw unmov'd, the Mourner's Cry.*

*The fam'd Physician tucks his Robes aroun'd, With ready Harp, and has us to the Wound Will get the Toiches he performs his Part,
This Way and that, solliciting the Dard,
And exercises all his Heav'nly Art.
All soothing Simples, known of Sovereign Use,
He presses out, and pours the noble Juice,
These first he uses, to lenise the Pain,
He tugs with Pincers, & if he tugs in vain
Then to the Patron of his Art he pray'd, The Patron of his Art refused his Aid.*

But now the Goddess Mother, mov'd with Grief,

*Aid pierc'd with Pity, hastens her Relief A Branch of Healing Dittany she brought,
Which in the Cretan Fields with Care she soget Rough is the Stem, which roolly Leazes surround.*

The Leafs with Flowers, the Flowers with Purple crown'd

Well known to wounded Goats a sure Relief To draw the pointed Steel, and ease the Grief This Venus brings, in Clouds involc'd, and twines

Th' extracted Lig'or with Ambrosian Dew, And od'rous Panacea Unseen she stands, Tempering the Mixture with her heavenly Hands

And pours it in a Bowl, already crown'd With Juice of medicinal Herbs, prepared to bathe the Wound

The Leech, in knowing of superior Art, Which aids the Cure, with it's foment's the Part,

*And in a Moment ceas'd the raging Smart Stanch'd the Blood, and in the bottom stands
The Steel, but scarcely touch'd with tender Hands,*

*Moves up, and follows of its own Accord,
And Health and Vigour are at once restor'd Taps first perceiv'd the closing Wound,
And first the Footsteps of a God he found*

*Arms, Arms! he cries, the Sword and Shield prepare,
And send the willing Chief, renc'd to War
This is no mortal Work, no cure of mine, Nor Art's effect, but done by Hands Divine*

—Castigata remordent—Juv

MY Paper on the Club of Widows has brought me in several Letters and, among the rest, a long one from Mrs President, is follows.

Swart SJA,

'You are pleased to be very merry, as you imagine, with us Widows. And you seem to ground your Sityr on our receiving Consolation so soon after the Death of our Deary, and the Number we are pleased to admit for our Companions, but you never reflect what Husbands we have buried, and how short a Sorrow the Loss of them was capable of occasioning. For my own Part, Mrs. President as you call me, my first Husband I was marry'd to at Fourteen, by my Uncle and Guardian (as I afterwards discovered) by way of Sale, for the Third part of my Fortune. This Fellow looked upon me as a meer Child, he might breed up after his own Fancy if he liked my Chamber-Maid before my Face, I was supposed so ignorant, how could I think there was any Hurt in it? When he came home Roaring Drunk at five in the Morning, 'twas the Custom of all Men that live in the World. I was not to see a Penny of Money, for, poor Thing how could I manage it? He took a handsome Cousin of his into the House, (as he said) to be my House-keeper, and to govern my Servants, for how should I know how to rule a Family? and while she had what Money she pleased, which was but reasonable for the Trouble she was at for my Good, I was not to be so censorious as to dislike Familiarity and Kindness between near Relations. I was too great a Coward to contend, but not so ignorant a Child to be thus imposed upon. I resented his Contempt as I ought to do, and in most poor pass we blinded Wives do, till it pleased Heaven to take away my Liant, who left me free Possession of my own Land, and a large Jointure. My Youth and Money brought me many Lovers, and several endeavour'd to establish an Interest in my Heart while my Husband was in his last Sickness. The Honourable Edward Watfort was one of the first who addressed to me, advised to it by a Cousin of his that was my intimate Friend and knew to a Penny what I was worth. Mr Watfort is a very agreeable Man, and every Body would like him as well as he does himself, if they did not plainly see that his Esteem and Love is all taken up, and by such an Object, as 'tis impossible to get the better of. I men in myself. He made no doubt of marrying me within Four or five Months, and begun to proceed with such assured ease Air, that piqued my Pride not to banish him, quite contrary, out of pure Malice, I 'heard his first Declaration with so much innocent Surprise, and blushed so prettily, I perceived it touched his very Heart, and he thought me the best-natured Silly poor thing on Earth. When a Man has such a Notion of a Woman, he loves her better than he thinks he does. I was overjoy'd to be thus revenged on him, for designing on my Fortune, and finding it was in my Power to make his Heart ache, I resolv'd to compleat my Conquest, and entertain'd several other Pretenders. The first Impression of my undesigned Innocence was so strong in his Head, he attributed all my Followers to the inevitable Force of my Charms, and from several Blushes and side Glances, concluded himself the Favourite, and when I used him like a Dog for my Diversion, he thought it was all Prudence and Fear, and pitied the Violence I did my own Inclinations to comply with my Friends, when I marry'd Sir Nicholas Tribble of Sixty Years of Age. You know, Sir, the Case of Mrs Medlar, I hope you would not have had me cry out my Eyes for such a Husband. I shed Tears enough for my Widowhood a Week after my Marriage, and when he was put in his Grave, reckoning he had been two Years dead, and my self a Widow of that Standing, I married three Weeks afterwards John Sturdy, Esq, his next Heir. I had indeed some Thoughts of taking Mr Waitfort, but I found he could stry, and besides he thought it indecent to ask me to marry again till my Year was out, so privately resolving him for my Fourth, I took Mr Sturdy for the present. Would you believe it, Sir, Mr Sturdy was just Five and Twenty, about Six Foot high, and the stoutest Fox hunter in the Country, and I believe I wished ten thousand times for my old Tribble again. He was following his Dogs all the Day, and all the Night keeping them up at Table with him and his Companions: however I think my self oblig'd to them for lending him a Chase in which he broke his Neck. Mr Waitfort began his Addresses anew, and I verily believe I had married him now, but there was a young Officer in the Guards, that had debauched two or three of my Acquaintance, and I could not forbear being a little vain of his Courtship. Mr Waitfort heard of it, and read me such an insolent Lecture upon the Conduct of Women, I married the Officer that very Day, out of pure Spight to him. Half an Hour after I was married I received a Penitential Letter from the Honourable Mr Edward Waitfort, in which he begged Pardon for his Passion, as proceeding from the Violence of his Love. I triumphed when I read it, and could not help, out of the Pride of my Heart, shewing it to my new Spouse, and we were very merry together upon it. Alas! my Mirth lasted a short time, my young Husband was very much in Debt when I marry'd him, and his first Action afterwards was to set up a gilt Chariot and Six, in fine Trappings before and behind. I had married so hastily, I had not the Prudence to reserve my Estate in my own Hands. My ready Money was lost in two Nights at the Groom Porter's, and my Diamond Necklace which was stole I did not know how, I met in the Street upon Jenny Whaddie's Neck.

'My Plate vanished Piece by Piece, and I had been reduced to downright Pewter, if my Officer had not been deliciously killed in a Duel, by a Fellow that had cheated him of Five Hundred Pounds, and afterwards, at his own Request, satisfy'd him and me too, by running him through the Body. Mr Waitfort was still in Love, and told me so again, and to prevent all Fears of ill Usage, he desir'd me to reserve every thing in my own Hands. But now my Acquaintance began to wish me Joy of his Constancy, my Charms were declining, and I could not resist the Delight I took in shewing the young Flirts about Town, it was yet in my Power to give Pain to a Man of Sense. This, and some private Hopes he would bring himself, and what a Glory would it be for me, and how I should be envy'd, made me accept of being third Wife to my Lord Fraday. I proposed from my Rank and his Estate, to live in all the Joys of Pride, but how was I mistaken? he was neither extravagant, nor ill-natured, nor debauched? I suffered however more with him than with all my others. He was splanatick. I was forced to sit whole Days hearkening to his imaginary Ails, it was impossible to tell what would please him, what he liked when the Sun shined, made him sick when it rained. he had no Distemper, but lived in constant Fear of them all. my good Genius dictrated to me to bring him acquainted with Doctor Grisel, from that Day he was always contented, because he had Names for all his Complaints, the good Doctor furnished him with Reasons for all his Pains, and Prescriptions for every Fancy that troubled him. in hot Weather he lived upon Juleps, and let Blood to prevent Fevers, when it grew cloudy he generally apprehended a Consumption, to shorten the History of this wretched Part of my Life, he ruined a good Constitution by endeavouring to mend it, and took several Medicines, which ended in taking the grand Remedy, which cured both him and me of all our Uneasinesses. After his Death, I did not expect to hear any more of Mr Waitfort, I knew he had renounced me to all his Friends, and been very witty upon my Choice, which he affected to talk of with great Indifferency. I gave over thinking of him, being told that he was engaged with a pretty Woman and a great Fortune, it vexed me a little, but not enough to make me neglect the Advice of my Cousin Washwell, that came to see me the Day my Lord went into the Country with Russel. she told me experimentally, nothing put in an unfaithful Lover and a dear Husband so soon out of ones Head, as a new one, and, at the same time, propos'd to me a Kinsman of hers. You understand enough of the World (said she) to know Money is the most valuable Consideration. he is very rich, and I am sure cannot live long. he has a Cough that must carry him off soon. I knew afterwards she had given the self same Character of me to him, but however I was so much persuaded by her, I trusted on the Match, for fear he should die before the time came. he had the same Fears, and was so pressing, I married him in a Fortnight, resolving to keep it private a Fortnight longer. During this Fortnight Mr Waitfort came to

'make me a Visit, he told me he had waited on me sooner, but had that Respect for me, he would not interrupt me in the first Day of my Affliction for my dead Lord that as soon as he heard I was at Liberty to make another Choice, he had broke off a Match very advantageous for his Fortune, just upon the Point of Conclusion, and was forty times more in Love with me than ever I never received more Pleasure in my Life than from this Declaration, but I composed my Face to a grave Air, and said the News of his Engagement had touched me to the Heart, that in a rash jealous Fit, I had married a Man I could never have thought on if I had not lost all hopes of him Good natured Mr Waitfort had like to have dropped down dead at hearing this, but went from me with such an Air as plainly shewed me he had all the Blame upon himself, and hated those Friends that had advised him to the fatal Application, he seemed as much touched by my Misfortune as his own, for he had not the least Doubt I was still passionately in Love with him The Truth of the Story is, my new Husband gave me Reason to repent I had not staid for him he had married me for my Money, and I soon found he loved Money to Distraction, there was nothing he would not do to get it, nothing he would not suffer to preserve it the smallest Expence keep him awake whole Nights and when he paid a bill, twas with as many Sighs, and after as many Delays, as a Man that endures the Loss of a Limb I heard nothing but Reproofs for Extravagancy whatever I did I saw very well that he would have starved me, but for losing my Jointures and he suffered Agonies between the Grack of seeing me have so good a Stomach, and the Fear that if he made me fast, it might prejudice my Health I did not doubt he would have broke my Heart, if I did not break his, which was allowed by the Law of Self defence The Way was very easy I resolved to spend as much Money as I could, and before he was aware of the Stroke, appeared before him in a two thousand Pound Diamond Necklace he said nothing, but went quietly to his Chamber, and as it is the right, composed himself with a Dose of Opium I behaved my self so well upon the Occasion, that to this Day I believe he died of an Apoplexy Mr Waitfort was resolved not to be too late this time, and I heard from him in two Days I am almost out of my Weed at this present Writing, and am very doubtful whether I'll marry him or no I do not think of a Seventh, for the ridiculous Reason you mention, but out of pure Morality that I think so much Constancy should be rewarded, tho' I may not do it after all perhaps I do not believe all the unreasonable Malice of Mankind can give a Pretence why I should have been constant to the Memory of any of the Deceased, or have spent much time in grieving for an insolent, insignificant, negligent, extravagant splenatick, or covetous Husband, my first insulted me, my second was nothing to me, my third disgusted me, the fourth would have ruined me, the fifth tormented me and the sixth would have starved me If the other Ladies you name would thus give in their Hus-

'brinds Pictures at length, you would see they have had as little Reason as my self to lose their Hours in weeping and wailing

Non possidentem multa vocaveris Rectis Beatum, rectius occupat Nomen Beati, qui Deorum Numeribus sapienter uti Duramque callet pauperem pati — Hor

I WAS once engaged in Discourse with a Rosicrusian about the great Secret As this kind of Men (I mean those of them who are not professed Cheats) are over run with Enthusiasm and Philosophy, it was very amusing to hear this religious Adept descending on his pretended Discovery He talked of the Secret as of a Spint which lived within an Emerald, and converted every thing that was near it to the highest Perfection it is capable of It gives a Lustre, says he, to the Sun, and Water to the Diamond It irradiates every Metal, and enriches Lead with all the Properties of Gold It heightens Smoke into Flame, Flame into Light, and Light into Glory He further added, that a single Ray of it dissipates Pain, and Care, and Melancholy from the Person on whom it falls In short, says he, its Presence naturally changes every Place into a kind of Heaven After he had gone on for some Time in this unintelligible Cant, I found that he jumbled natural and moral Ideas together into the same Discourse, and that his great Secret was nothing else but Content

This Virtue does indeed produce, in some measure, all those Effects which the Alchymist usually ascribes to what he calls the Philosopher's Stone and if it does not bring Riches, it does the same thing, by banishing the Desire of them If it cannot remove the Disquietudes arising out of a Man's Mind, Body, or Fortune, it makes him easie under them It has indeed a kindly Influence on the Soul of Man, in respect of every Thing to whom he stands related It extinguishes all Murmur, Repining, and Ingratitude towards that Being who has allotted him his Part to act in this World It destroys all inordinate Ambition, and every Tendency to Corruption, with regard to the Community wherein he is placed It gives Sweetness to his Conversation, and a perpetual Serenity to all his Thoughts

Among the many Methods which might be made use of for the acquiring of this Virtue, I shall only mention the two following First of all, A Man should always consider how much he has more than he wants, and Secondly, How much more unhappy he might be than he really is

First of all, A Man should always consider how much he has more than he wants I am wonderfully pleased with the Reply which Aristippus made to one who condoled him upon the Loss of a Farm, Why, said he, I have three Farms still, and you have but one, so that I ought rather to be afflicted for you, than you for me On the contrary, foolish Men are more apt to consider what they have lost than what they possess, and to fix their Eyes upon those who are richer than themselves, rather than on those who are under greater Difficulties. All the real Pleasures and Conveniences of Life lie in a narrow Compass but it is the Humour of Mankind to be always looking forward, and straining after one who has got the Start of them in Wealth and Honour. For this Reason, as there are none can be properly called rich, who have not more than they want, there are few rich Men in any of the politer Nations but among the middle Sort of People, who keep their Wishes within their Fortunes, and have more Wealth than they know how to enjoy. Persons of a higher Rank live in a kind of splendid Poverty, and are perpetually wanting, because instead of requeasing in the solid Pleasures of Life, they endeavour to outvie one another in Shadows and Appearances. Men of Sense have at all times beheld with a great deal of Mirth this silly Game that is playing over their Heads, and by contracting their Desires, enjoy all that secret Satisfaction which others are always in quest of. The Truth is, this ridiculous Chace after imaginary Pleasures cannot be sufficiently exposed, as it is the great Source of those Evils which generally undo a Nation. Let a Man's Estate be what it will, he is a poor Man if he does not live within it, and naturally sets himself to Sale to any one that can give him his Price. When Pittacus, after the Death of his Brother, who had left him a good Estate, was offered a great Sum of Money by the King of Iydia, he thanked him for his Kindness, but told him he had already more by Half than he knew what to do with. In short, Content is equivalent to Wealth, and Luxury to Poverty, or, to give the Thought a more agreeable Turn, Content is natural Wealth, says Socrates, to which I shall add, Luxury is artificial Poverty. I shall therefore recommend to the Consideration of those who are always aiming after superfluous and imaginary Enjoyments, and will not be at the Trouble of contracting their Desires, an excellent Saying of Bion the Philosopher, namely, That no Man has so much Care, as he who endeavours after the most Happiness.

In the second Place, every one ought to reflect how much more unhappy he might be than he really is. The former Consideration took in all those who are sufficiently provided with the Means to make themselves easie, this regards such as actually lie under some Pressure or Misfortune. These may receive great Alleviation from such a Comparison as the unhappy Person may make between himself and others, or between the Misfortune which he suffers, and greater Misfortunes which might have befallen him.

I like the Story of the honest Dutchman, who, upon breaking his Leg by a Fall from the Minnistr, told the Standers-by, It was a great Mercy that 'twas not his Neck. To which, since I am got into Quotations, give me leave to add the Saying of an old Philosopher, who, after having invited some of his Friends to dine with him, was ruffled by his Wife that came into the Room in a Passion, and threw down the Table that stood before them, Every one, says he, has his Calam- ity, and he is a happy Man that has no greater than this. We find an Instance to the same Purpose in the Life of Doctor Hammond, written by Bishop Fell. As this good Man was troubled with a Complication of Distempers, when he had the Gout upon him, he used to thank God that it was not the Stone, and when he had the Stone, that he had not both these Distempers on him at the same time.

I cannot conclude this Essay without observing that there was never any System besides that of Christianity, which could effectually produce in the Mind of Man the Virtue I have been hitherto speaking of. In order to make us content with our present Condition, many of the ancient Philosophers tell us that our Discontent only hurts our selves, without being able to make any Alteration in our Circumstances, others, that whatever Evil befalls us is derived to us by a fatal Necessity, to which the Gods themselves are subject whilst others very gravely tell the Man who is miserable, that it is necessary he should be so to keep up the Harmony of the Universe, and that the Scheme of Providence would be troubled and perverted were he otherwise. These, and the like Considerations, rather silence than satisfy a Man. They may shew him that his Discontent is unreasonable, but are by no means sufficient to relieve it. They rather give Despair than Consolation. In a Word, a Man might reply to one of these Comforters, as Augustus did to his Friend who advised him not to grieve for the Death of a Person whom he loved, because his Grief could not fetch him again. It is for that very Reason, said the Emperor, that I grieve.

On the contrary, Religion bears a more tender Regard to humane Nature. It prescribes to every miserable Man the Means of bettering his Condition: nay, it shews him, that the bearing of his Afflictions is he ought to do will naturally end in the Removal of them. It makes him easie here, because it can make him happy hereafter.

Upon the whole, a contented Mind is the greatest Blessing a Man can enjoy in this World, and if in the present Life his Happiness arises from the subduing of his Desire, it will arise in the next from the Gratification of them.

No 575] MONDAY, August 2, 1714 [Addison

—Nec morti esse locum— Virg

A LEWD young Fellow seeing an aged Hermit go by him barefoot Father, says he, you are in a very miserable Condition if there is not another World. True, Son, said the Hermit, but what is thy Condition if there is? Man is a Creature designed for two different States of Being, or rather, for two different Lives. His first Life is short and transient, his second permanent and lasting. The Question we are all concerned in is this, In which of these two Lives it is our chief Interest to make our selves happy? Or, in other Words, Whether we should endeavour to secure to our selves the Pleasures and Gratifications of a Life which is uncertain and unrecautious and at its utmost Length of a very inconsiderable Duration, or to secure to our selves the Pleasures of a Life which is fixed and settled, and will never end? Every Man, upon the first hearing of this Question, I now, very well which Side of it he ought to close with. But however right we are in Theory, it is plain that in Practice we adhere to the wrong Side of the Question. We make Provisions for this Life as tho' it were never to have an End, and for the other Life as tho' it were never to have a Beginning.

Should a Spirit of superior Rank who is a Stranger to human Nature, accidentally alight upon the Earth, and take a Survey of its Inhabitants what would his Notions of us be? Would not he think that we are a Species of Beings made for quite different Ends and Purposes than what we really are? Must not he imagine that we were placed in this World to get Riches and Honours? Would not he think that it was our Duty to toil after Wealth, and Station, and Title? Nay, would not he believe we were forbidden Poverty by Threats of eternal Punishment, and enjoined to pursue our Pleasures under Pain of Damnation? He would certainly imagine that we were influenced by a Scheme of Duties quite opposite to those which are indeed prescribed to us. And truly according to such an Imagination, he must conclude that we are a Species of the most obedient Creatures in the Universe that we are constant to our Duty and that we keep a steady Eye on the End for which we were sent hither.

But how great would be his Astonishment when he learnt that we were Beings not designed to exist in this World above threescore and ten Years? and that the greatest Part of this busy Species fall short even of that Age? How would he be lost in Horror and Admiration, when he should know that this Set of Creatures who try out all their Endeavours for this Life, which scarce deserves the Name of Existence, when, I say, he should know that this Set of Creatures are to exist to all Eternity in another Life, for which they make no Preparation? Nothing can be a greater Disgrace to Reason, than that Men, who are per-wisdomed of these two different States of Being, should be perpetually employed in providing for a Life of threescore and ten Years, and neglecting to make Provision for that which after many Myriads of Years will be still new, and still beginning, especially when we consider that our endeavours for making ourselves great, or rich, or honourable, or whatever else we place our Happiness in, may after all prove unsuccessful whereas if we constantly and sincerely endeavour to make our selves happy in the other Life, we are sure that our Endeavours will succeed, and that we shall not be disappointed of our Hope.

The following Question is started by one of the Schoolmen. Supposing the whole Body of the Earth were a great Ball or Mass of the finest Sand, and that a single Grain or Particle of this Sand should be annihilated every thousand Years. Supposing then that you had it in your Choice to be happy all the while this prodigious Mass of Sand was consuming by this slow Method till there was not a Grain of it left, on Condition you were to be miserable for ever after, or, supposing that you might be happy for ever after, on Condition you would be miserable till the whole Mass of Sand were thus annihilated at the Rate of one Sand in a thousand Years. Which of these two Cases would you make your Choice?

It must be confessed in this Case, so many Thousands of Years are to the Imagination as a kind of Eternity tho' in reality they do not bear so great a Proportion to that Duration which is to follow them, as a Unite does to the greatest Number which you can put together in Figures, or as one of those Sands to the supposed Heap. Reason therefore tells us, without any Manner of Hesitation, which would be the better Part in this Choice. However, as I have before intimated, our Reason might in such a Case be so overset by the Imagination, as to dispose some Persons to sink under the Consideration of the great Length of the first Part of this Duration, and of the great Distance of that second Duration which is to succeed it. The Mind, I say, might give it self up to that Happiness which is at Hand, considering that it is so very near, and that it would last so very long. But when the Choice we actually have before us is this, Whether we will chuse to be happy for the space of only threescore and ten, nay, perhaps of only twenty or ten Years, I might say of only a Day or an Hour, and miserable to all Eternity, or, on the contrary, miserable for this short Term of Years, and happy for a whole Eternity. What Words are sufficient to express that Folly and want of Consideration which in such a Case makes a wrong Choice?

I here put the Case even at the worst, by supposing (what seldom happens) that a Course of Virtue makes us miserable in this Life. But if we suppose (as it generally happens) that Virtue would make us more happy even in this Life than a contrary Course of Vice, how can we sufficiently admire the Stupidity or Madness of those Persons who are capable of making so absurd a Choice?

Every wise Man therefore will consider this Life only as it may conduce to the Happiness of the other, and cheerfully sacrifice the Pleasures of a few Years to those of an Eternity.

Nitor in adversum, nec me, qui cetera, vincit Impetus, et rapido contrarius evohor Orbi
Ovid

I REMEMBER a young Man of very lively Parts, and of a sprightly turn in Conversation, who had only one Fault, which was an inordinate Desire of appearing fashionable. This ran him into many Amours, and consequently into many Distempers. He never went to Bed till two a Clock in the Morning, because he would not be a queer Fellow and was every now and then knocked down by a Constable, to signalize his Vivacity. He was initiated into Half a Dozen Clubs before he was One and twenty, and so improved in them his natural Gayety of Temper, that you might frequently trace him to his Lodgings by a range of broken Windows, and other the like Monuments of Wit and Gallantry. To be short, after having fully established his Reputation of being a very agreeable Rake, he died of old Age at Five and twenty.

There is indeed nothing which betrays a Man into so many Errors and Inconveniences as the Desire of not appearing singular, for which Reason it is very necessary to form a right Idea of Singularity, that we may know when it is judicious, and when it is vicious. In the first Place, every Man of Sense will agree with me, that Singularity is laudable, when, in Contradiction to a Multitude, it adheres to the Dictates of Conscience, Morality, and Honour. In these Cases we ought to consider, that it is not Custom, but Duty, which is the Rule of Action, and that we should be only so far sociabilis, as we are reasonable Creatures. Truth is never the less so, for not being attended to, and it is the Nature of Actions, not the Number of Actors, by which we ought to regulate our Behaviour. Singularity in Concerns of this Kind is to be looked upon as heroic Bravery, in which a Man leaves the Species only as he soars above it. What greater Instance can there be of a weak and pusillanimous Temper, than for a Man to pass his whole Life in Opposition to his own Sentiments? or not to dare to be what he thinks he ought to be?

Singularity therefore is only vicious when it makes Men act contrary to Reason, or when it puts them upon distinguishing themselves by Trifles. As for the first of these, who are singular in any thing that is irreligious, immoral, or dishonourable, I believe every one will easily give them up. I shall therefore speak of those only who are remarkable for their Singularity in things of no Importance, as in Dress, Behaviour, Conversation, and all the little Intercourses of Life. In these Cases there is a certain Deference due to Custom, and notwithstanding there may be a Colour of Reason to deviate from the Multitude in some Particulars, a Man ought to sacrifice his private Inclinations and Opinions to the Practice of the Publick. It must be confessed that good Sense often makes a Humourist, but then it unqualifies him for being of any Moment in the World, and renders him ridiculous to Persons of a much inferior Understanding.

I have heard of a Gentleman in the North of England, who was a remarkable Instance of this foolish Singularity. He had laid it down as a Rule within himself, to act in the most indifferent Parts of Life according to the most abstracted Notions of Reason and Good Sense, without any Regard to Fashion or Example. This Humour broke out at first in many little Oddnesses. He had never any stated Hours for his Dinner, Supper or Sleep, because, said he, we ought to attend the Calls of Nature, and not set our Appetites to our Meals, but bring our Meals to our Appetites. In his Conversation with Country Gentlemen, he would not make use of a Phrase that was not strictly true. He never told any of them, that he was his humble Servant, but that he was his Well-wisher, and would rather be thought a Mal-content, than drink the Kings Health when he was not a-dry. He would thrust his Head out of his Chamber-Window every Morning, and after having gaped for fresh Air about half an Hour, repeat fifty Verses as loud as he could bawl them for the Benefit of his Lungs to which End he generally took them out of Hommer, the Greek Tongue, especially in that Author, being more deep and sonorous, and more conducive to Expectoration, than any other. He had many other Particularities, for which he gave sound and philosophical Reasons. As this Humour still grew upon him, he chose to wear a Turban instead of a Perriwig, concluding very justly, that a Bandage of clean Linnen about his Head was much more wholesome, as well as cleanly, than the Caul of a Wig, which is soiled with frequent Perspirations. He afterwards judiciously observed, that the many Ligatures in our English Dress must naturally check the Circulation of the Blood for which Reason he made his Breeches and his Doublet of one continued Piece of Cloth, after the Manner of the Russians. In short, by following the pure Dictates of Reason, he at length departed so much from the rest of his Countrymen, and indeed from his whole Species, that his Friends would have clapped him into Bedlam, and have begged his Estate, but the Judge being informed that he did no Harm, contented himself with issuing out a Commission of Lunacy against him, and putting his Estate into the Hands of proper Guardians.

The Fate of this Philosopher puts me in Mind of a Remark in Monsieur Fontinell's Dialogues of the Dead. The Ambitious and the Covetous (says he) are Madmen to all Intents and Purposes, as much as those who are shut up in dark Rooms, but they have the good Luck to have Numbers on their Side, whereas the Frenzy of one who is given up for a Lunatick, is a Frenzy hors d'œuvre that is, in other Words, something which is singular in its Kind, and does not fall in with the Madness of a Multitude.

The Subject of this Essay was occasioned by a Letter which I received not long since, and which, for want of Room at present, I shall insert in my next Paper.

THE Letter mentioned in my last Paper is as follows.

SIR,

'You have so lately decry'd that Custom, too much in use among most People, of making themselves the Subjects of their Writings and Conversation, that I had some difficulty to perswade my self to give you this Trouble, till I had considered that tho' I should speak in the First Person, yet I could not be justly charg'd with Vanity, since I shall not add my Name, as also, because what I shall write will not, to say the best, redound to my Praise, but is only designed to remove a Prejudice conceived against me, as I hope, with very little Foundation My short History is this

I have lived for some Years last past altogether in London, till about a Month ago an Acquaintance of mine, for whom I have done some small Services in Town, invited me to pass part of the Summer with him at his House in the Country. I accepted his Invitation and found a very hearty Welcome. My Friend, an honest plain Man, not being qualified to pass away his time without the Reliefs of Business, has grafted the Farmer upon the Gentleman, and brought himself to submit even to the servile Parts of that Employment such as inspecting his Plough, and the like. This necessarily takes up some of his Hours every Day, and as I have no Relish for such Diversions I used at these Times to retire either to my Chamber, or a shady Walk near the House, and entertain myself with some agreeable Author. Now you must know, Mr. Spectator, that when I read, especially if it be Poetry, it is very usual with me when I meet with any Passage or Expression which strikes me much to pronounce it aloud, with that Tone of the Voice which I think agreeable to the Sentiments there expressed, and to this I generally add some Motion or Action of the Body. It was not long before I was observed by some of the Family in one of these heroic Fits, who thereupon received Impressions very much to my Disadvantage. This however I did not soon discover, nor should have done probably, had it not been for the following Accident. I had one Day shut my self up in my Chamber, and was very deeply engrossed in the Second Book of Milton's Paradise Lost. I walked to and fro with the Book in my Hand, and, to speak the Truth, I fear I made no little Noise when presently coming to the following Lines,

— On a sudden open'd,
With impetuous Recoil and jarring Sides, Flung several Doors, and on their Hinges grate Hail! Thunder, &c.

I in great Transport threw open the Door of my Chamber, and found the great Part of the Family standing on the Outside in a very great Consternation. I was in no less Confusion, and begged Pardon for having disturbed them, addressing my self particularly to comfort one of the Children, who received an unlucky fall in this Action, whilst he was too intently surveying my Meditations through the Key hole. To be short, after this Adventure I early observed that great Part of the Family, especially the Women and Children looked upon me with some Apprehensions of Fear, and my Friend himself tho' he still continued his Civilities to me, did not seem altogether easy. I took Notice, that the Butler was never after this Accident ordered to leave the Bottle upon the Table after Dinner. Add to this, that I frequently overheard the Servants mention me by the Name of the crazed Gentleman the Gentleman a little touched, the mad Londoner, and the like. This made me think it high Time for me to shift my Quarters, which I resolved to do the first handsome Opportunity and was confirmed in this Resolution by a young Lady in the Neighbourhood who frequently visited us, and who one Day, after having heard all the fine Things I was able to say, was pleased with a scornful Smile to bid me go to sleep.

The first Minute I got to my Lodgings in Town I set Pen to Paper to desire your Opinion, whether, upon the Evidence before you, I am mad or not. I can bring Certificates that I behave myself soberly before Company, and I hope there is at least some Merit in withdrawing to be mad. Look you Sir, I am contented to be esteemed a little touched, as they phrase it, but should be sorry to be madder than my Neighbours. Therefore, pray let me be as much in my Senses as you can afford. I know I could bring your self as an Instance of a Man who has confessed talking to himself, but yours is a particular Case, and cannot justify me, who have not kept Silence any Part of my Life. What if I should own my self in Love? You know Lovers are always allowed the Comfort of Soliloquy. — But I will say no more upon this Subject because I have long since observed, the ready Way to be thought Mad is to contend that you are not so as we generally conclude that Man drunk, who takes Pains to be thought sober. I will therefore leave my self to your Determination but am the more desirous to be thought in my Senses that it may be no Discredit to you when I assure you that I have always been very much

Your Admirer

P. S. If I must be mad, I desire the young Lady, may believe it is for her

The humble Petition of John a Nokes and John a Stiles,

Sheweth,

That your Petitioners have had Causes depending in Westminster Hall above five hundred Years, and that we despair of ever seeing them brought to an Issue. That your Petitioners have not been involved in these Law Suits out of any litigious Temper of their own, but by the Instigation of contentious Persons, that the young Lawyers in our Inns of Court are continually setting us together by the Ears, and think they do us no Hurt, because they plead for us without a Fee. That many of the Gentlemen of the Robe have no other Clients in the World besides us two, That when they have nothing else to do, they make us Plaintiffs and Defendants, tho' they were never retained by either of us. That they trudge, condemn, or acquit us, without any manner of Regard to our Reputations and good Names in the World. Your Petitioners therefore (being thereunto encouraged by the favourable Reception which you lately gave to our Kinsman Blank) do humbly pray, that you will put an End to the Controversies which have been so long depending between us your said Petitioners, and that our Unity may not endure from Generation to Generation it being our Resolution to live hereafter as it becometh Men of peaceable Dispositions. And your Petitioners (as in Duty bound) shall ever Pray, &c.

Equi feris humana in corpora transit, Inque feras Noster Ovid

THERE has been very great Reason, on several Accounts, for the learned World to endeavour at settling what it was that might be said to compose personal Identity

Mr Lock, after having premised that the Word Person properly signifies a thinking intelligent Being that has Reason and Reflection, and can consider it self as it self, concludes That it is Consciousness alone, and not an Identity of Substance, which makes this personal Identity of Sameness. Had I the same Consciousness (says that Author) that I saw the Ark and Noah's Flood, as that I saw an Overflowing of the Thames last Winter or as that I now write, I could no more doubt that I who write this now, that saw the Thames overflow last Winter, and that viewed the Flood at the general Deluge, was the same Self, place that Self in what Substance you please, than that I who write this am the same My self now whilst I write, (whether I consist of all the same Substance material or immaterial or no) that I was Yesterday. For as to this Point of being the same Self, it matters not whether this present Self be made up of the same or other Substances.

I was mightily pleas'd with a Story in some Measure applicable to this Piece of Philosophy, which I read the other Day in the Persian Tales as they are lately very well translated by Mr Philips, and with an Abridgement whereof I shall here present my Readers

I shall only premise that these Stories are writ after the Eastern Manner, but somewhat more correct.

Fadlallah, a Prince of great Virtues, succeeded his Father Bin Ortoe, in the Kingdom of Mousel. He reigned over his faithful Subjects for some time, and lived in great Happiness with his beauteous Consort Queen Zemroude, when there appeared at his Court a young Dervus of so lively & entertaining a Turn of Wit, as won upon the Affections of every one he conversed with. His Reputation grew so fast every Day, that it at last raised a Curiosity in the Prince himself to see and talk with him. He did so, and far from finding that common Fame had flatter'd him, he was soon convinced that every thing he had heard of him fell short of the Truth.

Fadlallah immediately lost all Manner of Relish for the Conversation of other Men, and as he was every Day more and more satisfied of the Abilities of this Stranger, offer'd him the first Posts in his Kingdom. The young Dervus, after having thanked him with a very singular Modesty, desired to be excused, as having made a Vow never to accept of any Employment, and preferring a free and independent State of Life to all other Conditions.

The King was infinitely charm'd with so great an Example of Moderation and tho' he could not get him to engage in a Life of Business, made him however his chief Companion and first Favourite.

As they were one Day hunting together, and happened to be separated from the rest of the Company, the Dervus entertained Fadlallah with an Account of his Travels and Adventures.
After having related to him several Curiosities which he had seen in the Indies, It was in this Place, says he, that I contracted an Acquaintance with an old Brachman, who was slided in the most hidden Povers of Nature. He died within my Arms, and with his parting Breath, communicated to me one of the most valuable of his Secrets, on Condition I should never reveal it to any Man. The King immediately reflecting on his young Favourite's having re-fus'd the late Offers of Greatness he had made him, told him he presumed it was the Power of making Gold. No Sir, says the Dervus, it is something more wonderful than that, it is the Power of re animating a dead Body, by flinging my own Soul into it.

While he was yet speaking a Doe came bounding by them and the King, who had his Bow ready, shot her through the Heart telling the Dervus, that a fair Opportunity now offer'd for him to show his Art. The young Man immediately left his own Body breathless on the Ground, while at the same Instant that of the Doe was re animated, she came to the King, fawn'd upon him, and after having play'd several wanton Tricks, fell again upon the Grass, at the same Instant the Body of the Dervus recovered its Life. The King was infinitely pleas'd at so uncommon an Operation, and conjur'd his Friend by every thing that was sacred to communicate it to him. The Dervus at first made some Scruple of violating his Promise to the dying Brachman, but told him at last that he found he could conceal nothing from so excellent a Prince after having oblig'd him therefor by an Oath to Secrecy, he taught him to repeat two Cabalistical Words, in pronouncing of which the whole Secret consisted. The King, impatient to try the Experiment, immediately repeated them as he had been taught, and in an Instant found himself in the Body of the Doe.
He had but little Time to contemplate himself in this new Being for the treacherous Dervus shooting his own Soul into the Royal Corps, and bending the Prince's own Bow against him, had laid him dead on the Spot, had not the King, who perceiv'd his Intent, fled swiftly to the Woods.

The Dervus, now triumphant in his Villany, returned to Mousel, and filled the Throne and Bed of the unhappy Fadlallah.

The first thing he took Care of, in order to secure himself in the Possession of his new-acquired Kingdom, was to issue out a Proclamation, ordering his Subjects to destroy all the Deer in the Realm. The King had perished among the rest, had he not avoided his Pursuers by re-animating the Body of a Nightgale which he saw lie dead at the Foot of a Tree.
In this new Shape he winged his Way in Safety to the Palace, where perching on a Tree which stood near his Queen's Apartment, he filled the Smell, (say the Historians) that they could discern whether the Persons who came thither were chaste or otherwise. They used to meet and faun upon such as were chaste, caressing them as the Friends of their Master Vulcan, but flew at those who were polluted, and never ceased barking at them till they had driven them from the Temple.

My Manuscript gives the following Account of these Dogs, and was probably designed as a Comment upon this Story.

'These Dogs were given to Vulcan by his Sister Diana, the Goddess of Hunting and of Chastity, having bred them out of some of her Hounds, in which she had observed this natural Instinct and Sagacity. It was thought she did it in Spight to Venus, who, upon her Return home, always found her Husband in a good or bad Humour, according to the Reception which she met with from his Dogs. They lived in the Temple several Years, but were such snappish Curs that they frightened away most of the Votaries. The Women of Sicily made a solemn Deputation to the Priest, by which they acquainted him, that they would not come up to the Temple with their annual Offerings unless he muzzled his Mastiffs, and at last compromised the Matter with him, that the Offering should always be brought by a Chorus of young Girls, who were none of them above seven Years old. It was wonderful (says the Author) to see how different the Treatment was which the Dogs gave to these little Misses, from that which they had shown to their Mothers. It is said that the Prince of Syracuse, having married a young Lady, and being naturally of a jealous Temper, made such an Interest with the Priests of this Temple, that he procured a Whelp from them of this famous Breed. The young Puppy was very troublesome to the fair Lady at first, inasmuch that she solicited her Husband to send him away, but the good Man cut her short with the old Sicilian Proverb, Love me love my Dog. From which Time she lived very peaceably with both of them. The Ladies of Syracuse were very much annoyed with him, and several of very good Reputation refused to come to Court till he was discarded. There were indeed some of them that defied his Sagacity, but it was observed, though he did not actually bite them, he would growl at them most confoundedly. To return to the Dogs of the Temple. After they had lived here in great Repute for several Years, it so happened, that as one of the Priests, who had been making a charitable Visit to a Widow who lived on the Promontory of Lily-dunn, return'd home pretty late in the Evening, the Dogs flew at him with so much Fury, that they would have worried him if his Brethren had not come in to his Assistance. Upon which, says my Author, the Dogs were all of them hanged, as having lost their original Instinct.

I cannot conclude this Paper without wishing that we had some of this Breed of Dogs in Great Britain, which would certainly do Justice, I should say Honour, to the Ladies of our Country, and shew the World the difference between Pagan Women and those who are instructed in sounder Principles of Virtue and Religion.

No 580] FRIDAY, August 13, 1714 [Addison

—Si verbo audacia detur, Non metuum magni dixisse palatia Cæli
Ovid Met

SIR,
'I CONSIDERED in my two last Letters¹ that awful and tremendous Subject, the Ubiquity or Omnipresence of the Divine Being. I have shewn that he is equally present in all Places throughout the whole Extent of infinite Space. This Doctrine is so agreeable to Reason, that we meet with it in the Writings of the enlightened Heathens, as I might show at large, were it not already done by other Hands. But tho' the Deity be thus essentially present through all the Immensity of Space, there is one Part of it in which he discovers himself in a most transcendent and visible Glory. This is that Place which is marked out in Scripture under the different Appellations of Paradise, the Third Heaven, the Throne of God, and the Habitation of his Glory. It is here where the glorified Body of our Saviour resides, and where all the celestial Hierarchies, and the innumerable Hosts of Angels, are represented as perpetually surrounding the Seat of God with Hallelujahs and Hymns of Praise. This is that Presence of God which some of the Divines call his Glorious, and others his Majestatick Presence. He is indeed essentially present in all other Places as in this, but it is here where he resides in a sensible Magnificence, and in the midst of those Splendors which can affect the Imagination of created Beings.

It is very remarkable that this Opinion of God Almighty's Presence in Heaven, whether discovered by the Light of Nature, or by a general Tradition from our first Parents, prevails among all the Nations of the World, whatsoever different Notions they entertain of the Godhead. If you look into Homer, that is, the most ancient of the Greek Writers, you see the supreme Powers seated in the Heavens, and encompassed with inferior Deities, among whom the Muses are represented as singing incessantly about his Throne. Who does not here see the main Strokes and Outlines of this great Truth we are speaking of? The same Doctrine is shadowed out in many other Heathen Authors, tho' at the same time, like several other revealed Truths, dashed and adulterated with a mixture of Fables and human Inventions. But to pass over the Notions of the Greeks and Romans, those more enlightened Parts of the Pagan World, we find there is scarce a People among the late discovered Nations who were not trained up in an Opinion, that Heaven is the Habitation of the Divinity whom they worshipped.

As in Solomon's Temple there was the Sacrum Sanctorum, in which a visible Glory appeared among the Figures of the Cherubims, and into which none but the High Priest himself

'have kept Holy the Sublath-Day, in a more particular Manner than any other of the Seven. These, and the like Speculations, we may very innocently indulge, so long as we make use of them to inspire us with a Desire of becoming Inhabitants of this delightful Place.

'I have in this, and in two foregoing Letters treated on the most serious Subject that can employ the Mind of Man, the Omnipresence of the Deity, a Subject which if possible should never depart from our Meditations. We have considered the Divine Being, as he inhabits Infinity as he dwells among his Work, as he is present to the Mind of Man, and as he discovers himself in a more glorious Manner among the Regions of the Blest. Such a Consideration should be kept awake in us at all Times, and in all Places, and possess our Minds with a perpetual Awe and Reverence. It should be interwoven with all our Thoughts and Perceptions, and become one with the Consciousness of our own Being. It is not to be reflected on in the Coldness of Philosophy, but ought to sink us into the lowest Prostration before him, who is so astonishingly Great, Wonderful, and Holy.

*Sunt bona, sunt quædam mediocritas, sunt malæ

Quæ leges ——— Mart*

I AM at present sitting with a Heap of Letters before me, which I have received under the Character of SPECTATOR. I have Complaints from Lovers, Schemes from Projectors, Scandal from Ladies, Congratulations, Compliments, and Advice in abundance.

I have not been thus long an Author, to be insensible of the natural Fondness every Person must have for their own Productions, and I begin to think I have treated my Correspondents a little too uncivilly in Strangling them all together on a File, and letting them lie so long unregarded. I shall therefore, for the future, think my self at least obliged to take some Notice of such Letters as I receive, and may possibly do it at the end of every Month.

In the mean time, I intend my present Paper as a short Answer to most of those which have been already sent me.

The Publick however is not to expect I should let them into all my Secrets, and though I appear abstruse to most People, it is sufficient if I am understood by my particular Correspondents.

My Well-wisher Van Nath is very arch, but not quite enough so to appear in Print.

Philadelphus will in a little time, see his Query fully answered by a Treatise which is now in the Press.

It was very improper at that time to comply with Mr G.

Miss Kitty must excuse me.

The Gentleman who sent me a Copy of Verses on his Mistress's Dancing, is I believe too thoroughly in Love to compose correctly.

I have too great a Respect for both the Universities to praise one at the Expence of the other. Tom Numble is a very honest Fellow, and I desire him to present my humble Service to his Cousin Jill Bumper.

I am obliged for the Letter upon Prejudice. I may in due time animadvert on the Case of Grace Grumble.

The Petition of P. S. granted.

That of Sarah Lovell, refused.

The Papers of A. S. are returned.

I thank Aristyphus for his kind Invitation.

My Friend at Hoodstock is a bold Man, to undertake for all within Ten Miles of him.

I am afraid the Entertainment of Tom Turnover will hardly be relished by the good Cities of London and Westminster.

I must consider further of it before I indulge W. F. in those freedoms he takes with the Ladies Stockings.

I am obliged to the ingenious Gentleman who sent me an Ode on the Subject of a late SPECTATOR, and shall take particular Notice of his last Letter.

When the Lady who wrote me a Letter, dated July the 20th, in relation to some Passages in a Letter, will be more particular in her Directions, I shall be so in my Answer.

The poor Gentleman, who fancies my Writings could reclaim an Husband who can abuse such a Wife as he describes, has I am afraid too great an Opinion of my Skill.

Philantropos is, I dare say, a very well-meaning Man, but a little too prolix in his Compositions. Co instantius himself must be the best Judge in the Affair he mentions.

The Letter dated from Livorno is received. Arctura and her Friend may hear further from me.

Celia is a little too hasty.

Harriot is a good Girl, but must not Curtsy to Folks she does not know.

I must ingeniously confess my Friend Samson Bentstaff has quite puzzled me, and writ me a long Letter which I cannot comprehend one Word of.

Collidan must also explain what he means by his Druggell.

I think it beneath my Spectatorial Dignity, to concern my self in the Affair of the boiled Dumpling.

I shall consult some Litterati on the Project sent me for the Discovery of the Longitude.

I know not how to conclude this Paper better, than by inserting a Couple of Letters which are really genuine, and which I look upon to be two of the smartest Pieces I have received from my Correspondents of either Sex.

Brother SPEC.

'While you are surveying every Object that falls in your way, I am wholly taken up with one. Had that Sage, who demanded what Beauty was, lived to see the dear Angel I love, he would not have asked such a Question. Tenet in sababile multos Scribaulis Cacoethes ———— Juv

THERF is a certain Distemper, which is mentioned neither by Galen nor Hippocrates, nor to be met with in the Israen Dispensary Journal, in the Motto of my Paper, terms it a Cacoethes, which is a hard Word for a Disease called in plain English, the Plague of Writing. This Cacoethes is predominant in the Small Pox, there being very few who are not seized with it some time or other in their Lives. There is, however, this Difference in these two Distempers, that the first, after having indisposed you for a time never returns again, whereas this I am speaking of, when it is once got into the Blood, seldom comes out of it. The British Nation is very much afflicted with this Malady, and tho' very many Remedies have been applied to Persons infected with it, few of them have ever proved successful. Some have been cauterized with Satyrs and Lampoons, but have received little or no Benefit from them, others have had their Heads fastened for an Hour together between a Cleft Board, which is made use of as a Cure for the Disease when it appears in its greatest Malignity. There is indeed one kind of this Malady which has been sometimes removed, like the Biting of a Tartarula, with the sound of a musical Instrument, which is commonly known by the Name of a Cat Call. But if you have a Patient of this Kind under your Care, you may assure your self there is no other way of recovering him effectually, but by forbidding him the use of Pen, Ink, and Paper.

But to drop the Allegory before I have tired it out, there is no Species of Scriblers more offensive, and more incurable, than your Periodical Writers whose Works return upon the Publick on certain Days and at stated Times. We have not the Consolation in the Perusal of these Authors, which we find at the reading of all others, (namely) that we are sure if we have but Patience, we may come to the End of their Labours. I have often admired a humorous Saying of Diogenes, who reading a dull Author to several of his Friends, when every one began to be tired, finding he was almost come to a blink lest at the End of it, cried, Cour ci, Lads, I see Land. On the contrary, our Progress through that kind of Writers I am now speaking of is never at an End. One Day makes Work for another, we do not know when to promise our selves Rest.

It is a melancholy thing to consider, that the Art of Printing which might be the greatest Blessing to Mankind, should prove detrimental to us, and that it should be made use of to scatter Prejudice and Ignorance through a People, instead of conveying to them Truth and Knowledge.

I was lately reading a very whimsical Treatise, entitled, William Ramsey's Vindication of Astrology. This profound Author, among many mystical Passages, has the following one. 'The Absence of the Sun is not the Cause of Night so much as his Light is so great that it may illuminate the Earth all over at once as clear as broad Day, but there are tenebrous and dark Stars, by whose Influence Night is brought on, and which do ray out Darkness and Obscurity upon the Earth, as the Sun does Light.'

I consider Writers in the same View this sage Astrologer does the Heavenly Bodies. Some of them are Stars that scatter Light as others do Darkness. I could mention several Authors who are tenebrous Stars of the first Magnitude, and point out a Knot of Gentlemen, who have been dull in Consort and may be looked upon as a dark Constellation. The Nation has been a great while benighted with several of these Antiluminaries. I suffered them to ray out their Darkness as long as I was able to endure it, till at length I came to a Resolution of rising upon them, and hope in a little time to drive them quite out of the British Hemisphere.

EVERY Station of Life has Duties which are proper to it. Those who are determined by Choice to any particular kind of Business, are indeed more happy than those who are determined by Necessity, but both are under an equal Obligation of fixing on Employments, which may be either useful to themselves or beneficial to others. No one of the Sons of Adam ought to think himself exempt from that Labour and Industry which were denounced to our first Parent, and in him to all his Posterity. Those to whom Birth or Fortune may seem to make such an Application unnecessary, ought to find out some Calling or Profession for themselves, that they may not be as a Burden on the Species, and be the only useless Parts of the Creation.

Many of our Country Gentlemen in their busie Hours apply themselves wholly to the Chase, or to some other Diversion which they find in the Fields and Woods. His grave occasion to one of our most eminent English Writers to represent every one of them as lying under a kind of Curse pronounced to them in the Words of Go'rah, I will give thee the Toils of the Air, and to the Beasts of the Field.

Tho' Exercise of this kind when indulged with Moderation, may have a good Influence both on the Mind and Body, the Country affords many other Amusements of a more noble kind.

Among these I know none more delightful in itself, and beneficial to the Publick, than that of PLANTING. I could mention a Noble man whose Fortune has placed him in several Parts of England, and who has always left these visible Marks behind him, which show he has been there. He never hired a House in his Life, without leaving all about it the Seeds of Wealth, and bestowing Legacies on the Posterity of the Owner. Had all the Gentlemen of England made the same Improvements upon their Estates, our whole Country would have been at this time a one great Garden. Nor ought such an Employment to be looked upon as too inglorious for Men of the highest Rank. There have been Heroes in this Art, as well as in others. We are told in particular of Cyrus the Great, that he planted all the Lesser Asia. There is indeed something truly magnificent in this kind of Amusement. It gives a nobler Air to several Parts of Nature, it fills the Earth with a Variety of beautiful Scenes and has something in it like Creation. For this Reason the Pleasure of one who Plants is something like that of a Poet, who, as Aristotle observes, is more delighted with his Productions than any other Writer or Artist whatsoever.

Plantations have one Advantage in them which is not to be found in most other Works, as they give a Pleasure of a more lasting Date and continually improve in the Eye of the Planter. When you have finished a Building or any other Undertaking of the like Nature, it immediately decays upon your Hands: you see it brought to its utmost Point of Perfection, and from that time hastening to its Ruin. On the contrary, when you have finished your Plantations, they are still arriving at greater Degrees of Perfection as long as you live, and appear more delightful in every succeeding Year than they did in the foregoing.

But I do not only recommend this Art to Men of Estates as a pleasing Amusement, but as it is a kind of Virtuous Employment, and may therefore be inculcated by moral Motives particularly from the Love which we ought to have for our Country, and the Regard which we ought to bear to our Posterity. As for the first, I need only mention what is frequently observed by others, that the Increase of Forest Trees does by no Means bear a Proportion to the Destruction of them, insomuch that in a few Ages the Nation may be at a Loss to supply it self with Timber sufficient for the Fleets of England. I know when a Man talks of Posterity in Matters of this Nature, he is looked upon with an Eye of Ridicule by the cunning and selfish part of Mankind. Most People are of the Humour of an old Fellow of a College, who when he was pressed by the Society to come into something that might redound to the good of their Successors, grew very peevish, He is always doing, says he, something for Posterity, but I would just see Posterity do something for us.

But I think Men are inexorable, who fail in a Duty of this Nature, since it is so easily discharged. When a Man considers that the putting a few Twigs into the Ground, is doing good to one who will make his appearance in the World about Fifty Years hence or that he is perhaps saving one of his own Descendants easy or rich, by so inconsiderable an Expence, if he finds him selfaverse to it he must conclude that he has a poor and base Heart void of all generous Principles and I owe to Mankind.

There is one Consideration, which may very much enforce what I have here said. Many honest Minds that are naturally disposed to do good in the World, and become benighted to Mankind complain within themselves that they have not Talent for it. Thus therefore is a good Office which is suited to the meanest Capacities, and which may be performed by Multitudes who have not Abilities sufficient to deserve well of their Country and to recommend themselves to their Posterity, by any other Method. It is the Phrase of a Friend of mine, when any useful Country Neighbour dies, that you may trace him which I look upon as a good Funeral Oration, at the Death of an honest Husbandman, who hath left the Impressions of his Industry behind him, in the Place where he has lived.

Upon the foregoing Considerations, I can scarce forbear representing the Subject of this Paper as a kind of Moral Virtue. Which, as I have already shown, recommends it self likewise by the Pleasure that attends it. It must be confessed, that this is none of those turbulent Pleasures which is apt to gratify a Man in the Heats of Youth: but if it be not so tumultuous, it is more lasting. Nothing can be more delightful than to entertain ourselves with Prospects of our own making, and to walk under those Shades which our own Industry has raised. Amusements of this Nature compose the Mind, and lay it Rest all those Passions which are unuseful to the Soul of Man, besides that they naturally engender good Thoughts, and dispose us to laudable Contemplations. Many of the old Philosophers passed away the greatest Parts of their Lives among their Gardens. Epicurus himself could not think sensual Pleasure attainable in any other Scene. Every Reader who is acquainted with Homer, Virgil and Horace, the greatest Genius of all Antiquity, knows very well with how much Rapture they have spoken on this Subject: and that Virgil in particular has written a whole Book on the Art of Planting.

This Art seems to have been more especially adapted to the Nature of Man in his Primitive State, when he had Life enough to see his Pro-

The Sequel of the Story of Shalum and Hilpa

THE Letter inserted in my last had so good an Effect upon Hilpa, that she answered it in less than a Twelvemonth, after the following Manner

Hilpa, Mistress of the Vallies, to Shalum, Master of Mount Tirzah

In the 789th Year of the Creation

'What have I to do with thee, O Shalum? Thou praisest Hilpa's Beauty, but art thou not secretly enamoured with the Verdure of her Meadows? Art thou not more affected with the Prospect of her green Vallies, than thou wouldst be with the Sight of her Person? The Lowings of my Herds, and the Blerutings of my Flocks, make a pleasant Echo in thy Mountains, and sound sweetly in thy Ears What tho' I am delighted with the Wavings of thy Forests, and those Breezes of Perfumes which flow from the Top of Tirzah Are these like the Riches of the Valley?

'I know thee, O Shalum, thou art more wise and happy than any of the Sons of Men Thy Dwellings are among the Cedars, thou searchest out the Diversity of Soils, thou understandest the Influences of the Stars, and markest the Change of Seasons Can a Woman appear lovely in the Eyes of such a one? Disquiet me not, O Shalum, let me alone, that I may enjoy those goodly Possessions which are fallen to my Lot. Win me not by thy enticing Words May thy Trees increase and multiply, mayest thou add Wood to Wood, and Shade to Shade, but tempt not Hilpa to destroy thy Solitude, and make thy Retirement populous

The Chinese say, that a little time afterwards she accepted of a Treat in one of the neighbouring Hills to which Shalum had invited her This Treat lasted for two Years, and is said to have cost Shalum five hundred Antelopes, two thousand Ostriches, and a thousand Tun of Milk, but what most of all recommended it, was that Variety of delicious Fruits and Pot-herbs, in which no Person then living could any way equal Shalum

He treated her in the Tower which he had planted amidst the Wood of Nightingales This Wood was made up of such Fruit-Trees and Plants as are most agreeable to the several Kinds of Singing Birds, so that it had drawn into it all the Musick of the Country, and was filled from one End of the Year to the other with the most agreeable Consort in Season

He shewed her every Day some beautiful and surprising Scene in this new Region of Woodlands, and as by this Means he had all the Opportunities he could wish for of opening his Mind to her, he succeeded so well, that upon her Departure she made him a kind of Promise, and gave him her Word to return him a positive Answer in less than fifty Years

She had not been long among her own People in the Vallies, when she received new Overtures, and at the same Time a most splendid Visit from Mishpach, who was a mighty Man of old, and had built a great City, which he called after his own Name Every House was made for at least a thousand Years, nay there were some that were raised out for three Lives, so that the Quantity of Stone and Timber consumed in this Building is scarce to be imagined by those who live in the present Age of the World This great Man entertained her with the Voice of musical Instruments which had been lately invented, and danced before her to the Sound of the Lumbrel He also presented her with several domestick Utensils wrought in Brass and Iron, which had been newly found out for the Convenience of Life In the mean time Shalum grew very unwise with himself, and was sorely displeased at Hilpa for the Reception which she had given to Mishpach, insomuch that he never wrote to her or spoke of her during a whole Revolution of Saturn, but finding that this Intercourse went no further than a Visit, he again renewed his Addresses to her, who during his long Silence is said very often to have cast a wishing Eye upon Mount Tirzah

Her Mind continued wavering about twenty Years longer between Shalum and Mishpach, for tho' her Inclinations favoured the former, her Interest pleaded very powerfully for the other While her Heart was in this unsettled Condition, the following Accident happened which determined her Choice A high Tower of Wood that stood in the City of Mishpach having caught Fire by a Flash of Lightning, in a few Days reduced the whole Town to Ashes Mishpach resolved to rebuild the Place whatever it should cost him and having already destroyed all the Timber of the Country, he was forced to have Recourse to Shalum, whose Forests were now two hundred Years old He purchased these Woods with so many Herds of Cattle and Flocks of Sheep, and with such a vast Extent of Fields and Pastures, that Shalum was now grown more wealthy than Mishpach, and therefore appeared so charming in the Eyes of Zilpah's Daughter, that she no longer refused him in Marriage On the Day in which he brought her up into the Mountains he raised a most prodigious Pile of Cedar and of every sweet smelling Wood, which reached above

'perswade my Countrymen to reap some Advantage from so many unregarded Hours, and as such you will encourage it

'I shall conclude with giving you a Sketch or two of my Way of proceeding

'If I have any Business of consequence to do to-morrow, I am scarce dropt asleep to-night but I am in the midst of it, and when awake I consider the whole Procession of the Affair, and get the Advantage of the next Day's Experience before the Sun has risen upon it

'There is scarce a great Post but what I have some Time or other been in, but my Behaviour while I was Master of a College pleases me so well, that whenever there is a Province of that Nature vacant, I intend to step in as soon as I can

'I have done many Things that would not pass Examination, when I have had the Art of Flying, or being invisible, for which Reason I am glad I am not possessed of those extraordinary Qualities

'Lastly, Mr SPECTATOR, I have been a great Correspondent of yours, and have read many of my Letters in your Paper which I never wrote you If you have a Mind I should really be so, I have got a Parcel of Visions and other Miscellanies in my Noctuary, which I shall send you to enrich your Paper with on proper Occasions

Intus, et in Cute novi — Pers

THO' the Author of the following Vision is unknown to me, I am apt to think it may be the Work of that ingenious Gentleman, who promised me, in the last Paper, some Extracts out of his Noctuary

SIR,

'I was the other Day reading the Life of Ma homer Among many other Extravagancies, I find it recorded of that Impostor, that in the fourth Year of his Age the Angel Gabriel caught him up, while he was among his Play fellows, and, carrying him aside, cut open his Breast, plucked out his Heart, and wrung out of it that black Drop of Blood, in which, say the Turkish Divines, is contained the Fomes Peccati, so that he was free from Sin ever after I immediately said to my self, tho' this Story be a Fiction, a very good Moral may be drawn from it, would every Man but apply it to himself, and endeavour to squeeze out of his Heart whatever Sins or ill Qualities he finds in it.

'While my Mind was wholly taken up with this Contemplation, I insensibly fell into a most pleasing Slumber, when methought two Porters entered my Chamber, carrying a large Chest between them After having set it down in the middle of the Room they departed I immediately endeavourd to open what was sent me, when a Shape, like that in which we paint our

'Angels, appeared before me, and forbid me Enclosed, said he are the Hearts of several of your Friends and Acquaintance but before you can be qualified to see and amadvert on the Failings of others, you must be pure your self whereupon he drew out his Incision Knife, cut me open, took out my Heart, and began to squeeze it I was in a great Confusion, to see how many things, which I had always cherished as Virtues, issued out of my Heart on this Occasion In short, after it had been thoroughly squeezed, it looked like an empty Bladder, when the Phantome, breathing a fresh Particulate of Divine Air into it, restored it safe to its former Repository and having sewed me up, we began to examine the Chest

'The Hearts were all enclosed in transparent Phials, and preserved in a Liquor which looked like Spirits of Wine The first which I cast my Eye upon, I was afraid would have broke the Glass which contained it It shot up and down, with incredible Swiftness, thro' the Liquor in which it swam, and very frequently bounced against the Side of the Phial The Fomes, or Spot in the Middle of it, was not large, but of a red fiery Colour, and seemed to be the Cause of these violent Agitations Thst, says my Instructor, is the Heart of Tom Drad-Nought, who behaved himself well in the late Wars, but has for these Ten Years last past been running at some Post of Honour to no Purpose He is lately retired into the Country, where, quite choaked up with Spleen and Choler, he rules at better Men than himself, and will be for ever uncurable, because it is impossible he should think his Merit sufficiently rewarded The next Heart that I examined was remarkable for its Smallness it lay still at the Bottom of the Phial, and I could hardly perceive that it beat at all The Fomes was quite black, and had almost diffused it self over the whole Heart This, says my Interpreter, is the Heart of Dick Gloomy, who never thirsted after any thing but Money Notwithstanding all his Endeavours, he is still poor This has flung him into a most deplorable State of Melancholy and Despair He is a Composition of Envy and Idleness, hates Mankind, but gives them their Revenge by being more uncurable to himself, than to any one else

'The Phial I looked upon next contained a large fur Heart which beat very strongly The Fomes or Spot in it was exceeding small, but I could not help observing, that which way soever I turned the Phial it always appeared uppermost and in the strongest Point of Light The Heart you are examining, says my Companion, belongs to Will Worths He has, indeed, a most noble Soul, and is possessed of a thousand good Qualities The Speck which you discover is Vanity Here, says the Angel, is the Heart of Freelove, your intimate Friend Freelove and I, said I, are at present very cold to one another, and I do not care for looking on the Heart of a Man, which I fear is overcast with Rancour My Teacher commended me to look upon it I did so, and to my unspeakable Surprise, found that a small swelling Spot, which I at first took to be Ill-Will towards me, was only Passion, and that upon my nearer Inspection it wholly disappeared upon which the Phantome told me Isidore was one of the best natured Men alive.

This, says my Teacher, is a Female Heart of your Acquaintance I found the Femur in it of the largest Size, and of a hundred different Colours, which were still varying every Moment Upon my asking to whom it belonged, I was informed that it was the Heart of Croquetille.

I set it down, and drew out another, in which I took the Femur at first Sight to be very small, but was amazed to find, that as I look'd stedfastly upon it, it grew still larger. It was the Heart of Melissa, a noted Prude who lives the next Door to me.

I show you this, says the Phantome, because it is indeed a Rarity, and you have the Happiness to know the Person to whom it belongs. He then put into my Hands a large Chrystal Glass, that enclosed an Heart in which, though I examined it with the utmost Nicety, I could not perceive any Memish. I made no Scruple to affirm that it must be the Heart of Scraphura and was glad but not surpris'd, to find that it was so. She is, indeed continued my Guide, the Ornament, as well as the Envy, of her Sex, at these last Words, he pointed to the Hearts of several of her Female Acquaintance which lay in different Phials and had very large Spots in them, all of a deep Blue. You are not to wonder, says he that you see no Spot in an Heart, whose Innocence has been Proof against all the Corruptions of a depraved Age. If it has any Memish, it is too small to be discovered by Human Eyes.

I laid it down, and took up the Hearts of other Females, in all of which the Femurs ran in several Veins, which were twisted together, and made a very perplexed Figure. I asked the Meaning of it and was told it represented Decent.

I should have been glad to have examined the Hearts of several of my Acquaintance whom I knew to be particularly addicted to Drinking, Gaming, Intrepping, &c. but my Interpreter told me I must let that alone till another Opportunity, and flung down the Cover of the Chest with so much violence, as immediately awoke me.

No 588] WEDNESDAY, Sept. 2, 1714 [H. Grove.]

Dicitur, Onnis in Inutilitate est et Gratia, et Caritas—Cicero de Nat. Deor. L.

MAN may be considered in two Views, as a Reasonable, and as a Social Being, capable of becoming himself either happy or miserable, and of contributing to the Happiness or Misery of his Fellow Creatures Suitably to this double Capacity, the Contriver of Human Nature hath wisely furnished it with two Principles of Action Self love and Benevolence designed one of them to render Man wakeful to his own personal Interest, the other to dispose him for giving his utmost Assistance to all engag'd in the same Pursuit. This is such an Account of our Frame, so agreeable to Reason, so much for the Honour of our Maker, and the Credit of our Species, that it may appear somewhat unaccountable what should induce Men to represent human Nature as they do under Characters of Disadvantage, or, having drawn it with a little and sordid Aspect, what Pleasure they can possibly take in such a Picture. Do they reflect that 'tis their Own, and, if we will believe themselves, is not more odious than the Original? One of the first that talk'd in this lofty Strain of our Nature was Epicurus. Benevolence, would his Followers say, is all founded in Weakness and, whatever be pretended, the Kindness that passeth between Men and Men is by every Man directed to himself. This it must be confessed is of a Piece with the rest of that hopeful Philosophy, which having patch'd Man up out of the four Elements, attributes his Being to Chance, and derives all his Actions from an unintelligible Declination of Atoms. And for these glorious Discoveries the Poet is hey and measure transported in the Praises of his Hero as if he must needs be something more than Man, only for an Endeavour to prove that Man is in nothing superior to Beasts. In this School was Mr Hobbs instructed to speak after the same Manner, if he did not rather draw his Knowledge from an Observation of his own Temper for he somewhere unluckily lays down this as a Rule, 'That from the Similitudes of Thoughts and Passions of one Man to the Thoughts and Passions of another, whosoever looks into himself and considers what he doth when he thinks, hopes, fears, &c. and upon what Grounds he shall hereby find and know what are the Thoughts and Passions of all other Men upon the like Occasions.' Now we will allow Mr Hobbs to know best how he was inclined, but in earnest, I should be heartily out of Conceit with my self, if I thought my self of this unamiable Temper, as he affirms, and should have as little Kindness for my self as for any Body in the World. Hitherto I always urg'd that kind and benevolent Propensions were the original Growth of the Heart of Man, and, however checked and overtopped by counter Inclinations that have since sprung up within us, have still some Force in the worst of Tempers, and a considerable Influence on the best. And, methinks, it's a fur Step towards the Proof of this, on Saving Faith, an Essay on the Soul's Immortality, and miscellanies in prose and verse, including Nos 588, 601, 626, and 635 of the Spectator. He received also £20 a year for ministering to two small congregations in the neighbourhood of Taunton. His wife died in 1736, and he in the year following. His works appeared in 1740 in 4 vols 8vo.

The Rev Henry Grove was a Presbyterian minister, who kept school at Taunton. He was born there in 1683 became a teacher at the age of 23 (already married), and worked for the next 18 years in the Taunton Academy, his department Ethics and Pneumatology. He spent his leisure in religious controversy, writing an 'Essay on the Terms of Christian Communion,' a Discourse that the most beneficent of all Beings is He who hath an absolute Fullness of Perfection in Himself, who give Existence to the Universe, and so cannot be supposed to want that which He communicated, without diminishing from the Plentitude of his own Power and Happiness. The Philosophers before mentioned have indeed done all that in them lay to invalidate this Argument, for, placing the Gods in a State of the most elevated Blessedness, they describe them as Selfish as we poor miserable Mortals can be, and shut them out from all Concern for Mankind, upon the Score of their having no Need of us. But if He that sitteth in the Heavens wants not us, we stand in continual Need of Him: and surely, next to the Survey of the immense Treasures of his own Mind, the most exalted Pleasure He receives is from beholding Millions of Creatures, lately drawn out of the Gulph of Non existence rejoicing in the various Degrees of Being and Happiness imparted to them. And as this is the true, the glorious Character of the Deity, so in forming a reasonable Creature He would not, if possible, suffer his Image to pass out of his Hands unadorned with a Resemblance of Himself in this most lovely Part of his Nature. For what Complacency could a Mind, whose Love is as unbounded as his Knowledge, have in a Work so unlike Himself? A Creature that should be capable of knowing and conversing with a vast Circle of Objects, and love none but Himself? What Proportion would there be between the Head and the Heart of such a Creature, its Affections, and its Understandings? Or could a Society of such Creatures, with no other Bottom but Self Love on which to maintain a Commerce, ever flourish? Reason, 'tis certain, would oblige every Man to pursue the general Happiness, as the Means to procure and establish his own, and yet if, besides this Consideration, there were not a natural Instinct, prompting Men to desire the Welfare and Satisfaction of others Self-Love, in Defiance of the Admonitions of Reason, would quickly run all Things into a State of War and Confusion. As nearly interested as the Soul is in the Fate of the Body, our provident Creator saw it necessary, by the constant Returns of Hunger and Thirst, those importunate Appetites to put it in Mind of its Charge. Knowing, that if we should eat and drink no other than cold abstracted Speculation should put us upon these Exercises, and then leave it to Reason to prescribe the Quantity, we should soon refine our selves out of this bodily Life. And indeed, 'tis obvious to remark, that we follow nothing heartily, unless carried to it by Inclinations which anticipate our Reason, and, like a Bias, draw the Mind strongly towards it. In order, therefore, to establish a perpetual Intercourse of Benefits amongst Mankind, their Maker would not fail to give them this generous Prepossession of Benevolence, if, as I have said, it were possible. And from whence can we go about to argue its Impossibility? Is it inconsistent with Self-Love? Are their Motions contrary? No more than the diurnal Rotation of the Earth is opposed to its Annual or its Motion round its own Center, which may be improved as an Illustration of Self-Love, to that which whirls it about the common Center of the World, answering to universal Benevolence. Is the Force of Self-Love abated, or its Interest prejudiced by Benevolence? So far from it, that Benevolence, though a distinct Principle, is extremely servicable to Self Love, and then doth most Service when 'tis last designed.

But to descend from Reason to Matter of Fact, the Pity which arises on Sight of Persons in Distress, and the Satisfaction of Mind which is the Consequence of having removed them into a happier State, are instead of a thousand Arguments to prove such a thing as a disinterested Benevolence. Did Pity proceed from a Reflection we make upon our Liability to the same ill Accidents we see befall others, it were nothing to the present Purpose, but this is assigning an artificial Cause of a natural Passion, and can by no Means be admitted as a tolerable Account of it, because Children and Persons most Thoughtless about their own Condition, and incapable of entering into the Prospects of Futurity, feel the most violent Touches of Compassion. And then as to that charming Delight which immediately follows the giving Joy to another, or relieving his Sorrow, and is, when the Objects are numerous, and the kindness of Importance really inexpressible, what can this be owing to but a Consciousness of a Man's having done something Praise worthy, and expressive of a great Soul? Whereas, if in all this he only Sacrificed to Vanity and Self-Love, as there would be nothing brave in Actions that make the most shining Appearance, so Nature would not have rewarded them with this divine Pleasure nor could the Commendations, which a Person receives for Benefits done upon selfish Views, be at all more Satisfactory, than when he is applauded for what he doth without Design, because in both Cases the Ends of Self-Love are equally answered. The Conscience of approving ones self a Benefactor to Mankind is the noblest Recompence for being so doubtless it is, and the most interested cannot propose any thing so much to their own Advantage, notwithstanding which, the Inclination is nevertheless unselfish. The Pleasure which attends the Gratification of our Hunger and Thirst, is not the Cause of these Appetites: they are previous to any such Prospect and so likewise is the Desire of doing Good with this Difference, that being settled in the intellectual Part, this last, though Antecedent to Reason, may yet be improved and regulated by it, and, I will add, is no otherwise a Virtue than as it is so. Thus have I contended for the Dignity of that Nature I have the Honour to partake of, and, after all the Evidence produced, think I have a Right to conclude, against the Motto of this Paper, that there is such a thing as Generosity in the World. Though if I were under a Mistake in this, I should stay as Cicero in Relation to the Immortality of the Soul, I will ingly err, and should believe it very much for the Interest of Mankind to lie under the same Delusion. For the contrary Notion naturally tends to dispirit the Mind, and sink it into a Meanness fatal to the Godlike Zeal of doing good. As on the other hand, it teaches People to be Ungrateful, by possessing them with a Perswasion concerning

The following is Discourse comes from the same Has d'with the Essays upon Infinitude

WE consider infinite Space as an Expansion without a Circumference. We consider Eternity, or infinite Duration, as a Line that has neither a Beginning nor an End In our Speculations of infinite Space, we consider that particular Place in which we exist, as a kind of Center to the whole Expansion In our Speculations of Eternity, we consider the Time which is present to us as the Middle, which divides the whole Line into two equal Parts For this Reason, many witty Authors compare the present Time to an Isthmus or narrow Neck of Land, that rises in the midst of an Ocean, immeasurably diffused on either Side of it.

Philosophy, and indeed common Sense, naturally throws Eternity under two Divisions, which we may call in English, that Eternity which is past, and that Eternity which is to come. The learned Terms of Aeternitas a Parte ante, and Aeternitas a Parte post, may be more amusing to the Reader, but can have no other Idea affixed to them than what is conveyed to us by those Words, an Eternity that is past, and an Eternity that is to come Each of these Eternities is bounded at the one Extremity or, in other Words, the former has an End, and the latter a Beginning

Let us first of all consider that Eternity which

² See Nos 565, 571, 580, and 628

is past, reserving that which is to come for the Subject of another Paper The Nature of this Eternity is utterly inconceivable by the Mind of Man Our Reason demonstrates to us that it is as long, but at the same Time can frame no Idea of it, but what is b g with Absurdity and Contradiction We can have no other Conception of any Duration which is past, than that all of it is once present, and whatever was once present, is at some certain Distance from us, and whatever is at any certain Distance from us, be the Distance never so remote, cannot be Eternity The very Notion of any Duration's being past, implies that it is as once present, for the Idea of being once present, is actually included in the Idea of its being past. This therefore is a Depth not to be sounded by human Understanding We are sure that there has been an Eternity, and yet contradict our selves when we measure this Eternity by any Notion which we can frame of it

If we go to the Bottom of this Matter, we shall find, that the Difficulties we meet with in our Conceptions of Eternity proceed from this single Reason, That we can have no other Idea of any kind of Duration than that by which we ourselves, and all other created Beings, do exist which is, a successive Duration made up of past, present, and to come There is nothing which exists after this Manner, all the Parts of whose Existence were not once actually present, and consequently may be reached by a certain Number of Years applied to it We may ascend as high as we please, and employ our Being to that Eternity which is to come, in adding Millions of Years to Millions of Years, and we can never come up to any Fountain Head of Duration, to any Beginning in Eternity But at the same time we are sure, that whatever was once present does lie within the Reach of Numbers, though perhaps we can never be able to put enough of them together for that Purpose We may as well say, that any thing may be actually present in any Part of infinite Space, which does not lie at a certain Distance from us, as that any Part of infinite Duration was once actually present, and does not also lie at some determined Distance from us. The Distance in both Cases may be immeasurable and infinite as to our Faculties, but our Reason tells us that it cannot be so in itself Here therefore is that Difficulty which Human Understanding is not capable of surmounting We are sure that something must have existed from Eternity, and are at the same Time unable to conceive, that any thing which exists, according to our Notion of Existence, can have existed from Eternity

It is hard for a Reader, who has not rolled this Thought in his own Mind, to follow in such an abstracted Speculation but I have been the longer on it, because I think it is a demonstrative Argument of the Being and Eternity of a God And tho' there are many other Demonstrations which lead us to this great Truth, I do not think we ought to lay aside any Proofs in this Matter which the Light of Reason has suggested to us, especially when it is such a one as has been urged by Men famous for their Penetration and Force of Understanding, and which appears altogether and observed it in all its different Shapes and Appearances, from the Fifteenth to the Forty Fifth Year of his Age

As a farther Proof of his Skill, he has also sent me several Maxims in Love, which he assures me are the Result of a long and profound Reflection some of which I think my self obliged to communicate to the Publick, not remembering to have seen them before in any Author

'There are more Calamities in the World arising from Love than from Hatred

'Love is the Daughter of Idleness, but the Mother of Disquietude

'Men of grave Natures (says Sir Francis Bacon) are the most constant, for the same Reason

'Men should be more constant than Women

'The Gay Part of Mankind is most amorous, the Serious most loving

'A Coquet often loses her Reputation, whilst she preserves her Virtue

'A Prude often preserves her Reputation when she has lost her Virtue

'Love refines a Man's Behaviour, but makes a Woman's ridiculous

'Love is generally accompanied with Good will in the Young, Interest in the Middle aged, and a Passion too gross to Name in the Old

'The Endeavours to revive a decaying Passion generally extinguish the Remains of it.

'A Woman who from being a Slattern becomes over neat, or from being over-neat becomes a Slattern, is most certainly in Love

I shall make use of this Gentleman's Skill as I see Occasion and since I am got upon the Subject of Love, shall conclude this Paper with a Copy of Verses which were lately sent me by an unknown Hand, as I look upon them to be above the ordinary Run of Sonneteers

The Author tells me they were written in one of his despairing Fits and I find entertains some Hope that his Mistress may pity such a Passion as he has described, before she knows that she is herself Corinna

*In vain would'st thou complain, in vain pretend To ask a Pity which she must not lend

I LOOK upon the Play-house as a World within I itself They have lately furnished the Middle Region of it with a new Sett of Meteors, in order to give the Sublime to many modern Tragedies I was there last Winter at the first Rehearsal of the new Thunder,² which is much more deep and sonorous than any hitherto made use of They have a Salmoneus behind the Scenes, who plays it off with great Success Their Lightnings are made to flash more briskly than heretofore their Clouds are also better furbelow'd, and more voluminous, not to mention a violent Storm locked up in a great Chest that is designed for the Tempest They are also provided with above a Dozen Showers of Snow, which, as I am informed, are the Plays of many unsuccessful Poets artificially cut and shreaded for that Use Mr Rimmer's Edgar is to fall in Snow at the next acting of King Lear, in order to heighten, or rather to alleviate, the Distress of that unfortunate Prince and to serve by way of Decoration to a Piece which that great Critick has written against

I do not indeed wonder that the Actors should be such professed Enemies to those among our Nation who are commonly known by the Name of Criticks, since it is a Rule among these Gentlemen to fall upon a Play, not because it is ill written, but because it takes Several of them lay it down as a Maxim, That whatever Dramatick Performance has a long Run, must of Necessity be good for nothing as though the first Precept in Poetry were not to please Whether this Rule

'another Landſkip of Life is that does of Countreies, and tho' its Apperances may ſeem ſtrangely jumbled together, we may often obſerve ſuch Prices and Footſteps of noble Thoughts, as, if carefully purſued, might lead us into a proper Path of Action. There is ſo much Rapture and Trance in our fancied Blisſ, and ſomething ſo diſmal and ſhocking in our fancied Miſery, that tho' the Inactivity of the Body, has given Occaſion for calling Sleep the Image of Death, the Briskneſs of the Fancy affords us a ſtrong Intimation of ſomething within us that can never die.

I have wondered, that Alexander the Great, who came into the World ſufficiently dreamt of by his Parents, and had himſelf a tolerable knack at dreaming, ſhould often ſay, that Sleep was one thing which made him ſenſible he was mortal. I who have not ſuch Fields of Action in the Day-time to divert my Attention from this Matter, plainly perceive, that in thoſe Operations of the Mind, while the Body is at reſt, there is a certain Vastneſs of Conception, very ſuitable to the Capacity, and demonſtrative of the Force of that Divine Part in our Composition which will laſt for ever. Neither do I much doubt but had we a true Account of the Wonders the Hero laſt mentioned performed in his Sleep, his conquering this little Globe would hardly be worth mentioning. I may affirm, without Vanity, that when I compare ſeveral Actions in Quintus Curtius with ſome others in my own Nocturny, I appear the greater Hero of the two.

I ſhall cloſe this Subject with obſerving, that while we are awake we are at Liberty to fix our Thoughts on what we pleaſe; but in Sleep we have not the Command of them. The Ideas which ſtrike the Fancy, riſe in us without our Choice, either from the Occurrences of the Day paſt, the Temper we lye down in, or it may be the Direction of ſome ſuperior Being.

It is certain the Imagination may be ſo differently affected in Sleep, that our Actions of the Day might be either rewarded or puniſhed with a little Age of Happineſs or Miſery. St. Auſtin was of Opinion, that if in Parade there was the ſame Vicitude of ſleeping and waking as in the preſent World, the Dreams of its Inhabitants would be very happy.

And ſo far it preſent our Dreams are in our Power, that they are generally conformable to our waking Thoughts, ſo that it is not impoſſible to convey our ſelves to a Conſort of Muſic, the Conſervation of Diſtant Friends, or any other Entertainment which has been before lodged in the Mind.

My Readers, by applying theſe Hints will find the Neceſſity of making a good Day of it, if they heartily wiſh themſelves a good Night.

I have often conſider'd Marcia's Prayer, and Lucan's Account of Cato, in this Light.

Marc O ye immortal Powers, that guard the Juſt, Watch round his Couch, and ſoften his Repoſe, Banish his Sorrows, and becalm his Soul
With eaſie Dreams, remember all his Virtues!
And ſhew Mankind that Goodneſs is your Care Luc Sweet are the Slumbers of the virtuous Man!

*O Marcia, I have ſeen thy Godlike Father Some Pow'r's invincible ſupports his Soul,
And bears it up in all its worted Greatneſs
A ſound reſreſhing Sleep is fall'n upon him
I ſaw him ſtretcht at Eaſe, his Faſcy loſt In pleaſing Dreams, as I drew near his Couch, He ſmild, and cry'd, Cæſar! thou canſt not hurt me*

Mr Shadow acquaints me in a Poſtſcrip, that he has no manner of Title to the Viſion which ſucceeded his firſt Letter; but adds, that as the Gentleman who wrote it Dreams very ſenſibly, he ſhall be glad to meet him ſome Night or other, under the great Elm Tree, by which Purgel has given us a fine Metaphorical Image of Sleep, in order to turn over a few of the Leaves together, and oblige the Publick with an Account of the Dreams that lie under them.

WHEN all the Deviations of Life put together, we ſhould find that a great Part of them proceed from thoſe Clummiſſes and Reproaches which we ſpread abroad concerning one another.

There is ſcarce a Man living who is not, in ſome Degree, guilty of this Offence; tho', at the ſame time, how ever we treat one another, it muſt be confeſſed, that we all conſent in ſpeaking ill of the Perſons who are notorious for this Practice. It generally takes its Riſe either from an ill will to Mankind, a private Inclination to make our ſelves eſteem'd, an Oſtentation of Wit, a Vanity of being thought in the Secrets of the World, or from a Deſire of gratifying any of theſe Diſpoſitions of Mind in thoſe Perſons with whom we conſeſe.

The Publisher of Scandal is more or leſs odious to Mankind, and criminal in himſelf, as he is influenced by any one or more of the foregoing Motives. But whatever may be the Occaſion of ſpreading theſe falſe Reports, he ought to conſider, that the Effect of them is equally prejudicial and pernicious to the Perſon at whom they are aimed. The Injury is the ſame tho' the Principle from whence it proceeds may be different.

As every one looks upon himſelf with too much Indulgence, when he preſſes a Judgment on his own Thoughts or Actions, and is very few would be thought guilty of this abominable Proceeding, which is ſo univerſally practis'd, and, at the ſame time, ſo univerſally blamed, I ſhall lay down three Rules by which I would have a Man examine and ſearch into his own Heart before he ſtands acquitted to himſelf of that evil Diſpoſition of Mind which I am here mentioning.

Fiſt of all, Let him conſider whether he does not take Delight in hearing the Faults of others from a Pen, and being lashed in a Satyr, he was resolved to have them both at any Rate, and so uttered this compleat Piece of Nonsense. It will most effectually discover the Absurdity of these monstrous Unions, if we will suppose these Metaphors or Images actually Painted. Imagine then a Hand holding a Pen, and several Lashes of Whip-cord falling from it, and you have the true Representation of this sort of Eloquence. I believe, by this very Rule, a Reader may be able to judge of the Union of all Metaphors whatsoever, and determine which are Homogeneous and which Heterogeneous or to speak more plainly, which are Consistent, and which Inconsistent.

There is yet one Evil more which I must take notice of, and that is the running of Metaphors into tedious Allegories which, though an Error on the better Hand, causes Confusion as much as the other. This becomes abominable, when the Lustre of one Word leads a Writer out of his Road, and makes him wander from his Subject for a Page together. I remember a young Fellow, of this Turn, who having said by Chance that his Mistress had a World of Charms thereupon took Occasion to consider her as one possessed of Frigid and Torrid Zones, and pursued her from the one Pole to the other.

I shall conclude this Paper with a Letter written in that enormous Style, which I hope my Reader hath by this time set his Heart against. The Epistle hath heretofore received great Applause, but after what hath been said, let any Man commend it if he dare.

SIR,

'After the many heavy Lashes that have fallen from your Pen, you may justly expect in return all the Load that my Ink can lay upon your Shoulders. You have Quartered all the foul Language upon me, that could be raked out of the Air of Billingsgate, without knowing who I am, or whether I deserve to be Cuffed and Scarified at this rate. I tell you once for all, turn your Eyes where you please, you shall never Smell me out. Do you think that the Panicks, which you sow about the Parish, will ever build a Monument to your Glory? No, Sir, you may Fight these Battles as long as you will, but when you come to Balance the Account you will find that you have been Fishing in troubled Waters, and that an Ignis fatuus hath bewildered you, and that indeed you have built upon a sandy Foundation, and brought your Hogs to a fair Market.

Molle meum levibus Cor est violabile Felis
Ovid

THE Case of my Correspondent who sends me the following Letter has somewhat in it so very whimsical, that I know not how to entertain my Readers better than by laying it before them.

SIR,

'I am fully convinced that there is not upon Earth a more impertinent Creature than an importunate Lover. We are daily complaining of the Severity of our Fate, to People who are wholly unconcerned in it and hourly improving a Passion, which we would persuade the World is the Torment of our Lives. Notwithstanding this Reflection, Sir, I cannot forbear recurring to you with my own Case. You must know then, Sir, that even from my Childhood, the most prevailing Inclination I could perceive in my self, was a strong Desire to be in Favour with the Fair Sex. I am at present in the one and twentieth Year of my Age, and should have made Choice of a She Bed fellow many Years since, had not my Father, who has a pretty good Estate of his own getting, and passes in the World for a prudent Man, been pleased to lay it down as a Maxim, That nothing spoils a young Fellow's Fortune so much as marrying early, and that no Man ought to think of Wedlock 'till six and twenty. Knowing his Sentiments upon this Head, I thought it in vain to apply my self to Women of Condition, who expect Settlements, so that all my Amours have hitherto been with Ladies who had no Fortunes. But I know not how to give you so good an Idea of me, as by laying before you the History of my Life.

'I can very well remember, that at my School-mistresses, whenever we broke up, I was always for joining my self with the Miss who Lay in, and was constantly one of the first to make a Party in the Play of Husband and Wife. This Passion for being well with the Females still increased as I advanced in Years. At the Dancing-School I contracted so many Quarrels by struggling with my Fellow-Scholars for the Partner I liked best, that upon a Ball Night, before our Mothers made their Appearance, I was usually up to the Nose in Blood. My Father, like a discreet Man, soon removed me from this Stage of Softness to a School of Discipline, where I learnt Latin and Greek. I underwent several Severities in this Place, 'till it was thought convenient to send me to the University, though, to confess the Truth, I should not have arrived so early at that Seat of Learning, but from the Discovery of an Intrigue between me and my Master's House-keeper, upon whom I had employed my Rhetorick so effectually, that, though she was a very elderly Lady, I had almost brought her to consent to marry me. Upon my Arrival at Oxford, I found Logic so dry, that, instead of giving Attention to the Dead, I soon fell to addressing the Living. My first Amour was with a pretty Girl whom I shall call Parthenope. Her Mother sold Ale by the Town Wall. Being often caught there by the Proctor, I was forced at last, that my Mistress's Reputation might receive no Blemish, to confess my Addresses were honourable. Upon this I was immediately sent Home, but Parthenope soon after marrying a Shoe-maker, I was again suffered to return. My next Affair was with my Taylor's Daughter, who deserted me for the sake of a young Barber. Upon my complaining to one of my particular Friends of this 'Misfortune, the cruel Wagg made a meer Jest of my Calumny, and asked me with a Smile, Where the Needle should turn but to the Pole!' After this I was deeply in Love with a Milliner, and at last with my Bed-maker, upon which I was sent away, or in the University Phrase, Rusticated for ever.

Upon my coming home, I settled to my Studies so heartily, and contracted so great a Reservedness by being kept from the Company I most affected, that my Father thought he might venture me at the Temple.

Within a Week after my Arrival I began to shine again, and became enamour'd with a mighty pretty Creature, who had every thing but Money to recommend her. Having frequent Opportunities of uttering all the soft things which an Heart formed for Love could inspire me with, I soon gained her Consent to treat of Marriage; but unfortunately for us all, in the Absence of my Charmer I usually talked the same Language to her elder Sister, who is also very pretty. Now I assure you, Mr SPECTATOR, this did not proceed from my real Affection I had conceived for her, but being a perfect Stranger to the Conversation of Men, and strongly addicted to associate with the Women, I knew no other Language but that of Love. I should however be very much obliged to you, if you could free me from the Perplexity I am at present in. I have sent Word to my old Gentleman in the Country, that I am desperately in Love with the younger Sister; and her Father, who knew no better, poor Man! requinted him by the same Post, that I had for some time made my Addresses to the Sister. Upon this old Testy sends me up Word, that he has heard so much of my Exploits, that he intends immediately to order me to the South Sea. Sir, I have occasionally talked so much of dying, that I began to think there is not much in it, and if the old Squire persists in his Design, I do hereby give him Notice that I am providing my self with proper Instruments for the Destruction of despairing Lovers: let him therefore lool to it, and consider that by his Obstinacy he may himself lose the Son of his Strength, the World in hopeful Lawver, my Mistress a passionate Lover, and you, Mr SPECTATOR.

—Mens sine Pondere ludit—Petr

SINCE I received my Friend Shadow's Letter, several of my Correspondents have been pleased to send me an Account how they have been employed in Sleep, and what notable Adventures they have been engaged in during that Moonshine in the Brain. I shall try before my Readers an Abridgment of some few of their Extravagancies, in hopes that they will in Time accustom themselves to dream a little more to the Purpose.

One who styles himself Gladio, complains heavily that his Fair One charges him with Inconstancy, and does not use him with half the Kindness, which the Sincerity of his Passion may demand: the said Gladio having by Valour and Stragem put to Death Tyrants, Inchanters, Monsters, Knights, &c without Number, and exposed himself to all manner of Dangers for her Sake and Safety. He desires in his Postscript to know, whether, from a constant Success in them, he may not promise himself to succeed in her Esteem at last.

Another who is very prolific in his Narrative writes me Word, that having sent a Venture beyond Sea, he took Occasion one Night to fancy himself gone along with it, and grown on a sudden the richest Man in all the Indies. Having been there about a Year or two, a Gust of Wind that forced open his Casement blew him over to his native Country again, where walking at Six a Clock, and the Change of the Air not agreeing with him, he turned to his Left Side in order to a second Voyage: but e'er he could get on Ship-board, was unfortunately apprehended for stealing a Horse, try'd and condemn'd for the Fact, and in a fair way of being executed, if some Body stepping hastily into his Chamber had not brought him a Reprieve. This Fellow too wants Mr Shadow's Advice, who, I dare say, would bid him be content to rise after his first Nap, and learn to be satisfied as soon as Nature is.

The next is a publick spirited Gentleman, who tells me, That on the Second of September at Night the whole City was on Fire, and would certainly have been reduced to Ashes again by this Time, if he had not flown over it with the New River on his Back, and happily extinguished the Flames before they had prevailed too far. He would be informed whether he has not a Right to petition the Lord Mayor and Aldermen for a Reward.

A Letter dated September the Ninth acquaints me, That the Writer being resolved to try his Fortune, had fasted all that Day, and that he might be sure of dreaming upon something at Night, procured a handsome Sheet of Bride Cake, which he placed very conveniently under his Pillow. In the Morning his Memory happen'd to fail him, and he could recollect nothing but an odd Fancy that he had eaten his Cake, which being found upon Search reduced to a few Crums, he is resolved to remember more of his Dreams another Time, believing from this that there may possibly be somewhat of Truth in them.

I have received numerous Complaints from several delicious Dreamers, desiring me to invent some Method of silencing those noisy Slaves, whose Occupations lead them to take their early Rounds about the City in a Morning, doing a deal of Mischief and working strange Confusion in the Affairs of its Inhabitants. Several Monarchs have done me the Honour to acquaint me, how often they have been shook from their respective Thrones by the rattling of a Coach or the rumbling of a Wheel barrow. And many private Gentlemen, I find, have been baul'd of vast Estates by Fellows not worth Three-pence A fair Lady was just upon the Point of being married to a young, handsome, rich, ingenious Nobleman, when an impertinent Tinker passing by, forbid the Bruns, and a hopeful Youth, who had been newly advanced to great Honour and Preferment, was forced by a neighbouring Cobler to resign all for an old Song It has been represented to me, that those inconsiderable Rascals do nothing but go about dissolving of Marriages and spoiling of Fortunes, impoverishing rich and ruining great People, interrupting Beauties in the midst of their Conquests, and Generals in the Course of their Victories A boisterous Peripatetic hardly goes through a Street without waking half a Dozen Kings and Princes to open their Shops or clean Shoes, frequently transforming Sceptres into Pruning-Shovels, and Proclamations into Bills I have by me a Letter from a young Statesman, who in five or six Hours came to be Emperor of Europe, after which he made War upon the Great Turk, routed him Horse and Foot, and was crowned Lord of the Universe in Constantinople the Conclusion of all his Successes is, that on the 12th Instant about Seven in the Morning, his Imperial Majesty was deposed by a Chimney-Sweeper

On the other hand, I have Epistolary Testimonies of Gratitude from many miserable People, who owe to this clamorous Tribe frequent Deliverances from great Misfortunes A Small colman,* by waking one of these distressed Gentlemen, saved him from ten Years Imprisonment An honest Watchman bidding loud Good morrow to another, freed him from the Malice of many potent Enemies, and brought all their Designs against him to nothing A certain Valetudinarian confesses he has often been cured of a sore Throat by the Houseness of a Curman, and relieved from a Fit of the Gout by the Sound of old Shoes A noisy Puppy that plagued a sober Gentleman all Night long with his Impertinence, was silenced by a Cinder-Wench with a Word speaking

Instead therefore of suppressing this Order of Mortals, I would propose it to my Readers to make the best Advantage of their Morning Salutations A famous Macedonian Prince, for fear of forgetting himself in the midst of his good Fortune, had a Youth to wait on him every Morning, and bid him remember that he was a Man A Citizen who is waked by one of these Criers, may regard him as a kind of Remembrancer, come to admonish him that it is time to return to the Circumstances he has overlooked all the Night time, to leave off fancying himself what he is not, and prepare to act suitably to the Condition he is really placed in

People may dream on as long as they please, but I shall take no Notice of any Imaginary Adventures that do not happen while the Sun is on this Side the Horizon For which Reason I stifle Prutilla's Dream at Church last Sunday, who while the rest of the Audience were enjoying the Benefit of an excellent Discourse, was losing her

Money and Jewels to a Gentleman at Play, till after a strange Run of ill Luck she was reduced to pawn three lovely pretty Children for her last Stake When she had thrown them away her Compassion went off, discovering himself by his usual Tokens, a cloven Foot and a strong Smell of Brimstone which last proved only a Bottle of Spirits, which a good old Lady applied to her Nose, to put her in a Condition of hearing the Preacher's third Head concerning Time

If a Man has no Mind to pass abruptly from his imagined to his real Circumstances, he may employ himself a while in that new kind of Observation which my Onirocritical Correspondent has directed him to make of himself Pursuing the Imagination through all its Extravagancies, whether in Sleeping or Waking, is no improper Method of correcting and bringing it to act in Subordinancy to Reason, so as to be delighted only with such Objects as will affect it with Pleasure, when it is never so cool and sedate

MANKIND may be divided into the Merry and the Serious, who, both of them, make a very good Figure in the Species, so long as they keep their respective Humours from degenerating into the neighbouring Extreme there being a natural Tendency in the one to a melancholy Moroseness, and in the other to a satirical Levity

The merry Part of the World are very amiable, whilst they diffuse a Cheerfulness through Conversation at proper Seasons and on proper Occasions but on the contrary, a great Grievance to Society, when they infect every Discourse with insipid Mirth, and turn into Ridicule such Subjects as are not suited to it For though Laughter is looked upon by the Philosophers as the Property of Reason, the Excess of it has been always considered as the Mark of Folly

On the other Side, Seriousness has its Beauty whilst it is attended with Cheerfulness and Humanity, and does not come in unreasonably to pall the good Humour of those with whom we converse

These two Sets of Men, notwithstanding they each of them shine in their respective Characters, are apt to bear a natural Aversion and Antipathy to one another

What is more usual, than to hear Men of serious Tempers and austere Morals, enlarging upon the Vanities and Follies of the young and gay Part of the Species whilst they look with a kind of Horror upon such Poms and Diversions as are innocent in themselves, and only culpable when they draw the Mind too much?

I could not but smile upon reading a Passage in the Account which Mr Baxter gives of his own Life, wherein he represents it as a great Blessing, succeeded by a young Rake of the Middle-Temple, who was brought to me by his Grandmother, but to her great Sorrow and Surprise, he came out a Quaker. Seeing my self surrounded with a Body of Free-thinkers, and Scoffers at Religion, who were making themselves merry at the sober Looks and thoughtful Brows of those who had been in the Cave, I thrust them all in, one after another, and locked the Door upon 'em. Upon my opening it, they all looked, as if they had been frightened out of their Wits, and were marching away with Ropes in their Hands to a Wood that was within Sight of the Place. I found they were not able to bear themselves in their first serious Thoughts; but knowing these would quickly bring them to a better Frame of Mind, I gave them into the Custody of their Friends 'till that happy Change was wrought in them.

* Thomas Britton (Old Note.) Why he in particular?

The last that was brought to me was a young Woman, who at the first Sight of my short Face fell into an immoderate fit of Laughter, and was forced to hold her Sides all the while her Mother was speaking to me. Upon this I interrupted the old Lady, and taking her Daughter by the Hand, Madam, said I, be pleased to retire into my Closet, while your Mother tells me your Case. I then put her into the Mouth of the Cave, when the Mother, after having begg'd Pardon for the Girl's Rudeness, told me, that she often treated her Father and the gravest of her Relations in the same manner, that she would sit giggling and laughing with her Companions from one End of a Tragedy to the other nay, that she would sometimes burst out in the Middle of a Sermon, and set the whole Congregation a staring at her. The Mother was going on, when the young Lady came out of the Cave to us with a composed Countenance, and a low Curtsie. She was a Girl of such exuberant Mirth, that her Visit to Trophonius only reduced her to a more than ordinary Decency of Behaviour, and made a very pretty Prude of her. After having performed innumerable Cures, I looked about me with great Satisfaction, and saw all my Patients walking by themselves in a very Pensive and musing Posture, so that the whole Place seem'd covered with Philosophers. I was at length resolv'd to go into the Cave my self, and see what it was that had produced such wonderful Effects upon the Company, but as I was stooping at the Entrance, the Door being something low, I gave such a Nodd in my Chair, that I awak'd. After having recovered my self from my first Startle, I was very well pleas'd at the Accident which had befallen me, as not knowing but a little Stay in the Place might have spoiled my SPECTATORS.

—Solemne sum, sua sidera norunt—Virg

I HAVE always taken a particular Pleasure in examining the Opinions which Men of different Religions, different Ages, and different Countries, have entertain'd concerning the Immortality of the Soul, and the State of Happiness which they promise themselves in another World. For whatever Prejudices and Errors human Nature lies under we find that either Reason, or Irritation from our first Parents, has discovered to all People something in these great Points which bears Analogy to Truth, and to the Doctrines opened to us by Divine Revelation. I was lately discoursing on this Subject with a learned Person who has been very much conversant among the Inhabitants of the more Western Parts of Africa. Upon his conversing with several in that Country, he tells me that their Notion of Heaven or of a future State of Happiness is this, That every thing we there wish for will immediately present itself to us. We find, say they, our Souls are of such Nature that they require Variety, and are not capable of being always delighted with the same Objects. The Supreme Being therefore, in Compliance with this Taste of Happiness which he has planted in the Soul of Man, will ruse up from time to time, say they, every Gratification which it is in the Humour to be pleased with. If we wish to be in Groves or Bowers, among running Streams or Falls of Water, we shall immediately find our selves in the midst of such a Scene as we desire. If we would be entertained with Musick and the Melody of Sounds, the Consort rises upon our Wish, and the whole Region about us is filled with Harmony. In short, every Desire will be followed by Fruition, and whatever a Man's Inclination directs him to will be present with him. Nor is it material whether the Supreme Power creates in Conformity to our Wishes, or whether he only produces such a Change in our Imagination, as makes us believe our selves conversant among those Scenes which delight us. Our Happiness will be the same, whether it proceed from external Objects, or from the Impressions of the Deity upon our own private Fancies. This is the Account which I have received from my learned Friend. Notwithstanding this System of Belief be in general very chimerical and visionary, there is something sublime in its manner of considering the Influence of a Divine Being on a Human Soul. It has also, like most other Opinions of the Heathen World upon these important Points, it has, I say, its Foundation in Truth, as it supposes the Souls of good Men after this Life to be in a State of perfect Happiness, that in this State there will be no barren Hopes, nor fruitless Wishes, and that we shall enjoy every thing we can desire. But the particular Circumstance which I am most pleas'd with in this Scheme, and which arises from a just Reflection upon Human Nature, is that Variety of Pleasures which it supposes the Souls of good Men will be possessed of in another World. This I think highly probable, from the Dictates both of Reason and Revelation. The Soul consists of many Faculties, as the Understanding, and the Will, with all the Senses both outward and inward, or to speak more Philosophically, the Soul can exert herself in many different Ways of Action. She can understand, will, imagine, see and hear, love, and discourse, and apply herself to many other the like

Faculties of different Kinds and Natures, but what is more to be considered, the Soul is capable of receiving a most exquisite Pleasure and Satisfaction from the Exercise of any of these its Powers, when it is gratified with their proper Objects. It can be entirely happy by the Satisfaction of the Memory, the Sight the Hearing, or any other Mode of Perception. Every Faculty is a distinct Taste in the Mind and hath Objects recommended to its proper Relish. Doctor Tillotson somewhere says, that he will not presume to determine in what consists the Happiness of the West, because God Almighty is capable of making the Soul happy by ten thousand different Ways. Besides these several Avenues to Pleasure which the Soul is endowed with in this Life, it is not impossible, according to the Opinions of many eminent Divines, but there may be new Faculties in the Soul of good Men made perfect, as well as new Senses in their glorified Bodies. Thus we are sure of, that there will be new Objects offered to all these Faculties which are essential to us.

We are likewise to take Notice that every particular Faculty is capable of being employed on a very great Variety of Objects. The Understanding, for Example, may be happy in the Contemplation of Moral, Natural, Mathematical, and other Kinds of Truth. The Memory likewise may turn itself to an infinite Multitude of Objects, especially when the Soul shall have passed through the Space of many Millions of Years, and shall reflect with Pleasure on the Days of its former Life. Every other Faculty may be considered in the same Manner.

We cannot question but that the Happiness of a Soul will be adequate to its Nature, and that it is not endowed with any Faculties which are to be useless and unemployed. The Happiness is to be the Happiness of the whole Man, and we may easily conceive to our selves the Happiness of the Soul, which any one of its Faculties is in the Fruition of its chief Good. The Happiness may be of a more exalted Nature in Proportion as the Faculty employed is so, but the whole Soul is in the Fruition of any of its particular Powers, the whole Soul is happy in the Pleasure which issues from any of its particular Acts. For notwithstanding, as has been before hinted, and as it has been taken Notice of by one of the greatest modern Philosophers, we divide the Soul into several Powers and Faculties, there is no such Division in the Soul itself, since it is the whole Soul that remembers, understands, wills, or imagines. Our manner of considering the Memory, Understanding, Will, Imagination, and the like Faculties, is for the better enabling us to express our selves in such abstracted Subjects of Speculation, not that there is any such Division in the Soul itself.

Seeing then that the Soul has many different Faculties, or in other Words, many different Ways of acting, that it can be intensely pleased, or made happy by all these different Faculties, or Ways of acting, that it may be endowed with several latent Faculties, which it is not at present in a Condition to exert, that we cannot believe the Soul is endowed with any Faculty which is of no Use to it, that whenever any one of these Faculties is transcendently pleased, the Soul is in a State of Happiness, and in the last Place considering that the Happiness of another World is to be the Happiness of the whole Man, who can question but that there is an infinite Variety in those Pleasures we are speaking of, and that this Fullness of Joy will be made up of all those Pleasures which the Nature of the Soul is capable of receiving.

We shall be the more confirmed in this Doctrine, if we observe the Nature of Variety, with regard to the Mind of Man. The Soul does not care to be always in the same bent. The Faculties receive one another by Turns, and receive an additional Pleasure from the Novelty of those Objects about which they are conversant.

Revelation likewise very much confirms this Notion under the different Views which it gives us of our future Happiness. In the Description of the Throne of God, it represents to us all those Objects which are able to gratify the Senses and Imagination. In very many Places it intimates to us all the Happiness which the Understanding can possibly receive in that State, where all Things shall be reversed to us, and we shall know, even as we are known, the Raptures of Devotion of Divine Love, the Pleasure of conversing with our blessed Saviour, with an innumerable Host of Angels and with the Spirits of just Men made perfect, are likewise revealed to us in several Parts of the Holy Writings. There are also mentioned those Hierarchies or Governments in which the Blest shall be ranged one above another, and in which we may be sure a great Part of our Happiness will likewise consist, for it will not be there as in this World where every one is aiming at Power and Superiority, but on the contrary, every one will find that Station the most proper for him in which he is placed, and will probably think that he could not have been so happy in any other Station. Here and many other Particulars are revealed in Divine Revelation as the several Ingredients of our Happiness in Heaven, which all inly such a Variety of Joys and such a Gratification of the Soul in all its different Faculties, as I have been here mentioning.

Some of the Rabbins tell us, that the Cherubims are a Set of Angels who know no evil, and the Seraphims a Set of Angels who love most. Whether this Distinction be not altogether Imaginary, I shall not here examine, but it is highly probable that among the Spirits of good Men, there may be some who will be more pleased with the Employment of one Faculty than of another, and this perhaps according to those innocent and virtuous Habits or Inclinations which have here taken the deepest Root.

I might here apply this Consideration to the Spirits of wicked Men, with relation to the Pain which they shall suffer in every one of their Faculties, and the respective Miseries which shall be appropriated to each Faculty in particular. But leaving this to the Reflection of my Readers, I shall conclude, with observing how we ought to be thankful to our great Creator, and rejoice in the Being which he has bestowed upon us, for having made the Soul susceptible of Pleasure by so many different Ways We see by what a Variety of Passages, Joy and Gladness may enter into the Thoughts of Man, how wonderfully a human Spirit is framed, to imbibe its proper Satisfaction, and taste the Goodness of its Creator We may therefore look into our selves with Rapture and Amazement, and cannot sufficiently express our Gratitude to him, who has encompassed us with such a Profusion of Blessings, and opened in us so many Capacities of enjoying them

There cannot be a stronger Argument that God has designed us for a State of future Happiness, and for that Heaven which he has revealed to us, than that he has thus naturally qualified the Soul for it, and made it a Being capable of receiving so much Bliss He would never have made such Faculties in vain, and have endowed us with Powers that were not to be exerted on such Objects as are suited to them. It is very manifest, by the inward Frame and Constitution of our Minds, that he has adapted them to an infinite Variety of Pleasures and Gratifications, which are not to be met with in this Life We should therefore at all times take Care that we do not disappoint thus his gracious Purpose and Intention towards us, and make those Faculties which he formed as so many Qualifications for Happiness and Rewards, to be the Instruments of Pain and Punishment

Ἡ ἀνθρώπος ἐβέργητος πεφυλώς

Antonin Lib 9

THE following Essay comes from an Hand which has entertained my Readers once before

Notwithstanding a narrow contracted Temper be that which obtains most in the World, we must not therefore conclude this to be the genuine Characterstuck of Mankind, because there are some who delight in nothing so much as in doing Good, and receive more of their Happiness at second hand, or by rebound from other, than by direct and immediate Sensation Now tho' these Heroic Souls are but few, and to Appearance so far advanced above the groveling Multitude, as if they were of another Order of Beings, yet in Reality their Nature is the same, moved by the same Springs, and endowed with all the same essential Qualities, only cleared, refined, and cultivated Water is the same fluid Body in Winter and in Summer when it stands stiffened in Ice as when it flows along in gentle Streams gladdening a thousand Fields in its Progress 'Tis a Property of the Heart of Man to be diffusive Its kind Wishes spread abroad over the Face of the Creation, and if there be those, as we may observe too many of them, who are all wrapt up in their own dear selves, without any visible Concern for their Species, let us suppose that their Good-nature is frozen, and by the prevailing Force of some contrary Quality restrained in its Operations I shall therefore endeavour to assign some of the principal Checks upon this generous Propension of the Human Soul, which will enable us to judge whether, and by what Method, this most useful Principle may be unfettered, and restored to its native Freedom of Exercise

The first and leading Cause is an unhappy Complexion of Body The Heathens, ignorant of the true Source of Moral Evil, generally charged it on the Obliquity of Matter, which, being eternal and independent, was incapable of Change in any of its Properties, even by the Almighty Mind who, when He came to fashion it into a World of Beings, must take it as he found it 'Tis Notion, as most others of theirs, is a Composition of Truth and Error That Matter is eternal, that from the first Union of a Soul to it, it perverted its Inclinations, and that the ill Influence it hath upon the Mind is not to be corrected by God himself, are all very great Errors, occasioned by a Truth as evident, that the Capacities and Dispositions of the Soul depend to a great Degree, on the bodily Temper As there are some Fools, others are Knaves, by Constitution, and particularly, it may be said of many, that they are born with an illiberal Cast of Mind, the Matter that composes them is tedious as Birdlime, and a kind of Cramp draws their Hands and their Hearts together, that they never care to open them unless to grasp at more 'Tis a melancholy Lot this but attended with one Advantage above theirs, to whom it would be as painful to forbear good Offices, as it is to these Men to perform them that whereas Persons naturally Beneficent often mistake Instinct for Virtue, by reason of the Difficulty of distinguishing when one rules them and when the other, Men of the opposite Character may be more certain of the Motive that predominates in every Action If they cannot confer a Benefit with that Ease and Frankness which are necessary to give it a Grace in the Eye of the World, in requital, the real Merit of what they do is imbrac'd by the Opposition they surmount in doing it The Strength of their Virtue is seen in rising against the Weight of Nature, and every time they have the Resolution to discharge their Duty, they make a Sacrifice of Inclination to Conscience, which is always too grateful to let its Followers go without suitable Marks of its Approbation Perhaps the entire Cure of this ill Quality is no more possible, than of some Distempers that descend by Inheritance However, a great deal may be done by a Course of Beneficence obstinately persisted in this, if any thing, being a likely way of establishing a moral Habit, which shall be somewhat of a Counterpoise to the Force of Mechanism Only it must be remembered, that we do not intermit, upon any Pretence whatsoever, the Custom of doing Good, in regard if there be the least Cessation, Nature will watch the Opportunity to return, and in a short time to recover the Ground it was so long in quitting For there is this Difference between mental Habits, and

'aloud in the Boxes at a Play, is in a fair way of being a Favourite. I have known a young Fellow make his Fortune by knocking down a Constable and may venture to say, tho' it may seem a Paradox, that many a Fair One has died by a Duel in which both the Combatants have survived.

'About three Winters ago I took Notice of a young Lady at the Theatre, who conceived a Passion for a notorious Rake that headed a Party of Cat-calls, and am credibly informed, that the Emperor of the Mohocks married a rich Widow within three Weeks after having rendered himself formidable in the Cities of London and Westminster. Scowring and breaking Windows have done frequent Execution upon the Sex, but there is no Sett of these Male Charmers who make their way more successfully, than those who have gained themselves a Name for Intrigue, and have ruined the greatest Number of Reputations. There is a strange Curiosity in the female World to be acquainted with the dear Man who has been loved by others, and to know what it is that makes him so agreeable. His Reputation does more than half his Business. Every one that is ambitious of being a Woman of Fashion, looks out for Opportunities of being in his Company, so that to use the old Proverb, 'When his Name is up he may lie a-Bed.

'I was very sensible of the great Advantage of being a Man of Importance upon these Occasions on the Day of the King's Entry, when I was seated in a Balcony behind a Cluster of very pretty Country Ladies, who had one of these showy Gentlemen in the midst of them. The first Trick I caught him at was bowing to several Persons of Quality whom he did not know nay, he had the Impudence to hem at a Blue Garter who had a finer Equipage than ordinary, and seemed a little concerned at the Impudent Huzzas of the Mob, that hindered his Friend from taking Notice of him. There was indeed one who pull'd off his Hat to him, and upon the Ladies asking who it was, he told them, it was a Foreign Minister that he had been very merry with the Night before whereas in Truth, it was the City Common Hunt.

'He was never at a Loss when he was asked any Person's Name tho' he seldom knew any one under a Peer. He found Dukes and Earls among the Aldermen, very good-natured Fellows among the Privy Counsellors, with two or three agreeable old Rakes among the Bishops and Judges.

'In short, I collected from his whole Discourse, that he was acquainted with every Body, and knew no Body. At the same Time, I am mistaken if he did not thro' Day make more Advances in the Affections of his Mistress, who sat near him, than he could have done in half a Year's Courtship.

'Ovid has finely touch'd this Method of making Love, which I shall here give my Reader in Mr Dryden's Translation

Thus Love in Theatres did first improve, And Theatres are still the Scene of Love

*Nor shun the Chariots, and the Coursers Race, Till Circus is no inconvenient Place
Nor Need is there of talking on the Hand, Nor Nods nor Sighs, which Lovers understand, But boldly next the Fair your Seat provide,
Close as you can to hers, and Side by Side Pleas'd or unpleas'd, no Matter, crowding sit,
For so the Laros of publick Shows permit
Then find Occasion to begin Discourse, Enquire whose Chariot this, and whose that Horse,
To whatsoever Side she is inclin'd, Sunt all your Inclinations to her Mird, Like what she likes, from thence your Court begin,
And whom she favours, wish that he may win.*

*O when will come the Day, by Heaven design'd, When thou, the best and fairest of Mankind, Drawn by white Horses, shalt in Triumph ride,
Will conquer'd Slaves attending on thy Side, Slaves, that no longer can be safe in flight, O glorious Object! O surprizing Sight!
O Day of publick Joy, too good to end in Night!
On such a Day, if thou, and next to thee Soe Beauty sits, the Spectacle to see,
If she enquire the Names of conquer'd Kings,
Of Mountains, Rivers, and their hidden Springs, Answer to all thou knowest, and, if Need be,
Of Things unknown seen to speak knowingly
This is Euphrates, crown'd with Reeds, and there Flows the sanst Tigris, with his Sea-green Har.
Invent new Names of Things unknown before, Call this Armenia, that, the Caspian Shore
Call it is a Mede, and that a Parthian Youth, Talk probably, no Matter for the Truth.*

THE following Copy of Verses comes from one of my Correspondents, and has something in it so Original, that I do not much doubt but it will divert my Readers.

I.

*My Time, O ye Muses, was happily spent,
When Phoebe went with me wherever I went,
Ten thousand sweet Pleasures I felt in my Breast Sure I ever fond Spleen'd like Colin was blest!
But now she is gone, and has left me behind What a marvellous Charge on a sudden I find!
When th'us were as fine as could possibly be,
I thought 'twas the Spring, but alas! it was she.*

*With such a Companion, to tend a few Sheep,
To rise up and play, or to lie down and sleep*

'It is said that John Byron wrote these verses in honour of Joanna, daughter of his friend, Dr Richard Bentley, Master of Trinity.

I was so good-humour'd, so cheerful and gay,
My Heart was as light as a Feather all Day
But now I so cross and so peevish am grown,
So strangely increase as ever was known My Fair one is gone, and my Joys are all drown'd,
And my Heart—I am sure it weighs more than a Pound

III

The Poetain that wont to run sweetly along,
And dance to soft Murmurs the Pebbles among,
Now is lost, little Cupid, if Phebe was there,
'Twas as Pleasure to look at, 'tis as Pain to hear but now she is absent, I weep by its Side, And still as it murmurs no no'thing but of de,
Must yet be so cheerful, while I go in Pain?
Peace there with so in Bul'ing, and hear me complain

When my Lamblers around me would often times play,
As I then Phebe and I were as joyful as they,
How pleasant their Sporting, how happy the Time, When Spring, Love and Beauty were all in their Prime!

But now when the Froicks when by me they pass,
I fling at their Fleeces an handful of Grass,
Be still then, I cry, for it makes me quite mad,
To see you so merry, while I am so sad

My Dog I was ever well pleased to see Cen e wagging his Tail to my Fair one and me,
As I Phebe was pleas'd too, and to my Dog said, Come hither, poor Fellow, and pat'd his Head But now, when he's yawning, I give a sour Look Cry, Straggl, and give him a Blow with my Crook

As I'll give him another, for why should not I say
Be as dull as his Master, when Phebe's away?

When walking with Phebe, what Sights have I seen?

How fair was the Flower, how fresh was the Green?

What a lovely appearance the Trees and the Shade,

The Corn fields and Hedges, and every thing made?

But now she has left me, tho' all are still then,
They none of 'em now so delightful appear
'Twas nought but the Magick, I find, of her Eyes, Made so many beautiful Prospects arise

Sweet Musick wet with us Lo'h all the Wood thro,
The Lark, Linnet, Thrush, and Nightingale too,

Winds over us whisper'd, Flocks by us did bleat,
They none of 'em now so delightful appear
But now she is absent, tho' still they sing on,
The Woods are but lonely, the Melody's gone Her Voice in the Consort, as now I have found, Gave every thing else its agreeable Sound

VIII

Rose, what is become of thy delicate Hue?
And where is the lovely beautiful Blue?
Does ought of its Sweetness the Blossom beguile, That Meadov, those Daisies, why do they not smile?

Al! Rivals, I see what it was that you dress And nade so in selves fit e for, a Place in her Breast

You put on your Colours to pleasure her Eye,
To be pluck'd by her Hand, on her Bosom to die

IX

How slowly Time creeps, till my Phebe return!

While amidst the soft Zephyr's cold Breezes I burn,

Methinks if I knew whereabouts he would tread, I could breathe on his Wings, and 't would melt down the Lead

Fly swifter, ye Minutes, bring hither my Dear,
And rest so much longer for I when she is here
At Colin's old Time is full of Delay,

Nor will budge one Foot faster for all thou canst say

Will no pitying Power that hears me complain, Or cure my Disquiet, or soften my Pain?
To be cur'd, thou must, Colin, thy Passion re-
more,

But what a Swain is so silly to live without Love?
No, Deity, but the dear Nymph to return,
For ne'er was poor Shepherd so sadly forlorn At! What shall I do? I shall die with Despair, Take heed, all ye Swains, for ye love one so fair

THE Desire of knowing future Events is one of the strongest Inclinations in the Mind of Man. Indeed in Ability of foreseeing probable Accidents is what, in the Language of Men is called Wisdom and Prudence. But, not satisfied with the Light that Reason holds out, Mankind hath endeavour'd to penetrate more compendiously into Futurity. Magick, Oracles, Omens, lucky Hours, and the various Arts of Superstition, owe their Rise to this powerful Cause. As this Principle is founded in Self-Love, every Man is sure to be solicitous in the first Place about his own Fortune, the Course of his Life, and the Time and Manner of his Death.

If we consider that we are free Agents, we shall discover the Absurdity of such Enquiries. One of our Actions, which we might have performed or neglected, is the Cause of another that succeeds it, and so the whole Chain of Life is link'd together. Pain, Poverty, or Infamy, are the natural Product of vicious and imprudent Acts, as the contrary Blessings are of good ones so that we cannot suppose our Lot to be determined without Impiety. A great Enhancement of Pleasure arises from its being unexpected, and Pain is doubled by being foreseen. Upon all these, and several other Accounts, we ought to rest satisfied in this Portion bestowed on us to adore the Hand that hath fitted every Thing to our Nature, and hath not more display'd his Goodness in our Knowledge than in our Ignorance.

It is not unworthy Observation, that superstitious Enquiries into future Events prevail more or less, in proportion to the Improvement of liberal Arts and useful Knowledge in the several Parts of the World. Accordingly we find, that magical Incantations remain in Lapland, in the more remote Parts of Scotland they have their second Sight, and several of our own Countrymen see abundance of Furies. In Asia this Credulity is strong, and the greatest Part of refined Learning there consists in the Knowledge of Amulets, Talismans, occult Numbers, and the like.

When I was at Grand Cairo, I fell into the Acquaintance of a good natured Mussulman, who promised me many good Offices, which he designed to do me when he became the Prime Minister, which was a Fortune bestowed on his Immigration by a Doctor very deep in the curious Sciences. At his repeated Solicitations I went to learn my Destiny of this wonderful Sage. For a small Sum I had his Promise, but was requir'd to wait in a dark Apartment till he had run thro' the preparatory Ceremonies. Having a strong Propensity, even then, to Dreaming, I took a Nap upon the Sofa where I was placed, and had the following Vision, the Particulars whereof I picked up the other Day among my Papers.

I found my self in an unbounded Plain, where methought the whole World, in several Habits and with different Tongues, was assembled. The Multitude glided swiftly along and I found in my self a strong Inclination to mingle in the Train. My Eyes quickly singled out some of the most splendid Figures. Several in rich Castans and glittering Turbans bustled through the Throng, and trampled over the Bodies of those they threw down. till to my great Surprise I found that the great Race they went only hastened them to a Scaffold or a Bowstring. Many beautiful Damsels on the other Side moved forward with great Gravity, some danced till they fell all along, and others pruned their Faces till they lost their Noses. A Tribe of Creatures with busy Looks filling into a Fit of Laughter at the Misfortunes of the unhappy Ladies, I turn'd my Eyes upon them. They were each of them filling his Pockets with Gold and Jewels, and when there was no Room left for more, these Wretches looking round with Fear and Horror, pined away before my Face with Famine and Discontent.

This Prospect of human Misery struck me dumb for some Miles. Then it was that, to disburthen my Mind, I took Pen and Ink, and did every Thing that hath since happen'd under my Office of SPECTATOR. While I was employing my self for the Good of Mankind, I was surpris'd to meet with very unsuitable Returns from my Fellow Creatures. Never was poor Author so beset with Pamphleteers, who sometimes march'd directly against me, but oftner shot at me from strong Bulwarks, or rose up suddenly in Ambush. They were of all Characters and Capacities, some with Ensigns of Dignity and others in Liveries but what most surpris'd me, was to see two or three in black Gowns among my Enemies. It was no small Trouble to me, sometimes to have a Man come up to me with an angry Face, and reproach me for having lampooned him, when I had never seen or heard of him in my Life. With the Ladies it was otherwise. Many became my Enemies for not being particularly pointed out as there were others who resented the Satire which they imagined I had directed against them. My great Comfort was in the Company of half a Dozen Friends, who, I found since, were the Club which I have so often mentioned in my Papers. I laugh'd often at Sir Roger in my Sleep, and was the more diverted with Will Hojcom's Gallantries, (when we afterwards became acquainted) because I had foreseen his Marriage with a Farmer's Daughter. The Regret which arose in my Mind upon the Death of my Companions, my Anxieties for the Publick, and the many Calumnies still fleeing before my Eyes made me repent my Curiosity when the Migiern entered the Room, and ruin'd me, by telling me (when it was too late) that he was just going to begin.

A B I have only deliver'd the Prophecy of that Part of my Life which is past, it being inconvenient to divulge the second Part 'till a more proper Opportunity.

HAVING perused the following Letter, and finding it to run upon the Subject of Love, I referred it to the I earned Casualist, whom I have return'd in my Service for Speculations of that kind. He return'd it to me the next Morning with his Report annexed to it, with both of which I shall here present my Reader.

MR SPECTATOR,

Finding that you have Entertained an useful Person in your Service in quality of Love Casualist, I apply my self to you, under a very great Difficulty, that hath for some Months perplexed me. I have a Couple of humble Servants, one of which I have no Aversion to, the other I think of very kindly. The first hath the Reputation of a Man of good Sense, and is one of those People that your Sex are apt to Value. My Spark is reckoned a Coxcomb among the Men, but is a Favourite of the Ladies. If I marry the Man of Worth, as they call him, I shall oblige my Parents and improve my Fortune but with my dear Beau I promise my self Happiness, altho' not a Jointure. Now I would Lady promised him to bring her Daughter to his Bed the next Night, though in her Heart she abhor'd so infamous an Office. It was no sooner dark than she convey'd into his Room a young Maid of no disagreeable Figure, who was one of her Attendants, and did not want Address to improve the Opportunity for the Advancement of her Fortune. She made so good use of her Time, that when she offered to rise a little before Day, the King could by no means think of parting with her. So that finding herself under a Necessity of discovering who she was, she did it in so hand some a Manner, that his Majesty was exceeding gracious to her, and took her ever after under his Protection. insomuch that our Chronicles tell us he carried her along with him, made her his first Minister of State, and continued true to her alone, 'till his Marriage with the beautiful Elfrida.

Mr SPECTATOR,

I HAVE a couple of Nieces under my Direction, who so often run gadding abroad, that I don't know where to have them. Their Dress, their Tea, and their Visits take up all their Time, and they go to Bed as tired with doing nothing, as I am after quilting a whole Under-Petticoat. The only time they are not idle, is while they read your SPECTATORS which being dedicated to the Interests of Virtue, I desire you to recommend the long neglected Art of Needle-work. Those Hours which in this Age are thrown away in Dress, Play, Visits, and the like, were employ'd, in my time, in writing out Receipts, or working Beds, Chairs, and Hangings for the Family. For my Part, I have ply'd my Needle these fifty Years, and by my good Will would never have it out of my Hand. It grieves my Heart to see a couple of proud idle Flirts sipping their Tea, for a whole Afternoon, in a Room hung round with the Industry of their Great Grand-mother. Pray, Sir, take the laudable Mystery of Embroidery into your serious Consideration, and as you have a great deal of the Virtue of the last Age in you, continue your Endeavours to reform the present

I am, &c.

In Obedience to the Commands of my venerable Correspondent, I have duly weigh'd this important Subject, and promise myself, from the Arguments here laid down, that all the fine Ladies of England will be ready, as soon as their Mourning is over, to appear covered with the Work of their own Hands.

What a delightful Entertainment must it be to the Fair Sex, whom their native Modesty, and the Tenderness of Men towards them, exempts from Publick Business, to pass their Hours in imitating Fruits and Flowers, and transplanting all the Beauties of Nature into their own Dress, or raising a new Creation in their Closets and Apartments. How pleasing is the Amusement of walking among the Shades and Groves planted by themselves, in surveying Heroes slain by their Needle, or little Cypids which they have brought into the World without Pun!

This is, methinks, the most proper way wherein a Lady can shew a fine Genius, and I cannot forbear wishing, that several Writers of that Sex had chosen to apply themselves rather to Tapestry than Rhime. Your Pastoral Poetesses may vent their Fancy in Rural Landships, and place despairing Shepherds under silken Willows, or drown them in a Stream of Mohair. The Heroick Writers may work up Battles as successfully, and inflame them with Gold or stain them with Crimson. Even those who have only a Turn to a Song or an Epigram, may put many valuable Stitches into a Purse, and crowd a thousand Graces into a Pair of Garters.

If I may, without breach of good Manners, imagine that any pretty Creature is void of Genius, and would perform her Part herein but very awkwardly, I must nevertheless insist upon her working, if it be only to keep her out of Harm's way.

Another Argument for busying good Women in Works of Fancy, is, because it takes them off from Scandal, the usual Attendant of Tea-Tables, and all other unactive Scenes of Life. While they are forming their Birds and Beasts, their Neighbours will be allowed to be the Fathers of their own Children. And Whig and Tory will be but seldom mentioned, where the great Dispute is whether Blue or Red is the more proper Colour. How much greater Glory would Sophronia do the General, if she would chuse rather to work the Battle of Blenheim in Tapestry, than signalize her self with so much Vehemence against those who are Frenchmen in their Hearts.

A Third Reason that I shall mention, is the Profit that is brought to the Family where these pretty Arts are encouraged. It is manifest that this way of Life not only keeps fair Ladies from running out into Expences, but is at the same time an actual Improvement. How memorable would that Matron be, who should have it inscribed upon her Monument, 'that she Wrought out the whole Bible in Tapestry, and died in a good old Age, after having covered three hundred Yards of Wall in the Mansion-House.

The Premises being consider'd, I humbly submit the following Proposals to all Mothers in Great Britain.

I That no young Virgin whatsoever be allow'd to receive the Addresses of her first Lover, but in a Suit of her own Embroidering.

II That before every fresh Servant, she be oblig'd to appear with a new Stomacher at the least.

III That no one be actually married, till she hath the Child-bed Pillows, &c. ready Stitched, as likewise the Mantle for the Boy quite finished.

These Laws, if I mistake not, would effectually restore the decay'd Art of Needle-work, and make the Virgins of Great Britain exceedingly Nimble finger'd in their Business.

¹ Public Mourning for Q. Anne, who died Aug 1, 1714

There is a memorable Custom of the Grecian Ladies in this particular, preserved in Homer, which I hope will have a very good Effect with my Country women. A Widow in Ancient Times could not, without Indecency, receive a second Husband till she had Woven a Shroud for her deceased Lord, or the next of kin to him. Accordingly, the Christie Penelope, having as she thought, lost Ulysses at Sea, she employed her time in preparing a Winding-sheet for Laertes, the Father of her Husband. The Story of her Web being very famous, and yet not sufficiently known in its several Circumstances, I shall give it to my Reader, as Homer makes one of her Wooers relate it.

*Sweet Hope she gave to me, yet with apart,
With well taught Looks, and a deceitful Heart
As if she were of many a slender Twine
Of various Texture, and perplexed Design, My Yonks she cry'd, my Lord but newly dead, Forbear a while to court my widow'd Bed,
'Till I have woven, as selenic Vows require,
This Web, a Shroud for poor Ulysses' Sirr His Linen, when I ate the Heron's Soul demands, Shall claim this Labour of his Daughters' Hands*

*Let all the Dames of Greece in Nan e despise, While the great King without a Covering lies Thus she Nor did my Friends mistrust the

*All Day she sped the long laborious Toil But when the Luring Lamps supply'd the Sun, Each Night unravell'd what the Day begun Three in long Summers did the Iruind pre-ail
The Fourth her Maidens told the amazing Tale These Eyes beheld, as close I took my Stand,
The backward Labours of her faithless Hand
'Till watch'd at length, and press'd on e cry

Dicite Io Paan, et Io bis dicite Paan Decidit in casses prada petita meos — Ovid

MR SPECTATOR,
H A V I N G in your Paper of Monday last published my Report on the Case of Mrs Fanny Pickle, wherein I have taken Notice, that Love comes after Marriage, I hope your Readers are satisfied of this Truth, that as Love generally produces Matrimony, so it often happens that Matrimony produces Love.

It perhaps requires more Virtues to make a good Husband or Wife, than what go the finishing any the most shining Character whatsoever.

Discretion seems absolutely necessary, and accordingly we find that the best Husbands have been most famous for their Wisdom. Homer, who hath drawn a perfect Pattern of a prudent Man to make it the more complete, hath celebrated him for the just Returns of Fidelity and

Truth to his Penelope, insomuch that he refused the Cresses of a Goddess for her sake, and to use the Expression of the best of Pagan Authors, etulum suam praeiit Immortalitati, his old Woman was dearer to him than Immortality.

Virtue is the next necessary Qualification for this domestick Character, as it naturally produces Constancy and mutual Esteem. Thus Brutus and Porcia were more remarkable for Virtue and Affection than any others of the Age in which they lived.

Good Nature is a third necessary Ingredient in the Marriage State, without which it would inevitably sower upon a thousand Occasions. When Greatness of Mind is joined with this amiable Quality, it attracts the Admiration and Esteem of all who behold it. Thus Cesar, not more remarkable for his Fortune and Valour than for his Humanity, stole into the Hearts of the Roman People, when breaking through the Custom, he pronounced an Oration at the Funeral of his first and best beloved Wife.

Good Nature is insufficient, unless it be steady and uniform, and accompanied with an Evenness of Temper, which is, above all things, to be preserved in this Friendship contracted for Life. A Man must be easy within himself, before he can be so to his other self. Socrates, and Marcus Aurelius, are Instances of Men, who, by the Strength of Philosophy, having entirely composed their Minds and subdued their Passions, are celebrated for good Husbands, notwithstanding the first was yoked with Xantippe, and the other with Lucretia. If the wedded Pair would but habituate themselves for the first Year to bear with one another's Faults, the Difficulty would be pretty well conquer'd. This mutual Sweetness of Temper and Complacency, was finely recommended in the Nuptial Ceremonies among the Heathens, who, when they sacrificed to Juno at that Solemnity, always tore out the Gail from the Entrails of the Victim, and cast it behind the Altar.

I shall conclude this Letter with a Passage out of Dr Plot's Natural History of Staffordshire, not only as it will serve to fill up your present Paper, but if I find my self in the Humour, may give Rise to another, I having by me an old Register, belonging to the Place here under-mentioned.

Sir Philip de Sen erule held the Mannors of Whichever, Searescot, Kidwari, Netherlorton, and Corlewe, all in Com Stafford, of the Earls of Lancaster, by this memorable Service. The said Sir Philip shall find, maintain and sustain, one Bacon Flitch, hanging in his Hall at Whichenore ready arrayed all times of the Year, but in Leut, to be given to every Man or Woman married, after the Day and the Year of their Marriage be past, in Iorn following.

Whosoever that any one such before named will come to enquire for the Bacon, in their own Person, they shall come to the Butliff, or to the Porter of the Lordship of Whichenore, and shall say to them in the manner as ensueth.

Bayliff, or Porter, I doo you to know, that I am come for my self, to demand one Bacon Flyke hanging in the Hall of the Lord of Whichenovre, after the Form thereunto belonging

After which Relation, the Bayliff or Porter shall assign a Day to him, upon Promise by his Faith to return, and with him to bring Twain of his Neighbours. And in the mean Time the said Bailiff shall take with him Twain of the Freeholders of the Lordship of Whichenovre, and they three shall go to the Manor of Rudlow, belonging to Robert Knightleye, and there shall summon the aforesaid Knightleye, or his Bayliff, commanding him to be ready at Whichenovre the Day appointed, at Prime of Day, with his Carriage, that is to say, a Horse and a Saddle, a Sack and a Pryke, for to convey the said Bacon and Corn a Journey out of the County of Stafford, at his Costages. And then the said Bailiff shall, with the said Freeholders, summon all the Tenants of the said Manor, to be ready at the Day appointed, at Whichenovre, for to do and perform the Services which they owe to the Bacon. And at the Day assigned, all such as owe Services to the Bacon, shall be ready at the Gate of the Manor of Whichenovre, from the Sun-rising to Noon, attending and awaiting for the coming of him who fetcheth the Bacon. And when he is come, there shall be delivered to him and his Fellows, Chaplets and to all those which shall be there, to do their Services due to the Bacon. And they shall lead the said Demandant with Trumps and Tambours, and other manner of Minstrels to the Hall-Door, where he shall find the Lord of Whichenovre, or his Steward, ready to deliver the Bacon in this Manner

He shall enquire of him, which demandeth the Bacon, if he have brought twain of his Neighbours with him. Which must answer, They be here ready. And then the Steward shall cause these two Neighbours to swear, if the said Demandant be a wedded Man, or have been a Man wedded and if since his Marriage one Year and a Day be past and if he be a Free-man, or a Villain. And if his said Neighbours make Oath, that he hath for him all these three Points rehearsed then shall the Bacon be taken down and brought to the Hall Door, and shall there be laid upon one half Quarter of Wheat, and upon one other of Rye. And he that demandeth the Bacon shall kneel upon his Knee, and shall hold his right Hand upon a Book, which Book shall be laid upon the Bacon and the Corn, and shall make Oath in this manner

'Here ye, Sir Philip de Somerville, Lord of Whichenovre, mayntener and gyver of this Baconne. Thrt I A sithe I Wedded my Wife, and sithe I had hyr in my keeping, and at my Wylle by a Year and a Day after our Marriage, I would not have chaunged for none other, frer ne fowler, richer, ne pourer, ne for none other descended of greater Lynage sleeping ne waking at noo tyme. And if the seyd B were sole and I sole I would take her to be my Wife before all the Wymen of the Worlde, of whrt condicions sower they be good or evylle, as help me God ond his Seyntes, and this Flesh and all Fleshes

And his Neighbours shall make Oath, that they trust verily he hath said truly. And if it be found by his Neighbours before named that he be a Free man, there shall be delivered to him half a Quarter of Wheat and a Cheese, and if he be a Villain, he shall have half a Quarter of Rye without Cheese. And then shall Knightleye the Lord of Rudlow be called for, to carry all these Things tofore rehearsed and the said Corn shall be laid on one Horse and the Bacon above it and he to whom the Bacon appertaineth shall ascend upon his Horse, and shall take the Cheese before him if he have a Horse. And if he have none, the Lord of Whichenovre shall cause him to have one Horse and Saddle, to such time as he be past his Lordship and so shall they depart the Manor of Whichenovre with the Corn and the Bacon, tofore him that hath won it, with Trumpets, Tabourets, and other manner of Minstrelsie. And all the Free Tenants of Whichenovre shall Conduct him to be pressed the Lordship of Whichenovre. And then shall they all return, except him, to whom appertaineth to make the Carriage and Journey without the County of Stafford, at the Costs of his Lord of Whichenovre.

MR SPECTATOR,
ACCORDING to my Promise, I herewith transmit to you a List of several Persons, who from time to time demanded the Flitch of Bacon of Sir Philip de Somerville and his Descendants as it is preserved in an ancient Manuscript under the title of The Register of Whichenovre-Hall, and of the Bacon Flitch there maintained.

In the Beginning of this Record is recited the Law or Institution in Form, as it is already printed in your last Paper. To which are added Two By-Laws, as a Comment upon the General Law, the Substance whereof is, that the Wife shall take the same Oath as the Husband, mutatis mutandis, and that the Judges shall, as they think meet, interrogate or cross examine the Witnesses. After this proceeds the Register in Manner following

'Aubrey de Falstaff, Son of Sir John Falstaff, Kt with Dame Maude his Wife, were the first that demanded the Bacon, he having bribed twain of his Father's Companions to swear falsely in his Behoof, whereby he gained the Flitch. But he and his said Wife falling immediately into a Dispute how the said Bacon should be dressed, it was by Order of the Judges taken from him, and hung up again in the Hall

² Lord Macaulay, in a letter published p 1433 * * * of Mr Bohn's edition of Lowndes's Bibliographer's Manual, calls this paper 'undoubtedly Addison's, and one of his best,' although not claimed, because he could not own it without admitting what Lord Macaulay rightly considered quite as obvious, his authorship of No 623 Addison wrote, evidently, some other of these unappropriated papers

'Nobility to keep a certain Number of Chaplains are undisputed, though perhaps not one in ten of those reverend Gentlemen have any Relation to the noble Families their Seats belong to, the Right generally of creating all Chaplains except the Domestick, where there is one, being nothing more than the Perquisite of a Steward's Place who, if he happens to out live any considerable Number of his noble Masters, shall probably, at one and the same Time, have fifty Chaplains, all in their proper Accoutrements, of his own Creation, though perhaps there hath been neither Grace nor Prayer said in the Family since the Introduction of the first Coronet.

MR SPECTATOR,
I WISH you would write a Philosophical Paper about Natural Antipathies, with a Word or two concerning the Strength of Imagination. I can give you a List upon the first Notice, of a Rational China Cup, of an Egg that walks upon two Legs and a Quart Pot that sings like a Nightingale. There is in my Neighbourhood a very pretty pruttling Shoulder of Veal, that scurries out at the Sight of a Knife. Then as for Natural Antipathies, I know a General Officer who was never conquered but by a smother'd Rabbit, and a Wife that domineers over her Husband by the Help of a Breast of Mutton. A Story that relates to my self on this Subject may be thought not unentertaining, especially when I assure you that it is literally true. I had long made Love to a Lady, in the Possession of whom I am now the happiest of Mankind, whose Hand I should have guined with much Difficulty without the Assistance of a Cat. You must know then, that my most dangerous Rival had so strong an Aversion to this Species, that he infallibly swooned away at the Sight of that harmless Creature. My Friend Mrs Lucy, her Maid, having a greater Respect for me and my Purse than she had for my Rival, always took Care to pin the Tail of a Cat under the Gown of her Mistress, whenever she knew of his coming, which had such an Effect, that every Time he entered the Room, he looked more like one of the Figures in Mrs Salmon's Wax work, than a desirable Lover. In short, he grew Sick of her Company which the young Lady taking Notice of, (who no more knew why, than he did) she sent me a Challenge to meet her in Lucan's Inn Chappel, which I joyfully accepted, and have (amongst other Pleasures) the Satisfaction of being praised by her for my Stratagem, I am,

MR SPECTATOR,
The Virgins of Great Britain are very much oblig'd to you for putting them upon such tedious Drudgeries in Needlework, as were fit only for the Hilpas and the Nilpas that lived before the Flood. Here's a stir indeed with your Histories in Embroidery, your Groves with Shades of Silk and Streams of Mohair! I would have you to know, that I hope to kill a hundred Lovers before the best Housewife in England can stitch out a Battel, and do not fear but to provide Boys and Girls much faster than your Disciples can embroider them. I love Birds and Beasts as well as you, but am content to fancy them when they are really made. What do you think of Gilt Leather for Furniture? There's your pretty Hangings for a Chamber, and what is more, our own Country is the only Place in Europe where Work of that kind is tolerably done. Without minding your dusty Lessons I am this Minute going to Paul's Church-Yard to bespeak a Skreen and a Set of Hangings and am resolved to encourage the Manufacture of my Country.

Yours,

Sic, cum transierint mei Nullo cum strepitu dies, Plebeius moriar sereno Illi mors gratia inculcat, Qui, notus nimis omnibus, Ignotus moritur sibi — Seneca

I HAVE often wondered that the Jesus should contrive such a worthless Greatness for the Deliverer whom they expected, as to dress him up in external Pomp and Pageantry, and represent him to their Imagination, as making Havock amongst his Creatures, and acted with the poor Ambition of a Cesar or an Alexander. How much more illustrious doth he appear in his real Character, when considered as the Author of universal Benevolence among Men, as refining our Passions, exalting our Nature, giving us vast Ideas of Immortality, and teaching us a Contempt of that little showy Grandeur, wherein the Jesus made the Glory of their Messiah to consist.

Nothing (says Longinus) can be Great, the Contempt of which is Great. The Possession of Wealth and Riches cannot give a Man a Title to Greatness, because it is looked upon as a Greatness of Mind, to contemn these Gifts of Fortune, and to be above the Desire of them. I have therefore been inclined to think, that there are greater Men who lie concealed among the Species, than those who come out, and draw upon themselves the Eyes and Admiration of Mankind. Virgil would never have been heard of, had not his Domestick Misfortunes driven him out of his Obscurity, and brought him to Rome.

If we suppose that there are Spirits or Angels who look into the Ways of Men, as it is highly probable there are, both from Reason and Revelation, how different are the Notions which they entertain of us, from those which we are apt to form of one another? Were they to give us in their Catalogue of such Worthies as are now living, how different would it be from that, which any of our own Species would draw up?

We are dazzled with the Splendour of Titles, the Ostentation of Learning, the Noise of Vic-

² There was at this time a celebrated manufactory of tapestry at Chelsea stories, They, on the contrary, see the Philosopher in the Cottrice, who possesses his Soul in Patience and Thankfulness, under the Pressures of what little Minds call Poverty and Distress. They do not look for great Men at the Head of Armies or among the Pomps of a Court, but often find them out in Shades and Solitudes, in the private Walks and By paths of Life. The Living's Walk of a wise Man is more illustrious in their Sight, than the March of a General at the Head of a hundred thousand Men. A Contemplation of God's Works, a voluntary Act of Justice to our own Detriment, a generous Concern for the Good of Mankind, a pious Fear that is shed in Silence for the Misery of others, a private Desire or Resentment broken and subdued, in short, an unfeigned Exercise of Humility, or any other Virtue, are such Actions as are glorious in their Sight, and denominate Men great and reputable. The most famous among us are often looked upon with Pity, with Contempt, or with Indignation, while those who are most obscure among their own Species, are regarded with Love, with Approbation and Esteem.

The Moral of the present Speculation amounts to this, That we should not be led away by the Censure, and Applauses of Men, but consider the Figure that every Person will make, at that Time when Wisdom shall be justified of her Children, and nothing pass for Great or Illustrious, which is not an Ornament and Perfection to humane Nature.

The Story of Gyges the rich Lydian Monarch, is a memorable Instance to our present Purpose. The Oracle being asked by Gyges, who was the happiest Man, replied Aglaüs. Gyges, who expected to have heard himself named on this Occasion, was much surprized, and very curious to know who this Aglaüs should be. After much Enquiry he was found to be an obscure Countryman who employ'd all his Time in cultivating a Garden, and a few Acres of Land about his House.

Covales's agreeable Relation of this Story shall close this Day's Speculation.

Thus Aglaüs (a Man unknown to Men, But the Gods knew, and therefore told him then) Thus he'd obscurely live without a Name, Aglaüs, now consign'd to eternal Fame For Gyges, the rich King, ruck'd at a great, Presum'd at wise Apollo's Delphick Seat, Presum'd to ask, Oh thou, the whole World's Eye,

*See st thou a Man that happier is than I?
The God, who scorn'd to flatter Man, reply'd, Aglaüs happier is. But Gyges cry'd, In a proud Rage, Who can that Aglaüs be?
We've heard as yet of no such King as he And true it was, through the whole Earth around,*

*No King of such a Name was to be found Is some old Hero of that Name alive, Who his high Race does from the Gods derive?
Is it some mighty Gen'ral, that has done Wonders in Fight, and God-like Honours won?
Is it some Man of endless Wealth? said he None, none of these; who can this Aglaüs be?*

*After long Search, and vain Enquiries past,
In an obscure Arcadian Vale at last,
(The Arcadian Life has always slady been) Near Sopho's Town (which he but once had seen) Thus Aglaüs, who Monarchs envy'd, cry'd, If hose happy as the Gods steed Wits ess to Th is mighty Aglaüs was lab'ring found,
With his own Hands, in his own little Ground So, gracious God, (if it n ay lawful be Among these foolish Gods to mention thee)
So let me act, on such a private Stage,
The last d ill Scenes of my declining Age,
After long Toils and Voyages in vain,
This quiet Port let my toss'd Vessel gain,

I AM willing to postpone every thing, to do any the least Service for the Deserving and Unfortunate. Accordingly I have caused the following Letter to be inserted in my Paper the Moment that it came to my Hands, without altering one Tittle in an Account which the Lady relates so handsomely her self.

MR SPECTATOR,
'I flatter my self, you will not only pity, but, if possible, redress a Misfortune my self and several others of my Sex lie under. I hope you will not be offended, nor think I mean by this to justify my own imprudent Conduct, or expect You should. No! I am sensible how severely, in some of your former Papers, you have reproved Persons guilty of the like Mismangements. I was scarce sixteen, and, I may say without Vanity, Handsome, when courted by a false perjured Man, who, upon Promise of Marriage, rendered me the most unhappy of Women. After he had deluded me from my Parents, who were People of very good Fashion, in less than three Months he left me. My Parents would not see, nor hear from me and had it not been for a Servant, who had lived in our Family, I must certainly have perished for want of Bread. However, it pleased Providence, in a very short time, to alter my miserable Condition. A Gentleman saw me, liked me, and married me. My Parents were reconciled and I might be as happy in the Change of my Condition, as I was before miserable but for some things, that you shall know, which are insupportable to me and I am sure you have so much Honour and Compassion as to let those Persons know, in some of your Papers, how much they are in the wrong. I have been married near five Years, and do not know that in all that time I ever went abroad without my Husband's Leave and Approbation. I am obliged, through the Importunities of several of my Relations, to go abroad oftner than suits my Temper. Then it is,

'I labour under insupportable Agonies That Man, or ruther Monster, haunts every Place I go to Base Villain! By reason I will not admit his nauseous wicked Visits and Appointments, he strives all the ways he can to run me He left me destitute of Friend or Money, nor ever thought me worth enquiring after, till he unfortunately happened to see me in a Front Box, sparkling with Jewels Then his Passion returned Then the Hypocrite pretended to be a Penitent Then he practised all those Arts that helped before to undo me I am not to be deceived a second time by him I hate and abhor his odious Passion, and, as he plainly perceives it, either out of Spight or Diversion, he makes it his Business to expose me I never fail seeing him in all publick Company, where he is always most industriously spiteful He hath, in short, told all his Acquaintance of our unhappy Affair, they tell theirs, so that it is no Secret among his Comprions, which are numerous. They, to whom he tells it, think they have a Title to be very familiar If they bow to me, and I out of good Manners return it, then I am pester'd with Freedoms that are no ways agreeable to my self or Company If I turn my Eyes from them, or seem displeased, they sower upon it, and whisper the next Person, he his next, 'till I have at last the Eyes of the whole Company upon me Nay, they report abominable Falshoods, under that mistaken Notion, She that will grant Favours to one Man, will to a hundred I beg you will let those who are guilty, know, how ungenerous this way of Proceeding is I am sure he will know himself the Person aim'd at, and perhaps put a stop to the Insolence of others Cursed is the Fate of unhappy Women! that Men may boast and glory in those things that we must think of with Shame and Horror! You have the Art of making such odious Customs appear detestable For my Sake, and I am sure, for the Sake of several others, who dare not own it, but, like me, lie under the same Misfortunes, make it as infamous for a Man to boast of Favours or expose our Sex, as it is to take the Lie or a Box on the Ear, and not resent it.

*Your Constant Reader,
and Admirer,
LESBIA*

P S 'I am the more Impatient under this Misfortune, having receiv'd fresh Provocation, last Wednesday, in the Abbey

I entirely agree with the amiable and unfortunate LESBIA, that an Insult upon a Woman in her Circumstances, is as infamous in a Man, as a tame Behaviour when the Lie or a Buffet is given, which Truth, I shall beg leave of her to illustrate by the following Observation

It is a Mark of Cowardise passively to forbear resenting an Affront, the Resenting of which would lead a Man into Danger, it is no less a Sign of Cowardise to affront a Creature, that hath not Power to avenge it self Whatever Name therefore this ungenerous Man may bestow on the helpless Lady he hath injur'd, I shall not scruple to give him in return for it, the Appellation of Coward

A Man, that can so far descend from his Dignity, as to strike a Lady, can never recover his Reputation with either Sex, because no Provocation is thought strong enough to justify such Treatment from the Powerful towards the Weak. In the Circumstances, in which poor LESBIA is situated, she can appeal to no Man whatsoever to avenge an Insult, more grievous than a Blow If she could open her Mouth, the base Man knows, that a Husband, a Brother, a generous Friend would die to see her righted

A generous Mind, however enrag'd against an Enemy, feels its Resentments sink and vanish away, when the Object of its Wrath falls into its Power An estranged Friend, filled with Jealousie and Discontent towards a Bosom-Aquaintance, is apt to overflow with Tenderness and Remorse, when a Creature that was once dear to him, undergoes any Misfortune What Name then shall we give to his Ingratitude, (who forgetting the Favours he solicited with Fagerness, and receiv'd with Rapture) can insult the Miseries that he himself caused, and make Sport with the Pain to which he owes his greatest Pleasure? There is but one Being in the Creation whose Province it is to practise upon the Imbecillities of frail Creatures, and triumph in the Woes which his own Artifices brought about, and we well know, those who follow his Example, will receive his Reward

Leaving my fair Correspondent to the Direction of her own Wisdom and Modesty, and her Enemy, and his mean Accomplices, to the Compunction of their own Hearts I shall conclude this Paper with a memorable Instance of Revenge, taken by a Spanish Lady upon a guilty Lover, which may serve to show what violent Effects are wrought by the most tender Passion, when sower'd into Hatred, and may deter the Young and unwary from unlawful Love The Story, however Romantick it may appear, I have heard affirmed for a Truth.

Not many Years ago an English Gentleman, who in a Rencounter by Night in the Streets of Madrid had the Misfortune to kill his Man, fled into a Church-Porch for Sanctuary Leaning agunst the Door, he was surprized to find it open, and a glimmering Light in the Church He had the Courage to advance towards the Light, but was terribly startled at the sight of a Woman in White who ascended from a Grave with a bloody Knife in her Hand The Phantom marched up to him, and asked him what he did there He told her the Truth, without reserve, believing that he had met a Ghost Upon which, she spoke to him in the following Manner 'Stranger, thou art in my Power I am a Murderer as thou art Know then, that I am a Nun of a noble Family A base perjur'd Man undid me, and boasted of it I soon had him dispatched, but not content with the Murder, I have brib'd the Sexton to let me enter his Grave, and have now pluck'd out his False Heart from his Body, and thus I use a Traitor's Heart. At these Words she tore it in Pieces, and trampled it under her Feet

IT is highly laudable to pay Respect to Men who are descended from worthy Ancestors, not only out of Gratitude to those who have done Good to Mankind, but as it is an Encouragement to others to follow their Example. But this is an Honour to be received not demanded, by the Descendants of great Men and they who are apt to remind us of their Ancestors, only put us upon making Comparisons to their own Disadvantage. There is some Pretence for boasting of Wit, Beauty, Strength or Wealth, because the Communication of them may give Pleasure or Profit to others but we can have no Merit, nor ought we to claim any Respect because our Fathers acted well, whether we would or no.

The following Letter ridicules the Folly I have mentioned, in a new, and, I think, not disagreeable Light.

MR SPECTATOR,

'Were the Genealogy of every Family preserved, there would probably be no Man valued or despised on Account of his Birth. There is scarce a Beggar in the Streets who would not find himself lineally descended from some great Man nor any one of the highest Title who would not discover several base and indigent Persons among his Ancestors. It would be a pleasant Entertainment to see one Pedigree of Men appear together, under the same Characters they bore when they acted their respective Parts among the Living. Suppose therefore a Gentleman, full of his illustrious Family, should, in the same manner as Virgil makes Eneas look over his Descendants, see the whole Line of his Progenitors pass in a Review before his Eyes, and with how many varying Passions would he behold Shepherds and Soldiers, Statesmen and Artificers Princes and Beggars, walk in the Procession of five thousand Years! How would his Heart sink or flutter at the several Sports of Fortune in a Scene so diversified with Rags and Purple, Handicraft Tools and Scepters Ensigs of Dignity and Emblems of Disgrace and how would his Fears and Apprehensions, his Transports and Mortifications, succeed one another, as the Line of his Genealogy appeared bright or obscure?

'In most of the Pedigrees hung up in old Mansion Houses, you are sure to find the first in the Catalogue a great Statesman, or a Soldier with an honourable Commission. The Honest Artificer that begot him, and all his frugal Ancestors before him, are torn off from the Top of the Register and you are not left to imagine, that the noble Founder of the Family ever had a Father. Were we to trace many boasted Lines farther backwards, we should lose them in a Mob of Tradesmen or a Crowd of Rusticks, without 'hope of seeing them emerge again. Not unlike the old Appian Way, which after having run many Miles in Length, loses it self in a Bog.

'I lately made a Visit to an old Country Gentleman, who is very far gone in this sort of Fan Madness. I found him in his Study perusing an old Register of his Family, which he had just then discovered, as it was branched out in the Form of a Tree, upon a Skin of Parchment. Having the Honour to have some of his Blood in my Veins, he permitted me to cast my Eye over the Boughs of this venerable Plant and asked my Advice in the Reforming of some of the superfluous Branches.

'We passed slightly over three or four of our immediate Fore-fathers, whom we knew by Tradition, but were soon stopped by an Alderman of London, who, I perceived, made my Kinsman's Heart go pit-a-pit. His Confusion increased when he found the Alderman's Father to be a Graser, but he recovered his Fight upon seeing Justice of the Quorum at the end of his Titles. Things went on pretty well, as we threw our Eyes occasionally over the Tree, when unfortunately he perceived a Merchant Tailor perched on a Bough, who was said greatly to have increased the Estate he was just going to cut him off, if he had not seen George after the Name of his Son, who was recorded to have mortgaged one of the Manors his honest Father had purchased. A Weaver, who was burnt for his Religion in the Reign of Queen Mary, was pruned away without Mercy as was likewise a Yeoman, who died of a Fall from his own Cart. But great was our Triumph in one of the Blood who was beheaded for High Treason, which nevertheless was not a little allied by another of our Ancestors, who was hanged for stealing Sheep. The Expectations of my good Cousin were wonderfully rused by a Match into the Family of a Knight but unfortunately for us this Branch proved Barren. On the other hand Margery the Milk-maid being twined round a Bough, it flourished out into so many Shoots, and bent with so much Fruit that the old Gentleman was quite out of Countenance. To comfort me, under this Disgrace, he singled out a Branch ten times more fruitful than the other, which, he told me, he valued more than any in the Tree, and bade me be of good Comfort. This enormous Bough was a Graft out of a Welsh Heiress, with so many As's upon it that it might have made a little Grove by it self. From the Trunk of the Pedigree, which was chiefly composed of Labourers and Shepherds, arose a huge Sprout of Farmers this was branched out into Yeomen, and ended in a Sheriff of the County, who was knighted for his good Service to the Crown, in bringing up an Address. Several of the Names that seemed to disparage the Family, being looked upon as Mistakes, were lopped off as rotten or withered, as, on the contrary, no small Number appearing without any Titles, my Cousin, to supply the Defects of the Manuscript, added Esq. at the End of each of them.

'I labour under insupportable Agonies That Man, or rather Monster, haunts every Place I go to Base Villain! By reason I will not admit his nauseous wicked Visits and Appointments, he strives all the ways he can to ruin me He left me destitute of Friend or Money, nor ever thought me worth enquiring after, till he unfortunately happened to see me in a Front Box, sparkling with Jewels Then his Passion returned Then the Hypocrite pretended to be a Penitent Then he practised all those Arts that helped before to undo me I am not to be deceived a second time by him I hate and abhor his odious Passion, and, as he plainly perceives it, either out of Spight or Diversion, he makes it his Business to expose me I never fail seeing him in all publick Company, where he is always most industriously spiteful He hath, in short, told all his Acquaintance of our unhappy Affair they tell theirs, so that it is no Secret among his Companions, which are numerous They, to whom he tells it, think they have a Title to be very familiar If they bow to me, and I out of good Manners return it, then I am pester'd with Freedoms that are no ways agreeable to my self or Company If I turn my Eyes from them, or seem displeased, they sower upon it, and whisper the next Person, he his next, 'till I have at last the Eyes of the whole Company upon me Nay, they report abominable Falshoods, under that mistaken Notion, She that will grant Favours to one Man, will to a hundred I beg you will let those who are guilty know, how ungenerous this way of Proceeding is I am sure he will know himself the Person aim'd at, and perhaps put a stop to the Insolence of others Cursed is the Fate of unhappy Women! that Men may boast and glory in those things that we must think of with Shame and Horror! You have the Art of making such odious Customs appear delectable For my Sake, and I am sure, for the Sake of several others, who dare not own it, but, like me lie under the same Misfortunes, make it as infamous for a Man to boast of Favours or expose our Sex, as it is to take the Lie or a Box on the Ear, and not resent it.

*Your Constant Reader,
and Admirer,
LESBIA.*

P S 'I am the more Impatient under this Misfortune, having receiv'd fresh Provocation, last Wednesday, in the Abbey

I entirely agree with the amiable and unfortunate LESBIA, that an Insult upon a Woman in her Circumstances, is as infamous in a Man, as a tame Behaviour when the Lie or a Buffet is given, which Truth, I shall beg leave of her to illustrate by the following Observation

It is a Mark of Cowardise passively to forbear resenting an Affront, the Resenting of which would lead a Man into Danger, it is no less a Sign of Cowardise to affront a Creature, that hath not Power to avenge it self Whatever Name therefore this ungenerous Man may bestow on the helpless Lady he hath injur'd, I shall not scruple to give him in return for it, the Appellation of Coward

A Man, that can so far descend from his Dignity, as to strike a Lady, can never recover his Reputation with either Sex, because no Provocation is thought strong enough to justify such Treatment from the Powerful towards the Weak In the Circumstances, in which poor LESBIA is situated, she can appeal to no Man whatsoever to avenge an Insult, more grievous than a Blow If she could open her Mouth, the wise Man knows, that a Husband, a Brother, a generous Friend would die to see her righted

A generous Mind, however enrag'd against an Enemy, feels its Resentments sink and vanish away, when the Object of its Wrath falls into its Power An estranged Friend, filled with Jealousie and Discontent towards a Bosom-Acquaintance, is apt to overflow with Tenderness and Remorse, when a Creature, that was once dear to him, undergoes any Misfortune What Name then shall we give to his Ingratitude, (who forgetting the Favours he solicited with Eagerness, and receiv'd with Rapture) can insult the Miseries that he himself caused, and make Sport with the Pain to which he owes his greatest Pleasure? There is but one Being in the Creation whose Province it is to practise upon the Imbecillities of frail Creatures, and triumph in the Woes which his own Artifices brought about, and we well know, those who follow his Example, will receive his Reward

Leaving my fair Correspondent to the Direction of her own Wisdom and Modesty and her Enemy, and his mean Accomplices, to the Compunction of their own Hearts I shall conclude this Paper with a memorable Instance of Revenge taken by a Spanish Lady upon a guilty Lover, which may serve to show what violent Effects are wrought by the most tender Passion, when sower'd into Hatred, and may deter the Young and unwary from unlawful Love The Story, however Romantick it may appear, I have heard affirmed for a Truth.

Not many Years ago an English Gentleman, who in a Rencontre by Night in the Streets of Madrid had the Misfortune to kill his Man, fled into a Church-Porch for Sanctuary Leaning against the Door, he was surprized to find it open, and a glimmering Light in the Church He had the Courage to advance towards the Light but was terribly startled at the sight of a Woman in White who ascended from a Grave with a bloody Knife in her Hand The Phantom marched up to him and asked him what he did there He told her the Truth, without reserve, believing that he had met a Ghost Upon which she spoke to him in the following Manner 'Stranger, thou art in my Power I am a Murderer as thou art Know then, that I am a Nun of a noble Family A base perjur'd Man undid me, and boasted of it I soon had him dispatched but not content with the Murder, I have brib'd the Sexton to let me enter his Grave, and have now pluck'd out his False Heart from his Body, and thus I use a Traitor's Heart. At these Words she tore it in Pieces, and trampled it under her Feet

IT is highly laudable to pay Respect to Men who are descended from worthy Ancestors, not only out of Gratitude to those who have done Good to Mankind, but as it is an Encouragement to others to follow their Example. But this is an Honour to be receiv'd, not demand'd, by the Descendants of great Men, and they who are apt to remind us of their Ancestors, only put us upon making Comparisons to their own Disadvantage. There is some Pretence for boasting of Wit, Beauty, Strength or Wealth, because the Communication of them may give Pleasure or Profit to others; but we can have no Merit, nor ought we to claim any Respect, because our Fathers acted well, whether we would or no.

The following Letter ridicules the Folly I have mentioned, in a new, and, I think, not disagreeable Light.

MR SPECTATOR,

'Were the Genealogy of every Family preserved, there would probably be no Man valued or despis'd on Account of his Birth. There is scarce a Beggar in the Streets who would not find himself liberally descended from some great Man, nor any one of the highest Title, who would not discover several base and indigent Persons among his Ancestors. It would be a pleasant Entertainment to see one Pedigree of Men appear together, under the same Characters they bore when they acted their respective Parts among the Living. Suppose therefore a Gentleman, full of his illustrious Family, should, in the same manner as Virgil makes Aeneas look over his Descendants, see the whole Line of his Progenitors pass in a Review before his Eyes, and with how many varying Passions would he behold Shepherds and Soldiers, Statesmen and Artificers, Princes and Beggars, walk in the Procession of five thousand Years! How would his Heart sink or flutter at the several Sports of Fortune in a Scene so diversified with Rags and Purple, Handicraft Tools and Scepters, Ensigns of Dignity and Emblems of Disgrace; and how would his Fears and Apprehensions, his Transports and Mortifications, succeed one another, as the Line of his Genealogy appeared bright or obscure?

IT is reckoned a Piece of Ill breeding for one Man to engross the whole Talk to himself For this Reason, since I keep three Visiting-Days in the Week, I am content now and then to let my Friends put in a Word There are several Advantages hereby accruing both to my Readers and my self As first, Young and modest Writers have an Opportunity of getting into Print Again, The Town enjoys the Pleasure of Variety, and Posterity will see the Humour of the present Age, by the help of these little Lights into private and domestick Life The Benefits I receive from thence, are such as these I gain more Time for future Speculations, pick up Hints which I improve for the publick Good give Advice redress Grievances and, by leaving commodious Spaces between the several Letters that I print, furnish out a Spectator with little Labour and great Ostentation

MR SPECTATOR,

'I was mightily pleased with your Speculation of Friday Your Sentiments are Noble, and the whole worked up in such a manner, as cannot but strike upon every Reader But give me leave to make this Remark That while you write so Pathetically on Contentment, and a retired Life, you soothe the Passion of Melancholy, and depress the Mind from Actions truly Glorious Titles and Honours are the Reward of Virtue We therefore ought to be affected with them And tho' light Minds are too much puffed up with exterior Pomp yet I cannot see why it is not as truly Philosophical to admire the glowing Ruby, or the sparkling Green of an Emerald, as the funter and less permanent Beauties of a Rose or a Myrtle If there are Men of extraordinary Capacities who lie concealed from the World, I should impute it to them as a Blot in their Character, did not I believe it owing to the Merit of their Fortune rather than of their Spirit Cowley, who tells the Story of Aglaia with so much Pleasure, was no Stranger to Courts, nor insensible of Praise

'Tho' you have formerly made Eloquence the Subject of one or more of your Papers, I do not remember that you ever consider'd it as possessed by a Set of People, who are so far from making Quintilian's Rules their Practice, that, I dare say for them, they never heard of such an Author, and yet are no less Masters of it than Tully or Demosthenes among the Ancients, or whom you please amongst the Moderns The Persons I am speaking of are our common Beggars about this Town and that what I say is true, I appeal to any Man who has a Heart one Degree softer than a Stone As for my part, who don't pretend to more Humanity than my Neighbours, I have oftentimes gone from my Chambers with Money in my Pocket, and returned to them not only Penniless, but destitute of a Farthing, without bestowing of it any other way than on these seeming Objects of Pity In short, I have seen more Eloquence in a Look from one of these despicable Creatures, than in the Eye of the fairest She I ever saw, yet no one is a greater Admirer of that Sex than my self What I have to desire of you is, to lay down some Directions in order to guard against these powerful Orators, or else I know nothing to the contrary but I must my self be forced to leave the Profession of the Law, and endeavour to get the Qualifications necessary to that more profitable one of Begging But in which soever of these two Capacities I shine, I shall always desire to be your constant Reader, and ever will be

SIR,

'Upon Reading a Spectator last Week, where Mrs Fanny Fickle submitted the Choice of a Lover for Life to your decisive Determination, and imagining I might claim the Favour of your Advice in an Affair of the like, but much more difficult Nature, I called for Pen and Ink, in order to draw the Characters of Seven Humble Servants, whom I have equally encouraged for some time But this while I was reflecting on the agreeable Subject, and contriving an advantageous Description of the dear Person I was most inclined to favour, I happened to look into my Glass The sight of the Small Pox, out of Women, we find, according to the different Characters or Circumstances wherein they are left, that Widows may be divided into those who rouse Love, and those who rouse Compassion.

But not to ramble from this Subject, there are two Things in which consists chiefly the Glory of a Widow. The Love of her deceased Husband, and the Care of her Children. To which may be added a third arising out of the former, Such a prudent Conduct as may do Honour to both.

A Widow possessed of all these three Qualities, makes not only a virtuous but a sublime Character.

There is something so great and so generous in this State of Life, when it is accompanied with all its Virtues, that it is the Subject of one of the finest among our modern Tragedies in the Person of Andromache, and hath met with an universal and deserved Applause, when introduced upon our English Stage by Mr Philips.

The most memorable Widow in History is Queen Artemisia, who not only erected the famous Mausoleum, but drank up the Ashes of her dead Lord, thereby enclosing them in a nobler Monument than that which she had built, though deservedly esteemed one of the Wonders of Architecture.

This last Lady seems to have had a better Title to a second Husband than any I have read of, since not one Dust of her First was returning. Our modern Heroines might think a Husband a very bitter Draught and would have good Reason to complain, if they might not accept of a second Partner, till they had taken such a troublesome Method of losing the Memory of the first.

I shall add to these illustrious Examples out of ancient Story, a remarkable Instance of the Delicacy of our Ancestors in Relation to the State of Widowhood, as I find it recorded in Cowell's Interpreter. At First and West-Laborne, in the County of Berks, if a Customary Tenant die, the Widow shall have what the Law calls her Free Bench in all his Copyhold Lands, dum sola & casta fuerit that is, while she lives single and chaste but if she commit Incontinency she forfeits her Estate. Yet if she will come into the Court riding backward upon a black Ram, with his Tail in her Hand, and say the Words following, the Steward is bound by the Custom to re-admit her to her Free-Bench.

Here I am,
Riding upon a Black Ram,
Like a Whore as I am,
And, for my Crancum Crancum, Have lost my Bincum Bancum,
And, for my Tail's Game,
Have done this worldly Shame,
Therefore, I pray you Mr Steward, let me have my Land again.

The like Custom there is in the Manor of Torre in Devonshire, and other Parts of the West.

It is not impossible but I may in a little Time present you with a Register of Berkshire Ladies and other Western Dames, who rode publicly upon this Occasion and I hope the Town will be entertained with a Cavalcade of Widows.

It must be owned that Fear is a very powerful Passion, since it is esteemed one of the greatest of Virtues to subdue it. It being implanted in us for our Preservation, it is no Wonder it sticks close to us, as long as we have any thing we are willing to preserve. But as Life, and all its Enjoyments, would be scarce worth the keeping, if we were under a perpetual Dread of losing them, it is the Business of Religion and Philosophy to free us from all unnecessary Anxieties, and direct our Fear to its proper Object.

If we consider the Painfulness of this Passion, and the violent Effects it produces, we shall see how dangerous it is to give way to it upon slight Occasions. Some have frightened themselves into Madness, others have given up their Lives to these Apprehensions. The Story of a Man who grew grey in the Space of one Night's Anxiety is very famous.

O1 Nox, quam longa es, quæ facis una Senem

These Apprehensions, if they proceed from a Consciousness of Guilt are the sad Warnings of Reason and may excite our Pity, but admit of no Remedy. When the Hand of the Almighty is visibly lifted against the Impious, the Heart of mortal Man cannot withstand him. We have this Passion sublimely represented in the Punishment of the Egyptians, tormented with the Plague of Darkness, in the Apoecryphal Book of Wisdom ascribed to Solomon.

For when unrighteous Men thought to oppress the holy Nation, they being shut up in their Houses, the Prisoners of Darkness, and fetter'd with the Bonds of a long Night, by there exiled from the eternal Providence. For while they supposed to lye hid in their secret Sins, they were scattered under a dark Veil of Forgetfulness, being horribly astonished and troubled with strange Apparitions. — For Wickedness, condemned by her own Witness, is very timorous and being oppressed with Conscience, always forecasteth grievous things. For Fear is nothing else but a betraying of the Succours which Reason offereth. — For the whole World shined with clear Light, and none were hindered in their Labour. Over them only was spread a heavy Night, an Image of that Darkness which should afterwards receive them but yet were they unto themselves more grievous than the Darkness.

To Fear, so justly grounded, no Remedy can

As nothing illustrates better than Example, I shall here present my Reader with a Letter of Pedantick Humour, which was written by a young Gentleman of the University to his Friend, on the same Occasion, and from the same Place, as the lively Epistle published in my last Spectator

Dear Chum,

'It is now the third Watch of the Night, the 'greatest Part of which I have spent round a 'capacious Bowl of China, filled with the choicest
'Products of both the Indies I was placed at a 'quadrangular Table, diametrically opposite to the 'Mace-bearer The Visage of that venerable 'Herald was, according to Custom, most gloriously
'illuminated on this joyful occasion The 'Mayor and Aldermen, those Pillars of our Con'stitution, began to totter, and if any one at the 'Board could have so far articulated, as to have 'demanded intelligibly a Reinforcement of Liquor,
'the whole Assembly had been by this time ex'tended under the Table

'The Celebration of this Night's Solemnity was 'opened by the Obstruperous Joy of Drummers,
'who, with their Parchment Thunder, gave a 'signal for the Appearance of the Mob under their 'several Classes and Denominations They were 'quickly joined by the melodious Clank of Mar-
'row bone and Cleaver, whilst a Chorus of Bells
'filled up the Consort A Pyramid of Stack-'Faggots cheered the Hearts of the Populace with 'the Promise of a Blaze The Guns had no sooner 'uttered the Prologue, but the Heavens were 'brightened with artificial Meteors, and Stars of 'our own making and all the High-street lighted
'up from one End to another, with a Galaxy of 'Candles We collected a Largess for the Multi'tude, who toppled Cleemosynary till they grew

The Pile, still big with undiscover'd Stores,
The Turcan Pile did last its Freight disclose, Where the proud Tops of Rome's rev'ling Towers rise, Where once Giants sally, and invade the Skies

Whilst a vast Multitude expect the Tin e,
And their tur'd Eyes the lofty Mountain climb,
A thousand Iron Mouths their Voices try,
And under e it a dreadful Harmony,
In treble Notes the small Artillery plays,
The deep-mouth'd Cannon bellows in the Bass
The lab'ring Pile now heaves, and having giv'n Proofs of its Triumphant sig's in Flames to Heav'n

The Clouds envelop'd Heav'n from Human Sight,

Quench'd ev'ry Star, and put out ev'ry Light,
And Real Thunder grumbles in the Skies,
And in disdainful Murmurs Rome defies, Nor doth its unprov'd Challenge Rome decline,
But whilst both Parties in full Consort join, While Heav'n and Earth in Rival Peals resound,

The dreadful Cracks the Hearer's Sense confound,

Whether the Claps of Thunderbolts they hear,
Or else the Burst of Cannon rounds their Ear, Whether the Claps rag'd by struggling Metals rent,
Or struggling Clouds in Roman Metals pent But O, my Muse, the whole Adventure tell,
As ev'ry Accident in order fell

Full Groves of Trees the Hadrian Tower surround,

Fictitious Trees with Paper Garlands crown'd, These know no Spruce, but when their Bodies sprout

In Fire, and shoot their gilded Blossoms out,
When blazing Leaves appear above their Head,
And into branching flames their Bodies spread Whilst real Thunder splits the Ironament, And Heav'n's who's Roof in one vast Cleft is rent,
The three-fold Tongue amidst the Rapture tolls,

Then drops and on the Avry Surret falls
The Trees now kindle, and the Garland burns,
And thousand Thunderbolts for one returns Brigades of burning Archers upward fly, Bright Spears and shining Spear-men mount on high,

Flash in the Clouds, and glitter in the Sky
A seven fold Shield of Spheres doth Heav'n defend,

And back again the blunted Weapons send,
Unwillingly they fall, and dropping down, Pour out their Souls, their sulph'rous Souls, and groan

With Joy, great Sir, we view'd this pompous Show,

While Heav'n, that sate Spectator still 'till
now,

It self turn'd Actor proud to Pleasure you And so 'tis fit, when Leo's Fires appear,

That Heav'n at self should turn an Engincer,
That Heav'n at self should all its Wonders show,
And Orbs above consent with Orbs below

MR SPECTATOR,
YOU having, in your two last Spectators, given the Town a couple of Remarkable Letters, in very different Styles I take this Opportunity to offer to you some Remarks upon the Epistolary way of writing in Verse. This is a Species of Poetry by it self, and has not so much as been hinted at in any of the Arts of Poetry, that have ever fallen into my Hands Neither has it in any Age, or any Nation been so much cultivated, as the other several kinds of Poetrie. A Man of Genius may, if he pleases, write Letters in Verse upon all manner of Subjects, that are capable of being embellish'd with Wit and Language, and may render them new and agreeable by giving the proper Turn to them. But in speaking at present, of Epistolary Poetry, I would be understood to mean only such Writings in this Kind, as have been in Use amongst the Ancients and have been copied from them by some Moderns. These may be reduced into two Classes. In the one I shall range Love Letters, Letters of Friendship, and Letters upon mournful Occasions. In the other I shall place such Epistles in Verse, as may properly be called Familiar, Critical, and Moral to which may be added Letters of Mirth and Humour. Ours for the first, and Horace for the latter, are the best Originals we have left.

He that is ambitious of succeeding in the Ovidian way, should first examine his Heart well, and feel whether his Passions (especially those of the gentler kind) play easie since it is not his Wit, but the Delicacy and tenderness of his Sentiments, that will affect his Readers.
His Versification likewise should be soft, and all his Numbers flowing and querulous.

The Qualifications requisite for writing Epistles, after the Model given us by Horace, are of a quite different Nature. He that would excel in this kind must have a good Fund of strong Masculine Sense. To this there must be joined a thorough knowledge of Mankind, together with an Insight into the Business, and the pre-valing Humours of the Age. Our Author must have his Mind well seasoned with the finest Precepts of Morality, and be filled with nice Reflections upon the bright and the dark sides of human Life. He must be a Master of refined Raillery, and understand the Delicacies, as well as the Absurdities of Conversation. He must have a lively Turn of Wit, with an easie and concise manner of Expression. Every thing he says, must be in a free and disengag'd manner.
He must be guilty of nothing that betrays the 'Air of a Recluse, but appear a Man of the World throughout His Illustrations, his Compositions, and the greatest part of his Images must be drawn from common Life Strokes of Satyr and Criticism, as well as Panegyrick, judiciously thrown in (and as it were by the by) give a wonderful List and Ornament to Compositions of this kind But let our Poet, while he writes Epistles, though never so familiar, still remember that he writes in Verse, and must for that reason have a more than ordinary care not to fall into Prose, and a vulgar Diction, excepting where the Nature and Humour of the Thing does necessarily require it. In this Point Horace hath been thought by some Critics to be sometimes careless, as well as too negligent of his Versification, of which he seems to have been sensible himself

'All I have to add is, that both these Manners of Writing may be made as entertaining, in their Way, as any other Species of Poetry, if undertaken by Persons duly qualify'd, and the latter sort may be managed so as to become in a peculiar manner Instructive I am, &c

I shall add an Observation or two to the Remarks of my ingenious Correspondent, and, in the first place, take Notice, that Subjects of the most sublime Nature are often treated in the Epistolary way with Advantage, as in the famous Epistle of Horace to Augustus The Poet surprises us with his Pomp, and seems rather betrayed into his Subject, than to have aimed at it by Design He appears like the Visit of a King Incognito, with a mixture of Familiarity, and Grandeur In Works of this kind when the Dignity of the Subject hurries the Poet into Descriptions and Sentiments, seemingly unpremeditated, by a sort of Inspiration, it is usual for him to recollect himself, and fall back gracefully into the natural Style of a Letter

I might here mention an Epistolary Poem, just published by Mr Eusden on the King's Accession to the Throne Wherein, amongst many other noble and beautiful Strokes of Poetry, his Reader may see this Rule very happily observed

THE following Letter having in it some Observations out of the common Road, I shall make it the Entertainment of this Day

MR SPECTATOR,

'The common Topics against the Pride of Man which are laboured by florid and declamatory Writers, are taken from the Baseness of his Original, the Imperfections of his Nature, or the short Duration of those Goods in which he makes his Boast. Though it be true that we can have nothing in us that ought to raise our Vanity, yet a Consciousness of our own Merit may be sometimes laudable. The Folly therefore lies here. We are apt to pride our selves in worthless, or perhaps shameful Things and, on the other hand, count that disgraceful which is our truest Glory

'Hence it is, that the Lovers of Praise take wrong Measures to attain it. Would a vain Man consult his own Heart, he would find that if others knew his Weaknesses as well as he himself doth, he could not have the Impudence to expect the publick Esteem. Pride therefore flows from want of Reflection, and Ignorance of our selves. Knowledge and Humility come upon us together. The proper way to make an Estimate of our selves, is to consider seriously what it is we value or despise in others. A Man who boasts of the Goods of Fortune, a gay Dress or a new Title, is generally the Mark of Ridicule. We ought therefore not to admire in our selves, what we are so ready to laugh at in other Men.

'Much less can we with Reason pride ourselves in those things, which at some time of our Life we shall certainly despise. And yet, if we will give our selves the Trouble of looking back ward and forward on the several Changes, which we have already undergone and hereafter must try, we shall find that the greater Degrees of our Knowledge and Wisdom, serve only to shew us our own Imperfections.

'As we rise from Childhood to Youth, we look with Contempt on the Toys and Trifles which our Hearts have hitherto been set upon. When we advance to Manhood, we are held wise in proportion to our Shame and Regret for the Rashness and Extravagance of Youth. Old Age fills us with mortifying Reflections upon a Life, mis-spent in the Pursuit of anxious Wealth or uncertain Honour. Agreeable to this Gradation of Thought in this Life, it may be reasonably supposed, that in a future State, the Wisdom, the Experience, and the Maxims of old Age, will be looked upon by a separate Spirit in much the same Light, as an ancient Man now sees the little Follies and Toys of Infants. The Pomps, the Honours, the Policies, and Arts of mortal Men, will be thought as trifling as Hobby-Horses, Mock Battles, or any other Sports that now em-

'ploy all the Cunning, and Strength, and Ambition of rational Beings from four Years old to nine or ten

'If the Notion of a gradual Rise in Beings, from the meanest to the most High be not a vain Imagination, it is not improbable that an Angel looks down upon a Man as a Man doth upon a Creature which approaches the nearest to the rational Nature. By the same Rule (if I may indulge my Fancy in this Particular) a superior Brute looks with a kind of Pride on one of an inferior Species. If they could reflect, we might imagine from the Gestures of some of them that they think themselves the Sovereigns of the World, and that all things were made for them. Such a Thought would not be more absurd in Brute Creatures, than one which Men are apt to entertain, namely, That all the Stars in the Firmament were created only to please their Eyes and amuse their Imaginations. Mr Dryden, in his Tale of the Cock and the Fox, makes a Speech for his Hero the Cock, which is a pretty Instance for this Purpose,

*Then turning, said to Parrot, See, my Dear, How late at Nature late adorn'd the Year,
How the pale Primrose and the Violet spring,
And hark! ere their Fancies, curs'd to sing
All these are over, and I! What Pleasure see Man strut upon two Legs, and do as we*

'What I would observe from the Whole is this, That we ought to value our selves upon those Things only which superior Beings think valuable, since that is the only way for us not to sink in our own Esteem hereafter

No 622] FRIDAY, November 19, 1714 [

—Fallentis Servita Vita—Hor

MR SPECTATOR,

'IN a former Speculation you have observed, I that true Greatness doth not consist in that Pomp and Noise wherein the Generality of Mankind are apt to place it. You have there taken Notice, that Virtue in Obscurity often appears more illustrious in the Eye of superior Beings, than all that passes for Grandeur and Magnificence among Men

'When we look back upon the History of those who have born the Parts of Kings, Statesmen, or Commanders they appear to us stripped of those outside Ornaments that dazzled their Contemporaries, and we regard their Persons as great or little, in Proportion to the Luminence of their Virtues or Vices. The wise Sayings generous Sentiments, or disinterested Conduct of a Philosopher under many Circumstances of Life, set him higher in our Esteem than the mighty Potentates of the Earth, when we view them both through the long Prospect of many Ages. Were the Memoirs of an obscure Man, who lived up to the Dignity of his Nature, and according to the Rules of Virtue, to be hid before us, we should find nothing in such a Character which 'might not set him on a Level with Men of the highest Stations. The following Extract out of the private Papers of an honest Country Gentleman will set this Matter in a clear Light. Your Reader will perhaps conceive a greater Idea of him from these Actions done in Secret, and without a Witness, than of those which have drawn upon them the Admiration of Multitudes

MEMOIRS

"In my 22d Year I found a violent Affection for my Cousin Charles's Wife growing upon me, wherein I was in danger of succeeding if I had not upon that Account begun my Travels into foreign Countries.

"A little after my Return into England, at a private Meeting with my Uncle James, I resolved the Office of his Estate, and prevailed upon him not to disinherit his Son Me.

"Me Never to tell this to Me, lest he should think hardly of his deceased Father though he continues to speak ill of me for this very Reason

"Prevented a cardious Law-suit between my Nephew Harry and his Mother, by allowing her under-hand, out of my own Pocket, so much Money yearly as the Dispute was about

"Procured a Penance for a young Divine, who is Sister's Son to the good Man who was my Tutor, and hath been dead Twenty Years

"Gave ten Pounds to poor Mrs —, my Friend H—'s Widow

"Me To retrench one Dish at my Table, till I have fetched it up again

"Me To repair my House and finish my Gardens in order to employ poor People after Harvest time.

"Ordered John to let out Goodman N—'s Sheep that were poisoned, by Night but not to let his fellow-Servants know it

"Prevailed upon M T Esq, not to take the Law of the Farmer's Son for shooting a Partridge, and to give him his Gun again.

"Paid the Apothecary for curing an old Woman that confessed her self a Witch

"Gave away my favourite Dog for biting a Beggar

"Made the Minister of the Parish and a White Justice of one Mind by putting them upon examining their Notions to one another

"Me To turn off Peter for shooting a Doe while she was eating Acorns out of his Hand

"When my Neighbour Jol n, who hath often injured me, comes to make his Request to Morrow

"Me I have forgiven him

"Laid up my Charriot and sold my Horses, to relieve the Poor in a Scarcity of Corn

"In the same Year remitted to my Tenants a Fifth Part of their Rents

"As I was going to bed, I fell into a Thought that worried my Heart and chail, I hope, be the better for it as long as I live

"Me To charge my Son in private to erect no Monument for me, but not to put this in my last Will

I AM obliged to my Friend, the Love Casuist,² for the following Curious Piece of Antiquity, which I shall communicate to the Publick in his own Words.

MR SPECTATOR,
You may remember, that I lately transmitted to you an Account of an ancient Custom, in the Manors of East and West-Enborne, in the County of Berks, and elsewhere. If a Customary Tenant die, the Widow shall have what the Law calls her Free-Bench in all his Copyhold Lands, dum sola et casta fuerit, that is, while she lives single and chaste, but if she commits Incontinency, she forfeits her Estate. Yet if she will come into the Court and go back ward upon a Black Ram, with his Tail in her Hand and say the Words following, the Steward is bound by the Custom to re-admit her to her Free Bench.

*Here I am,
Riding upon a Black Ram,
Like a Whore as I am,
And, for my Crincum Crancum Have lost my Bincum Buncum,
And, for my Tail's Game,
Have done this worldly Shan e, Therefore I pray you Mr Steward, let me have my Land again*

After having informed you that my Lord Coke observes, that this is the most frail and slippery tenure of any in England, I shall tell you, since the Writing of that Letter, I have, according to my Promise, been at great Pains in searching out the Records of the Black Ram, and have at last met with the Proceedings of the Court-Baron, held in that Behalf, for the Space of a whole Day. The Record saith, that a strict Inquisition having been made into the Right of the Tenants to their several Estates, by a crafty old Steward, he found that many of the Lords of the Manor were, by default of the several Widows, forfeited to the Lord, and accordingly would have enter'd on the Premises Upon which the good Women demanded the Benefit of the Ram. The Steward, after having perused their several Pleas, adjourn'd the Court to Barnaby bright,³ that they might have Day enough before them.

The Court being set, and filled with a great Concourse of People, who came from all Parts to see the Solemnity, the first who entered was the Widow Frontly, who had made her Appearance in the last Year's Cavalcade. The Register observes, that finding it an easy Pad-Ram, and foreseeing she might have further Occasion for it, she purchased it of the Steward.

Mrs Sarah Dainty, Relict of Mr John Dainty, (who was the greatest Prude in the Parish) came next in the Procession. She at first made some Difficulty of taking the Tail in her Hand, and was observed in pronouncing the Form of Penance, to soften the two most emphatical Words into Cincum Clancum. But the Steward took care to make her speak plain English before he would let her have her Land again.

The third Widow that was brought to this worldly Shame, being mounted upon a vicious Ram, had the Misfortune to be thrown by him, upon which she hoped to be excused from going thro' the rest of the Ceremony. But the Steward being well versed in the Law, observed very wisely upon this Occasion, that the breaking of the Rope does not hinder the Execution of the Criminal.

The fourth Lady upon Record was the Widow Ogle, a famous Coquette, who had kept half a Score young Fellows off and on for the Space of two Years but having been more kind to her Carter John, she was introduced with the Huzzar's of all her Lovers about her.

Mrs Sable appearing in her Weeds, which were very new and fresh, and of the same Colour with her whimsical Palfrey, made a very decent Figure in the Solemnity.

Another, who had been summoned to make her Appearance, was excused by the Steward, as well knowing in his Heart, that the good Squire himself had qualified her for the Ram.

Mrs Quack having nothing to object against the Indictment, pleaded her Belly. But it was remembered that she made the same Excuse the Year before. Upon which the Steward observ'd, that she might so contrive it, as never to do the Service of the Manor.

The Widow Idget being cited into Court, insisted that she had done no more since the Death of her Husband, than what she used to do in his Life-time, and withal desir'd Mr Steward to consider his own Wife's Case, if he should chance to die before her.

The next in order was a Dowager of a very corpulent Make, who would have been excused as not finding any Ram that was able to carry her upon which the Steward commuted her Punishment, and ordered her to make her Entry upon a black Ox.

The Widow Maskwell, a Woman who had long lived with a most unblemished Character, having turned off her old Chamber-maid in a Pet, was by that revengeful Creature brought in upon the black Ram Nine times the same Day.

Several Widows of the Neighbourhood, being brought upon their Tryal, they shew'd that they did not hold of the Manor, and were discharged accordingly.

³ Then the 11th, now the 22nd of June, longest day of the year

A pretty young Creature who closed the Procession, came smiling in, with so bewitching an Air, that the Steward was oblig'd to cast a Sheep's Eye upon her, and married her within a Month after the Death of his Wife.

N^o B Mrs Teuchow appeared, according to Summons, but had nothing laid to her Charge having liv'd irreproachably since the Decease of her Husband who left her a Widow in the Sixty ninth Year of her Age

MANKIND is divided into two Parts, the Busy and the Idle. The Busy World may be divided into the Virtuous and the Vicious. The Vicious again into the Covetous, the Ambitious, and the Sensual. The Idle Part of Mankind are in a State inferior to any one of these. All the other are engaged in the Pursuit of Happiness, though often mispleed, and are therefore more likely to be attentive to such Means, as shall be proposed to them for that End. The Idle, who are neither wise for this World nor the next, are emphatically called by Dr Tillotson, Fools at large. They propose to themselves no End, but run adrift with every Wind. Advice therefore would be but thrown away upon them since they would scarce take the Pains to read it. I shall not fatigue any of this worthless Tribe with a long Haringue, but will leave them with this short Saying of Plato, that Labour is preferable to Idleness, as Bragiantes to Idlers.

The Pursuits of the Active Part of Mankind, are either in the Paths of Religion and Virtue, or, on the other Hand, in the Roads to Wealth, Honours or Pleasure. I shall therefore compare the Pursuits of Avarice, Ambition and sensual Delight, with their opposite Virtues and shall consider which of these Principles engages Men in a Course of the greatest Labour, Suffering and Acquiescence. Most Men, in their cool Reasonings, are willing to allow that a Course of Virtue will in the End be rewarded the most amply but represent the Way to it as rugged and narrow. If therefore it can be made appear, that Men struggle through as many Troubles to be miserable, as they do to be happy, my Readers may perhaps be persuaded to be Good, when they find they shall lose nothing by it.

I start, for Avarice. The Miser is more Industrious than the Saint. The Pains of getting, the Fears of losing, and the Inability of enjoying his Wealth have been the Mark of Suffer in all Ages. Were his Repentance upon his Neglect of a good Bargain, his Sorrow for being over-reached his Hope of improving a Sum, and his Fear of falling into Want, directed to their proper Objects they would make so many different Christian Graces and Virtues. He may apply to himself a great Part of St Paul's Catalogue of Sufferings. In journeying after in Perils of Water, in Perils of Robbers, in Perils of False Brethren. In Weariness and Pain, in Sleeplessness, in Hunger and Thirst, in Fastings of course. At how much less Expence might he lay up to himself Treasures in Heaven, or if I may in this Place, be allowed to add the Saying of a great Philosopher he may proven suel Possessions, as fear, cold, or Arms, nor Men, nor Jove himself.

In the second Place if we look upon the Toils of Ambition, in the same Light as we have considered those of Avarice, we shall readily own that far less Trouble is requisite to gain lasting Glory, than the Power and Reputation of a few Years or in other Words, we may with more Ease deserve Honour, than obtain it. The Ambitious Man should remember Cardinal De Caster's Complaint. 'Had I served God with the same Application, wherewith I served my King, he would not have forsaken me in my old Age.' The Cardinal here softens his Ambition by the specious Pretence of serving His King. Whereas his Words in the proper Construction, imply, that if instead of being acted by Ambition, he had been acted by Religion, he should have now felt the Comforts of it, when the whole World turned its Back upon him.

Thirdly, Let us compare the Pains of the Sensual, with those of the Virtuous and see which are heavier in the Balance. It may seem strange, at the first View, that the Men of Pleasure should be advised to change their Course, because they lead a painful Life. Yet when we see them so active and vigilant in quest of Delight under so many Disquiets, and the Sport of such various Passions let them answer, as they can, if the Pains they undergo, do not outweigh their Enjoyments. The Infidelities on the one Part between the two Sexes, and the Cuprices on the other the Debauchment of Reason, the Pangs of Expectation the Disappointments in Possession, the Stings of Remorse, the Vanities and Vexations attending even the most refined Delights that make up this Business of Life, render it so silly and uncomfortable, that no Man is thought wise till he hath got over it, or happy, but in proportion as he hath cleared himself from it.

The Sum of all is this. Man is made in active Being. Whether he walk in the Paths of Virtue or Vice, he is sure to meet with many Difficulties to prove his Patience, and excite his Industry. The same if not greater Labour, is required in the Service of Vice and Folly, as of Virtue and Wisdom. And he hath this easy Choice left him, whether with the Strength he is Master of, he will purchase Happiness or Repentance.

I HAVE seen a little Work of a learned Man, consisting of extemporary Speculations, which owed their Birth to the most trifling Occurrences of Life His usual Method was, to write down any sudden Start of Thought which arose in his

'Soul, sunk into the State of Sloth and Indolence, it is also necessary that there be an uncommon Pleasure annexed to the first Appearance of Truth in the Mind. This Pleasure being exquisite for the Time it lasts, but transient, it thereby comes to pass that the Mind grows into an Indifference to its former Notions, and passes on after new Discoveries, in hope of repeating the Delight. It is with Knowledge as with Wealth, the Pleasure of which lies more in making endless Additions, than in having a Review of our old Store. There are some Inconveniences that follow this Temper, if not guarded against particularly this, that through a too great Eagerness of something new we are many times impatient of staying long enough upon a Question that requires some time to resolve it, or, which is worse, persuade our selves that we are Masters of the Subject before we are so, only to be at the Liberty of going upon a fresh Scene in Mr. Lock's Words, We see a little, presume a great deal, and so jump to the Conclusion.

'A further Advantage of our Inclination for Novelty, as at present circumstantiated, is, that it annihilates all the boasted Distinctions among Mankind. Look not up with Envy to those above thee Sounding Titles, stately Buildings, fine Gardens, gilded Chariots, rich Equipages, what are they? They dazzle every one but the Possessor. To him that is accustomed to them they are cheap and regardless Things. They supply him not with brighter Images or more sublime Satisfaction than the plain Man may have, whose small Estate will just enable him to support the Charge of a simple unencumbered Life. He enters heedless into his Rooms of State, as you or I do under our poor Sheds. The noble Paintings and costly Furniture are lost on him he sees them not. As how can it be otherwise, when by Custom, a Fabrick infinitely more grand and finish'd, that of the Universe stands unobserved by the Inhabitants, and the everlasting Lamps of Heaven are lighted up in vain, for any Notice that Mortals take of them? Thanks to indulgent Nature, which not only placed her Children originally upon a Level, but still, by the Strength of this Principle, in a great Measure preserves it, in spite of all the Care of a Man, to introduce artificial Distinctions.

'To add no more, Is not this Fondness for Novelty, which makes us out of Conceit with all we already have, a convincing Proof of a future State? Either Man was made in vain, or this is not the only World he was made for. For there cannot be a greater Instance of Vanity, than that to which Man is liable to be deluded from the Cradle to the Grave with fleeting Shadows of Happiness. His Pleasures, and those not considerable neither, die in the Possession, and fresh Enjoyments do not rise fast enough to fill up half his Life with Satisfaction. When I see Persons sick of themselves any longer than they are called away by something that is of Force to chain down the present Thought when I see them hurry from Country to Town, and then from the Town back again into the Country, continually shifting Postures, and placing Life in all the different Lights they can think of,

'Surely, say I to my self, Life is vain, and the Man beyond Expression stupid or prejudic'd, who from the Variety of Life cannot gather, He is designed for Immortality.'

THE following Account, which came to my Hands some time ago, may be no disagreeable Entertainment to such of my Readers, as have tender Hearts and nothing to do

MR SPECTATOR,

'A Friend of mine died of a Fever last Week, which he caught by walking too late in a dewy Evening amongst his Reapers. I must inform you that his greatest Pleasure was in Husbandry and Gardening. He had some Humours which seem'd inconsistent with that good Sense he was otherwise Master of. His Uneasiness in the Company of Women was very remarkable in a Man of such perfect Good breeding, and his avoiding one particular Walk in his Garden, where he had used to pass the greatest Part of his time, raised abundance of idle Conjectures in the Village where he lived. Upon looking over his Papers we found out the Reason, which he never intimated to his nearest Friends. He was, it seems, a passionate Lover in his Youth, of which a large Parcel of Letters he left behind him are a Witness. I send you a Copy of the last he ever wrote upon that Subject, by which you will find that he concealed the true Name of his Mistress under that of Zelinda.

A long Month's Absence would be unsupportable to me if the Business I am employed in were not for the Service of my Zelinda, and of such a Nature as to place her every Moment in my Mind. I have furnished the House exactly according to your Fancy, or, if you please, I own, for I have long since learn'd to do nothing but what you do. The Apartment I designed for your Use is so exact a Copy of that which you live in, that I often sit in it myself in your House when I step into it, I sit when I find it without its proper Inhabitant. You will have the next delicious Prospect from your Closet — my dear Sir at England affords. I am sure I should think it so, if the Landlord that shows such Variety did not at the same time suggest to me the Greatness of the Space that lies between us.

The Gardens are laid out very beautifully, I have dressed up every Hedge in Woodbines, sprinkled Bowers and Arbours in every Corner, and made a little Paradise round me. Yet I am still like the first Man in his Solitude, but half blest without a Partner in my Happiness. I have directed one Walk to be made for two Persons, where I promise ten thousand Satisfaction to my self in your Conversation. I already take my Evening's Turn in it, and have now a Path upon the Edge of this little Alley, while I soothed

'Eternal Duration which I ath ter, or, if I may use the Philosophical Term, we may apprehend a Potential though not an Act ual Eternity.

'This Notion of a future Eternity, which is natural to the Mind of Man, is an unanswerable Argument that he is a Being designed for it, especially if we consider that he is capable of being Virtuous or Vicious here, that he hath Faculties improvable to all Eternity, and by a proper or wrong Employment of them, may be happy or miserable thro' out that infinite Duration. Our Idea indeed of this Eternity is not of an adequate or fixed Nature, but it is perpetually growing, and extending itself toward the Object, which is too big for human Comprehension. As we are now in the Beginnings of Existence, so still we always appear to ourselves as if we were for ever entering upon it. After a Million or two of Centuries, so we considerable Time, already past, may slip out of our Memory, which, if it be not strengthened in a wonderful Manner, may possibly forget that ever there was a Sun or Planets. And yet, notwithstanding the long Race that we shall then have run we shall still imagine ourselves just starting from the Goal and find no Proportion between that Space which we know had a Beginning, and what we are sure will never have an End.

'But I shall leave this Subject to your Management, and question not but you will throw it into such a Light as shall at once improve and entertain your Reader.

'I have enclosed you a Translation of the Speech of Cato on this Occasion, which hath incidentally fallen into my Hands, and which for Correctness, Purity, and Elegance of Phrase, cannot be sufficiently admired.

'I think are none of your Speculations which please me more than those upon Infinity and Eternity. You have already considered that Part of Eternity which is past, and I wish you would give us your Thoughts upon that which is to come.

'Your Readers will perhaps receive greater Pleasure from this View of Eternity than the former, since we have every one of us a Concern in that which is to come. Whereas a Speculation on that which is past is rather curious than useful.

'Besides, we can easily conceive it possible for successive Duration never to have an End though as you have justly observed that Eternity which never had a Beginning is altogether incomprehensible. That is, we can conceive an Eternal Duration which may be, though we cannot an

NEXT to the People who want a Place, there are none to be pitied more than those who are solicited for one. A plain Answer, with a Denial in it, is look'd upon as Pride, and a civil Answer as a Promise.

Nothing is more ridiculous than the Pretensions of People upon these Occasions. Every thing a Man hath suffered, whilst his Enemies were in play, was certainly brought about by the Malice of the opposite Party. A bad Cause would not have been lost, if such an one had not been upon the Bench, nor a profligate Youth disinherited, if he had not got drunk every Night by toasting in outed Ministry. I remember a Lord, who having been fined in a Court of Justice for a Præsumption that deserved the Pillory, desir'd upon the Merit of it to be made a Justice of Peace when his Friends came into Power and shall never forget a Whig Criminal, who, upon being indicted for a Rape, told his Friends, You see what a Man suffers for sticking to his Principles.

The Truth of it is, the Sufferings of a Man in a Party are of a very doubtful Nature. When they are such as have promoted a good Cause, and fallen upon a Man undeserv'dly, they have a Right to be heard and recompens'd beyond any other Pretensions. But when they rise out of Rashness or Indiscretion, and the Pursuit of such Measures as have rather ruin'd, than promoted the Interest they aim at, (which hath always been the Case of many great Sufferers) they only serve to recommend them to the Children of Violence or Folly.

I have by me a Bundle of Memorials presented by several Cavaliers upon the Restauration of King Charles II which may serve as so many Instances, to our present Purpose.

Among several Persons and Pretensions recorded by my Author, he mentions one of a very great Estate, who, for having roasted an Ox whole, and distributed a Hogshhead upon King Charles's Birth-day, desir'd to be provided for, as his Majesty in his great Wisdom shall think fit. Another put in to be Prince Henry's Governor, for having dared to drink his Health in the worst of Times.

A Third petitioned for a Colonel's Commission, for having Curs'd Oliver Cromwell, the Day before his Death, on a publick Bowling Green.

But the most whimsical Petition I have met with is that of B. B. Esq. who desir'd the Honour of Knighthood, for having Cueld Sir T. W. a notorious Roundhead.

There is likewise the Petition of one, who having let his Beard grow from the Martyrdom of King Charles the First, till the Restauration of King

Of the Second, desired, in Consideration thereof to be made a Privy Counsellor.

I must not omit a Memorial setting forth, that the Memorialist had, with great dispatch carried a Letter from a certain Lord to a certain Lord, wherein as it afterwards appeared Measures were concerted for the Restoration, and without which he verily believes that happy Resolution had never been effected who thereupon humbly prays to be made Post Master General.

A certain Gentleman, who seems to write with a great deal of Spirit and uses the Words Gallantry and Gentlen Every often in his Petition, begs that (in Consideration of his having worn his Hat for ten Years past in the Loyal Cavalier-Cock, to his great Danger and Detriment) he may be made a Captain of the Guards. I shall close my Account of this Collection of Memorials with the Copy of one Petition at length, which I recommend to my Reader as a very valuable Piece.

The Letter of J. H. Esq., Junr. to His Grace,

"THAT your Petitioner Father's Brother's Uncle, Colonel H. lost the third Finger of his Left Hand at Id est Fight.

That your Petitioner is remarkable in his Country for being, dared to treat Sir P. P. a ci need Requestrator, and three Members of the Assembly of Divines with Brawn and Minced Pie upon Not Peers Day.

That your said humble Petitioner hath been five times imprisoned in five several County Goals, for having been a Ring leader in five different Riots into which his Zeal for the Royal Cause hurried him when men of greater Estates had not the Courage to rise.

HAVING no spare Time to write any thing of my own, or to correct what is sent me by others, I have thought fit to publish the following Letters.

SIR,

Oxford, Novemb 22

"If you would be so kind to me, as to suspend that Satisfaction, which the I earned World must receive in reading one of your Speculations, by publishing this Labour, you will very much oblige and improve one, who has the Boldness to hope, that he may be admitted into the number of your Correspondents.

I have often wondered to hear Men of good Sense and good Nature profess a Dislike to Music, when, at the same time, they do not scruple to own, that it has the most agreeable and improving Influences over their Mind. It seems to me an unhappy Contradiction, that those Persons should have an Indifference for an Art, which rises in them such a Variety of sublime Measures.

However though some few, by their own or the unreasonable Prejudices of others, may be led into a Distaste for those Musical Societies which are erected merely for Entertainment, yet sure I may venture to say that no one can have the least Reason for Disaffection to that solemn kind of Melody which consists of the Prises of our Creator.

You have, I presume, already prevented me in an Argument upon this Occasion (which some Divines have successfully advanced upon a much greater) that Musical Sacrifice and Adoration has claimed a Place in the Laws and Customs of the most different Nations As the Greeks and Romans of the Prophane, the Jews and Christians of the Sacred World did unanimously agree in this as they disagreed in all other Parts of their Oeconomy.

I know there are not wanting some who are of Opinion that the pompous kind of Music which is in Use in foreign Churches is the most excellent, as it most affects our Senses. But I am swayed by my Judgment to the Modesty which is observed in the musical Part of our Devotions. Methinks there is something very admirable in the Custom of a Voluntary before the first Lesson, by this we are supposed to be prepared for the Admission of those Divine Truths, which we are shortly to receive. We are then to cast all worldly Regards from off our Hearts, all tumults within are then becalmed, and there should be nothing near the Soul but Peace and Tranquility. So that in this short Office of Pruse the Man is raised above himself, and is almost lost already amidst the Joys of Futurity.

I have heard some nice Observers frequently commend the Policy of our Church in this Particular, that it leads us on by such easy and regular Methods, that we are perfectly deceived into Piety. When the Spirits begin to languish

'[as they too often do] with a constant Series of Petitions, she takes care to allow them a pious Respite, and relieves them with the Raptures of an Anthem Nor can we doubt that the sublimest Poetry softened in the most moving Strains of Musick, can ever fail of humbling or exalting the Soul to any Pitch of Devotion Who can hear the Terrors of the Lord of Hosts described in the most expressive Melody, without being awed into a Veneration? or who can hear the kind and endearing Attributes of a merciful Father, and not be softened into Love towards him!

'As the rising and sinking of the Passions, the casting soft or noble Hints into the Soul, is the natural Privilege of Musick in general, so more particularly of that kind which is employed at the Altar Those Impressions which it leaves upon the Spirits are more deep and lasting, as the Grounds from which it receives its Authority are founded more upon Reason It diffuses a Calmness all around us, it makes us drop all those vain or immodest Thoughts which would be an hindrance to us in the Performance of that great Duty of Thanksgiving, which as we are informed by our Almighty Benefactor, is the most acceptable Return which can be made for those infinite Stores of Blessings which he daily condescends to pour down upon his Creatures When we make Use of this pathetic Method of addressing our selves to him, we can scarce contain from Raptures! The Heart is wined with a Sublimity of Goodness We are all Piety and all Love!

'How do the Blessed Spirits rejoice and wonder to behold unthinking Man prostrating his Soul to his dread Sovereign in such a Warmth of Piety as they themselves might not be ashamed of!

'I shall close these Reflections with a Passage taken out of the Third Book of Milton's Paradise Lost, where those harmonious Beings are thus nobly described

Then Crown'd again, their Gold'n Harps they took,

*Harps ever tun'd, that glittering by their side Like Quivers hung, and with Peanble sweet Of Charming Symphony they introduce The Sacred Song, and waken Raptures high,
No one exempt, no Voice but well could join Melodious part, such Concord is in Heav'n*

MR SPECTATOR,

'The Town cannot be unacquainted, that in divers Parts of it there are vociferous Setts of Men who are called Rattling Clubs, but what shocks me most is, they have now the Front to invade the Church and institute these Societies there, as a Clan of them have in late times done, to such a degree of Insolence, as has given the Parition where they reside in a Church near one of the City Gates, the Denomination of the Rattling Pew These gay Fellows, from humble Lay Professions, set up for Criticks without 'any Tincture of Letters or Reading, and have the Vanity to think they can lay hold of something from the Parson, which may be formed into Ridicule

'It is needless to observe, that the Gentlemen who every Sunday have the hard Province of instructing these Wretches in a way they are in no present Disposition to take have a fixt Character for Learning and Eloquence, not to be tainted by the weak Efforts of this contemptible Part of their Audiences Whether the Pulpit is taken by these Gentlemen, or any Strangers their Friends, the way of the Club is thus If any Sentiments are delivered too Sublime for their Conception if any uncommon Topick is entered on, or one in use new modified with the finest Judgment and Dexterity, or any controverted Point be never so elegantly handled, in short whatever surpasses the narrow Limits of their Theology, or is not suited to their Taste, they are all immediately upon their Watch, fixing their Eyes upon each other, with as much Warmth as our Gladiators of Fockey in the Hole, and waiting like them for a Hit if one touches, all take Fire, and their Noddles instantly meet in the Centre of the Pew, then, as by beat of Drum, with exact Discipline, they rear up into a full length of Stature, and with odd Looks and Gesticulations confer together in so loud and clamorous a manner, continued to the close of the Discourse, and during the After-Prism, as is not to be silenced but by the Bells Nor does this suffice them, without aiming to propagate their Noise through all the Church, by Signals given to the adjoining Seats, where others designed for this Fraternity are sometimes placed upon Tryal to receive them

'The Folly as well as Rudeness of this Practice is in nothing more conspicuous than this, that all that follows in the Sermon is lost for whenever our Sparks take alarm, they blaze out and grow so Tumultuous that no After Explanation can avail, it being impossible for themselves or any near them to give an Account thereof If any thing really Novel is advanced, how averse soever it may be to their way of thinking, to say nothing of Duty, Men of less Levity than these would be led by a natural Curiosity to hear the whole

'Laughter, where things Sacred are transacted, is far less pardonable than Whining at a Conventicle, the last has at least a Semblance of Grace, and where the Affection is unseen may possibly imprint wholesome Lessons on the Sincere but the first has no Excuse, breaking through all the Rules of Order and Decency, and manifesting a Remissness of Mind in those important Matters, which require the strictest Composure and Steadiness of Thought, A Proof of the greatest Folly in the World

'I shall not here enter upon the Veneration due to the Sanctity of the Place, the Reverence owing the Minister, or the Respect that so great an Assembly as a whole Parish may justly claim I shall only tell them, that as the Spanish Cobler, to reclaim a profligate Son, bid him 'have some regard to the Dignity of his Family, so they as Gentlemen (for we Citizens assume to

Omnia profecto, cum a celestibus rebus referret ad humanas, excelsum magnuscentiusque et dictet et sentiet — Cicero

THE following Discourse is printed, as it came to my Hands, without Variation

Cambridge, Dec 12
It was a very common Enquiry among the Ancients why the Number of excellent Orators, under all the Encouragements the most flourishing States could give them, fell so far short of the Number of those who excelled in all other Sciences. A Friend of mine used merrily to apply to this Case an Observation of Herodotus, who says, That the most useful Animals are the most fruitful in their Generation whereas the Species of those Beasts that are fierce and mischievous to Mankind are but scarcely continued.
The Historian instances in a Hare, which always either breeds or brings forth and a Lioness which brings forth but once, and then loses all Power of Conception. But, leaving my Friend to his Mirth, I am of Opinion, that in these latter Ages we have greater Cause of Complaint than the Ancients had. And since that solemn Festival is approaching which calls for all the Power of Oratory and which affords as noble a Subject for the Pulpit as any Revelation has taught us, the Design of this Paper shall be to show, that our Moderns have greater Advantages towards true and solid Eloquence, than any which the celebrated Speakers of Antiquity enjoy'd

The first great and substantial Difference is, that their Common Places, in which almost the whole Force of Amplification consists were drawn from the Profit or Honesty of the Action as they regarded only this present State of Duration But Christianity, as it exalts Morality to a greater Perfection, as it brings the Consideration of another Life into the Question as it proposes Rewards and Punishments of a higher Nature, and a longer Continuance, is more adapted to affect the Minds of the Audience, naturally inclined to pursue what it imagines its greatest Interest and Concern. If Pericles, as Historians report, could shake the firmest Resolutions of his Hearers, and set the Passions of all Greece in a Ferment, when the present Welfare of his Country, or the Fear of hostile Invasions, was the Subject. What may be expected from that Orator, who warns his Audience against those Evils which have no Remedy, when once undergones, either from Prudence or Time. As much greater is the Evil in a future State, are than these at present so much are the Motives to Persuasion under Christianity greater than in those which meer moral Considerations could supply us with. But what I now mention relates only to the Power of moving the Affections. There is another Part of Eloquence, which is indeed its Master-piece. I mean the Marvellous or Sublime. In this the Christian Orator has the Advantage beyond Contradiction. Our Ideas are so infinitely enlarg'd by Revelation, the Eye of Reason has so wide a Prospect into Eternity, the Notions of a Deity are so worthy and refined, and the Accounts we have of a State of Happiness or Misery so clear and evident that the Contemplation of such Objects will give our Discourse a noble Vigour, an invincible Force, beyond the Power of any human Consideration. Truly requires in his Perfect Orator some Skill in the Nature of Heavenly Bodies, because, says he, his Mind will become more extensive and unconfin'd, and when he descends to treat of human Affairs, he will both think and write in a more exalted and magnificent Manner. For the same Reason that excellent Master would have recommended the Study of those great and glorious Mysteries which Revelation has discovered to us, to which the noblest Parts of this System of the World are so much inferior, is the Creature is less excellent than its Creator. The wisest and most knowing among the Heathens had very poor and imperfect Notions of a future State.
They had indeed some uncertain Hopes, either received by Tradition, or gathered by Reason, that the Existence of virtuous Men would not be determined by the Separation of Soul and Body.
But they either disbelieved a future State of Punishment and Misery, or upon the same Account that Apelles painted Antigonus with one Side only towards the Spectator, that the Loss of his Eye might not cast a Blemish upon the whole Piece so these represented the Condition of Man in its fairest View, and endeavour'd to conceal what they thought was a Deformity to 'human Nature I have often observed, that whenever the abovementioned Orator in his Philosophical Discourses is led by his Argument to the Mention of Immortality, he seems like one awaked out of Sleep, rous'd and alarm'd with the Dignity of the Subject, he stretches his Imagination to conceive something uncommon, and with the greatness of his Thoughts, casts as it were, a Glory round the Sentence. Uncertain and unsettled as he was, he seems fired with the Contemplation of it. And no thing but such a Glorious Prospect could have forced so great a Lover of Truth, as he was, to declare his Resolution never to part with his Persuasion of Immortality, though it should be proved to be an erroneous one. But had he lived to see all that Christianity has brought to Light, how would he have lavished out all the Force of Eloquence in those noblest Contemplations which humane Nature is capable of, the Resurrection and the Judgment that follows it? How had his Breast glow'd with Pleasure, when the whole Compass of Futurity lay open and expos'd to his View? How would his Imagination have hurried him on in the Pursuit of the Mysteries of the Incarnation? How would he have enter'd, with the Force of Lightning, into the Affections of his Hearers, and fixed their Attention, in spite of all the Opposition of corrupt Nature, upon those glorious Themes which his Eloquence hath painted in such lively and lasting Colours?

This Advantage Christians have, and it was with no small Pleasure I lately met with a Fragment of Longinus, which is preserv'd, as a Testimony of that Critic's Judgment, at the Beginning of a Manuscript of the New Testament in the Vatican Library. After that Author has number'd up the most celebrated Orators among the Grecians, he says, Add to these Paul of Tarsus, the Patron of an Opinion not yet fully proved. As a Heathen, he condemns the Christian Religion and, as an impartial Critic, he judges in Favour of the Promoter and Preacher of it. To me it seems, that the latter Part of his Judgment adds great Weight to his Opinion of St. Paul's Abilities, since, under all the Prejudice of Opinions directly opposite, he is constrained to acknowledge the Merit of that Apostle. And, no doubt, such as Longinus describes St. Paul, such he appeared to the Inhabitants of those Countries which he visited and blessed with those Doctrines he was divinely commissioned to preach. Sacred Story gives us, in one Circumstance, a convincing Proof of his Eloquence, when the Men of Ephesus called him Mercury, because he was the chief Speaker, and would have paid Divine Worship to him, as to the God who invented and presided over Eloquence. This one Account of our Apostle sets his Character, consider'd as an Orator only, above all the celebrated Relations of the Skill and Influence of Demosthenes and his Contemporaries. Their Power in Speaking was admir'd but still it was thought human. Their Eloquence warn'd and ravish'd the Hearers, but still it was thought the Voice of Man, not the Voice of God. What Advantage then had St. Paul above those of Grace, or Romans? I confess I can ascribe this Excellence to nothing but the Power of the Doctrines he deliver'd, which may have still the same Influence on the Hearers, which have still the Power, when preached by a skilful Orator, to make us break out in the same Expressions, as the Disciples who met our Saviour in their Way to Emmaus, made use of, Did not our Hearts burn within us, when he talked to us by the Way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures? I may be thought bold in my Judgment by some, but I must affirm That no one Orator has left us so visible Marks and Footsteps of his Eloquence as our Apostle. It may perhaps be wonder'd at, that in his Reasonings upon Idolatry at Athens, where Eloquence was born and flourish'd, he confines himself to strict Argument only, but my Reader may remember what many Authors of the best Credit have assured us, That all Attempts upon the Affections and Strokes of Oratory were expressly forbidden, by the Laws of that Country, in Courts of Judicature. His want of Eloquence therefore here, was the Effect of his exact Conformity to the Laws. But his Discourse on the Resurrection to the Corinthians, his Harangue before Agrippa upon his own Conversion and the Necessity of that of others, are truly Great, and may serve as full Examples to those excellent Rules for the Sublime, which the best of Critics has left us. The Sum of all this Discourse is, That our Clergy have no farther to look for an Example of the Perfection they may arrive at, than to St. Paul's Harangues that when he, under the Want of several Advantages of Nature (as he himself tells us) was heard, admir'd, and made a Standard to succeeding Ages by the best Judge of a different Persuasion in Religion, I say our Clergy may learn, That, however instructive their Sermons are, they are capable of receiving a great Addition which St. Paul has given them a noble Example of, and the Christian Religion has furnished them with certain Means of attaining to

Ὁ ἐλαχίστων δέόμενος ἐγγίστα ζῶν
Socrates apud Xen

IT was the common Boast of the Heathen Philosophers, that by the Efficacy of their several Doctrines, they made Humane Nature resemble the Divine. How much mistaken soever they might be in the several Means they proposed for this End, it must be owned that the Design was great and glorious. The finest Works of Invention and Imagination are of very little Weight, when put in the Balance with what refines and exalts the rational Mind. Longinus excuses Homer very handsomely, when he says the Poet made his Gods like Men, that he might make his Men appear like the Gods. But it must be allowed that several of the ancient Philosophers acted, as Cicero wishes Homer had done they endeavour'd rather to make Men like Gods, than Gods like Men.

According to this general Maxim in Philosophy, some of them have endeavour'd to place Men in such a State of Pleasure, or Indolence at least, as they vainly imagin'd the Happiness of the Supreme Being to consist in. On the other Hand, the most virtuous Sect of Philosophers have created a chimerical wise Man, whom they made exempt from Passion and Pain, and thought it enough to pronounce him All-sufficient.

This last Character, which divested of the Glare of Human Philosophy that surrounds it, signifies no more, than that a Good and Wise Man should so arm himself with Patience, as not to yield tamely to the Violence of Passion and Pain, that he should learn so to suppress and contract his Desires, as to have few Wants, and that he should cherish so many Virtues in his Soul, as to have a perpetual Source of Pleasure in himself.

The Christian Religion requires, that, after having form'd the best Idea, we are able, of the Divine Nature, it should be our next Care to conform our selves to it, as far as our Imperfections will permit. I might mention several Passages in the sacred Writings on this Head, to which I might add many Maxims and wise Sayings of Moral Authors among the Greeks and Romans.

I shall only instance a remarkable Passage, to this Purpose, out of Julius's Cæsars. The Emperor having represented all the Roman Emperors, with Alexander the Great, as passing, in Review before the Gods, and striving for the Supremacy, lets them all drop excepting Alexander, Julius Cæsar, Augustus Cæsar, Trayan, Marcus Aurelius, and Constantine. Each of these great Heroes of Antiquity lays in his Claim for the upper Place, and, in Order to it, sets forth his Actions after the most advantageous Manner. But the Gods instead of being, dazzled with the Lustre of their Actions, enquire, by Mercury, into the proper Motive and governing Principle that influenced them throughout the whole Series of their Lives and Exploits. Alexander tells them, That his Aim was to conquer. Julius Cæsar, that his was to gain the highest Post in his Country. Augustus, to govern well. Trayan, That his was the same as that of Alexander, namely, To conquer. The Question, at length, was put to Marcus Aurelius, who replied, with great Modesty, That if I had always been his Care to imitate the Gods. This Conduct seems to have gained him the most Votes and best Place in the whole Assembly. Marcus Aurelius being afterwards asked to explain himself declares, That, by imitating the Gods he endeavour'd to imitate them in the Use of his Understanding, and of all other Faculties, and, in particular, That it was always his Study to have as few Wants as possible in himself, and to do all the Good he could to others.

Among the many Methods by which Revealed Religion has advanc'd Morality, this is one, that it has given us a more just and perfect Idea of that Being whom every reasonable Creature ought to imitate. The young Man, in a Heathen Comedy, might justify his Lewdness by the Example of Jupiter, as, indeed, there was scarce any Crime that might not be countenanced by those Notions of the Duty which prevailed among the common People in the Heathen World. Revealed Religion sets forth a proper Object for Imitation, in that Being who is the Pattern, as well as the Source, of all spiritual Perfection.

While we remain in this Life, we are subject to innumerable Temptations, which, if listen'd to, will make us deviate from Reason and Goodness, the only Things wherein we can imitate the Supreme Being. In the next Life we meet with nothing to excite our Inclinations that doth not deserve them. I shall therefore dismiss my Reader with this Maxim, viz. Our Happiness in this World proceeds from the Suppression of our Desires, but in the next World from the Gratification of them.

Sentio Te sedem Hominum ac Domum contemplarique si tibi parva (ut est) ita videtur, hæc celestia semper Spectato, illa humana contentito — Cicero Somn. Scio

THE following Essay comes from the ingenious Author of the Letter upon Notion, printed in a late Spectator. The Notions are drawn from the Platonick way of Thinking, but as they contribute to raise the Mind, and may inspire noble Sentiments of our own future Grandeur and Happiness, I think it well deserves to be presented to the Publick.

If the Universe be the Creature of an intelligent Mind, this Mind could have no immediate Regard to himself in producing it. He needed not to make Trial of his Omnipotence, to be inform'd what Effects were within its Reach. The World as existing in his eternal Idea was then as beautiful as now it is drawn forth into Being, and in the immense Abyss of his Essence are contained far brighter Scenes than will be ever set forth to View, it being impossible that the great Author of Nature should bound his own Power by giving Existence to a System of Creatures so perfect that he cannot improve upon it by any other Exertions of his Almighty Will. Between finite and Infinite there is an unmeasured Interval, not to be filled up in endless Ages, for which Reason, the most excellent of all God's Works must be equally short of what his Power is able to produce as the most imperfect, and may be exceeded with the same Ease.

I his Thought hath made some imagine, (what, it must be confess'd, is not impossible,) that the unfathom'd Space is ever teeming with new Births, the younger still inheriting a greater Perfection than the elder. But as this doth not fall within my present View, I shall content my self with taking Notice, that the Consideration now mentioned proves undeniably, that the Ideal Worlds in the Divine Understanding yield a Prospect incomparably more ample, various and delightful than any Created World can do. And that therefore it is not to be supposed that God should make a World merely of inanimate Matter, however diversified, or inhabited only by Creatures of no higher in Order than Brutes, so the End for which he designed his reasonable Offspring is the Contemplation of his Works, the Enjoyment of himself, and in both to be happy, having, to this Purpose, endowed them with correspondent Faculties and Desires. He can have no greater Pleasure from a bare Review of his Works, than from the Survey of his own Ideas, but we may be assured that he is well pleased in the Satisfaction derived to Beings capable of it, and, for whose Entertainment, he hath erected this immense Theatre. Is not this more than an Intimation of our Immortality? Man, who when considered as on his Probation for a happy Existence hereafter is the most remarkable Instance of Divine Wisdom if we cut him off from all Relation to Eternity, is the most wonderful and unaccountable Composition in the whole Creation. He hath Capacities to lodge a much greater Variety of Knowledge than he will be ever Master of, and an unsatisfied Curiosity to tread the secret Paths of Nature and Providence. But, with this, his Organs, in their present Structure, are rather fitted to serve the Necessities of a vile Body, than to minister to his Understanding and from the little Spot to which he is chained, he can frame but wandering Guesses concerning the innumerable Worlds of Light that encompass him, which, tho' in themselves of a prodigious Bigness, do but just glimmer in the remote Spices of the Heavens and, when with a great deal of Time and Pains he hath laboured a little way up the steep Ascent of Truth, and beholds with Pity the groveling Multitude beneath, in a Moment, his Foot slides, and he tumbles down headlong into the Grave.

Thinking on this, I am obliged to believe, in Justice to the Creator of the World, that there is another State when Man shall be better situated for Contemplation, or rather have it in his Power to remove from Object to Object, and from World to World and be accommodated with Senses, and other Helps for making the quickest and most amazing Discoveries. How doth such a Genius as Sir Isaac Newton, from amidst the Darkness that involves human Understanding, break forth, and appear like one of another Species? The vast Machine, we inhabit, lies open to him, he seems not unacquainted with the general Laws that govern it, and while with the Transport of a Philosopher he beholds and admires the glorious Work, he is capable of prying at once a more devout and more rational Homage to his Maker. But alas! how narrow is the Prospect even of such a Mind? and how obscure to the Compass that is taken in by the Ken of an Angel, or of a Soul but newly escaped from its Imprisonment in the Body! For my Part, I freely indulge my Soul in the Confidence of its future Grandeur, it pleases me to think that I who know so small a portion of the Works of the Creator, and with slow and painful Steps creep up and down on the Surface of this Globe, shall ere long shoot away with the Swiftmess of Imagination, trace out the hidden Springs of Nature's Operations, be able to keep pace with the heavenly Bodies in the Rapidity of their Career, be a Spectator of the long Chain of Events in the natural and Moral Worlds, visit the several Apartments of the Creation, know how they are furnished and how inhabited, comprehend the Order, and measure the Magnitudes, and Distances of those Orbs, which to us seem disposed without any regular Design, and set all in the same Circle, observe the Dependence of the Parts of each System, and (if our Minds are big enough to grasp the Theory) of the several Systems upon one another, from whence results the Harmony of the Universe. In Eternity a great deal may be done of this kind. I find it of use to cherish this generous Ambition for besides the secret Refreshment it diffuses through my Soul, it engages me in an Endeavour to improve my Faculties, as well as to exercise them conformably to the Rank I now hold among reasonable Beings, and the Hope I have of being once advanced to a more exalted Station.

The other, and that the Ultimate End of Man, is the Enjoyment of God, beyond which he cannot form a Wish. Dim it best are the Conceptions we have of the Supreme Being, who, as it were, keeps his Creatures in Suspence, neither discovering, nor hiding himself by which Means, the Libertine hath a Handle to dispute his Existence, while the most are content to speak him fair, but in their Hearts prefer every trifling Satisfaction to the Favour of their Maker, and ridicule the good Man for the Singularity of his Choice. Will there not a Time come, when the Free thinker shall see his impious Schemes overturned, and be made a Convert to the Truths he hates, when deluded Mortals shall be convinced of the Folly of their Pursuits, and the few Wise who followed the Guidance of Heaven, and, scorning the Blandishments of Sense and the sordid Bribery of the World, aspired to a celestial Abode, shall stand possessed of their utmost Wish in the Vision of the Creator? Here the Mind heaves a Thought now and then towards him, and hath some transient Glances of his Presence. When, in the Instant it thinks it self to have the fastest hold, the Object eludes its Expectations, and it falls back tired and baffled to the Ground. Doubtless there is some more perfect way of conversing with heavenly Beings. Are not Spirits capable of Mutual Intelligence, unless immersed in Bodies, or by their Intervention? Must superior Natures depend on inferior for the main Privilege of sociable Beings, that of conversing with, and knowing each other? What would they have done, had Matter never been created? I suppose, not have lived in eternal Solitude. As incorporeal Substances are of a nobler Order, so be sure, their manner of Intercourse is answerably more expedite and intimate. This method of Communication, we call Intellectual Vision, as somewhat Analogous to the Sense of Seeing, which is the Medium of our Acquaintance with this visible World. And in some such way can God make himself the Object of immediate Intuition to the Blessed and as he can, 'tis not improbable that he will, always condescending, in the Circumstances of doing it, to the Weakness and Proportion of finite Minds. His Works but faintly reflect the Image of his Perfections 'tis a Second-hand Knowledge. To have a just Idea of him, it may be necessary that we see him as he is. But what is that? 'Tis something, that never entered into the Heart of Man to conceive yet what we can easily conceive, will be a Fountain of Unspeakable, of Everlasting Rapture. All created Glories will fade and die away in his Presence. Perhaps it will be my Happiness to compare the World with the fur Temples of it in the Divine Mind, perhaps, to view the original Plan of those wise Designs that have been executing in a long Succession of Ages. Thus employed in finding out his Works, and contemplating their Author, how shall I fall prostrate and adoring my body swallowed up in the Immensity of Matter, my Mind in the Infinitude of his Perfections.

ADDITIONAL NOTES

To No 123.—The following letter, dated July 21, 1771, was sent by Addison to his friend Mr Wortley Montagu, with No 123 of the Spectator

'Dear Sir,

'Being very well pleased with this day's Spectator I cannot forbear sending you one of them, and desiring your opinion of the story in it. When you have a son I shall be glad to be his Leontine, as my circumstances will probably be like his. I have within this twelvemonth lost a place of £200 per ann., an estate in the Indies of £14,000, and what is worse than all the rest, my mistress. Hear this, and wonder at my philosophy. I find they are going to take away my Irish place from me too to which I must add, that I have just resigned my fellowship, and that stock sink every day. If you have any hints or subjects pray send me up a paper full. I long to talk in evening with you. I believe I shall not go for Ireland this summer, and perhaps would pass a month with you if I knew where. Lady Bellasis is very much your humble servant. Dick Steele and I often remember you

*I am, Dear Sir,
Yours eternally*

To Nos 453 461, and 465.—The Retrospective Review, vol. xi for 1825, in a cordially appreciative review of the writings of Marvell, says, 'Captain Thompson was a very incorrect and injudicious editor of Marvell's works. A very contemptible charge of plagiarism is also preferred by the editor against Addison for the insertion of three hymns in the Spectator, Nos 453, 461, and 465, no proof whatever is vouchsafed that they belong to Marvell, and the hymn inserted in the Spectator, No 461, "When Israel freed

'from Pharaoh's hand" is now known to be the noble composition of Dr Watts.' Captain Edward Thompson's edition of Marvell in 3 volumes quarto was printed for the editor in 1776. His great blunder was immediately discovered in the Gentleman's Magazine for September, 1776, and February, 1777 where it was shown for example that Dr Watts had chanted and transferred his version of the 114th Psalm (which Captain Thompson supposed to have been chanted by 'Lucky') to his volume of Dr Watts Psalms and Hymns, published in 1719. In the preface to that volume Dr Watts wrote, 'Where I have used three or four lines together of any author I have acknowledged it in the notes.' He did make frequent acknowledgment of lines or thoughts taken from other poets in Psalms 6, 21 63 104 139. But in a note to Ps 114 he absolutely spoke of the work as his own. Now the ground upon which Thompson ascribed this piece to Marvell is precisely that on which he also ascribed to Marvell Addison's poems in Nos 453 and 465 of the Spectator. He found them all in the latter part of a book of extracts of which he said that the first part was in Marvell's handwriting 'and the rest copied by his order.' It is very doubtful whether even the first part of the MS book, containing verse of Marvell's, was really in Marvell's handwriting and that the part written later was copied by his order is an unfounded assumption. Captain Thompson said of the MS book that it was many years in the care of Mr Nettleton and communicated to the editor by Mr Thomas Raikes.—Probably it was Mr Nettleton who in his youth had added to the book copies of Addison's and Dr Watts's verses from the Spectator, and Mallet's version of the old ballad of William and Margaret all of which pieces Captain Edward Thompson therefore supposed to have been written by Marvell.

- 5 HOR Ars Poet. ver 5
Admitted to the sight, would you not laugh?
- 6 JUV Sat. xii 54
Twas impious then (so much was age revered)
For youth to keep their seats when an old man appeared
- 7 HOR 2 Ep ii 208.
Visions and magic spells can you despise
And laugh at witches ghosts and prodigies?
- 8 VIRG AEn i 415.
They march obscure for Venus kindly shrouds With mists their persons and involves in clouds — Dryden
- 9 JUV Sat. xv 163 Tiger with tiger, bear with bear, you'll find In leagues offensive and defensive join'd — Tate
10. VIRG Georg i 201
So the boat's brawny crew the current stem,
And, slow advancing struggle with the stream
But if they slack their hands or cease to strive Then down the flood with headlong haste they drive — Dryden
- 11 JUV Sat ii 63
The doves are censured while the crows are spared
- 12 PERS Sat. v 92
I root th old woman from thy trembling heart.

I hate to see and never can believe — Roscommon
- 23 VIRG AEn ix 420
Fierce Volscens foams with rage and gazing round Descry'd not him who gave the fatal wound, Nor knew to fix revenge — Dryden
24. HOR 1 Sat. ix 3
Comes up a fop (I knew him but by fame),
And seized my hand and call'd me by name—
—My dear!—how dost?
- 25 VIRG AEn xii 46
And sickens by the very means of health.

With equal foot, rich friend impartial fate Knocks at the cottage and the palace gate:
Life's span forbids thee to extend thy cares,
And stretch thy hopes beyond thy years Night soon will seize, and you must quickly go To storied ghosts and Pluto's house below — Creech
- 27 HOR 1 Ep i 20. Imitated
Long as to him who works for debt, the day, Long as the night to her, whose love's away,
Long as the year's dull circle seems to run
When the brisk minor pants for twenty-one So slow th unprofitable moments roll,
That lock up all the functions of my soul,
That keep me from myself and still delay Life's instant business to a future day Thy task, which as we follow or despise,
The eldest is a fool the youngest wise
Which done, the poorest can no wants endure And which not done the richest must be poor — Pope
- 28 HOR 2 Od. x. 19
Nor does Apollo always bend his bow 29. HOR 1 Sat. x 23
Both tongues united sweeter sounds produce, Like Chian mixed with Palermitan juice
- 30 HOR 1 Ep vi 65
If nothing as Mimnermus strives to prove Can ever be pleasant without mirth and love, Then live in mirth and love thy sports pursue — Creech.

Much do I suffer, much to keep in peace Thus jealous, waspish, wrong headed thy misapprehence
Pope
- 40 HOR. 2 Ep. I. 708. Insulated
Yet lest you think I rally more than teach Or prize malignant arts I cannot reach I let me for once presume to instruct the times,
To know the poet from the man of rhymes, Tis he who gives my breast a thousand pricks
Can make me feel each prison that he feigns,
I may compose with more than magic art,
With pity and with terror tear my heart,
And stretch me o'er the earth or through the air To Thebes to Athens when he will and where.
Pope
- 41 OVID Met. I. 671.
So found is worse than lost — Adriana
- 42 HOR. 2 Ep. I. 222. Imitated
I could as the wolves on Orca's stony steep, Howl to the roarin', o' the north can deep;
Such is the shout the loud applauding note,
At Quin's high plume or Oldfield's peal Or when from court a birth day suit bestow'd Sinks the lost actor in the tawdry lord Booth enters — hark! the universal peal —
But has he spoken? — Not a syllable —
What shook the st. and made the people stare?
Cato's long wig flower'd down and flicker'd hair
Pope
- 43 VIRG. Æn. VI. 854
Be these thy arts to bid contention cease Chain up stern wars and give the nations peace, Or subject lands extend thy gentle sway
And teach with iron rod the brutality to obey

- 63 HOR. Ars Poet. ver. 1
If in a picture Piso, you should see A handsome woman with a flaxen tail Or a man's head upon a horse's neck,
Or limbs of beasts of the most different kinds, Cover'd with feathers of all sorts of birds Would you not laugh, and think the painter mad?
Trust me that book is as ridiculous,
Whose incoherent style like sick men's dreams Varies all shapes and mixes all extremes.

This ground with Bacchus, that with Ceres suits
That other loads the trees with happy fruits,
A fourth with grass, unbidden decks the ground.
Thus Tmolus is with yellow saffron crown'd, Indra black ebony and white ivory bears
And soft Idume weeps her odorous tears Thus Pontus sends her heavier stones from far And naked Strymon's temper steel for war; Pyrus for th' Ælian chariot breeds (In hopes of palms) a race of running steeds.
This is th' original contract, these the laws Imposed by nature and by nature's cause. — Dryden

'Concerning the Small-Pox

'R Stroughton, Apothecary, at the Unicorn in Southwark, having about 'Christmas last Published in the Postman, Tatler and Courant, a long Advertisement of his 'large Experience and great Success in curing the Small-Pox, even of the worst Kind and 'Circumstances, having had a Reputation for it almost 30 years, and can say than not 3
'in 20 miscarry under his hands, doth now contract it, and only repeats, that he thinks
'he has attain'd to as great a Certainty therein (and the Measles which are near of Kin)
'as has been acquir'd in curing any one disease (an Intermitting Feaver with the Bark 'only excepted) which he conceives may at this time, when the Small-Pox so prevails, and
'is so mortal, justify his Publications, being pressed by several so to do, and hopes it may 'be for the Good of many He has had many Patients since his last Publication and but 'One of all dy'd He hath also Certificates from above 20 in a small time Cured, and 'of the worst sort What is here offered is Truth and Matter of Fact, and he will, if 'desired, go with any one to the Persons themselves who have been Cured, many of whom 'are People of Value and Figure 'Tis by a correct Management, more than a great deal 'of Physick, by which also the Face and Eyes are much secured, tho' one Secret he has '(obtained only by Experience and which few or none know besides) that when they sud'denly strike in very rarely fails of raising them again in a few Hours, when many other 'things, and proper too, have not answered He does not desire, nor aim at the supplant-
'ing of any Physician or Apothecary concerned, but gives his assisting Advice if desired,
'and in such a way not Dishonourable or Injurious to either'

'Angelick Snuff The most noble Composition in the World, removing all 'manner of Disorders of the Head and all Swimming or Giddiness proceeding from
'Vapours, &c, also Drowsiness, Sleepiness and other lethargick Effects, perfectly curing
'Deafness to Admiration, and all Humours or Soreness in the Eyes, &c, strengthning them
'when weak perfectly cures Catarrhs, or Defluxions of Rheum, and remedies the Tooth-ach
'instantly, is excellently beneficial in Apoplectick Fits and Falling-Sickness, and assuredly
'prevents those Distempers, corroborates the Brain, comforts the Nerves, and revives
'the Spirits Its admirable Efficacy in all the above mention'd Diseases has been ex-
'perienc'd above a Thousand times, and very justly causes it to be esteem'd the most 'beneficial Snuff in the World, being good for all sorts of Persons Price 1s a Paper

SOME ADVERTISEMENTS

FROM THE ORIGINAL NUMBERS OF THE SPECTATOR

In No. 1 Books only were advertised, and they were, Dr James Drake's 'Anthropologia Norica, or, a New System of Anatomy', Sir William Petty's 'Political Arithmetic, a translation of Bernard Lamy's 'Perspective made Easy', 'The Compleat Geographer', an Essay towards the Probable Solution of this Question 'Where those birds do probably make their abode which are absent from our Climate, & some certain Times and Seasons of the Year' By a Person of Learning. The second edition of 'The Origin and Institution of Civil Government Discus'd, by the Rev Benjamin Hoadly, M.A., Rector of St. Peter's, poor (who did not become a Bishop until 1715) a third edition of 'The Works of the Right Rev Ezekiel Hopkins late Lord Bishop of London, &c.', and newly published, a Collection of Debates, Reports, Orders and Resolutions of the House of Commons, touching the right of Electing Members to sit in Parliament.

No. 2 was without advertisements. Nos. 3 to 9 still advertised only Books. No. 10 placed five miscellaneous advertisements before the books, one of 'The Number of Silk Gowns that in weekly sold at Mrs Rogers's, in Exchange Alley, one of a House to Let at 5000, one of Spanish Snuff, and two of Church and Spinneth (Villa Nova, Barcelona and Galera) Wines. The book advertisements predominating still — with at first only one or at most two general advertisements, as of Plain Spanish Snuff, Yew and Holly Plants for sale, the dancing glasses and decanters at the Fleet Glass-House in Whitechapel, a large House to let with a large House stables and all other conveniences, the sale of a deceased Gentleman's Library, or a Lieutenant's Commission lost or mislaid — we come to the first of the quick and transient notices in No. 25. They are from a purgative house, one of a 'Chrysal Cosmickel', the other 'A new and incomparable Paste for the Hands far exceeding anything ever yet in Print. It makes them Delicately white, sleek and plump fortifies them against the scorching heat of the Fire or Sun and Shyness of the Wind. A Hand cannot be so spoiled but the use of it will recover them'.

In No. 27 the first advertisement is of a Concert of Vocal and Instrumental Music by the best Masters, which would be performed for the benefit of Mrs. Moore at the Desire of several Persons of Quality. It is to be given 'at the 10 Golden Balls, in Fleet Street the Upper End of Bow Street Covent Garden'.

The first advertisement in the following number is of a boarding school for young gentlewomen, 'near the Windmill in Humpstead'. 'The famous Water Theatre of the ingenious Mr Winstanly' was to be opened on the ensuing Easter Monday, and

'There is a Parcel of extraordinary fine Bohee Tea to be sold at 26s per Pound, at the Sign of the Barber's Pole next door to the Drapers shop in Southampton Street in the Strand N.B. The same is to be sold from 10 to 12 in the Morning and from 2 to 4 in the Afternoon

Next day we have

'Just Published, and Printed very Correctly, with a neat Elzevir Letter, in 2mo for the Pocket,

'Paradise Lost, a Poem in twelve Books, written by Mr. John Milton. The

There lived in Prætor Georgii (they record)
A worthy member no small fool, a lord Who, though the house was up delighted sate, Heard noted, answer'd as in full debate,
In all but this a man of sober life Fond of his friend, and civil to his wife,
Not quite a madman, though a pasty fellow,
And much too wise to walk into a well.
